of the ensuing April. From that time to the last of April the plaintiff frequently went into the city in the morning and returned at night. On the 30th of April, he went to Boston and staid till the 2d of May, when he returned to Waltham. For about two weeks after this time he was often in Boston, remaining in the day time only; and in June, while some of his grandchildren were ill in Boston, he stayed every other night in the city. Except at this time he was not in Boston in 1832 more than in previous years; but his housekeeper remained there during the rest of the year, except a few weeks in the summer, keeping the house open for his reception, in the same manner as had usually been done before the period in question. From that time till the time of the trial at October term, 1834, the plaintiff had resided at Waltham as before. After the plaintiff went to Boston on the 30th of April, 1832, he sent to the assessors of that city a schedule of his real and personal estate, and was taxed there at the sum of $1,536.54, which tax he paid." On the foregoing facts the trial court instructed the jury that the plaintiff had a right to elect in which of the places he would be taxed and that if they found that the plaintiff had elected to be taxed in Boston they should find for him. This construction was held to be erroneous in that it withdrew from the jury consideration of all evidence except of the plaintiff's election, and because the question should have been left to the jury on all the facts and circumstances of the case.

In Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Metc. 242, "it appeared from the report of Wilde, J., before whom the case was tried, that in the year 1836, the plaintiff was an inhabitant of Boston, but in the month of October in that year, he went with his family to Edinburgh in Scotland, where he lived at lodgings for a short time, and afterwards went to housekeeping, taking a governess into his family for his younger children; that his principal residence, ever since, had been at Edinburgh, but during a part of each year he had lived on an estate, in the neighborhood of that city, which he had hired for a term of years; that in July, 1837, the plaintiff came to Boston on private business, where he remained a few days only, and then returned to his family in Edinburgh. It also appeared that the plaintiff, while a boy, was at school in Edinburgh for four years previous to 1813, and on his return to this country in that year, and on numerous occasions since (the last of which was not more than a year or two before his removal, in 1836) he expressed a great predilection for Edinburgh as a place of residence, and a desire and intention to live there, if he ever should have the means to enable him to do so; that about the time of his departure in 1836, and while making his preparations, he declared to two of his friends his intention to reside abroad, as long as his wife should be pleased with or like such residence; and that he should stay as long as he could, and if he ever should come back to this country, he should not live in Boston, as he preferred New York or Baltimore; and that in April, 1837, he requested a friend then in Edinburgh, and about to return to Boston, to make a contract, for two years, with a gentleman in this country, to go out to the plaintiff for the purpose of superintending the education of his children. It further appeared, that in the winter previous to the plaintiff's removal, he made a contract for the sale of his mansion house and furniture in Boston, but shortly afterwards procured the contract to be annulled, giving as his reason for so doing that in case of his death in Europe his wife might wish to return to Boston; and before he went away, he let the house and furniture to a tenant, who still occupies it." The court said, in that case: "Guiding ourselves by the rules which have been applied to motions for new trials, the court are of opinion, that a verdict against the plaintiff, upon this evidence, finding that he had not changed his residence and ceased to be an inhabitant of Boston, at the time this tax was assessed, would have been so manifestly against the evidence, that on a motion for a new trial, it could not have been supported."

In Sears v. Boston, 1 Metc. 250, the following facts appeared: "The plaintiff, on the 1st of June, 1836, was, and for many years prior to that time, had been, an inhabitant of the city of Boston. On that day, he left said city, with the intention of residing, with his family, in Paris, in the kingdom of France. All the members of his family followed him in September of the same year, and his dwelling house, with its furniture, was leased for one year. The plaintiff, at the time of his departure for France, intended to resume his residence in Boston, but he had not determined, or thought of, the particular time of his return. It was his expectation to be absent three years at least, and to remain, with his family, stationary in Paris, in which city he hired a dwelling house for one year. The state of commercial affairs in this country induced the plaintiff to return to Boston in October, 1837, and his family returned in July, 1838. On the 1st of May, 1837, the plaintiff was assessed, by the city assessors, for his poll and personal estate in the taxes laid for that year, and he paid the tax to the city collector, upon compulsion. Prior to the assessment of said tax, viz., on the 29th of March, 1837, the authorized agent of the plaintiff delivered the following notice to the assessors of said city: 'The undersigned, as agent of David Sears, and in his behalf, informs you that Mr. Sears with his family removed from this city, and leased his mansion house, nearly a year since. He has ever since continued and still continues absent with his family. This notice is given to enable you, before the assessment of taxes for the current year, to understand that Mr. Sears will not consider himself chargeable with taxes as an inhabitant of, or resident in, Boston.'" Upon these facts, and distinguishing Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Metc. 242, the court held that the plaintiff had not lost his residence in Boston. The court said: "Taking the facts as submitted to the court, in the present case, we are all of opinion that they indicate a casual and temporary departure of the plaintiff from his place of permanent abode, and that he still continued to be an inhabitant of Boston, liable to be taxed for his poll and personal property. Most of the circumstances point to Boston as the fixed place of his abode. and to Paris as a place of temporary residence. Here he was born and educated, and acquired his property. Here was his dwelling house; and though leased during his absence, it was with the furniture, and for a very short term, so that his family establishment could be resumed on his return. But the very strong circumstance which characterizes this case is, that at the time of the plaintiff's departure, it was his intention to resume his residence in Boston. It indicates that Paris was a place of temporary and not of permanent abode, and that he did not relinquish his domicile, or cease to be an inhabitant of Boston. Had he returned to Boston a few days before a town meeting or an election, we think he would have had a right to attend and vote as an inhabitant, in the same manner as if he had not been absent. He would have been in the same situation, in this respect, as a soldier, or mariner, or other person temporarily absent from his home, for purposes of business or pleasure. The circumstance of the plaintiff's taking a house in Paris for one year—it not appearing he engaged, or that it was his intention to engage, in any business or occupation abroad—is not sufficient to control the other circumstances tending to show that Paris was a place of a temporary visit, and not of permanent residence; that he was there as a sojourner, and not as an inhabitant. Each case of this description depends so much upon its own circumstances, that it is difficult to find authorities for anything more than a few general positions, which are plain and well understood. We think this case is distinguishable from that of Thorndike v. Boston [supra] in this, that in that case, at the time of the departure of the plaintiff from Boston, it was his declared intention not to return and resume his residence. This was strengthened by proof of preferences previously and frequently declared in favor of a foreign permanent residence and abode, and by a declared purpose, after taking up a residence at Edinburgh, not to return to Boston. In the present case, there was, at the time of the departure of the plaintiff from Boston, an intention to return and resume his residence in Boston, though at no fixed period, accompanied with circumstances indicating a temporary and not a permanent residence in Paris. The court are therefore of opinion that the plaintiff continued to be an inhabitant of Boston, liable by law to taxation, and that he is not entitled to recover back the money paid as a tax upon his person and personal property."

In Otis v. Boston, 12 Cush. 44, the facts and the conclusion of the court were stated as follows: "Boston was his domicile of origin, his native place, where he passed the earlier years of his life. He was beyond doubt an inhabitant of that place till 1828. He then left Boston, went to New York, took up his abode, and established himself in business there, and beyond doubt acquired a domicile or became an inhabitant there. This continued until his return to Boston in 1840. . . . [He] came to Boston without any definite intent to return to New York; he had his abode there eight years, and until the decease of his father in 1848. He was one of the executors of his father's will, and remained there in the performance of his duties as such, until April, 1849. The question is then brought to this, whether anything was done by Mr. Otis, by which he ceased to be an inhabitant of Boston, between April 5 and May 1, 1849. . . . In April Mr. Otis went to New York, but avowedly to take passage for Europe; it was not with any intent to resume his residence in New York as a home. His frequent intimations that it was his intention, after the decease of his father, to go to Europe, were accompanied with no act having a tendency to carry such an intention into effect. And so when he returned to Boston after the first of May, and sailed thence at the end of that month, he had fixed no place of abode definitely. He sailed for England, but not to stay there. He thought of going to Paris; but with a purpose so indefinite, that he was induced, by the existence of cholera in Paris, to go to Switzerland. Indeed, the most definite declaration of purpose, when he was about taking his departure for Europe was, that he should reside in Paris, or if he returned, should settle in New York. We attach no importance to the fact of his returning to Boston in May, 1849, and sailing from there instead of New York; independently of that circumstance, we think he was an inhabitant to the fifth of April, and that he had not ceased to be an inhabitant of Boston, certainly until he sailed for Europe, after the first day of May. How much longer he may have been considered an inhabitant of Boston, we give no opinion."

In Cabot v. Boston, 12 Cush. 52, it was held that the plaintiff was a resident of Brookline and taxable there on May 1, although at that date he was not physically present there on account of sickness, the facts of the case appearing as follows: "It was agreed that the plaintiff for more than twenty years owned a house in the city of Boston, which he occupied with his family five or six months in every year. On the first day of May, 1850, he was remaining in the house, with his wife. For more than twenty years next preceding May 1, 1850, he had owned a house in Brookline. He had occupied this house during said period not less than six months, and generally about seven months every year, commencing his occupation in April and ending it in November. During the rest of the year it was closed. During said twenty years, the plaintiff had paid his yearly tax, and exercised all municipal privileges in Brookline. The five or six months in every year, not spent at his house at Brookline, were passed by the plaintiff in Boston, at the house before mentioned, owned and solely occupied by himself and family. This house was closed during his residence at Brookline, until within a few years last past, when a domestic was left in it for the purpose of protecting the property. Since the year 1846, about eight weeks in every year, in mid-summer, have been passed by the plaintiff at a house on the seashore, at Beverly, owned and furnished by himself. In April, 1850, the usual preparations were made by the plaintiff and his family to remove from Boston to Brookline. Certain articles of furniture, which the plaintiff was in the habit of removing from one house to the other with his change of residence, were removed during the last week in April; the carpets in his house in Boston were taken up, and the other furniture was covered, and placed in its usual condition for the summer, and a domestic was living in the house, who was engaged to remain as aforesaid. The plaintiff, at and before that time, was suffering from a severe illness, but had declared his intention of removing upon the 28th day of April. On that day, in the opinion of his physicians, a removal to Brookline would endanger his health and life, and he sent a letter to the assessors of Brookline, stating the circumstances by which he was detained in Boston, and his intention to continue a citizen of Brookline, taxable there. He remained in Boston, with his wife, with no other attendance than was requisite for his comfort, until after the first day of May. Sometime in May, and as soon as a removal was permitted by his medical attendants, he was removed to his house at Brookline."

In Cole v. Cheahire, 1 Gray 441, the court held that a change of residence had been achieved before May 1, by the plaintiff, a resident of Cheshire, it appearing that he went, on April 27, to Lanesborough, with his trunks and horse, where he engaged a boarding place, telling the person with whom he contracted for board that he would like to come and live with him for one year, and make his home with him, since he intended to leave his father's home in Cheshire; that he was chosen, and served as, surveyor of highways in Lanesborough for two years and paid taxes in that town. The court said: "The question really at issue between the parties and upon which the case was determined was one of domicile, whether the plaintiff on the first day of May, 1851, was an inhabitant of Cheshire, and so liable to taxation in that town. He had been an inhabitant of Cheshire to April 27th 1851, and that domicile continued till he had acquired a new one. He averred that he had acquired such new domicile in Lanesborough. To establish this, he offered evidence to prove, first, a residence de facto in Lanesborough on the first of May, 1851, and secondly, that he was there with the intent of making it his home or place of abode. It was not difficult to prove that he was at Lanesborough before the first of May, that he came there with his horse and trunks, and made a contract for board and lodging. But the effect of these acts depended upon the intent and purposes with which they were done. If that intent and purpose were to work on the farm of Chase during the summer and autumn, and return to his father's house and home the ensuing winter, the facts proved would avail the plaintiff nothing. Qualified by such intent and purpose, they were perfectly consistent with the intention of retaining his domicile in Cheshire; they would not only fail to show a change of domicile, but they would exclude the conclusion. The plaintiff must prove that he left Cheshire with the intent of abandoning his old domicile and of acquiring a new one. That intent is manifested by what he does, and by what he says when doing, and sometimes as significantly by what he omits to do or to say. The plaintiff undertook to show, that before he actually went to Lanesborough to reside, he had the purpose of leaving Cheshire, and that he had a negotiation with Chase, with the view of going to live with him, and which finally resulted in his so doing. In this negotiation he stated that it was his purpose not to live with his father after his time was out in April. This negotiation, with the declaration of purpose and intent, which not so much accompanied as made part of it, was a fact competent to be proved. Whether the negotiation was successful, whether it ripened into a contract or not, might affect the weight, but not the competency of the evidence. Such declarations are, within the strictest rule, part of the res gestae, qualifying and giving character to the principal thing done. The sum of the whole matter simply is, that, to prove his intent to leave his old domicile, the plaintiff offered and was permitted to show that he had been in negotiation for a new one, with the avowed purpose of abandoning the old. It is open, of course, to the defendants, to show that the whole thing is collusive and a sham; but if real and in good faith, it furnishes the kind of evidence of which the case is, in its nature, susceptible, and which, uncontrolled, is satisfactory. It was competent for the plaintiff, with a view to show that the purpose he had formed of abandoning his domicile in Cheshire had been carried into effect, to prove that his domicile still continued in Lanesborough, and to exclude any inference that he had gone there for a temporary object, and with the intent to return after that object should have been attained. To this end he might show that he was a highway surveyor in Lanesborough, or had engaged in any pursuit or calling indicating the design and purpose of making Lanesborough a place of permanent residence."

In Bulkley v. Williamstown, 3 Gray 493, the following facts appeared: "Prior to the 1st of May, 1853, the plaintiff, who had previously been an inhabitant of Williamstown, had made preparations for removing from Williamstown to the west, contemplating a residence in Rock Island, Illinois; and that the last week in April he left Williamstown with his family, and took rooms and board in Adams, where he remained for two weeks, and then left his family and went to Rock Island, purchased real estate, located himself, returned for his family and goods, and took them to Rock Island, where he had ever since resided. There was conflicting evidence as to the nature and purpose of the plaintiff's residence in Adams. The trial judges instructed the jury that if the plaintiff had removed from Williamstown before the 1st of May, 1853, with a bona fide intention of abandoning his residence in that town from that time, and with no present intention of ever again making it his home, still he remained an inhabitant of Williamstown, for the purpose of taxation, unless he had, before the 1st of May, acquired a domicile in Adams, by his temporary residence in that town; and that the plaintiff, for the purpose of taxation, retained his residence in Williamstown, until he acquired one elsewhere, although he had, before the 1st of May, abandoned the town of Williamstown, with the intention of never residing there again; and that he would not acquire a domicile in Rock Island till he went there. The verdict was for the defendants and the plaintiff alleged exceptions to these instructions." The court on appeal overruled the exceptions to these instructions, saying: "The question in this case is, where was the plaintiff's domicile on the 1st of May, 1853? Clearly not in Rock Island, Illinois, for he had not taken up his abode there. But he was an inhabitant of Massachusetts, for the purposes of taxation, and of some town, city or district. There being no evidence in regard to any other place but Williamstown and Adams, his domicile or place of residence must have been in one of these, and the question is which of them. Whether he had left Williamstown, with an intent to make Adams his place of abode, was a question of fact, which was left to the jury, who decided that he had not, which appears to us to be right, according to the evidence as reported."

In Carnoe v. Freetown, 9 Gray 357, the facts appeared to be that the plaintiff, an inhabitant of Providence, losing his health, gave up his business there and moved, with his wife, to Freetown, Mass., and the following further facts were stated by the reporter: "The plaintiff himself testified that when he removed to Freetown, he did it with the intent of remaining there through the warm weather, and of returning to Providence as early as the September following, to do such business in Providence as he could find to do, and reside there. He remained with his wife in Freetown until September, 1854, when, his health being sufficiently restored, he attempted to get into business in Providence, and for that purpose went there several times during the subsequent fall and winter, but did not succeed in finding business agreeable to him before the 27th of March, 1855, up to which time, except when temporarily absent, he continued to reside with his wife in Freetown. On the 27th of March, 1855, the plaintiff went to Providence and bought the interest in a cotton manufactory in Uxbridge in this state, and on the 2d of April, 1855, entered into a partnership, under which he had since carried on the factory. About the middle of April, 1855, he hired a house in Cumberland, R. I., and made a contract for the carriage from Freetown to Providence, as soon as possible, of his furniture and his mother's, which were put on board a vessel and carried out of the river on the first day of May, the earliest day upon which the goods could be conveniently put on board the vessel on account of the state of the tides; and a few days afterwards, the plaintiff's wife went to Cumberland, and the plaintiff and his family had since occupied said house. From the 27th of March, 1855, to the 1st of May, 1855, the plaintiff was a part of the time in Providence, a part of the time in Uxbridge, and a part of the time in Freetown, and on said first day of May was in Freetown. The plaintiff also testified that at the time of entering into his present business, on the 27th of March, 1855, he intended, as soon as he could make arrangements, to remove his family to Cumberland, and reside there. It was also shown by the plaintiff, that for the year 1854 he was taxed in Providence, but did not pay that tax until June, 1855, after the defendants had assessed him for the year 1855 in Freetown; and that in August, 1855, he was assessed as a resident of Cumberland." Holding that the plaintiff was domiciled for taxation in Freetown on May 1, the court said: "On the 1st of May, 1855, when this tax was assessed, the plaintiff had ceased to be domiciled in Providence, because he had in fact quitted it, and, as early certainly as March, abandoned his intention to return to it. He had not acquired a domicile in Uxbridge or Cumberland, because he had not removed there, nor exercised any right of citizenship there; he had only an intention of removing. He was actually in person in Freetown on the 1st of May, and had no domicile for taxation elsewhere. He was therefore taxable in Freetown."

In Briggs v. Rochester, 16 Gray 337, the agreed facts were as follows: "That in April 1858 the plaintiff, who was then an inhabitant of the town of Rochester, removed out of the state, with the intention not only not to return and have his home in that town, but also with the intention to make his future abode and home in Motthaven in the state of New York; but that, before he took up his intended new abode, he stopped at the house of his son in the city of New York 'till and including the 1st of May, 1858;' and that shortly afterwards he went to Motthaven, where he has since resided. On these facts the question is, whether the plaintiff, on the said first of May, was an inhabitant of the town of Rochester, within the meaning of the ninth section of chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes, which directs that 'personal estate shall be assessed to the owner in the town where he shall be an inhabitant on the first day of May.'" On those facts the court held that the plaintiff was not an inhabitant of Rochester on May 1, 1858, having acquired a new domicile in New York.

In Kirkland v. Whately, 4 Allen 462, the court held that the domicile of origin of an infant has been lost and a new domicile acquired, by facts which appeared in the agreed statement as follows: "Isaac was born in 1845, and has been blind for many years. His father died in 1852 and his mother in 1854, both having their domicile in Northampton. His paternal grandfather resides in Northampton, but has had no wife for many years. His maternal grandfather and grandmother reside in Whately. Until his mother's death, the family of his father lived in the same house with his paternal grandfather, but after her death, the grandfather having no family except hired help, he ceased to live there. Controversies arose as to where he should remain, and suits as to matters connected with his estate. In April, 1857, these controversies were arranged, and Isaac by his guardian's direction was brought to his grandfather's house in Whately, where he has ever since remained, considering it as his home. The guardian has regularly paid for his board there. Since the death of his mother, he has had no place in Northampton to which he has habitually resorted or gone as a home, but occasionally has been to see his relations there; and the guardian has not reserved or provided for him any boarding place or rooms at Northampton, or had any such place in his mind. His friends and attachments are almost entirely in the family of his grandfather in Whately, and he has been living there without any plan or expectation of removing to any other place. He owns real estate to a large amount in Northampton, which is managed by the guardian; and the guardian has been taxed in Northampton every year since his appointment, in 1853, for personal estate of Isaac, and has paid the taxes without objection till last year. He has also been taxed in Whately since 1859, but has paid no tax there, except under protest. When Isaac first went to Whately, the guardian intended that he should merely make a visit of a few months there, and afterwards go to some school out of Whately, and so informed him, and afterwards endeavored at various times to induce him to go to some such school, but without success. The guardian has allowed him to remain in Whately, because Isaac wished it; and has no definite intention to allow him to remain, or to remove him."

In Colton v. Longmeadow, 12 Allen 598, the following facts appeared from the agreed statement: "On the 1st of April, 1864, the plaintiff was and always had been a resident of Longmeadow, and was subject to taxation there. That night, his buildings were destroyed by fire, and on the 12th of April he sold all his real and most of his personal estate in the town, and at various times during that month declared his intention of leaving Longmeadow and going to Philadelphia, and so informed one of the assessors. He left Longmeadow for Philadelphia on the 28th of April; reached Hartford, in Connecticut, on the 30th of April, where he was detained a few days by lameness; and then proceeded directly to Philadelphia, where he has since resided. On the 1st of May he was not in Massachusetts, but was in Connecticut, on his way to Philadelphia. Before the first of May, he had determined to leave Longmeadow, with the fixed intention not to return there to reside; and had the intention to go to Philadelphia to reside." The court said: "The plaintiff on the first day of May 1864 had abandoned his domicile in this state, and had gone beyond its limits, not intending to return here to reside, but intending to take up his residence in the state of Pennsylvania, where he has ever since resided. On said 1st of May he was in itinere, but he had absolutely abandoned his residence in this state, and had departed therefrom. If he had still continued within the state he would have been liable to taxation in Longmeadow, although he had actually left that town. . . . But having departed beyond the limits of the commonwealth on his way to his new place of residence, he had ceased to be an inhabitant of Longmeadow on the first day of May, 1864, so as to be taxable there within the meaning of Gen. Sts. c. 11, § 26."

In Bangs v. Brewster, 111 Mass. 382, the court set forth the essential facts and stated their holding as follows: "The question is as to the application of this rule to the facts of this case. The plaintiff was a shipmaster, most of whose time was spent at sea. He went to sea in November, 1867, taking his wife with him, and in December, 1868, he sent his wife to Orleans, and she arrived there in February, 1869. He did not arrive at Orleans until July, 1869, so that he was not personally present in Orleans on May 1, 1869. The special findings of the jury settle conclusively that when he went to sea in November, 1867, he had the definite intent to make Orleans his home, and that in December, 1868, he sent his wife to Orleans in pursuance of that intent. We think the jury were justified in finding that his domicile was in Orleans on the first of May. By sending his wife to Orleans with the intent to make it his home, he thereby changed his domicile. The fact of removal and the intent concurred. Although he was not personally present, he established his home there from the time of his wife's arrival. We think the learned judge who presided at the trial rightly refused to rule, as requested, that the plaintiff had not shown such a personal presence in Orleans as the law required in order to effect a change of domicile, and that the instructions given upon this subject, when applied to the facts of the case, were correct."

Where a person domiciled in Boston, left there in 1876, going to Europe with his family to reside for an indefinite length of time, intending never to return to Boston, but to return to another place of domicile, selected another place of residence while in Europe, before May 1, 1877, but did not return to America and take up residence in the place of his selection until 1879, it was held that his domicile in Boston continued to adhere to him, for purposes of taxation on May 1, 1877. Borland v. Boston, 132 Mass. 89, 42 Am. Rep. 424.

In Viles v. Waltham, 157 Mass. 542, 32 N. E. 901, 34 Am. St. Rep. 311, it appeared that the plaintiff was domiciled in Waltham, Mass., until April 28, 1890, when he started for Chicago, arriving the following day and afterwards dwelling and having his residence there. It was held that his residence had been changed to Chicago, on evidence which was stated as follows: "The plaintiff was asked, 'Did you have any talk with the assessors prior to May 1, 1890, with regard to your residence?' His answer was, 'I didn't see them together; I saw the chairman, Mr. Smith, first; I told him I should change my residence to Chicago. . . . When I told him that, 'Do you require me to give you writing to that effect?' I asked him at the time. He hesitated and said, 'You say you shall change?'" "Yes, sir, I shall change," I said. Then he said, "No, there is no need of your giving me a writing; you have a right to change your residence if you like." It appeared by other testimony that this conversation was just before he started for Chicago. One Underwood, connected with the Chicago firm to which the plaintiff belonged, was asked in the seventh interrogatory of his deposition: 'Did the plaintiff at any time within these years (1889, 1890), and prior to September 1st, 1890, have any conversation or correspondence with you, or in your presence, in regard to making or having made Chicago his residence?' The answer was: 'He had a number of conversations with me on that point, and also had correspondence. He said to me that he desired to make Chicago his home; that his family was scattered, and his business interests were larger in Chicago and Omaha than elsewhere; that he had elected and decided to make a change of residence, and solicited my advice and assistance as to what steps were necessary to bring about such a result; he told me he would like to see the assessor here (Chicago) to announce his intention to become a citizen of Chicago. I told him I did not think that would be of any use; that he was an American citizen, and had a perfect right to elect his place of residence anywhere in the country if he did it in good faith and did not take any action at any other place than Chicago in the way of voting, and so on, which would show that he made that particular place his home. He said he had decided to make Chicago his home, and that he should act under that decision, and wanted to take any steps that were necessary to carry that resolution in force.' The eighth interrogatory was the same as the seventh, except that 'May 1st, 1890,' was substituted for 'September 1st, 1890.' The answer was: 'I had a conversation with Mr. Viles prior to the 1st of May, 1890, regarding his taking up his residence in Chicago, and making it his home. He told me that he had determined to do so, and should take all necessary steps possible to conform to that decision. He asked me what it was necessary for him to do. He said he had notified his friends East that he had taken steps, and had told people here also, and that it was his decision to become a citizen of the state of Illinois, and give up his citizenship in Massachusetts.' It appeared by other testimony that these conversations were late in April and early in May, 1890."

In Dallinger v. Richardson, 176 Mass. 77, 57 N. E. 224, it was held that a finding by the court that for many years prior to his death the deceased was a resident of Washington and not of Cambridge on the following facts: "The defendants' testator, William A. Richardson, died in Washington, D. C., on October 19, 1896, leaving a will in which he described himself as 'a citizen and inhabitant of Cambridge in the county of Middlesex and commonwealth of Massachusetts.' The defendants applied to the probate court for the county of Middlesex for probate of the will by a petition which described the deceased as 'William A. Richardson, who last dwelt in Cambridge,' and the decree admitting the will to probate described the testator as 'late of Cambridge.' Evidence was offered and admitted, subject to the exception of the plaintiff, that the deceased was born, educated, and admitted to the bar in this commonwealth; that he resided for several years in Lowell, during which time he held offices under the city and the commonwealth; that he was appointed judge of probate and insolvency for the county of Middlesex, and then removed his residence to Cambridge, where he acquired a domicile and lived in a house which he owned. In 1872 he was appointed assistant secretary of the treasury of the United States, and resigned his office of judge of probate and insolvency. In 1873 he was appointed secretary of the treasury. While holding the two offices last named he retained his domicile and residence in Cambridge. In 1874 he was appointed a judge of the court of claims, and held that office until 1885, when he was appointed chief justice of the same court, and continued to hold that office until his death. In 1875 the deceased sold his house in Cambridge, and thereafter had no property of any kind in that city, performed no acts of citizenship therein, never remained there over night, and visited it only three or four times when he attended the reunion of his class of Commencement Day at Harvard University, and when he deposited his will in the registry of probate. In 1885 he erected a house in Washington, where he lived with his family until his death. He also purchased a burial lot there, in which the bodies of members of his family were buried. He told the register of probate for the county of Middlesex, in June, 1892, that he had never given up his residence in Cambridge, and did not consider himself a resident of Washington, and he made some other declarations tending to show that his domicile was in Washington. The defendants, after the assessment of the taxes, gave notice in writing to the assessors of Cambridge that pursuant to an order of the probate court they had paid over the estate of the testator to trustees appointed under the will by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and that they had no property whatsoever in their possession as executors, nor had any part been paid or distributed to any persons who were inhabitants of Massachusetts. The plaintiff offered in rebuttal of the foregoing evidence various conveyances of land by the deceased between 1885 and 1896, in which he described himself as 'of Cambridge, Massachusetts, chief justice of the court of claims at Washington, D. C.,' and a receipt given to him upon the deposit of his will in the registry of probate in which he was described as of Cambridge."

In Gardiner v. Brookline, 181 Mass. 162, 63 N. E. 397, it was held that the trial judge was warranted in finding as a matter of law that the plaintiff had changed his legal residence from Brookline to Newcastle, on the following agreed facts: "The judge has found as a fact that the petitioner left Brookline in 1887, and went to Newcastle, intending to make the last named place his permanent home, and that he did this with an honest intention to change his domicile or permanent residence from Brookline to Newcastle, with the intention also of making the latter the place of his permanent and real home, as distinguished from a mere place of summer resort, and further that, down to the time of the assessment of the tax in 1899, the petitioner had not returned to Brookline with the intention of leaving Newcastle and making Brookline his permanent home. . . . On May 1, 1899, the petitioner was the owner of a house and estate in Brookline, of about sixty-six acres, and had owned the same since 1883. Until 1887, he had made it his legal residence. For several years before that time he had passed a short time in Newcastle every summer, not more than eight weeks in any year. In 1889, he bought and has since owned an estate in Newcastle, of eleven and a half acres, on which are a house, stable, and farm barn. This house, as well as the house in Brookline, is fully furnished and suitable for winter and summer use. The petitioner has a library and family portraits in each house; but the main library and collection of pictures is in Brookline. From 1887 to 1889, the petitioner, with his family, lived, while at Newcastle, in a house given him rent free by his father-in-law. Since 1883, the petitioner has belonged to a church at Newcastle, and has neither attended nor belonged to a church at Brookline, although he is a member of a church in Boston. From 1887, the house at Brookline has been closed in the summer months, except that a woman, acting as caretaker, has slept in the rear of the house; and the petitioner did not spend any time at Brookline while his family was at Newcastle. In March, 1887, the petitioner notified the selectmen of Newcastle of his intention to become a citizen of that town, and in April he notified the authorities of Brookline of his change of residence, moved himself and family to Newcastle, and was occupying his house there on the last day of April and the first day of May in that year. It was admitted that the plaintiff would testify that he removed to Newcastle with the intention of making that house his home. He voted in Newcastle at every presidential and state election from 1887 to the present time. From April, 1887, to July, 1889, the petitioner went to Newcastle with his family each year in April, remaining there several weeks. He was again in Newcastle every summer for two or three months, and off and on at other times in each year. From July, 1889, to 1893, he was at Newcastle with his family one half and more of each year. Since 1893, he and his family have been in Newcastle every summer, from July to October or later; in 1897, from July until late in November; also in December, 1898, and in January, 1899. In the last named month he returned to Brookline and occupied his house there until about July 1, 1899. From 1887 to 1894, both inclusive, the petitioner's name appears in the Boston Directory as follows: 'Charles P. Gardiner, 2 Pemberton Sq. room 13. h. at Brookline.' From 1895 to 1899, both inclusive, the petitioner's name appears in said directory as follows: 'Charles P. Gardiner, 19 Pemberton Sq. room 13, h. at Brookline.' The petitioner knew that his name so appeared, and made no objection."

In Dickinson v. Brookline, 181 Mass. 195, 63 N. E. 331, 92 Am. St. Rep. 407, the plaintiff sought recovery of taxes paid under protest in Brookline, claiming to be a resident of Cohasset. The court held that the plaintiff was a resident of Brookline, and properly taxable there, upon facts which appeared as follows: "The plaintiff was domiciled in Boston. In or before April, 1890, he probably changed his domicile to Cohasset, and for some years spent four or five summer months in the former place and the rest of the year in Brookline. Since 1895, or 1896, he has let his Cohasset house and has permanently inhabited only the Brookline house, which seems to be the more important structure of the two, and stands in the name of the plaintiff's wife. He has continued to vote in Cohasset, and has intended, so far as consistent with the facts, to remain an inhabitant of Cohasset."

In Barron v. Boston, 187 Mass. 168, 72 N. E. 951, which was an action to recover back a personal property and poll tax assessed against the plaintiff in Boston, March 1, 1901, the court held that the ruling of the trial judge was error and that the residence of the plaintiff was Cohasset, not Boston, on that date, the facts appearing, as set out in the opinion, as follows: "He owned a house in Boston which he occupied a part of the time. He also owned a large estate in Cohasset, consisting of a dwelling house containing twenty rooms, and a farm house, stables, and a cow house. This he occupied a considerable part of the time in each year. Early in the year 1900 he was a resident of Boston, but he stayed with his family at the house in Cohasset from May to December in that year. The judge who heard the case found as follows: 'That in the fall of 1900 Mr. Barron, having formed the intention of then and there becoming a resident of Cohasset and while living in his house at Cohasset and before his return to Boston, gave notice to the assessors of the city of Boston that he was a resident of Cohasset; that Mr. Barron sometime after this notice was given—in December—moved to his Boston house and was not in Cohasset again until June, but his intention of remaining a resident of Cohasset continued uninterrupted; that he left for abroad in April and before leaving notified his family to be in Cohasset by the first of May, but that as a fact they were not there until shortly after the first of May. I further found as a fact that Mr. Barron did not notify the assessors of the town of Cohasset of his having become a resident there until the summer, in June, 1901, and that Mr. Barron had not carried out his intention of becoming a resident of Cohasset by any sufficient overt act; and on these facts I ruled and found the plaintiff was a resident of the city of Boston on May first, 1901, and not of Cohasset.'"

In Babcock v. Slater, 212 Mass. 434, 99 N. E. 173, it was held that the trial judge was warranted in finding that the plaintiff was domiciled in Milton on May 1, 1906, on facts which were stated as follows: "She [the plaintiff] had inherited from a parent an undivided interest in a large estate in Milton, and afterward acquired the whole title therein. Upon this estate she built a large and costly house, furnished it completely, and appears to have resided there when she was not traveling or temporarily sojourning in other places. She paid without objection taxes assessed upon her general personal estate in Milton during the years 1901 to 1905, inclusive. She paid no taxes upon her general personal estate in Webster, which she now alleges to have been her domicile, until the year 1908, and only during the years 1905, 1906, and 1907 a small sum on furniture and horses, which seem to have been assessed to her with real estate which she owned in that town. R. L. c. 12, sec. 23, cl. 3. She made only rare and brief visits to her house in that town. She went to Webster on March 18, 1905, to arrange for the opening of her house for occupation in the early spring, and she then caused herself to be registered as a voter in that town. Her stay however was very short, apparently only for that day. Soon after the middle of the next April she again went to Webster, and remained there until about May 13, when she returned to Milton, and there abode until about the first day of June, when she went to Bar Harbor. From that summer resort she returned to Milton, and remained there until about January 30, 1906, when she went to Washington, remaining there until May 16, 1906. In April, 1905, she was elected a trustee of the public library in Webster for the term of three years, and she accepted this office and acted as such trustee. She testified however that she never had voted in Webster, and never had attended a meeting of the trustees of the library. We find no evidence that before her visits to Webster in 1905 she spent any whole day or night in that town after 1901, except her testimony that she never had been in America on Memorial Day without going to the Webster cemetery. She received in 1904 two assignments of mortgages in which she was described as of Milton. When she went to Webster in April, 1905, she had a piano and some plants and furniture moved thither from her house in Milton, and afterwards brought back to Milton. She issued cards for 'at homes' in Milton, but never since 1899 had any cards with Webster as an address upon them."

(9) Michigan.

In Beecher v. Detroit, 114 Mich. 228, 72 N. W. 206, 4 Detroit L. N. 579, it appeared concerning the plaintiff: "That in 1882 he went to Negaunee, to take charge of the property and business of his father there. He continued in this employment, living in a house owned by his father, until the year 1892, when his father died, leaving a large estate in the city of Detroit; and, as he was one of the administrators of his father's estate, he came to Detroit that year, with his wife and children. Two years after coming to Detroit, he built a house costing $45,000 on a lot purchased for $35,000. This house was completed, so that he moved into it with his family, in January, 1894, and still continues to live in it. Relator claimed that his residence is at Negaunee. He gave testimony tending to show that from the time he went to Negaunee till the present he has voted there; that at the time of leaving Negaunee he stated publicly that he had no intention of changing his residence to Detroit, and has returned twice a year to Negaunee to vote; that, after coming to Detroit, he took out two policies of life insurance in both of which he is described as of Negaunee; that he offered his house in Detroit for sale, saying his health was such that he should not leave Negaunee, and had never intended to leave it, and was only temporarily in Detroit; that he should return to Negaunee as soon as the estate of his father was closed up." It was held by the court that the foregoing facts justified the conclusion of the jury that the plaintiff was domiciled in Detroit. The court said: "If we were to decide the question here de novo, I am strongly of the opinion that the great weight of the evidence is in favor of the proposition that the relator intended, when he left Negaunee, to return there, and that his residence in Detroit was intended as temporary only, and to continue only during the time necessary to settle up his father's estate. But the case is before us on certiorari, and the question to be determined is whether there is any evidence from which the jury or the court could legitimately find that his intention was to fix his domicile in Detroit. The fact is established that he actually resides there. He has built an expensive house. It appears that in building it his wife made certain suggestions as to the internal arrangements, and evidently with a view of making it a home. The house in Negaunee where he lived belonged to his father, and the only house which he actually owns is the one built by him in Detroit. It does not appear that he was ever assessed upon this large amount of personal property in Negaunee. He does not suggest that he is not possessed of it, or that it is not property subject to taxation. The question was fully submitted to the jury, and their finding is against him upon the question of fact."

(10) Missouri.

In State v. Renshaw, 166 Mo. 682, 685, 688, 66 S. W. 953, the court said: "The defendant contends that there is no substantial evidence that he ever was a resident of Audrain county, and, therefore, there is no fact to support the verdict, which is claimed to be the result of passion and prejudice. The defendant's evidence tended to show that for about twenty-five years prior to 1886 he lived in Callaway county; that about 1886 he moved to St. Louis, where he remained until 1892, and while he lived in St. Louis he voted once or twice; that he had a married daughter, who lived in Howardville, Albemarle county, Virginia, and that in 1892, he and his wife visited her, and stayed with her as her guests during 1892 and 1893, but that during 1894 he went to his daughter's said home to live permanently, and lived there during the year 1894 and during the year 1895, until September 1, 1895, when he moved to Charlottesville, Albemarle county, Virginia, rented a house, remained there until 1898, when he returned to his daughter's home in Howardville, where he remained a short time, and then moved again to Charlottesville, where he has resided ever since; that he first registered as a voter in Virginia on March 10, 1896; attended the State Democratic Convention in 1896, as a delegate from Charlottesville; that he was assessed for taxes in Virginia for the year 1895; that in 1896 he made a return of personal property for taxes, in Charlottesville, Virginia, and was listed or assessed in 1897, but made no return, and was not assessed for 1898. The evidence for the plaintiff showed that on March 31, 1894, the defendant came to Mexico, Audrain county, and boarded at the Ringo Hotel from that date until December 31, 1894, and that he returned on May 2, 1895, and remained until the latter part of July, 1895; that in 1894 he was in Callaway county, and the assessor of that county tried to assess him, but the defendant refused to be assessed in Callaway county, and said, 'My home is in Mexico;' that in 1896 when the assessor in Virginia assessed him the defendant said he was assessed in Missouri; that in 1895 the defendant again told the former assessor of Callaway county that he was living in Mexico; that after June 1, 1895, the assessor of Audrain county called upon the defendant, at the Mexico Savings Bank, where he usually transacted his business, through which bank he collected interest on loans he had outstanding in Audrain county, and in which bank he kept a deposit, and furnished him an assessment blank and asked him to make a return; that the defendant refused to do so, and said he was not a resident of Audrain county; that thereupon the assessor examined the records of the county and found that the defendant held mortgages amounting to $34,550 for money he had loaned in that county; that thereupon the assessor assessed him for that amount of personal property, and the defendant refusing to pay, this suit was brought. Upon this showing it cannot be said that there is no evidence to support the verdict of the jury, finding that on June 1, 1895, the defendant was a resident of Audrain county, but on the contrary the great weight of the evidence and the physical facts support the finding of the jury. Thus, on the defendant's showing he was a visitor at his daughter's home in Virginia during the years 1892 and 1893, and in 1894 he determined to take up his residence there permanently, and that he lived there in 1894 and 1895. As against this is the fact that he was actually in Mexico, boarding at the Ringo Hotel, from March 31st to May 22nd and from November 15th to December 31st, 1894, and also his own declaration to the assessor in 1894 that his home was in Mexico, and the fact that in 1895 he was actually in Mexico, stopping at said hotel, at intervals from May until August 23, 1895, and again told the ex-collector of Callaway county that he was still living in Mexico. And in addition, the further fact that he rented a house for the first time in Virginia on September 1, 1895, and became a registered voter there for the first time on March 10, 1896, and furthermore told the Virginia assessor in 1895 that he was assessed in Missouri. This being the state of the evidence, the finding of fact by the jury that the defendant was a resident of Audrain county on June 1, 1895, will not be reviewed or disturbed by this court."

In State v. Hamilton, 202 Mo. 377, 100 S. W. 609, it appeared that the defendant, a minor, had been domiciled in the Troy School District prior to the death of his parents, that after their death he moved to Lincoln county, School District No. 6, living there with his aunt for over twelve years, and that the curator or guardian of the estate of the defendant lived in still another school district. It was held that the defendant could not be taxed, upon this state of facts, in the Troy School District.

In State v. Shepherd, 218 Mo. 656, 117 S. W. 1169, 131 Am. St. Rep. 568, the following facts appeared, as stated by the court: "The uncontradicted evidence in the case shows, and the court found, that at the time the assessment of the taxes in question was made, the appellant was a resident of School District Fourteen, and not of Plattsburg School District, the one in which the assessment was made, and that during the years 1901 and 1902, and for many years prior thereto, appellant had kept a furnished room in his house on his farm, situate in said District Number Fourteen, which he occupied whenever there, but that during the greater part of those years he generally and continuously lodged at night with his parents at their home in the city of Plattsburg, which constitutes the Plattsburg School District. The evidence also conclusively shows that the sole reason for appellant's lodging with his parents was because they were old, sickly and helpless, both of whom died during those years, and he considered it his duty to stay with them at nights in order to minister unto their wants and necessities, but always returned every morning to his farm in said District Fourteen for the purpose of looking after his farm and caring for his stock. The evidence also shows that during said years he always considered and claimed his residence to be in said District Fourteen, and voted there, and never claimed Plattsburg to be his home." On this state of facts it was held that the defendant was a resident of School District Fourteen and was not taxable in the Plattsburg School District.

(11) Nebraska.

In White v. Lincoln, 79 Neb. 153, 112 N. W. 369, the court said: "Appellant's first contention is that he was not a resident of the city of Lincoln on April 1, 1905, and could not be legally taxed for that year. This insistence presents a question of fact which the board of equalization, as well as the district court, has determined adversely to appellant. A review of the record constrains us to adopt their finding as the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence. Appellant's testimony discloses that he was a resident of the city of Lincoln on January 1, 1905, and that he never removed from Lincoln, though absent therefrom with his family from the latter part of March until June 1, 1905—a part of the time visiting in Butler county and a part of the time boarding with relatives in University Place, a city conveniently near Lincoln. On June 1, 1905, he returned to Lincoln."

(12) Nevada.

In Bowman v. Boyd, 21 Nev. 281, 30 Pac. 823, the plaintiff sought to avoid taxes assessed on personalty in Nevada. He claimed that his residence was in Placer county, California. But he had no business there, and only a little real property. All his securities were in Nevada. It appeared in evidence that he had avoided taxation in California by declaring that his property was in Nevada. Holding that his personal property was taxable in Nevada, in the absence of a showing that it had been taxed in California, the court said: "We are of the opinion that for the purposes of taxation the assessment of the persons and property whose locality can be readily changed must of necessity refer to the situs of the property at some particular time or day, as, for instance, our statute provides 'that the lien for taxes shall attach on all property within the state on the first Monday in March in each year.' From the plaintiff's own testimony he has had no fixed residence or place of business. Since the year 1867 he has led a roving life. During the years 1888 and 1889 three-fourths of his time was spent in Washoe county, attending to his business of loaning and collecting his money. All his securities were there, and in fact from the evidence we should infer that they were always kept in Washoe county. He owned real estate in Washoe county of the value of five thousand dollars. Had a room in his own house rented during those two years. The total value of property assessed to him at Yankee Jim's, Placer county, Cal., was but one hundred dollars, and consisted of his house and lot. When the assessor of Placer county asked plaintiff for a statement of his personal property for the year 1889 he gave in this house, and when asked if he had no other property subject to taxation in California plaintiff answered: 'No, all my property is situated in the state of Nevada.' He tells the officers of Washoe county, Nevada, 'Yes, I have thirty-five thousand and eight hundred dollars in collaterals more than I have given a list of, but you cannot assess them to me, because I reside in California.' Under this state of the case it was proper for the judge to take into consideration the character of the plaintiff's residence during the assessing period of the year 1889, if he had any; and if he used such claim of residence merely as a pretext to escape the payment of taxes the inference would be in view of the fact that he owed a public duty to pay taxes somewhere, and as from his own statements he did not have a fixed permanent residence or place of business, and as every man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his own voluntary acts and declarations, it follows that the plaintiff's claim of residence in California was to escape taxation in Nevada. And his statement to the assessor of Placer county, Cal., was true, because all his securities were in Nevada, but such statement was made to said assessor to avoid the payment of taxes on his collaterals in the state of California. Therefore his said claim of residence and his statement to the assessor in Placer county was claimed and made to escape taxation in both states, and to avoid the performance of a public duty by contributing his just proportion to the support of the government. He will not be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong. The books are full of cases defining residence and nonresidence. But we fail to find any where the question of taxation has arisen, but what the courts hold that it must be a fixed and definite one, not roaming from place to place, and the party must show that he pays his taxes in that place."

(13) New Hampshire.

In Moore v. Wilkins, 10 N. H. 452, the following facts were agreed on: "That the plaintiff, with his wife, went to the town of Hooksett, about the middle of March, 1836, about which time he commenced the performance of one year's services as a preacher there; that they resided there until about the middle of March, 1837, when they went to her father's, in the town of Bedford; that the plaintiff went from Bedford to Hooksett, and preached the last two Sabbaths in March, 1837, which were two Sabbaths more than the year for which he engaged, when he went to Hooksett; that in the latter part of March, 1837, the plaintiff contracted with a religious society, whose meeting-house is in the town of Merrimack, to supply their pulpit one year, commencing on the first Sabbath, being the second day, of April, 1837; that on the 30th day of March, 1837, being the annual fast, the plaintiff went to Merrimack, and preached gratuitously in said meeting-house, and returned the same day to his wife's father's, in Bedford, where they were visiting; that the plaintiff went again from Bedford to Merrimack, on Saturday, the first day of April, 1837, put up at the house where himself and wife boarded the following year, preached in said meeting-house on the second day of April, 1837, and the next following morning returned to Bedford, where he remained till Saturday, the eighth day of April, 1837, on which last mentioned day he went again to Merrimack, preached there April 9th, and returned to Bedford in the evening of the 10th; that on Tuesday, the 11th, the plaintiff and his wife went, with their baggage, to Merrimack, where the plaintiff commenced boarding, by the week; that his wife proceeded the same day to Nashua, and two days after returned and commenced her residence, as a boarder, with her husband. And it was further agreed that the plaintiff was not taxed that year in Bedford, or in any other place, for his poll, or any of the property taxed by the defendants." Holding that the plaintiff was domiciled for taxation in Merrimack, the court said: "On the facts before us, the plaintiff had his home or domicile in Hooksett, or Merrimack. There is nothing to show where he resided before he went to Hooksett, and of course nothing to show that on taking up his residence there he retained any domicile elsewhere. He went there under a temporary engagement for a year; but he may well have contemplated remaining there an indefinite time, having no other home to return to, and having, so far as appears, no intention, at that time, of removing to any other place. But he left Hooksett in March, 1837, without any intention of returning there; and he contracted to supply the pulpit in Merrimack for a year, commencing on the first Sabbath in April, and actually went to that place on the first day of April. His personal residence, with his wife, at Bedford, during part of March, and again for a few days in April, being merely temporary, for the purpose of visiting at her father's, neither gave him a right to vote there, or made him liable to taxation in that town. Had the plaintiff removed from Hooksett on the first day of April, he would have been taxable there, under the provisions of the Act of 1827, even if he acquired a new domicile on that day in Merrimack. But he actually removed before that time. Before that time, also, he had made his engagement to go to Merrimack. On the first of April, 1837, he was personally resident in Merrimack, in pursuance of his engagement to preach there a year. He must be understood to have had the same intention of residing there an indefinite time that he had of remaining in Hooksett, when he went there; for he had abandoned his home in Hooksett, with no intention of returning there; he had taken up his personal residence in Merrimack, with an intention of pursuing his calling there, for a year at least; he had no home to return to, elsewhere; and, so far as appears, no intention of going to any particular place at the expiration of that time. We are of opinion that this is sufficient to show that he had a domicile in Merrimack on the first of April, and that he was lawfully taxed in that town."

(14) New Jersey.

In Sharp v. Casper, 36 N. J. L. 367, the court held that the prosecutor was not liable for personal property taxes in Salem, for the year 1871, being a resident of Cumberland at that time, the facts appearing in the following quotation: "From the evidence submitted to the court in this case, I am satisfied that Dr. Sharp, the prosecutor, had no such residence in the city of Salem at any time during the year 1871. The only evidence which seems at all opposed to this conclusion, is a letter addressed, late in the summer of 1871, by the prosecutor, to Mr. Rusling, since deceased, at that time the assessor of the said West ward, in Salem. This letter, it is urged on the part of the defendant, amounts to a conclusive admission by the prosecutor that with his own knowledge and consent he had been, in fact, assessed for the year 1871, as a resident of that ward. It must be admitted that there are some expressions in the letter which, unexplained, would go far to justify the inferences drawn from them by the defendant's counsel. Writing under date of August 25th, the prosecutor says to Mr. Rusling: 'I gave you some bonds to be assessed, when I saw you in Salem,' etc.; and again: 'Can you not be so kind as to cross off my name as to bonds, and oblige yours,' etc. It cannot be wondered at, that from such language as this there should be drawn very strong inferences against the present insistment of the prosecutor. And yet, to my mind, his explanation of these apparently damaging expressions is full and entirely satisfactory. He states that in the spring or early summer of 1871, while on a visit to his son, a practicing physician in the city of Salem, he was strongly urged by him to change his residence from Cumberland to Salem, and that he had serious thoughts of doing so, and, in fact, had almost made up his mind to do it; that being in this frame of mind, and engaged in conversation with his son upon this very subject of a change of residence, Mr. Rusling, happening to be near, was called by his son to join them, and was informed by him, that his father, the prosecutor, was about to change his residence to the city of Salem, and if he did so, should be assessed there for his personal property; that although he, the prosecutor, did, in the course of that interview, give in certain bonds to Mr. Rusling, he did it with no purpose or expectation that he would be assessed for them in Salem, unless the change of residence, which he had been thinking of, should be carried into effect; and that his plan of moving to Salem from Cumberland was never consummated. The statements of the prosecutor are corroborated in all material points by the testimony of his son, Dr. Edward S. Sharp; and they satisfy me, beyond a doubt, that the prosecutor was not liable to a personal tax in the city of Salem, for the year 1871."

In Guggenheim v. Long Branch, 80 N. J. L. 246, 76 Atl. 338, the court held that the plaintiff was a resident, for taxation, of Long Branch, N. J., and not of New York, on facts which appear in the following quotation from the opinion: "Our consideration of the prosecutor's testimony has not resulted in causing us to dissent from the conclusion reached by the state board, for in no part of his testimony do we find a positive and affirmative declaration by him satisfactory to us that in the year 1906 he resided elsewhere than in this state. For some years he maintained a summer residence at Long Branch, and in 1905 he paid personal taxes and voted there; and testified, by affidavit filed in New York city before the local taxing board, that he was not subject to taxation there for the reason that he then was a resident of Long Branch. In 1906 he did not vote anywhere, but resided for some weeks at Long Branch, reaching there in May and leaving his children there at his home, while he, with his wife, undertook a trip to Alaska, returning in October. During the week ends in the winter he returned to Long Branch, keeping his house open during winter; but he was uncertain whether that course of conduct was during the winter of 1906 or 1907. His reason for changing his residence from Long Branch to New York in 1906 he states was the inconvenience of the trip from his business place in New York to Long Branch, and because his vote was required more in New York than here. One of the Long Branch assessors testified that he visited the office of the New York tax board in February or March, 1906, and that upon inquiry there the officer in charge produced the tax books for 1906, which the witness read, showing that at that time, according to the New York tax records, the prosecutor was a resident of New Jersey. There is also testimony going to show that during that year the prosecutor was assessed in New York only upon his office furniture and fixtures at the sum of $17,000. At no time during the interim from 1905 until 1907 did the prosecutor, by word or act, indicate to anyone, and particularly to the taxing authorities of Long Branch, that he had determined to take up his residence elsewhere."

(15) New York.

In Bell v. Pierce, 51 N. Y. 12, the following facts appeared: "During the whole of the year 1864, preceding the 20th of June, the plaintiff resided with his family in the city of Buffalo. He owned the house in which he there resided, and had for several years. During the whole of the years 1863, 1864 and 1865, his principal and only business, which was that of an iron founder and machinist, was transacted in said city of Buffalo. On and for several years previous to the first day of July, 1864, he owned a furnished house and twenty acres of land in said town of West Seneca, and had been in the habit of sending his family there to spend about three months during the warm weather, and they there kept house. The house in Buffalo was closed, but the plaintiff personally attended to his business in Buffalo during such time, and usually slept at his house there once or twice a week during the stay of his family in West Seneca, but spent the other nights with his family in West Seneca. His wife occasionally, during said time, came into Buffalo and remained with the plaintiff at his house there over night, and had her meals there with the plaintiff, the rest of the family remaining at the house in West Seneca. About the 20th of June, 1864, plaintiff's family went to the house in West Seneca, and remained there, as in previous years, for about three months, and then returned to the house in Buffalo; and during the summer season, plaintiff was with his family in West Seneca, or at his house in Buffalo, substantially as is above stated to have been his habit in previous years. Defendants had no knowledge, before the delivery of the assessment roll to the supervisors of the town, that the plaintiff had or claimed to have any residence except in West Seneca, although they knew that he had been residing during that year in Buffalo, and that his family had come to West Seneca only a few weeks previous to July 1, 1864. They gave the statutory notices of the completion of the assessment roll, and of their meetings to correct the same, and no one appeared before them to object to the regularity of the plaintiff's assessment. Plaintiff was not assessed for personal property in the city of Buffalo in the year 1864." The assessors having found on these facts that the plaintiff's principal business was in West Seneca, and the plaintiff not having been taxed on his personalty in Buffalo, the court held that the plaintiff was properly deemed a resident of West Seneca for purposes of taxation.

In the case of In re Nichols, 54 N. Y. 62, the following facts appeared: "For several years prior to April, 1863, Wells had resided in New Haven, and had owned and carried on a farm in that town. In April, 1863, he sold and conveyed his farm to Henry J. Daggett, who took immediate possession, and from that time until some time in December, 1863, Wells, who was unmarried, boarded with Daggett on the farm. On or about the 14th day of June, 1864, Wells was taken sick at the house of Henry Matthews, his brother-in-law, in the city of Oswego, and was confined to the house by such illness until some time in the following August, and did not entirely recover until some time in October, 1864. Mr. Wells remained with Mr. Matthews in Oswego until some time in the month of January, 1865, when he removed to Caledonia, in the county of Livingston, where he has since resided." Considering these facts, the court said, in the majority opinion: "The first of July seems to be the time fixed by law for the ascertainment of the persons liable to be assessed. . . . Upon the evidence in this case it is my opinion that Horace Wells was at that date, in the year 1864, yet a resident of the town of New Haven, although he had gone to Oswego on the fourteenth of June for medical treatment, and had become too ill there to return to New Haven, if he had been desirous of doing so. His undoubted residence had been in New Haven, and it must be deemed to have continued there until a change is affirmatively shown, or at least until there is satisfactory evidence of the abandonment of that place as a residence. Upon the whole evidence I do not find satisfactory proof either of change or abandonment."

The facts in the case of People v. Taxes, etc. Com'rs, 3 N. Y. S. 674, were as follows: "Mr. Taylor, in his lifetime, resided a part of the year in the city of New York, but during the summer months he and his family occupied a country place, which in the record is called a farm, in the town of Ovid, Seneca county. He died at the city of New York, in February, 1887, leaving a last will and testament, which was admitted to probate, and of which the relator is the duly qualified executrix. Shortly after her husband's death, the relator determined to go with her two children to Ovid, and she took with her also the household servants from the dwelling house in the city of New York, which had been inhabited by the family before Mr. Taylor's death. This city house was closed, but was not abandoned. The relator's farm at Ovid consists of about ten acres of land, and she claims to carry on there a business, to wit, that of farming; but she admits that her farming operations are not conducted for gain, nor as a source of livelihood. In the autumn of 1887, the relator and her children and four female servants returned to the same dwelling house in New York city they had occupied at the time of and before Mr. Taylor's death, and remained there during the winter, the children attending school. At some time between September, 1887, and January, 1888, or early in January, 1888, the commissioners of taxes assessed the relator for the personal estate she held as executrix, and she claims their action was erroneous, and that she was subject to assessment only in Seneca county." The court held that the claim of the relator that she was subject to tax only in Seneca county, and a resident thereof, because she carried on there her principal business, within the meaning of the New York statute, to be unfounded. It was said: "I am of the opinion that the facts, as stated by the relator herself in the record brought up from the commissioners, do not warrant the conclusion that she transacted business in Seneca county within the meaning of the Act of 1850, amending the statute above referred to. After her husband's death she retired to what had been his country seat, a place of some ten acres, all that remained of a farm of some 300 acres he had at one time owned. She seems to have maintained this place, employing some nine servants in and about the houses and grounds, but not cultivating the land for any purpose of gain, and not trafficking in its products, but consuming in her own household some portion of what the soil yielded. This is no more transacting business than is the care and attention bestowed upon the administration of the town family residence and the supervision of the servants employed in it; and the whole testimony of the relator would indicate that her occupation in the country was nothing more than such as many people in easy circumstances engage in in the ordinary management and care of their summer places of abode. She may, for the purposes of this proceeding, choose to call it transacting business, but it is not doing so in any proper sense of the words. The action of the tax commissioners was right, and the writ must be dismissed."

In Austen v. Crilly, 13 App. Div. 247, 42 N. Y. S. 1097, it appeared that the defendant had two residences, one in Philadelphia, his Ann. Cas. 1917B.—49.

domicil, the other in New York, a residence for business purposes. Holding that his residence in New York was sufficient under the New York statute to render him taxable in that state, the court said: "Mr. Crilly admits that he has a residence in New York as well as in Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania residence he characterizes as 'permanent;' the New York residence as 'temporary.' The statute (2 R. S. [8th ed.] 1094) makes no such distinction. It provides that every person 'shall be assessed in the town or ward where he resides when the assessment is made for all personal estate owned by him.' Mr. Crilly tells us that his temporary residence in this city commenced on the 1st day of October, 1894. Apparently it has been continued from that day to this. It certainly continued down to the twenty-seventh of August of the present year, when his affidavit in the proceeding was made. He hired a house in this city for a residence about the 1st of October, 1894, and he was engaged in business here from that date down to the 1st of May, 1895. Clearly he confounds residence with domicil. The fact is that, though his domicil is in Pennsylvania, he has resided here ever since the 1st of October, 1894. What he styles his permanent residence is his domicil. What he characterizes as his temporary residence is simply his residence. He says he has paid taxes in Pennsylvania during the period in question. But he does not say that these taxes were upon personalty. They may have been upon real estate. He also says that he has always voted in Pennsylvania. That may be, but it is not conclusive. He may still be a resident of this city for the purpose of taxation. Besides, the statement is too general. It may well mean that whenever he voted it was there. He does not state that he has actually voted in Pennsylvania since the 1st day of October, 1894. The court properly found upon the relator's affidavit, as matter of fact, that he was a resident of the city for the purposes of taxation."

In People v. Crowley, 21 App. Div. 304, 47 N. Y. S. 457, order affirmed 155 N. Y. 700, 50 N. E. 1120, it was held that the relator was a resident, for taxation, of Williams-ville, Amherst, not of Buffalo, on July 1, 1896, it appearing: "That the relator formerly resided at Williams-ville in the town of Amherst and county of Erie, in which town he owned three farms; and that in the year 1863 he removed to the city of Buffalo, where he purchased or erected a valuable house in which he resided with his family until 1895. During this period of time he spent his summer months at his country house in Williams-ville, but he regarded Buffalo as his legal residence, and he was assessed and voted in that city. In 1895, however, he conceived the idea of changing his residence to Williamsville, at which place was located the principal office of the Buffalo and Williamsville Electric railroad, of which company he was the president and manager. He thereupon notified the board of assessors of his intention, and his assessment for personal property was omitted from the city assessment roll. From this time on his manner of living continued as before, that is, he occupied his residence in Williamsville from the latter part of May until the middle of October in each year, and his city house for the other seven months. His name, however, was placed upon the assessment roll of the town of Amherst for $25,000 of personal property, and he paid the tax upon that sum in 1895 and 1896. He likewise voted in that town at the annual election in each of those years."

In People v. O'Rourke, 32 App. Div. 66, 52 N. Y. S. 1057, it was held that the relator was a resident for taxation, of White Plains, and not of New York, on facts which appeared as follows: "From the testimony given by Gilbert Wright it appeared that he had resided in the town of White Plains from November, 1892, to the 15th day of November, 1896, living in a house owned by his wife. On the last-named date he and his family went to live in a suite of rooms in the Winthrop, a family hotel on One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street in the city of New York. The family remained in the hotel until about March 15, 1897, when Wright surrendered the lease of his apartments and returned to White Plains, taking up his abode in his former place of residence and continuing therein until about August 1, 1897, when he went, for recreation, with his family to Watch Hill, and had not, up to the time of his examination, returned to the city of New York for the purpose of residence, but was still absent for pleasure. He has never claimed any other place than White Plains and the city of New York as his residence. During the time that he resided at the Winthrop hotel he removed none of his furniture from White Plains, and, so far as is disclosed by this record, it still remains there. When he took up his abode at the hotel he did not register as residing in New York, nor did he report at the hotel office that his residence was such city. He did not vote in the city of New York in 1897, and had not voted there since he took up his residence in White Plains, nor could he say when he had last voted in New York except that it was just before he came to White Plains. He was asked where his present residence was and answered, 'Well, I claim my home, so far, I suppose, the Winthrop hotel, 125th street, New York city.' At this time he had no lease of any rooms in the hotel nor had he rented any since the surrender of his apartments about March 1, 1897. The only right which he had to claim this hotel as his residence is based upon his statement, 'I am always able to procure them (rooms) when I go there.' He, however, did testify that he went to White Plains about four years prior to 1896 for his health and under the advice of a physician; that he had recovered his health sufficient to warrant his return to New York; that it was for this reason that he went back and intended to make such place his residence and live either in a hotel or a private residence. Up to the time of his examination he had not carried such intention into effect. He has never paid any personal tax in the city of New York, and so far as appears, has never before been assessed for any either in the city of New York or White Plains."

In Paddack v. Lewis, 59 App. Div. 430, 69 N. Y. S. 1, affirmed in 170 N. Y. 591, 72 N. E. 1146, it appeared: "That the plaintiff is an unmarried man, and that from the year 1865 until the year 1883, with the exception of a short time spent at Jordan, he lived continuously in the town of Elbridge, where he was interested in the manufacture of paper and in the purchase and sale of real estate, stocks and other securities. He owned the paper mill, but the paper was manufactured by a firm under an arrangement by which the plaintiff furnished the raw material and disposed of the product. It was also undisputed that during this period of time the plaintiff furnished and occupied a room at the hotel, where he also took his meals, except when out of town. In 1874 he was first assessed for personal property in the town of Elbridge. In 1881 he was assessed for personal property in the city of Syracuse, but upon furnishing a sworn statement that he resided in the town of Elbridge, his assessment was vacated. In 1883 the plaintiff's assessment for personal property having been increased to the sum of fifteen thousand dollars by the assessors of the town of Elbridge, he claims to have changed his residence to the city of Syracuse, and frankly states as his reason therefor a desire to escape what he regarded as an exorbitant assessment. At this time he reserved for his own use a furnished room in a house owned and rented by him in the city, and notified the assessors of the city that he had taken up his residence there and was assessable for personal property. The Syracuse assessors thereupon assessed him for two thousand dollars of personal property, which amount was ultimately raised to ten thousand dollars. The plaintiff also testifies that he voted in Syracuse in the years 1884, 1885, 1886 and 1887, but during all this time he continued to transact his paper business at Elbridge and to occupy his room at the hotel in that village, where he had a safe and desk, and to all outward appearances there was little if any change in his habits of life and manner of conducting business, save that he ordinarily passed a portion of each week in the city of Syracuse." On the foregoing facts it was held, by the appellate division of the supreme court, and this holding was affirmed by the court of appeals, that the ruling of the county court that the plaintiff was a resident, for taxation, in Elbridge, was correct. The court said: "It having been made to appear beyond all question that the plaintiff's taxable residence for many years prior to 1883 was in the town of Elbridge, we think there is at least some reason for saying that, under all the circumstances of this case, he has not established by affirmative and satisfactory proof the fact that for the purposes of taxation he did in good faith acquire another residence, so as to deprive the assessors of that town of jurisdiction."

In People v. Feitner, 78 App. Div. 287, 80 N. Y. S. 534, it was held that sufficient facts on which to find that the relator was, on January 2, 1900, not a resident of New York, for taxation purposes, but was a resident of Lawrence, were stated in the affidavit of the plaintiff in which she alleged: "I reside in the village of Lawrence in the county of Nassau, where I own a house. I have owned this house since 1894, and during all that time it has been my residence. I spend a portion of each year in the city of New York and have an apartment in the building 155 West 58th street, which I occupy while in the city, but I consider Lawrence my residence, and I was actually at Lawrence on the first of July, 1900." She further alleged in her affidavit that in the year 1900 she occupied the apartment in Fifty-eighth street only from January seventeenth to April twenty-seventh, when she removed to Lawrence and remained there, with the exception of occasional trips, until early in October, when she went to Pennsylvania, then to Fishkill and then to Lakehurst, N. J., where she remained until January 17, 1901."

In New York v. Beers, 163 App. Div. 495, 148 N. Y. S. 438, the court, setting forth the facts and the holding, said: "Defendant claims to have been a resident of Westhampton since July, 1910. It appears that since 1904 he has lived at Westhampton from May until November in each year. In November it is his custom to move with his family to New York city where he rents a house for the season. Since 1903 he has voted at Westhampton at both state and local elections, and he is and for the last ten years past has been assessed for personal taxes in the town of Southhampton which includes the village of Westhampton. In certain judicial proceedings to which he was a party he has, within the period last referred to, treated Suffolk as the county of his legal domicile. In 1901 the defendant obtained a writ of certiorari to review his personal assessment in this city for the year 1901. The writ was dismissed, the court holding on the record before it that the defendant was a resident of this city and liable to taxation here. It appeared in the certiorari proceedings that defendant's course of life with respect to his several domicils in Westhampton and New York city and the period of his use of each was practically the same as appears upon the record and before us. It further appeared, however, that the defendant had voted in the city of New York at the election in 1900, and on this ground defendant was held to have elected to consider this city as his place of residence and so was liable to be assessed here. (People v. Feitner, 40 Misc. 368.) I think that inasmuch as defendant has since the period involved in the certiorari proceedings elected to adopt Westhampton as his voting place, and has by other acts shown an unequivocal intention to adopt Westhampton as his legal residence, these facts must be accepted as determinative of his intent and that the judgment should be reversed, with costs, and the complaint dismissed, with costs."

In People v. O'Donnell, 47 Misc. 226, 95 N. Y. S. 889, the court said: "Upon the facts presented I am of the opinion that the relator was a resident of the state of New Jersey, for the purposes of taxation, at the period in question and that the assessment should be vacated. According to the relator's actual assertion, he resides at Seabright, in the state of New Jersey, in a house which he has continuously owned for a number of years, his habit being to spend the summer and autumn and sometimes the winter, at that place, retaining his servants there at all times, and keeping this house always ready for his occupancy and that of his family. He also maintains a place of abode on Madison avenue, in this city, which, according to his custom, he and his family have occupied during the winter months. It appears also that in September, 1902, the relator filed a bill in chancery, in New Jersey, containing the recital that he was then residing at Rumson, township of Shrewsbury, county of Monmouth and state of New Jersey; that he voted in New Jersey, 1903, and that he was assessed for personal property in that state in 1904. Upon this state of facts, the circumstances accord with the relator's expression (founded upon his intention) that he is a resident of New Jersey, and the fact that he is also the lessee of a place of abode in the city of New York does not affect the question of his actual residence, under these circumstances."

In New York v. Brinkerhoff, 63 Misc. 445, 118 N. Y. S. 449, it appeared that the defendant was a lunatic, whose lunacy had come after his arrival at majority, that he had been kept for about fifteen years at the Bloomingdale Asylum, that his residence, before he became insane, had been in New York city, and that he had been recently moved from the Bloomingdale Asylum, without any intent on the part of his guardian that his domicile should be changed. On these facts it was held that the residence of the lunatic in New York city remained, since there had been no intent to change, although there had been a physical change.

In People v. Dinneen, 85 Misc. 128, 148 N. Y. S. 21, the court said: "The relator was residing with her husband in Ogdensburg on July 1, 1913. The statute specifically says that 'every person shall be taxed in the tax district where he resides when the assessment for taxation is made.' This does not mean where he resides for the purpose of voting or where his domicile is. The assessors of the city of Ogdensburg had jurisdiction to make this assessment. There was no evidence before the assessors, nor is there any before this court, that, after the first of July, Mrs. McGruer had in good faith changed her residence and that the said personal property is assessed in any other tax district. On the contrary the evidence shows that it is not assessed in any other district for the year 1913. The relator's business is carried on in the city of Ogdensburg, where she and her property have the protection of the laws and enjoy the benefit of the city government with its improvements. Within the letter and spirit of the statute I think the relator was properly assessed in the city of Ogdensburg."

A missionary bishop of the Episcopal church in Mexico was held to have been a resident of Mexico, not of New York, in the case of Matter of Riley, 86 Misc. 628, 148 N. Y. S. 623, wherein it was held that the estate of the deceased was exempt from taxation in New York. The court said: "The petition by the administratrix c. t. a. shows that decedent died March 13, 1904, in Mexico, where he resided for many years prior thereto, and that his will, dated September 16, 1889, with a codicil thereto dated April 21, 1891, was admitted to probate on or about September 8, 1904, by the surrogates' court of New York county. The petition further shows that the decedent was a bishop of the Episcopal church, in charge of the American branch of that church in Mexico. In his will he describes himself 'now in the city of New York, but for many years a resident of the city of Mexico.' In his codicil he describes himself as 'of New York, bishop in the Mexican branch of that church.' The question of domicile if decided in favor of the petitioner will dispose of the other questions involved. As above stated, the decedent for many years prior to the making of his will was a resident of Mexico, and it further appears that he returned to Mexico after the making of the codicil to his will and resumed his labors as bishop of the Episcopal church and bishop of the American branch of that church in Mexico, and that he died in Mexico fifteen years after the making of his will and thirteen years after the making of the codicil thereto. It is evident that decedent's life work was continuously in Mexico, and that he spent but a small part of his time outside of that country. Decedent considered Mexico as his domicile, notwithstanding the allegations in his will and the codicil thereto. Statements in both said will and codicil identify decedent with his Episcopal work in Mexico. It is to be gathered from these statements that it was decedent's intention to be considered a resident of Mexico, and that the recital in his will 'now of the city of New York' and in the codicil 'of New York' are mere descriptive recitals and should not be regarded as conclusive in fixing decedent's last domicile."

In the case of Matter of Rutherford, 88 Misc. 414, 150 N. Y. S. 734, the court held that deceased was a citizen of New York city. The facts were stated in the opinion as follows: "From such evidence it appears that Henry Rutherford died at the Hotel Astor, in the city of New York, on the 25th of February, 1913. The record does not disclose his domicile of origin. He had no children. The papers before me do not give the date of his wife's death, but certain statements therein contained would seem to indicate that she died before he began to live at hotels in the city of New York. There is no evidence as to his residence or domicile during his married life. Charles K. Phipard, a member of the firm of bankers and brokers with which the decedent transacted business, and who is also an executor under decedent's will, testified that he had known the decedent for about forty years; that he first became acquainted with him in New York city, and that prior to the month of November, 1911, he always claimed New York as his residence. Dr. Steele, a physician, testified that he knew the decedent socially and had attended him professionally for about ten years prior to his death, and that during that time the decedent had lived in hotels in New York city. Another physician testified that he had treated him at intervals for about five years prior to his death and that during all that time he lived at hotels in this city. There is no evidence that he had a home or a residence in any other state during that time. He engaged rooms at the Plaza hotel, New York city, on June 14, 1910, and remained there until September 1, 1911. He went to the Astor hotel in September, 1911, and remained there until he went to the Waldorf-Astoria on November 21, 1911. He remained at the Waldorf until March 20, 1912, when he returned to the Astor, and remained at the latter hotel until the date of his death. When registering at the hotel he wrote in the column marked 'residence' the words 'New York.' At the Plaza hotel his bills were rendered and paid monthly. He usually occupied two rooms in each of the hotels at which he stayed, but during part of the year 1912 he occupied a suite of five rooms at the Astor. On June 14, 1911, he rented two safe deposit boxes from the Safe Deposit Company of New York and retained them until his death. He also rented a room from the New York Storage Warehouse Company, and had a bank account in this city. Decedent was executor under the will of his brother, John Rutherford, and in his oath of office, verified April 4, 1911, he stated, 'I am a resident of the Hotel Plaza, in the borough of Manhattan, city and state of New York.' In the petition for the probate of the will of his brother, verified by the decedent on the 30th of March, 1911, he stated that he resided at the Hotel Plaza, in the borough of Manhattan, city of New York. He was executor under the will of his sister, Janet Rutherford Marshall, and in executing the oath of executor he stated on the 6th of November, 1911, that he was 'a resident of the Hotel Waldorf, in the borough of Manhattan, city and state of New York.' In the petition for the probate of her will, verified 6th of November, 1911, he stated that he resided in the borough of Manhattan, city and state of New York. In his will, which was executed on the 23d day of November, 1911, he described himself as 'at present residing in the city, county and state of New York.' He was assessed for personal taxes in New York city for the year 1911, and he paid the tax in 1912. He did not vote in New York city; in fact he never voted anywhere during his life. He was not engaged in any business, nor did he practice any profession." The executors further contended, however, that the deceased, in 1912, changed his residence to Grand Isle, Vt., the facts upon which they based their contention being as follows: "Decedent's brother, John Rutherford, owned a house at Grand Isle, Vt., which he used as a summer residence. Henry Rutherford usually spent a week or two every summer at the home of his brother in Grand Isle. John Rutherford died on February 7, 1911, and devised the house at Grand Isle to his brother Henry. Some time during the summer of 1911 Henry authorized an agent at Grand Isle to place the property in the market for sale. The furniture and pictures were packed and held at the house awaiting their final disposition. Henry went to Grand Isle during the summer of 1911 and remained there about one week. He slept at his own house, but took his meals at a neighboring hotel. He then returned to New York, and did not again visit Grand Isle until July, 1912, when he remained there one night. In August, 1912, he instructed his agent to withdraw the place from the market and ordered that the furniture be unpacked and that the house be repaired and made fit for occupancy. He then stated that he intended to make Grand Isle his home. This is proper evidence of animus. Decedent did not, however, visit the place again during his life. In September, 1912, he received a notice of assessment for personal taxes in New York city, and complained to his brokers that the assessment was too high and that he would not pay it as he was a resident of Grand Isle, Vt. An affidavit was prepared by an employee of the firm, in which the decedent stated that he was a resident of Grand Isle, Vt., and not liable to taxation in this city. Prior to this time he informed his employee in Grand Isle that he was willing to be assessed there at the same amount as his brother, namely, forty thousand dollars. He also stated in November, 1912, when making a contract for the construction of a yacht, that he resided at Grand Isle, Vt. On February 8, 1913, he described himself in a public document as 'now residing at Grand Isle, state of Vermont.'" Holding, however, that no such change of residence had been effected, the court said: "While the decedent doubtless intended to make Grand Isle his home and to acquire a domicile in Vermont, he never, for the purposes of the taxing act, completed the change of domicile, once intended, and this because of his failure to establish a residence in Vermont or to reside at the house in which he had once intended to live at Grand Isle. I will, therefore, find that the former domicile of decedent continued, and that decedent at the time of his death had his domicile in New York and not in Vermont."

In People v. Barker, 70 Hun 397, 24 N. Y. S. 63, affirmed 139 N. Y. 658, 35 N. E. 208, the court said: "The simple question is whether this relator is a resident within this state within the meaning of the provisions of the statute before referred to. The testimony taken in this proceeding I think clearly shows that the relator was not a resident of this state at the time this taxation was imposed. The relator is taxed upon his personal estate in Rhode Island and has been so taxed for six years. He votes in the city of Newport, state of Rhode Island, and he spends a part of the winter in New York, but that cannot be said to be his residence. To hold this relator liable for taxation in New York would be to tax his personal estate both in New York and Rhode Island, which would be double taxation, and is opposed to the principle established in the case of The People v. Coleman, 119 N. Y. 137."

In Wade v. Matheson, 4 Lans. 158, affirmed in 47 N. Y. 658, the court sets forth the facts and its holding as to residence as follows: "There is no doubt of the fact, I think, that at the time the assessment complained of was made, the plaintiff was a resident of Fishkill, in Dutchess county, and liable to be assessed for his personal property in that town in accordance with the provisions of the revised statutes (1 R. S. 389, sec. 5), which require that the owner of personal estate shall be assessed for the same in the town where he resides. The continuance of the plaintiff's business at Ogdensburg, by and through his agents, and his visits there after the removal of his family to superintend the business, and even the entry of his name in the hotel register, with 'Ogdensburg' as the place of his residence, does not, in my opinion, establish that his residence was at the latter place. It is plain and clear that he had moved his family with the intention of making Fishkill his permanent residence; and with the exception of going to Ogdensburg at irregular intervals and devoting about one-third of his time to his business there, the remainder of his time was spent at Fishkill, in the management of the business in which he was there engaged. The latter place was his residence, his home, and his domicile, beyond any question. His transient and temporary visits to Ogdensburg did not make him a resident there, and something more was essential."

In Bailey v. Buell, 59 Barb. 158 (reversed on other grounds 50 N. Y. 662), it appeared that the plaintiff had for some years resided on a farm in West Bloomfield; that in April 1867 he moved to a farm he owned in Richmond, having sold the West Bloomfield farm but having reserved the right to store part of his personal property there; that he remained on the Richmond farm until the 17th of May and then sold that farm, moving part of his personalty back to the West Bloomfield house and the rest to East Bloomfield; that he moved his family to East Bloomfield, his daughter attending school there and he and his wife living with his mother-in-law; that he remained in East Bloomfield under this arrangement until the assessment in question was made, when he claimed that he was not a resident of East Bloomfield, being there only temporarily, but that his true residence was West Bloomfield. It was held that a finding by the jury, under these facts, that the plaintiff was not a resident for taxation of East Bloomfield, was proper.

(16) Ohio.

In the case of Rockefeller v. O'Brien, 224 Fed. 541, it was held that the plaintiff, although temporarily residing in Ohio at the time of tax-listing, was not made a resident of that state by Ohio tax statutes, the court stating the facts and its conclusion as follows: "In the case under consideration, it is admitted that Mr. Rockefeller, all of the time he was in Ohio in the years 1913 and 1914, was a citizen of the state of New York; that he was a voter of that state; that he was taxed there, presumably upon this very property; that he had his permanent home there; and it cannot be doubted on the testimony introduced on this trial that he came to Ohio in June, 1913, as he had often done before, simply for a summer visit, which was continued longer than usual because of the illness of members of his family. Neither can it be doubted that when he left the state he left it with the purpose of permanently residing in the state of New York, which had been his home for more than thirty years. With these facts before us, in the opinion of this court, there can be no doubt at all that, notwithstanding the provisions of the Act of April 14, 1900, Mr. Rockefeller was a non-resident of Ohio when the tax returned in dispute was made, and that he could not properly be taxed upon his intangible property under the terms of that statute."

(17) Pennsylvania.

In Kirby v. Bradford County, 134 Pa. St. 109, 19 Atl. 494, it was held that a finding that the appellant was a resident of Bradford county, Pa., and not of California, was justified by the following facts: "In December, 1885, the plaintiff was living with his family in a dwelling or residence situated in Towanda township, Bradford county, and had lived therein, and had been the owner of the dwelling for several years prior thereto, furnishing the house, supporting the family, and paying all bills therefor. In December, 1885, he was a widower, and had been for some years, and his family consisted of his children. He was twenty-three years of age when he came to Towanda, and sixty-eight years of age in 1885. He continued the owner of the residence or dwelling in Towanda township, until the taking of the testimony in this case in March, 1889. The master found further, that from about December 1, 1884, the plaintiff made visits to his married daughters in Iowa and California, and spent the winters in the latter state; that he returned to Towanda township each spring of the year and did business there, as usual, his business being the lending of money, buying notes, etc.; that he frequently stated that his health was improved in California and he intended to make his residence at Alameda, in that state; that in his absence from Pennsylvania his family was left in his dwelling in Towanda township, he paying the family expenses; that in the spring of 1887 he voted in California, but paid no taxes there except upon a mortgage he held upon property owned by his son-in-law."

(18) Texas.

Commorancy within a jurisdiction for twelve years has been held in Texas to constitute residence for purposes of taxation, in spite of declarations by the person concerned showing an intention of ultimately making another jurisdiction his home, and in spite of a failure on his part to exercise political rights within the jurisdiction. Carmody v. Clayton, 154 S. W. 1067, wherein the court said: "We are further of opinion that, in view of the evidence which we have discussed in relation to the actual situs of the property during 1910 and 1911, coupled with the long-continued residence of the appellant and his wife in this state, he was a citizen of Texas, in contemplation of the tax laws. It is true that, so far as his intention is disclosed, either by conduct or oral declaration, he has at all times refrained from the exercise or performance of those political rights and duties conferred upon him as a citizen by the laws of the state where he has resided, preferring apparently to defer those matters until such time as he and his wife might reach a conclusion as to where they would ultimately make their home. Such matters, however, are largely personal, determinable to an extent by personal predilection, and depending, in a measure, upon the view of individual duty and responsibility. But the legal duty to pay taxes is not dependent upon the exercise of political rights. In fact, it occurs to us that merely refraining from the exercise of such rights is, at most, a circumstance to prove nonresidence and in no sense establishes nonresidence incontrovertibly. . . . There are, perhaps, many persons in this state who have and desire no political rights, and who as well contemplate ultimately removing from the state when their affairs are satisfactorily adjusted, just as appellant says he intends to do; but those several facts, it occurs to us, afford no reason why their property during the years of actual residence in the state, when found, shall not bear its just share of the burden of government. As said by the cases cited, it shares in the benefits, and should not escape the burdens. It is no answer to this just demand to say that the person sought to be taxed is here temporarily, a mere sojourner, for a period of years, or that the property was removed on the first of each year. Such a claim affords its own answer and refutation. Hence, in our opinion, appellant's character of residence in Texas for the past twelve years has been, and was during the years for which he was taxed, such residence as to constitute him, in contemplation of the tax statutes, a citizen of the state, and to subject the property in controversy to taxation, without reference to his political residence, as shown by his intentions."

(19) Vermont.

In Mann v. Clark, 33 Vt. 55, it was held that the plaintiff was a resident, for tax purposes, of Braintree, on April 1, 1856, the facts appearing as follows: "Prior to the 31st of March, 1856, the plaintiff resided in Randolph. During the month of March he hired a farm in Braintree, with the intention of living there the next season, and moved his goods, furniture and provisions to the house which he was to occupy, and drew his wood to the woodshed on the place. The term of the outgoing tenant expired on the 31st of March, but he did not in fact leave till two or three days after. On the 31st of March, being Saturday, the plaintiff took his wife and family, and leaving Randolph went to the house of his brother-in-law, in Brookfield, near the farm in Braintree which he had hired. He remained with his brother-in-law in Brookfield till the 4th day of April, when he moved to the farm in Braintree which he had hired, and there he lived for the ensuing year.

In Woodward v. Isham, 43 Vt. 123, the court said: "The plaintiff denies that he was, during the whole or any part of either of said years, an inhabitant of District No. 8, and claims that he was, during all that time, an inhabitant of School District No. 7, in said town, and taxable in the latter district. But the facts disclosed by the bill of exceptions do not support the plaintiff's action. On the 19th of March, 1866, the plaintiff, with his family, left School District No. 7, and moved on to the town farm, in District No. 8, under a contract to carry it on for the term of one year. They lived on that farm and carried it on during that year, in fulfillment of the contract. The plaintiff, with his family, moved there for that purpose, intending that the town farm in No. 8 should be their home and residence during that year. This constituted the plaintiff an inhabitant of District No. 8, within the meaning of the statute. And for the same purpose, under similar contracts and with like intentions, the plaintiff, with his family, lived on said farm the second and third years, and the facts show that he was an inhabitant of District No. 8 during the three years for which said taxes were assessed. The case states that the plaintiff, at the same time, carried on and controlled his own farm in District No. 7; that during the haying and harvesting seasons, he, with some of his family, occupied his house in No. 7, to do the work there, the rest of the family living on the town farm and taking charge of it at the same time, and that he intended all the time to return to reside on his farm in No. 7, when he should get through carrying on the farm in No. 8. But all this does not tend to show that the plaintiff was an inhabitant of District No. 7 during any of the time for which said taxes were assessed. He was temporarily on his farm in No. 7, for the purpose merely of doing the work on that place, intending to return to the town farm in No. 8, that being his fixed abode and that of his family, during the term of each of said contracts; and having performed the labor which caused him to be temporarily from the town farm, he returned to it as his habitation and family establishment. His intention, all that time, to return and reside on his own farm in No. 7, when he had got through with his contract to carry on the town farm, did not make him an inhabitant of No. 7, or affect his relation, rights, or liability as an inhabitant of No. 8, while he lived there, under the circumstances of the case. Not only the district, but the plaintiff himself, could justly claim that he was, during that time, an inhabitant of No. 8, and the listers, in discharge of their duty, set his said list in that district."

In Meserve v. Folsom, 62 Vt. 504, 20 Atl. 926, the question was whether the plaintiff had in 1883 a taxable residence in Wheelock. It appeared that since 1874 he had not a residence outside the county; that he had paid no taxes in 1880 and 1881; that, although he claimed to have resided in Sutton in 1882, he had not been allowed to vote there; that, although he claimed to have been a resident for taxation of Sutton or Lyndon, he had not been on the tax lists of those towns. On those facts it was held to be a proper finding that the plaintiff was a resident of Wheelock for purposes of taxation.

(20) Wisconsin.

In Kellogg v. Oshkosh, 14 Wis. 623, the court said: "The plaintiff's residence at Oshkosh, at the time the taxes were assessed, is not seriously questioned by his counsel. If it were, it is clear that the finding of the circuit judge could not in this respect be disturbed. His own testimony fully sustains it. Every man has, in law, a home or domicile. The plaintiff is an unmarried man. He says he came to Oshkosh in the spring of 1855, and remained until December, 1856; he voted there in the fall of 1856, and a large share of his time has since been spent there, the winter seasons being passed at different places abroad on account of his health; most of his property has been there and in that vicinity, and that has been his principal if not his only place of business, and he has never removed or gone elsewhere with the intention of remaining, nor exercised the rights of privileges of a citizen at any other place. This clearly made him a resident of Oshkosh. The act of voting was the highest evidence that he had changed his domicile, and made Oshkosh his home in intent as well as in fact."

(21) Canada.

In Jones v. St. John, 30 Can. Sup. Ct. 122, these facts appeared: "[The plaintiff] carried on business in St. John as a brewer up to 1893 when he sold the brewery to three of his sons and conveyed his house and furniture to his adult children in trust for them all. He then went to New York where he carried on the business of buying and selling stocks and securities having offices for such business and living at a hotel paying for a room in the latter only when occupied. During the next four years he spent about four months in each at St. John visiting his children and taking recreation. He had no business interests there but attended meetings of the directors of the Bank of New Brunswick during his yearly visits. He was never personally taxed in New York and took no part in municipal matters there. Being assessed in 1897 on personal property in St. John he appealed against the assessment unsuccessfully and then applied for a writ of certiorari with a view to having it quashed." On these facts it was held that the plaintiff had lost his domicile in St. John, N. B., and acquired a domicile in New York for purposes of taxation. The court said: "The circumstances chiefly militating against the acquisition of a domicile in New York by Mr. Jones, are two, his mode of living there, and the facts in connection with the maintenance of the family home in St. John. The materiality of these circumstances lies in their bearing upon the question of his intention to make a permanent, or indefinitely continuing, home in New York. As to the first, two things are to be taken into account, the continuance of the hotel life for a period covering five years, and the fact that Mr. Jones was a widower. And as to the second, the facts are to be regarded in the light of Mr. Jones's open and avowed purpose to divest himself of all proprietary interest in the house at St. John and its furnishings, and fall short of proving that he maintained the establishment. . . . Here we have explicit and repeated declarations of Mr. Jones, before the making of the assessment in question, which can leave no reasonable doubt as to his intention to abandon St. John as a place of residence and to make his home in New York (irrespective of whether he succeeded in the eye of the law in accomplishing it). His entire good faith in making the declaration has not been, and cannot well be, impugned. We have therefore the fact of a long continued actual residence in New York as his chief place of abode, coupled with an avowed and bona fide intention to make it his home permanently, or, at least, for an indefinite time, and his fixed determination not to return to St. John to reside. There was, consequently, the acquisition of a new home or domicile, and the abandonment of the former one within the meaning of the act."

BARTLETT

TOWN OF NEW BOSTON.

New Hampshire Supreme Court—February 2, 1915.

77 N. H. 476; 93 Atl. 796.

Domicil — What Constitutes — Intention as Essential.

For a person to gain a residence in a town, it is essential that he go there with the intention of remaining and making it his home for some definite time.

Taxation — Place of Taxation — Facts Showing Residence.

In a proceeding to abate taxes claimed by plaintiff to have been improperly assessed against him in a town from which he had changed his residence, evidence that after residing in the town for seventeen years he drove to another town and told the officials that he was a resident thereof, after which he was taxed therein, was insufficient to require a finding that he resided in the latter town, where he did not move his family or make any preparations to remove them from the former town but continued to live with them therein.

[See note at end of this case.]

Review of Assessment — Persons Entitled — Failure to List Property.

Pub. St. 1901, c. 59, § 11, gives a right of appeal from an assessment only to a property owner who has complied with chapter 57, §§ 8, 9, making it his duty to fill out a blank inventory and deliver it to the town selectmen; and hence a property owner who had failed to perform this duty cannot complain of the validity of the selectmen's action in taxing him for property owned by him but returned for taxation by others.

Transferred from Superior Court, Hillsborough county: PIKE, Judge.

Action by Eben L. Bartlett, plaintiff, against Town of New Boston, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff alleges exceptions. Case transferred to Supreme Court. EXCEPTION OVERRULED.

[476] The plaintiff lived in Deering from April 28, 1893, to January, 1894, and then removed to New Boston. He retained ownership of the house in Deering and has occupied it whenever his business took him to that town. From 1894 to 1902 he had a woman come and do the work whenever he had occasion to occupy the Deering house, from 1902 to 1906 he kept a servant in the house, and since 1906 he has employed her whenever he has remained in Deering for any considerable time. He refused to return an inventory for 1910, and the selectmen of New Boston doomed him. He announced that he should leave the town if he was compelled to pay the tax, and on March 25, 1911, he drove to Deering, told the selectmen that he was a resident of that town, and was taxed there for the years 1911 and [477] 1912. He remained in Deering two days at that time and returned again on March 31 for a stay of a day or two. Although the plaintiff claimed to be a resident of Deering, he has in fact lived and made his home in New Boston since March 25, 1911, just as he had done since 1894. During all the time he lived with his family in New Boston, he had been accustomed to make trips to Deering two or three times a month and stay there from one day to a week, the length of his stay depending on the time required to look after his property in that town. Since 1911, his visits to Deering have not been longer nor more frequent than before that year. The tax commissioner having found that the plaintiff was a resident of New Boston when the taxes in question were assessed, he moved that this finding be struck from the report as contrary to the evidence and excepted to a denial of the motion.

Branch & Branch for plaintiff.

Wason & Moran for defendant.

YOUNG, J.—The only question of law it will be necessary to consider is whether there is any evidence to sustain the finding excepted to; in other words, whether fair-minded men can reach any other conclusion than that the plaintiff was a resident of Deering when one or both of these taxes were assessed. It is conceded that he was a resident of New Boston when he started for Deering on March 25, 1911. Consequently he is a resident of that town unless he went to Deering on that or some subsequent day, intending to remain there and make that town his home. Leach v. Pillsbury, 15 N. H. 137, 138

To gain a residence in a town, a person must not only go there, but must go with the intention of remaining and making it his home for a more or less definite time. Therefore, if the plaintiff had intended to reside in Deering and make his home in that town when he went there on March 31, 1911, he would have been a resident of that town on April 1, even though he decided some time during the day to return to New Boston. But instead of these facts conclusively appearing, as the plaintiff contends, the evidence warrants the finding that when the plaintiff went to Deering he had no intention of remaining there and making that town his home; for he neither moved his family nor made any preparations to move them to that town, but continued to live with them in New Boston, just as he [478] had done for the preceding seventeen years. In short, the evidence warrants the finding that whenever the plaintiff has gone to Deering he has gone with the intention of returning to New Boston and making that town his home.

It would be useless to consider the plaintiff's other contentions. Section 8, chapter 57, of the Public Statutes, made it his duty to fill out a blank inventory and deliver it to the selectmen of New Boston on or before April 15 in each year; and having failed to perform this duty, he cannot question the validity of the selectmen's action in taxing him for property owned by him, but returned for taxation by his son and grandson. Section 11, chapter 59, of the Public Statutes, which gives the right of appeal, bases that right on compliance with the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of chapter 57. It is therefore immaterial here whether his contention that the real estate which he owned ought to have been taxed to his son and grandson is well founded. He failed to return an inventory of other property for which he was taxable, and his failure cuts off his right to appeal from any of the taxes included in the assessment of that year. The argument that on tax appeals equity is done cannot apply when there is no appeal; and the suggestion that New Hampshire procedure regards the substance rather than the form comes to nothing, for the substance of the law on this subject is that one who has conducted as the plaintiff did has no redress against the judgment of the assessors in levying taxes upon his estate.

Exception overruled.

All concurred.

NOTE.

The ruling in the reported case is that in order to acquire a residence in a town, a person not only must go to that town but must go there with the intention of remaining and making it his home. The facts are reviewed and are held to show that in the instant case there was no such intent. For a complete consideration of the law of residence within personal property or inheritance tax statutes, and for the particular facts which have, in the cases, been held to constitute residence within such statutes, see the note to the case of Rex v. Board of Assessors, reported ante, this volume, at page 721.

STATE EX REL. ILSLEY ET AL.

v.

LEUCH.

Wisconsin Supreme Court—April 9, 1914.

156 Wis. 631; 146 N. W. 790.

Taxation — Review of Assessment — Conclusiveness of Finding.

A finding of the board of review of the city of Milwaukee, in making assessments for property omitted from taxation, that the owner resided within the city is jurisdictional, and hence is not conclusive on appeal, though sustained by some evidence.

Place of Taxation — Facts Showing Residence.

In a proceeding to have canceled an assessment by the board of review of the city of Milwaukee for property omitted from taxation, in which the owner claimed that he did not reside in the city, the evidence is held to show that the owner had established his residence out of the city with the intention of changing his domicile, so that he was not taxable by the city.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Milwaukee county: ESCHWEILER, Judge.

Action by State of Wisconsin, on relation of Alice B. Ilsley et al., executrices, plaintiffs, against Peter F. Leuch, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. REVERSED.

[631] The appeal is from a judgment affirming, on certiorari, assessments made by board of review of the city of Milwaukee against relators as executrices of the will of Edward Bradley, deceased, for property omitted from taxation in said city in the years 1910 and 1911, during the lifetime of the testator.

It appears from the evidence taken before the board of review that Mr. Bradley was domiciled in the city of Milwaukee from 1874 to May, 1909, when he moved to his country residence in the town of Milwaukee. He continued to occupy a business office in the city jointly with his brother. In 1903 he sold his expensive city residence and built one in the country, costing $35,000. This burned down before it was [632] ready for occupancy, and in 1908 he began building another, suitable for living in the whole year. In May, 1909, he moved into it and resided there till December 31, 1909, when he went to Washington and other places, spending part of the time at the Hotel Pfister in Milwaukee. From May 1, 1910, to December 31, 1910, he lived at his country home. He then went to California and other parts for the winter, stopping occasionally for a few days at a time at the Hotel Pfister in Milwaukee. About May 1, 1911, he returned to his country home and lived there till February 1, 1912, when he moved to the city on account of the bad roads. He rented flats in his own name and lived there with his daughter, Mrs. Hsley, until about June 1, 1912, when he returned to his country residence. The reason he did not return earlier in the spring was because of the installation of a sewerage system at his country home, which system was not completed till then. He continued to live at his residence in the town of Milwaukee till December 1, 1912, when he returned to his rented flats in the city, where he continued to remain until his unexpected death on the 26th of the same month. So far as known, it was his intention to return to his country residence in the spring of 1913. He made frequent and continuing declarations that his residence was in the town of Milwaukee after he moved there in May, 1909. Indeed, one of his avowed objects in changing his residence from the city to the town was to escape taxation in the city, as he thought he was discriminated against on his intangible property assessment. In May, 1910, he informed the city assessor that he was no longer a resident of the city, and he paid no more personal property taxes there except on office furniture owned jointly with his brother. He was assessed in the town of Milwaukee after 1910 on personal property other than intangible property, which the assessor of the town said was never assessed therein. His name was taken off from the voting lists in the city of Milwaukee on and after the fall of 1910. That [633] fall he offered to vote in the town of Milwaukee, but as his name was not on the lists he had to be sworn in. He found one qualified witness, went to look for another but did not return. In the fall of 1912 he voted in the town of Milwaukee at the primary and general election, but did not vote at the spring elections of 1911 and 1912. In his income tax statement made out in 1912 for the income of 1911 he gave the town of Milwaukee as his residence. His wife died in 1897 and he never remarried. His daughter Mrs. Hsley occupied the rented flats with him in the city and lived with him part of the time at his country home.

The board of review, apparently largely upon the advice of the city attorney, refused to cancel the assessment by a vote of nineteen to ten. The assessment for 1910 was $1,069,600 and for 1911 was $1,143,800. The executrices are residents of different taxing districts in this state, and neither resides in the city of Milwaukee.

Van Dyke, Rosecrantz, Shaw & Van Dyke for appellants.

Daniel W. Hoan and Garfield S. Canright for respondent.

VINJE, J.—Assuming that the facts in this case bring the relators within the rule announced in State v. Fisher, 124 Wis. 271, 102 N. W. 566, that the assessment was presumptively correct and could be overturned only by definite and conclusive evidence impeaching it, yet we cannot escape the conclusion that there was no basis in the evidence upon which the assessment could rest. The finding attacked is one that goes to the jurisdiction of the board of review to act at all, not one confessedly made within its jurisdiction. The former finding stands upon a different basis from the latter, as was pointed out in Borgnis v. Falk Co. [634] 147 Wis. 327, 359, 360, 361, 133 N. W. 269, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 489. It is not conclusive upon appeal. If it were, such boards could determine their own jurisdiction without the right of review by the courts, no matter how erroneous their action. It is only findings made within their jurisdiction that are conclusive if based upon some evidence, not findings determining jurisdiction. The latter must have a substantial basis in the evidence or they cannot be sustained.

In the instant case the trial court was of the opinion that the renting of flats by the deceased in February, 1912, living in them till the following June, and returning thereto in December, furnished a sufficient basis for the board's determination. In this the court erred. The renting of and living in such flats, as stated, in no wise contradicted the undisputed facts that the deceased intended to change his place of residence from the city of Milwaukee to the town of Milwaukee, and that such intention was effectuated by an actual removal of residence to the town in May, 1909, which continued uninterrupted till his death in December, 1912. His name was taken from the tax rolls in the city and placed upon the tax rolls of the town for personal property taxation. He voted in the town and ceased to vote in the city. In fact, he did everything that could, under his mode of life and business necessities, be done to effectuate his intent to change domicile.

The fact of a man having a residence in one taxing district and a business office in another is now so common as not to cast any doubt upon the question of residence. The same is almost true of the custom of residents of the country, who have a business office in the city, to move into the city temporarily for the winter months. Certainly in the case of the deceased, who was about seventy years old, such temporary winter residence in the city should not be held inconsistent with an unmistakable effectuated intent to establish his residence in the town of Milwaukee.

The question was suggested by respondent that the deceased should not be aided by the court in escaping just taxation. [635] The court can neither give nor refuse such aid. All it can do is to declare the law upon the facts presented. It appears in this case, however, that the chairman of the town of Milwaukee was present with his attorney before the board of review of the city and protested against the assessment of the estate in the city, claiming it was taxable in the town of Milwaukee. Thus it becomes a question of which taxing district is entitled to tax the estate, rather than a question of its escaping taxation.

The conclusion arrived at on the merits renders it unnecessary to determine the questions raised by the relators as to the constitutionality of the reassessment statute.

By THE COURT.—Judgment reversed, and cause remanded with directions to enter a judgment canceling the assessments.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that, where the facts show an actual removal from one place of residence or domicile to another, with the purpose of making the second place a permanent home, the fact of a temporary abiding in the former place, for business purposes, does not prevent the effectuation of the change of residence for purposes of taxation. For a comprehensive review of the cases discussing what constitutes residence within a jurisdiction for the purposes of personal property or inheritance tax statutes, see the note to Rex v. Board of Assessors, reported ante, this volume, at page 721.

NEAS ET AL.

WHITENER-LONDON REALTY COMPANY.

Arkansas Supreme Court—June 14, 1915.

119 Ark. 301; 178 S. W. 390.

Mortgage — Sufficiency — Defect in Description.

A mortgage which did not give the range number of lands included is insufficient to pass the legal title.

Recording Acts — Constructive Notice from Record — Instrument Defectively Describing Property.

Kirby's Dig. § 762, declares that every instrument in writing affecting the title of realty shall be constructive notice from the time it is filed for record. Section 763 declares that no instrument for the conveyance of land shall be good against a subsequent purchaser for value without actual notice, unless after due acknowledgment and execution it shall be filed for record in the office of the clerk and ex officio recorder. Section 5396 declares that every mortgage shall be a lien on the property mortgaged from the time it is filed in the office of the recorder. A mortgage which included several parcels of land correctly described some of the parcels, but did not give the range number of two sections which were attempted to be included. After recordation of the mortgage the mortgagor disposed of the land to bona fide purchasers for value without notice. It is held that, as the doctrine of constructive notice is harsh, and such statutes are strictly construed, the purchaser, not having actual notice of the mortgage, will not be charged with constructive notice thereof on the theory that an inspection of the mortgage might have led to inquiry by which he would have discovered that the land he afterwards purchased was included. [See note at end of this case.]

Mistake in Record — Effect.

To entitle a party to the benefit of the recording act it is sufficient if he properly file his instrument for record.

Appeal from Mississippi Chancery Court: FRIERSON, Chancellor.

Action by Whitener-London Realty Company, plaintiff, against M. L. Neas et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

J. W. Rhodes, Jr. and W. J. Lamb for appellants.

Hawthorne & Hawthorne for appellees.

[303] SMITH, J.—Appellee, Whitener-London Realty Company, hereinafter designated as the realty company, was the plaintiff below, and instituted this suit for the purpose of reforming and foreclosing a deed of trust executed in its favor by one O. R. Lilly. The realty company conveyed to Lilly on October 25, 1910, a large body of land, all of which was situated in township 13 north, range 8 east, Mississippi County, Arkansas, except two sections numbered 26 and 35, which were situated in township 12 north, range 8 east. This deed recited that it was subject to a timber contract theretofore made by the realty company with the Chapman & Dewey Lumber Company. The deed to Lilly recited that the consideration of $34,947 had been fully paid. On March 3, 1911, Lilly executed to W. [304] B. Flannigan, as trustee for the realty company, a deed of trust to secure notes aggregating the sum of $17,298.50, the balance due on the purchase price of the lands. This trust deed accurately described the lands lying in township 13 north, range 8 east, but described sections 26 and 35, as being in township 12 without giving any range number. Lilly was indebted to appellant D. H. Robinson in the sum of $6,000, and to secure the payment of this sum, which was evidenced by a promissory note for that amount, and which note was assigned to, and is now owned, by one J. W. Pumphrey, executed a deed of trust on said sections 26 and 35 in township 12 north, range 8 east. The date of this deed was April 12, 1911. Lilly later negotiated a trade with appellant Neas for the sale of section 35, township 12 north, range 8 east, for a consideration of $8,500, and executed a deed to Neas conveying said section of land on the 14th day of October, 1911. The deed of trust from Lilly in favor of the realty company was filed for record on the 23d day of March, 1911, while the deed to Lilly from the realty company was filed on the 14th of March, 1911, and all of the other conveyances herein mentioned were filed for record subsequent to those dates.

When Neas was negotiating with Lilly for the purchase of the section above described he procured an abstract of title to that section of land, which was made by a competent abstractor, and from the certificate of this abstracter it appears that the abstract purported to show all conveyances and liens of every kind affecting said land. There is some proof in the record to the effect that Robinson and Lilly were associated together in business, and that after taking a deed of trust in his favor on both sections 26 and 35 to secure the payment of the $6,000 due him from Lilly, Robinson thereafter, without any consideration, released his deed of trust insofar as section 35 was concerned.

But it was shown that he considered Lilly as solvent, and he stated that he would have satisfied his deed of trust entirely had he been requested so to do. It is not necessary, however, to review the transactions between [305] Lilly and Robinson, as the court below made no finding that Robinson was not an innocent purchaser except insofar as he was affected with constructive notice of the prior deed of trust from Lilly to Flannigan, as trustee.

The realty company filed suit in the Federal Court at Jonesboro on the 28th of March, 1912, in which it asked a reformation of the deed of trust to Flannigan by the insertion of the omitted range, and a foreclosure of that instrument; but this suit was never prosecuted to a final decree, and was dismissed on the 28th day of December, 1912. During the pendency of this suit in the Federal Court, Neas paid to Lilly the balance of the purchase money due on section 35, but Neas had not been made a party to this suit in the Federal Court, and had no actual knowledge of its existence.

The court below held that the registration of the deed of trust from Lilly to Flannigan was constructive notice of its existence, and that it constituted a lien prior to the subsequent conveyances. There is no circumstance in proof to support a finding that Neas was not a bona fide purchaser for value, and while there are some circumstances in proof which tend in a measure to show that Robinson may not have been, yet the chancellor did not make that finding of fact, nor is it now contended that the evidence is sufficient to establish that fact, but it is urged that both Robinson and Neas had such constructive notice of the Flannigan deed of trust that the conveyances to them must be held subject to that lien. The determination of the correctness of this view is, therefore, the question in the case.

Section 762 of Kirby's Digest provides that every instrument of writing affecting the title, in law or equity, to any real or personal property which is required by law to be acknowledged, or proved and recorded, shall be constructive notice to all persons from the time the same is filed for record in the office of the recorder of the proper county.

Section 763 of Kirby's Digest provides that no instrument of writing for the conveyance of any real estate, or by which the title thereto may be affected in law or [306] equity shall be good or valid against a subsequent purchaser of such real estate for a valuable consideration, without actual notice thereof; or against any creditor of the person executing such deed, bond or instrument, obtaining a judgment or decree, which by law may be a lien upon such real estate, unless such deed, bond or instrument, duly executed and acknowledged, or approved, as is or may be required by law, shall be filed for record in the office of the clerk and ex officio recorder of the county where such real estate may be situated.

Section 5396 of Kirby's Digest provides that every mortgage, whether for real or personal property, shall be a lien on the mortgaged property from the time the same is filed in the recorder's office for record, and not before; which filing shall be notice to all persons of the existence of such mortgage.

(1) The description of sections 26 and 35 in the Flannigan deed of trust was insufficient to convey the legal title to those lands. It is shown without dispute that there were lands in township 12 north, in addition to those in range 8 east, there being townships numbered 12 north, 9 east; 12 north, 10 east; and 12 north, 11 east, and 12 north, 12 east. The designation of the range was, therefore, essential to a proper description of these sections.

In the case of Howell v. Rye, 35 Ark. 470 (to quote the syllabus), the court said:

"When a deed does not mention the township and range in which the land is situated, and no boundaries, natural or artificial objects, or other means for identifying the land, are given, on its face, is bad for uncertainty; and the grantor may make a new deed correcting the mistake and omission, which would be good between them."

To the same effect, see Fuller v. Fellows, 30 Ark. 657; Mooney v. Cooledge, 30 Ark. 640; Doe v. Porter, 3 Ark. 18, 36 Am. Dec. 448; Howell v. Rye, 35 Ark. 470; Cooper v. White, 30 Ark. 513.

(2) Appellee concedes the insufficiency of the description when it prays that the same be reformed, and the court granted the prayer of that petition and decreed reformation of the deed by the insertion of the omitted [307] range. But appellee says that inasmuch as its deed of trust had been properly acknowledged and recorded, it thereupon became constructive notice to appellants and all others, not only of all recitals contained in it, but that its registry charged appellants and all others with the knowledge of all facts which would have been discovered by the inquiry which would have been suggested had they read the deed as recorded, that is, that this mortgage conveyed the same lands in township 13, range 8 east, which Lilly had purchased from the realty company when he purchased the two sections in township 12-8, and that as all the lands were conveyed to him by the same deed a perusal of this deed of trust would have suggested to him the necessity of inquiring whether or not the deed of trust was not in fact intended to convey the lands in township 12 north, range 8, as well as the lands in township 13 north, range 8. In effect appellees contend that the registry of the deed of trust was constructive notice of all its recitals and notice of all facts which could have been ascertained by the pursuit of the inquiry which its recitals would have suggested.

A somewhat similar contention was made in the case of Bluff City Lumber Co. v. Clarksville Bank, 95 Ark 1, 128 S. W. 58. In that case a deed of trust had been recorded which recited the dissolution of a partnership, and it was there contended that as all persons were charged with constructive notice of the instrument itself, they were likewise charged with the recitals contained in that instrument, and the trial court had been asked, but had refused, to give an instruction so declaring the law. Mr. Justice Battle, speaking for the court, said:

"The appellants contend that the trial court erred in refusing to so instruct; but it did not. The record of a deed is only constructive notice of that for which it is required. As it is not required to give notice of the dissolution of partnership, it does not subserve that purpose. Kirby's Digest, section 762."

It is said in the third edition of Warvelle on Abstracts, section 62, that "The doctrine of constructive notice under registration laws has always been regarded as [308] a harsh necessity, and the statutes which create it have always been subjected to a rigid construction."

The case of Stead v. Grosfield, 67 Mich. 289, 34 N. W. 871, involved a question very similar to the one now under consideration. The syllabus in that case is as follows:

"On February 17, 1873, B., the owner of certain property, executed a mortgage, under the foreclosure of which the defendant claimed title. The property was vacant and unoccupied. This mortgage failed to mention the block in which the lot was located. On July 12, 1875, B. executed another mortgage upon the same property to the plaintiff, in which it was correctly described. The plaintiff was ignorant of the existence of the defendant's mortgage. Held, that the first mortgage and its foreclosure were void for uncertainty of description, and that plaintiff's title must prevail."

In the case of Laughlin v. Tips, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 649, 28 S. W. 551, through the inaccuracy of the description employed, the question of the identity of the land conveyed was involved. But it was there contended that inasmuch as the first deed, which was of record, was intended to convey the tract of land in controversy, the subsequent purchaser stood charged with knowledge of that fact because the identity could have been known by investigation. But in disposing of this question, it was said:

"The deed does not, of itself, give notice that the tract of land sold by W. T. Lytle to appellant was the same sold by him to John T. Lytle and James Speed; and in order to make it effective, it became necessary to show that the two deeds conveyed the same tract, and that this was known to appellant at the time he purchased. Purchasers are only charged with constructive notice of the facts actually exhibited by the record, and not with such as might have been ascertained by such inquiries as an examination of the record might have induced a prudent man to make. Taylor v. Harrison, 47 Tex. 454, 26 Am. Rep. 304. Registration is constructive notice only of what appears on the face of the deed, as registered. McLouth v. Hurt, 51 Tex. 115."

[309] A very similar question was under consideration by the Supreme Court of Mississippi in the case of Simmons v. Hutchinson, 81 Misc. 351, 33 So. 21, in which case that court said:

"Constructive notice arising from the record of a muniment of title is imputed to purchasers and creditors from a mere presumption of law, and it imputes only such knowledge as the instrument there recorded discloses, and not what a diligent inquiry into its meaning might disclose. The registration of an instrument is constructive notice to the world of the contents of the paper there recorded or intended to be recorded, and of its particular contents only, and it will have no operation or effect unless the original instrument correctly and sufficiently describes the premises which are to be affected. The effect of the registration law is to impute to a purchaser notice of what the instrument recorded or intended to be recorded actually conveys, and has no operation in the way of putting him upon inquiry as to what premises were intended to be conveyed, unless they be substantially described therein. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. sections 653, 654."

In the case of American Invest. Co. v. Coulter, 8 Kan. App. 841, 61 Pac. 820, a mortgage had described a tract of land as being in range 17 when it was in fact in range 7, and the Supreme Court of Kansas held that the record of the mortgage itself which had an improper range, and, therefore, in imperfect description was not sufficient to charge subsequent grantees with constructive notice that the mortgage conveyed or was intended to convey the land in range 7.

An old case on this subject and one that is cited in all of the more recent cases is that of Lally v. Holland, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 396. In that case a court of chancery was asked to reform a deed of trust in which a mistake had been made as to the name of the bargainer, and as to that of the slave conveyed by the deed, and to enforce it as reformed against one who, subsequent to the execution of the deed, had purchased the slave without notice. In that case it was said:

"Again, registration is constructive notice in respect to such instruments only, as are authorized and required by law to be registered, and are duly registered in compliance [310] with law. 1 Story's Eq., section 404. And, furthermore, registration is constructive notice only, of what appears on the face of the deed as registered. 2 Humph. 116; 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 299. If the registration be not authorized or required by law; or if the registry itself be not in compliance with the requirements of the law; or if, upon the face of the deed as registered, the property purporting to be conveyed, be not truly and properly described, the act of registration is treated as a mere nullity, and, of course, cannot affect the subsequent purchaser with constructive notice. The object of registration is to give notice to creditors and subsequent purchasers. They have the right to presume that the instrument, as registered, speaks the truth, and expresses fully the true intention of the parties. They cannot be expected or required to look beyond the face of the paper as it appears on the register's books; nor can they be charged with notice of anything beyond."

A more recent case and one which reviews a great many authorities is that of Bailey v. Galpin, 40 Minn. 319, 41 N. W. 1054. In that case a deed had been recorded to a town lot which failed to state the block in which the lot was situated, and in that case, as here, it was contended that inasmuch as the deed had been recorded, that fact made it constructive notice to all subsequent purchasers of the property intended to be conveyed. Justice Vanderburgh, speaking for the Supreme Court of Minnesota, said:

"The legal title to land does not pass by deed unless so described that it can be identified or located by referring to or following out the description as given, and the effect of the record as constructive notice merely, cannot be aided or supplemented by proof of the actual intentions of the parties to the deed, not disclosed by the record. Tice v. Freeman, 30 Minn. 391, 15 N. W. 674; Parret v. Shaubhut, 5 Minn. 331. . . . But if the description in the deed is so defective and inaccurate that the subject of the grant is not properly identified or indicated, so that a reformation of the instrument is required, the legal title will not pass. Roberts v. Grace, 16 Minn. 134. Here the description is confessedly defective on its face. It is not [311] aided by the addition of particulars containing a correct description or identification, or pointing to it, as might be done, by reference to a previous deed or well known name or locality, or anything of the kind. . . .

"We come now to consider, in the next place, whether the record of the deed—there being no actual notice—was constructive notice to the plaintiffs of the equitable rights of the defendant, as between her and her grantors, to a reformation of the deed. But this could not well be; for, if the description in the deed is altogether insufficient to locate or identify the property and pass the title, it would not be constructive notice at all to the plaintiffs, and they were not bound to notice it or look for it. Simmons v. Fuller, 17 Minn. 490; Roberts v. Grace, 16 Minn. 135; Martind. Conv. section 276, et seq. It is intended that the record be a correct and sufficient source of information, and the statute did not mean to put purchasers upon further inquiry by virtue of its operation making the fact of registration constructive notice; and parties are understood to purchase upon the faith of the title as appearing of record. Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 298; Ledyard v. Butler, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 136; Jackson v. How, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 83; Fort v. Burch, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 74. It is the settled rule that registration is constructive notice only of what appears on the face of the deed, and of the description of the premises therein. And if upon the face of the deed as registered, the property in controversy is not so described as to identify it with reasonable certainty, the record cannot be notice to subsequent bona fide purchasers. Roberts v. Grace, supra, 136; Will. Eq. Jur. *256. Under the registration laws, it is sometimes said in a loose and general way that the record of a deed is constructive notice to all the world, but this means simply that the record is open to all, and is notice to interested parties; and, strictly speaking, a purchaser has not by law constructive notice of all matters of record, but only of such as the title deeds of the estate show upon their face, or refer or direct him to. And the bona fide purchaser is not constructively bound to look further than the information afforded by the record of such deeds. The record of a deed is notice [312] only to those who are bound to search for it. Dexter v. Harris, 2 Mason 536, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,862; Maul v. Rider, 59 Pa. St. 167; Sanger v. Craigue, 10 Vt. 555; Thomson v. Wilcox, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 376.

"The distinction between constructive and actual notice is also to be noticed. Constructive notice of the contents of a deed arises as an inference or presumption of law from the mere fact of record, and is in law equivalent to actual notice of what appears upon the face of the record to the party bound to search for it, whether he has seen or known of it or not; that is, constructive notice under the recording acts may bind the title, but does not bind the conscience; while actual notice binds the conscience of the party. Underwood v. Courtown, 2 Sch. & Lef. (Eng.) 66. Hence, where the attention of an interested party is directed to a defective deed, or the recorded copy thereof, he may get actual knowledge of the facts sufficient to affect his conscience, and put him upon inquiry, so as to charge him with notice, which would not otherwise be legally attributable to him from the record only. Thomas, Mortg. section 491. In this case it is only upon the assumption in advance that the plaintiffs knew in fact of the existence of the defendant's deed or the description therein, or were chargeable with notice by the record thereof, that it can be claimed that they were put upon inquiry, or that the title of these lots was bound by it. But they had no actual notice of it. The search made for them did not disclose it. The land was not known by such description. They were not put upon inquiry as to the particulars of the transaction, and they could not be constructively bound by a deed which did not describe the land, and inquiry of the parties to that deed did not become a duty, since they had no notice in fact. Maul v. Rider, 59 Pa. St. 167. As was said in Barnard v. Campau, 29 Mich. 163, 164, in general, it will not be disputed that one who seeks a benefit from the recording laws must incur all the risks of the failure to have his papers spread upon the record in proper form. An equitable construction cannot be placed upon such laws, by which they may be made to give constructive notice of things the records [313] do not show. And in Frost v. Beekman, supra, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 299, the chancellor says: "The registry was intended to contain within itself all the knowledge of the deed necessary for the purchaser's safety." The defendant was at fault in not seasonably examining and correcting the description in her deed; and where one of two innocent parties must suffer, the loss ought justly to fall on that one whose error has led to it. Thomson v. Wilcox, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 380."

We have quoted extensively from that case, as it involves the question under consideration here, and the reasoning of the court is decisive of the point at issue, although we are not called upon to approve the statement that one seeking the benefit of the recording laws must incur all the risks of failure to have his papers spread upon the record in proper form, as we have held that one is required only to properly file his instrument for record. Ghio v. Byrne, 59 Ark. 280, 27

S. W. 243; Case v. Hargadine, 43 Ark. 144; Oats v. Walls, 28 Ark. 244. It would be unreasonable to extend the provisions of the registry laws so as to impose upon one who has only constructive notice, the duties resting upon one who has actual knowledge. Good faith requires of that man, who has actual knowledge of any existing fact, to pursue such inquiry as would be suggested to an ordinarily prudent man by that knowledge, and equity charges him with the knowledge which he would have thus obtained had he made that inquiry. But we find no cases which impose this duty upon him who has only constructive notice. Constructive notice relates only to the instrument as recorded, and if the instrument is insufficient to give the necessary notice, then knowledge is not to be imputed. The deed of trust to Flannigan being one which requires reformation, its registry imputes no knowledge that range 8 had been omitted, and appellants having no actual knowledge of its existence are, therefore, innocent purchasers without notice, and the conveyances to them are superior to the Flannigan deed of trust.

The decree of the chancellor is therefore reversed and this cause will be remanded with directions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

In General.

This note considers the question whether the record of an instrument containing a defective description of real property operates as constructive notice. As was pointed out in Barnard v. Campau, 29 Mich. 162, "subsequent purchasers are charged with constructive notice of what appears of record, and their rights are the same whether they have actually seen the record or not." And in Scott v. Gordon, 109 Mo. App. 695, 83 S. W. 550, it was said: "The law does not necessarily contemplate notice of a technically perfect legal conveyance before a subsequent purchaser could be charged." But on the other hand, it was well remarked in Ann. Cas. 1917B.—50.

Simmons v. Fuller, 17 Minn. 485: "Nothing could be more inequitable than because the law affects a purchaser with constructive notice of the record, to hold him affected also with constructive notice of the real intention of the parties to a deed, where the record of it utterly fails to disclose what that was. That would be a premium on negligence, not of the purchaser, but of the parties to the deed." And in Savidge v. Seager, 175 Mich. 47, 140 N. W. 951, the court said: "The records should give information in such a form that the exact state of the title may be easily discovered; they must be characterized by certainty, accuracy, and reliability. A description, which in a deed of bargain and sale may be sufficient to pass title, may not be sufficient in a public record to give notice to subsequent purchasers."

A prayer for reformation of the instrument is not inconsistent with constructive notice, inasmuch as a defective description may be sufficient to put the examiner on inquiry, and yet be such as to make a correction proper and expedient. Nolen v. Henry, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 792; Bowen v. Galloway, 98 Ill. 41; Scott v. Gordon, 109 Mo. App. 695, 83 S. W. 550. But it has been held that where reformation is required in order to render the instrument valid between the parties, the record of the instrument cannot be constructive notice to purchasers. Simmons v. Fuller, 17 Minn. 485.

Description Imparting Notice.

WHERE PROPERTY IS IDENTIFIED.

Where a description in a recorded instrument is erroneous, but the error is apparent on the face of the instrument, and the understanding of the plain import of the record is not defeated, the record is constructive notice. Black Eagle Oil Co. v. Belcher, 22 Cal. App. 258, 133 Pac. 1153 (letters "S. B. & M.," meaning San Bernardino Base & Meridian, were transposed and appeared as "B. M. & S.>"). In Scott v. Gordon, 109 Mo. App. 695, 83 S. W. 550, the court said: "The error in this description is in the first course being set out as 'north,' when it should have been 'south.' But as the description calls for two northern courses which made it impossible to have the terminating point at the place of beginning, it was again apparent that there was a mere error in the scrivener. There is no reasonable ground to say that anyone reading such description would not have been sufficiently informed that the fourteen acres in controversy had been attempted to be conveyed to these plaintiffs."

Where the description, although defective, is correct to an extent sufficient to identify the tract intended, the record gives constructive notice. Loeb v. Conley, 160 Ky. 91, Ann. Cas. 1916B 49, 169 S. W. 575; Allen v. Hambleton, 1 Ky. L. Rep. (abstract) 353; Anderson v. Baughman, 7 Mich. 69, 74 Am. Dec. 699; Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 463; Thorwarth v. Armstrong, 20 Minn. 464; Baker v. Clay, 101 Mo. 553, 14 S. W. 734 (inaccuracy in call for quantity); Coney v. Laird, 153 Mo. 408, 55 S. W. 96 (lands properly described by section, township, and range, but name of wrong county given); Mohr v. Scherer, 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 509 (county designated by former name); Kennedy v. Boykin, 35 S. C. 61, 14 S. E. 809, 28 Am. St. Rep. 838 (mistake in number of acres, "more or less"); Daugherty v. Yates, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 646, 35 S. W. 937; West v. Houston Oil Co. 46 Tex. Civ. App. 102, 102 S. W. 927. Thus in Anderson v. Baughman, supra, the court said: "The description of the mortgage is as follows: 'All that certain piece or parcel of land situate in Springwells, Wayne county, Michigan, known as lot number four (4) in block number one (1) of the La Fontaine farm, so-called, lying south of the River road, so-called, and fronting on Detroit river, being now used and occupied, with the steam saw-mill thereon, by the parties of the first part.' By reference to the plat, it appears that all that part of the La Fontaine farm 'lying south of the River road, and fronting on Detroit river,' is divided into four tracts or lots, by straight lines drawn from the road to the river, parallel with the side lines of the farm; that these tracts are not designated by any word of description, as subdivision, block, or lot, but simply by numbers 1, 2, 3, and 4, in large figures; number one being on the upper or easterly line and the numbers following consecutively to the lower or westerly line, and number four adjoining the lower line of the farm. None of these four tracts appears to have been divided into smaller portions or lots. That part of the farm immediately across the road, and between that and Fort street, is also divided into four tracts or blocks, numbered, beginning on the west line, consecutively 5, 6, 7, and 8, in the same large figures; and these last four tracts are each subdivided into ten smaller lots. . . . It is admitted that tract or lot four, between the River road and the river, as shown upon the plat, is situate on the La Fontaine farm referred to, in the township of Springwells, Wayne county; and that it lies south of the River road, and fronting on Detroit river. It is also proved that the steam saw-mill of the mortgagors, at the date of the mortgage, and for years before and since, was, and is, situate on this tract or lot four; and that there was no mill on any of the other tracts or lots between the River road and the river (though all of them were occupied as a lumber yard in connection with the mill). In all these particulars this tract or lot four agrees exactly with the calls of the mortgage. It is then evident that, if these tracts, numbered 1, 2, 3 and 4, between the road and the river, are properly called 'lots,' instead of blocks, we have, in the mortgage, a full and perfect description, by the number of the lot, and the courses and distances indicated on the plat, with the further fact in identification, not susceptible of mistake, the mill called for in the mortgage as being on this lot. The description is then perfect and certain; and it agrees with all the calls of the mortgage, with the single exception that it is not 'in block No. 1.' But, as the description is full, true, and perfect, in all respects, without the words 'in block No. 1,' and false and impossible with them, these words must be rejected under the familiar rule, falsa demonstratio non nocet: of which a more appropriate illustration cannot be found in the books. . . . It is quite evident the person who drafted the mortgage mistook that part of the farm between the road and the river for one block of lots, and supposed lot four to be a lot of that block. The error, however, is so palpable that it cannot fail to be discovered by construing the mortgage, as such instruments must always be construed, with reference to the plat, and facts, and monuments on the ground, referred to in the instrument itself. The mortgage was good between the parties, without correction, and the error appearing by construction, the record was notice to all subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers, as much as if the error had not occurred. No man of ordinary intelligence could have been deceived as to the land intended."

In Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 463, it appeared that the description in the mortgage was "lot number one (1), in section twenty-eight (28), on the Forsyth or Porter farm in said city, being on the southwest corner of Fort and Sixth streets." The lot should have been described as in section eighteen (18), the other parts of the description being correct. The court held the description to be sufficient to impart constructive notice.

In West v. Houston Oil Co. 46 Tex. Civ. App. 102, 102 S. W. 927, the court said: "It cannot be questioned that the description of the land as that 'tract, lot or parcel of land containing four thousand four hundred and twenty-eight acres, and being the league of land granted me by George Antonia Nixon, Commissioner of the Empresario Lorenzo de Zavalla . . . , and for further description of said land reference is hereby made to the original plat and field notes of survey which are on file and of record in the General Land Office of this Republic' is sufficient to identify and convey the land in controversy. The insertion in the description of the statements that the land was situate in Jefferson county on Cabicera bayou and joining the land of Francis Valeras on the east, which statements as applied to the only league of land granted by Nixon to McGee and which McGee, as shown by his subsequent act, intended to sell and did sell to Dobson, are shown to be false, does not viti-ate the true description and invalidate the deed, nor can the reference to the false testimonio which was delivered to Dobson with the deed have such effect. . . . The fact that the false portions of the description indicated that the land conveyed was other than the land in controversy would not justify a purchaser in failing to make the reasonable inquiries by which the truth could have been ascertained. He could not accept the false portion of the description and discard the true and thus make himself an innocent purchaser."

It has been held to be sufficient to describe the property as "all the right, title and interest of said Richard K. Morien and wife, in and to the real estate lying in the county of Henrico of which Richard Morien died seized and possessed." Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 26, 34 S. E. 890. And in Vanvalkenberg v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. 37 Fed. 617, 59 U. S. App. 102, 31 C. C. A. 145, it was held that the record of a mortgage on "thirty acres" in a certain quarter section was notice to judgment creditors, it appearing that the mortgagor owned in the designated quarter section only the thirty acres intended to be described.

In Regan v. Milby, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 21, 50 S. W. 587, it was held that the record of a deed with a defective description but containing a correct statement of the number of acres conveyed was constructive notice to a judgment creditor that the grantee claimed a part of the land formerly owned by the grantor.

WHERE PURCHASER IS PUT ON INQUIRY.

The general rule is that where the record of an instrument containing a defective description of the property is sufficient to put those who see it on an inquiry which, duly prosecuted, would disclose the true facts, the recorded instrument is notice to subsequent purchasers.

Wash. 285, 101 Pac. 867, 132 Am. St. Rep. 1075.

Thus in the case last cited wherein it appeared that the description was "lots (7) and (8) in Cove addition to the city Seattle, Washington" and that Cove addition consisted of twelve blocks each containing sixteen lots, the court said: "Was this deed sufficient to put a subsequent purchaser upon notice? We think it was. The record showed that Rayburn and Alexander owned no interest in any other lots numbered 7 and 8 in this addition. They had deeded these lots away and the deed was of record. An inquiry of Rayburn would have revealed the fact, or an inquiry of his grantee would have disclosed, that the grantee or her successors in interest were claiming the lots by virtue of the deed of June 4, 1907, and intended to 'fight it out' with the grantor. . . . In Deering v. Holcomb, 26 Wash. 588, 598, 67 Pac. 240, 561, quoting from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, this court said: 'Whatever is notice enough to excite attention, and put the party on his guard, and call for inquiry, is notice of everything to which such inquiry might have led. When a person has sufficient information to lead him to a fact, he shall be deemed conversant of it.' . . . The deed of June 4, above referred to, which was standing of record, even if it was not notice of itself, was alone sufficient to put the appellant upon inquiry as to whether Rayburn and Alexander had not parted with all their title. It follows that the appellants were not purchasers without notice."

In Partridge v. Smith, 2 Biss. 183, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,787, it appeared that a mortgage was intended to describe the south half of the southeast quarter of section 15, town 43 north, range 8 east of the third principal meridian, in McHenry county, Illinois. The description read: "The south half of the southeast quarter of section 15, in township No. 8 north, of range No. 43 east of the 4th principal meridian, being in the county of McHenry and state of Illinois." According to the government surveys, of which the court took judicial notice, there was no such tract of land in McHenry county as the one described. The court said: "It may be admitted—and I think the authorities go that far—that if there had been any land in McHenry county to which this description would apply, it would not be the duty of the parties to trace up and determine what the actual truth was; but, upon a mere inspection of the record, which these parties are presumed to have seen, it would appear that Mrs. Smith undertook to mortgage a particular tract of land in McHenry county; that it was east of the fourth principal meridian; that it was in town 8 north; that it was in range 43 east. The inquiry would naturally be, what does this mean? There is no fourth meridian in McHenry county; there is no range 43 east. In point of fact the range and town are simply transposed. It should be 'town 43' instead of 'range,' and 'range 8' instead of 'town.' I think that, with this before them, there were facts from which they could infer, or any prudent man might infer, that this property upon which their deed of trust operated was encumbered, and that incumbrance was upon the record two days before their own. The property was actually mortgaged. It was the intention of the parties that it should be mortgaged. There is simply a misdescription of the property. The question is whether it is of such a character as to do away with the effect of the registry laws as against a person whose deed took effect subsequent to the recording of this mortgage. I think there was enough upon the record to put a prudent man upon inquiry and compel him to follow it up and to affect him with the consequences of that pursuit."

In Leonard v. Osburn, 169 Cal. 157, 146 Pac. 530, 532, wherein it appeared that the recorded deed described the lot conveyed as "lot 10, block 21, subdivision No. 6, according to the map made by N. E. Beckwith," and it appeared that the reference to the map was erroneous, it was held nevertheless that the deed was constructive notice, the court saying: "It appears that there was no lot 10 in block 2 on the Beckwith map, nor any subdivision 6; that that block was not divided into lots, but was reserved as a site for a church, which church was already built in the year 1890. It was also shown by competent testimony that the lot described in the deed through which defendant derives title can from the description therein be easily located, notwithstanding the false reference to the map. . . . We think in the present case that, had the plaintiff's predecessor before purchasing the lot examined the record of the deed of defendant's predecessor, including the map therein referred to, she would undoubtedly have been put upon inquiry, and could not have failed to discover the true facts. She would have discovered that there was no subdivision 6 delineated upon said map, and that in the only subdivision platted thereon, viz., subdivision 1, there was no lot 10 in block 2. Inquiry upon the ground would have quickly brought to light that the lot described in said record was no other than the one she was negotiating to purchase."

In Bowen v. Galloway, 98 Ill. 41, it appeared that a deed of trust conveyed "lot 4, in block 13, in Ogden's addition to Chicago, having a frontage of 24½ feet and a depth of 80 feet" with a two-story and basement frame dwelling thereon. It further appeared that in said block 13 there were both an original lot 4, and a sub lot 4 cut from original lots 1 and 2. The original lot 4 was 40' x 116' and did not have the dwelling house described; the subplot 4 was 23' x 80' and had a dwelling house as described in the deed of trust. The grantor had a fee simple title to subplot 4, and no title to the original lot 4. In holding that the description in the deed of trust was a sufficient identification of the subplot 4, the court said: "It seems plain that with this description, no reasonable man could fail to identify the property conveyed by this Munroe trust deed. The mistake of 18 inches in stating the frontage of the lot is so small as to be a matter of no moment whatever, and the identification, by the description of the house which stood upon the lot, is conclusive. The prayer for reformation of the deed is not a matter that is at all essential. The deed was sufficient without reformation. It was no doubt better that in the decree it should be more distinctly described. It is true, that where the description of property in a deed is, by mistake, so defective that it cannot be identified, the record of such deed would not be notice to a subsequent purchaser; and it is also true that while such a mistake in a deed may be reformed, as between the parties to it, no reformation of such deed could lawfully be made as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser of the property. But in this case we cannot regard Bowen, or any of those through whom he derives title, as bona fide purchasers. The record of the Munroe trust deed was sufficient notice to put each and every of them upon inquiry. Such inquiry could not fail to furnish them the necessary information as to the property which was described in that deed."

Contrary to the general rule, the view is expressed in the reported case that constructive notice does not extend to such facts as would be revealed by an inquiry duly prosecuted according to the facts disclosed by a defective description in the record. The view of the reported case finds support in the following cases: Bailey v. Galpin, 40 Minn. 319, 41 N. W. 1054; Simmons v. Hutchinson, 81 Miss. 351, 33 So. 21. And see the Missouri and Texas cases compared supra. But see Cable v. Minneapolis Stock-Yards, etc. Co. 47 Minn. 417, 50 N. W. 528.

Description Not Imparting Notice.

VAGUE AND INDEFINITE DESCRIPTION.

Where the description of the premises is omitted or is given in vague and indefinite terms that do not identify the property or impart information sufficient to put a subsequent purchaser on inquiry, the record does not afford constructive notice. Bright v. Buckman, 39 Fed. 246 (omission of block number, where there were ten blocks; grantor owned lots as numbered in only one block, but he had in some manner dealt with same numbered lots in another block); Fuller v. Fellows, 30 Ark. 657 (lands described by subdivisions of certain sections with reference to homestead, omitting township, range, county and state); Adams v. Edgerton, 48 Ark. 419, 3 S. W. 628; Chamberlain v. Bell, 7 Cal. 292, 68 Am. Dec. 260 (number and description of lots omitted from record by mistake); Bender v. Chew, 129 La. 849, 56 So. 1023; Wilfert v. Duson, 131 La. 21, 58 So. 1019; Thurlough v. Dresser, 98 Me. 161, 56 Atl. 654 (twelve acres of "a farm in Caswell"); Barrows v. Baughman, 9 Mich. 213; Barnard v. Campau, 29 Mich. 162; Stead v. Grosfield, 67 Mich. 289, 34 N. W. 871 (omission of block number, where subdivision contained three blocks); Roberts v. Grace, 16 Minn. 126; Gatewood v. House, 65 Mo. 663 (reference to unrecorded certificates of entry); Banks v. Ammon, 27 Pa. St. 172; Southern Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. Rodgers, 104 Tenn. 437, 58 S. W. 234 (inconsistent calls and unclosed lines); Potter v. Dooley, 55 Vt. 512.

Thus in Banks v. Ammon, 27 Pa. St. 172, the following description was considered: "Beginning at a servisberry corner, thence north to a white oak, thence east to white oak, thence south to limestone quarry, thence to a white oak: all these trees are marked for the purpose of running off the above described land." The court said: "There is nothing in the description to bring home notice to the purchaser of the identity of the land. Neither township, county, nor state is given for its locality; nor is the number of the tract, or the amount of acres mentioned. No boundaries, courses, or distances referred to: all that is required to fill the description is to find one servisberry, three white oaks, a limestone quarry, with the trees marked in some manner. One about to purchase at a judicial sale, finding such a deed upon record, might safely assume that it did not apply to land of which the grantor died seized. We are of opinion that the description in this deed was too vague and indefinite, either to bring home notice to the purchaser, or to put him upon inquiry."

In Stead v. Grosfield, 67 Mich. 289, 34 N. W. 871, the controversy was over lot No. 9, in block 1, of Joseph Bushey's subdivision of private claim 171, Livernois farm. Both parties claimed through Joseph Bushey, who on February 17, 1873, executed a mortgage to Michael Darmstadter on lots 9, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of the Bushey plat. No block was mentioned. The plat contained three blocks, numbered 1, 2 and 3, and each block contained a lot numbered 9. This mortgage was duly recorded on the day of its date. On July 2, 1875, Joseph Bushey executed a mortgage to Mary E. Sage covering lot 9, of block 1, of the Bushey plat, which was duly recorded. The plaintiff claimed title through this mortgage and the defendant claimed title through the mortgage to Darmstadter; and the question was whether the record of the first mortgage was notice to Sage at the time she acquired her mortgage. The court held that it was not notice for want of a sufficient description of the premises.

It has been held that the record of a deed conveying "all the estate, both real and personal, to which" the grantor was "in any manner entitled at law or in equity," was not notice to subsequent purchasers, because of the want of description of the lands intended to be conveyed. Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Grat. (Va.) 518. That holding was disapproved in Warren v. Syme, 7 W. Va. 474.

In each of the following cases it was held that the description was not sufficient to impart notice, on the ground, however, that actual notice is necessary to put a subsequent purchaser on inquiry as to the premises intended to be affected by a defective record. Bailey v. Galpin, 40 Minn. 319, 41 N. W. 1054; Simmons v. Hutchinson, 81 Miss. 351, 33 So. 21 ("the $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 3" etc., held to be indefinite and no notice of intention to describe the east $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of Sec. 3, etc.); Cass County v. Oldham, 75 Mo. 50 (township and range omitted); Ozark Land, etc. Co. v. Franks, 156 Mo. 673, 57 S. W. 540 (land described as S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 26, range 5, omitting township: grantor referred to as patentee, and other record evidence showed that grantor was not patentee of land in any other section 26 in range 5). Laughlin v. Tips, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 649, 28 S. W. 551. And see the reported case.

DESCRIPTION APPARENTLY RELATING TO OTHER PROPERTY.

It has been generally held that where the recorded instrument appears by its description to relate to certain land, it is not constructive notice as to other land, which it was intended to describe.

Alabama.—Winter-Loeb Grocery Co. v. Carroll, 194 Ala. 402, 70 So. 5 (specific designation of property other than that owned by mortgagor and intended to be mortgaged; nothing to show that all of mortgagor's property was to be conveyed).

California.—Davis v. Ward, 109 Cal. 186, 41 Pac. 1010, 50 Am. St. Rep. 29 (land described as situated in range 24, instead of 25).

Colorado.—Annie C. Gold Min. Co. v. Marks, 13 Colo. App. 248, 58 Pac. 404 (misnomer of mining claims).

Illinois.—Rodgers v. Kavanaugh, 24 Ill. 583; Wait v. Smith, 92 Ill. 385; Slocum v. O'Day, 174 Ill. 215, 51 N. E. 243 (lots described as being in section 11 instead of section 17); Harms v. Coryell, 177 Ill. 496, 53 N. E. 87; Thorpe v. Helmer, 275 Ill. 86, 113 N. E. 954; Munford v. McIntyre, 16 Ill. App. 316 (section 13 instead of 12).

Indiana.—Easter v. Severin, 64 Ind. 375 ("three town lots in the town of Benwood" held not to apply to lots or lands outside of Benwood); Rinehardt v. Reifers, 158 Ind. 675, 64 N. E. 459 ("lots 13 & 14 in University Park addition to West Lafayette" instead of lots 13 & 14 in University Park, second addition to West Lafayette).

Iowa.—Scoles v. Wilsey, 11 Ia. 261 (Iowa statute provided for description in recorder's index); Miller v. Bradford, 12 Ia. 14 ("undivided" right, instead of individual right); Noyes v. Horr, 13 Ia. 570; Breed v. Conley, 14 Ia. 269, 81 Am. Dec. 485; Stewart v. Huff, 19 Ia. 557 (lots numbered according to unrecorded plat, and lot numbers were subsequently changed); Halloway v. Platner, 20 Ia. 121, 89 Am. Dec. 517 (land described as situated in range 44, instead of 43); Peters v. Ham, 62 Ia. 656, 18 N. W. 296 ("Zulauf's subdivision" instead of Zollar's addition).

Kansas.—American Invest. Co. v. Coulter, 8 Kan. App. 841, 61 Pac. 820 (range 17 instead of 7).

Louisiana.—Robeson v. Robert, 6 La. 1; Adams v. Drews, 110 La. 456, 34 So. 602; Haas v. Fontenot, 132 La. 812, 61 So. 831 ("N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 23, township 4 south, range 1 west" instead of S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, etc.); Sentell v. Randolph, 52 La. Ann. 52, 26 So. 797.

Maryland.—Brydon v. Campbell, 40 Md. 331 ("one-fourteenth part" instead of four-tenths).

Michigan.—Burrowes v. Gibson, 42 Mich. 121, 3 N. W. 293; Savidge v. Seager, 175 Mich. 47, 140 N. W. 951.

Minnesota.—Simmons v. Fuller, 17 Minn. 485 (wrong block number); Ada Bank v. Gullikson, 64 Minn. 91, 66 N. W. 131.

Montana.—Baker v. Bartlett, 18 Mont. 446, 45 Pac. 1084, 56 Am. St. Rep. 594 ("lot 16, block 67" instead of lot 16, block 57).

Nebraska.—Galway v. Malchow, 7 Neb. 285 (wrong section); Gillespie v. Sawyer, 15 Neb. 536, 19 N. W. 449.

Pennsylvania.—Wentz's Appeal, 10 W. N. C. (Pa.) 284 (error in starting point).

New Jersey.—See Rutgers v. Kingsland, 7 N. J. Eq. 178.

New York.—Thomson v. Wilcox, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 376 (metes and bounds described wrong lot, although street number was correctly given).

Texas.—McLouth v. Hurt, 51 Tex. 115; Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. Gill, 86 Tex. 284, 24 S. W. 502 (wrong block number, according to only accessible map); Neyland v. Texas Yellow Pine Lumber Co. 26 Tex. Civ. App. 417, 64 S. W. 696; Dickerson v. McFarland, 152 S. W. 1140 (second call read "east" instead of "west," thereby throwing description to another tract, although fourth call was also "east" but qualified by "to the beginning"); Higginbotham v. Breed, 160 S. W. 117.

Vermont.—Sanger v. Craigue, 10 Vt. 555 (east half of lot described as west half).

In Thorpe v. Helmer, 275 Ill. 86, 113 N. E. 954, the court said: "The property was described as in the subdivision by John G. Shortall, trustee, of the north half of the northeast quarter of section 16. The proof shows that there is only one subdivision in Cook county by John G. Shortall, trustee, and that it is in section 26, but there is neither allegation nor proof that the Chicago Title & Trust Company knew that fact. In any event, it was not required to look for the record of title to a lot of land in section 16. The record of an instrument affecting the title to land is constructive notice only so far as the land is correctly described, unless it is apparent from the record itself that there is a misdescription. . . . There is nothing in the description to indicate that there was not a subdivision by John G. Shortall, trustee, in section 16, and nothing to indicate that the land intended to be conveyed was in section 26." In Savidge v. Seager, 175 Mich. 47, 140 N. W. 951, it appeared that the recorded notice of levy described the premises as "lot 5, block Q, Mitchell's revised plat of Cummer & Gerrish's addition to the village of Clam Lake, now city of Cadillac, state of Michigan." There was a plat known as Cummer & Gerrish's addition, but that contained no block Q; and there was no plat known as Mitchell's revised plat of Cummer & Gerrish's addition. The court said: "The property described in the levy proceedings places this lot in the proper block Q, but not in the correct plat. . . . 'G. A. Mitchell's revised plat of the village of Clam Lake, now city of Cadillac, and Mitchell's revised plat of the village of Clam Lake, now city of Cadillac, is one and the same thing.' There is a lot 5, block Q, in the G. A. Mitchell's revised plat of the village of Clam Lake, now city of Cadillac. There is but one block Q in the city of Cadillac, and that is found in Mitchell's revised plat of the village of Clam Lake. There is no lot 5, block Q, of Cummer & Gerrish's addition to the village of Clam Lake, now city of Cadillac. . . . It will be noted that the description was a wrong description, as distinguished from an imperfect or impossible description. It is the claim of the plaintiff that, by a process of elimination, defendant Seager could have ascertained that the only block Q in the city of Cadillac was in Mitchell's revised plat, and that there was no block Q in the Cummer & Gerrish addition. But the description being a wrong description, why should the defendant be driven to take his chances upon what should be eliminated from the wrong description? Might he not as well say that block Q was a mistake, or the lot levied upon was wrongly described, or that describing it as Mitchell's revised plat was an error, as well as to say that he must find that Cummer & Gerrish's addition was an error? We do not think, in the light of the cases which we have cited, that there was any such duty resting upon the defendant Seager."

In Burrowes v. Gibson, 42 Mich. 121, 3 N. W. 293, the court said: "The lot 7 deeded to Elizabeth Knight, and on which the mortgage rests and to which the complainant seeks to apply the levy, is lot 7 of John Gibson's subdivision of lots 12, 13, 14 and 18 of the Labrosse and Baker farms, situated on the south side of Pine street between Sixth and Seventh streets, according to the recorded plat of the same in the register's office of Wayne county, and the levy is described as on lot numbered 7 of the subdivision of lots numbered 12, 13 and 14 of the Labrosse and Baker farms, so-called, in the city of Detroit. . . . We have then in the one case a John Gibson subdivision of four specified lots on a specified block according to a recorded plat, and in the other a subdivision of three specified lots made by some one not named, and not located on any block nor referred to any plat. It is, we think, not possible to hold that the lot 7 in the levy was so described there as to affect the public with notice, through the certificate, that the lot 7 of the John Gibson subdivision was meant. The difficulty is not merely that the description in the levy has fewer badges of identification than were practicable, and should have been given. It goes further. Instead of being only a blind guide to the lot claimed, the description is a misleading one which points somewhere else."

In Ada Bank v. Gullikson, 64 Minn. 91, 66 N. W. 131, it was said: "The lots intended to be described in the mortgage were lots 6 and 7 in block 13 in the town (now village) of Ada, but the actual description was lots 6 and 7 in block 13 of the First addition to the town (now village) of Ada. The plaintiff's claim is that the land intended to be described in the mortgage can be located and identified by following out the description, which is complete if the false particular locating the lots in the First addition to the village of Ada be eliminated by rejecting therefrom the words 'The First addition to,' thereby locating the lots in the original plat. . . . The fallacy of the plaintiff's claim lies in the assumption that the description in the mortgage on its face discloses in what particular it is false, and what should be corrected in or eliminated therefrom in order to describe the lots intended to be mortgaged. It is impossible to tell from the face of the description whether the mistake therein is in locating the lots in the wrong plat or block or village. If the mistake was in locating the lots in the wrong block, and block 23 was intended, then, if 23 was substituted for 13, the description would be correct. Conceding that a person reading the description would be charged with notice that there was no block 13 in the First addition, yet it does not, as we have suggested, charge him with notice that the mistake was in locating the lots in the wrong plat, and not in the wrong block or village."

In Sentell v. Randolph, 52 La. Ann. 52, 26 So. 797, wherein it was alleged that the mortgage and deed of sale described certain quarter sections other than those intended, the court said: "If we were to decree that these defendants must loose their lands, we would then virtually have to hold that they should have been aware of a fact of which plaintiff had no knowledge whatever until quite recently. Plaintiff and her ancestors in title held for years the land described in her deed of purchase without suspecting that there was the least illegality in the title to these lands, and that she had the shadow of a claim to the lands now owned by these defendants. She, in consequence, cannot, in the absence of evidence, sustain the position that they should have known that which was unknown to her and to her ancestors in title. Not only the title since a number of years did not inform the public, as required, what property it embraced, but it did not inform the plaintiff until a comparatively recent date. The intention of Mrs. Randolph to sell these tracts to plaintiff's ancestor in title, if it was the intention, does not appear of record. What plaintiff's ancestors in title intended to do, does not in the absence of all notice concern third persons."

The rule has been laid down that where, on account of a misdescription, the recorded instrument is not in the apparent chain of the title of the land in question, the record is not constructive notice. Cunningham v. Thornton, 28 Ill. App. 58.

v.

HENRY.

Alabama Supreme Court—December 17, 1914.

190 Ala. 540; 67 So. 500.

Deeds — Validity — Uncertainty of Description.

The law leans against the destruction of a deed for uncertainty of description, and will construe, where it can be done consistently with the rules, so as to effect, and not to defeat, the intention of the parties.

[See 66 Am. St. Rep. 60.]

Same.

Although a deed may be void on its face for want of a definite description of the land, a court of chancery will reform it upon proper allegation and proof of extrinsic facts.

Same.

A grantor, owning a large body of surrounding land, conveyed ten acres, to be laid off so as to include a certain shoal on the creek, which in fact was in section 15; the deed describing it as being in sections 16 and 22, to be laid off so as to include that certain shoal, the land to be surveyed and platted, and a certified plat to become a part of deed to complete a description, in view of the recording of the plat referred to therein, is an uncertain description, which may be aided by parol proof, and which comes within the maxim, "Id certum est, quod certum reddi potest."

Reformation of Instruments — Laches.

Where land was conveyed to a power company in May, 1909, and conveyed by it to complainant in March, 1913, after the death of the original grantors, complainant's bill, thereafter filed, for reformation of the description in the deed, is not too long delayed.

[See 65 Am. St. Rep. 504.]

Right to Sue for Reformation — Person Out of Possession.

To maintain a bill to correct a mistake in the description of land conveyed by a deed, it is not necessary that the complainant should be in possession of the land.

Recording Acts — Constructive Notice — Instrument Defectively Describing Property.

A deed executed in May, 1909, conveying ten acres from a body of surrounding land described as lying in sections 16 and 22, to be laid off so as to include a certain shoal on a creek, and to be surveyed and platted, and a certified plat to be a part of the deed to perfect the description, on record before the plat was filed, sufficiently described the lands to put a purchaser on inquiry, and hence was such constructive notice as to defeat his rights as a bona fide purchaser.

Corporations — Execution of Deed — Form of Signature.

A deed of "Big Hillabee Power Company," purporting on its face to be the deed of the company, and reciting that in witness the grantor had set its hand and seal and delivered it by its president, signed, "L. W. Roberts, Pres't Big Hillabee Power Co.," was the deed of the company, since any defect in the signature is such as a court of equity will not permit to defeat the right of the grantee.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Tallapoosa county: WHITESIDE, Chancellor.

Action by R. L. Henry, plaintiff, against Roy Nolen, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

George A. Sorrell for appellant.
Lackey & Rowland for appellee.

[541] GARDNER, J.—Bill filed for reformation of description in certain deeds, referred to therein. Woodlawn Realty, etc. Co. v. Hawkins, 186 Ala. 234, 65 So. 183. Complainant claims title through a corporation known as Big Hillabee Power Company. It is shown: That one J. H. Chisolm, who was the owner of the land, conveyed by deed of date May 19, 1909, in execution of which deed his wife, Rebecca Chisolm, joined, to said Big Hillabee Power Company a tract of land consisting of 10 acres, to be laid off so as to include a certain shoal on Big Hillabee creek known as "Lindsey Shoal." That said Chisolm owned a large body of land surrounding the particular land. The description in said deed, a copy of which is made Exhibit A to the bill, is as follows: "Ten acres of land lying and being in sections 16 and 22, to be laid off so as to include Lindsey shoals on Big Hillabee creek, said land to be surveyed and platted by J. R. Hall, and when surveyed by him and platted, a certified plat by said J. R. Hall shall be and become a part of this deed for the purpose of making the description perfect, and shall be attached to this deed and recorded as a part of this deed, with full water rights to erect a dam of sufficient height to back water to property sold Mr. Pinckard, at Chisolm's Bridge over said creek, with full rights, privileges, easements to, of the use of said stream for the purpose of a water power, said lands and water rights lying and being in township 23 of range 22."

[542] The misdescription sought to be corrected, and the averments in connection therewith, are found in section 12 of the bill, as follows: "12. Orator further shows to your honor that the Lindsey shoals on Big Hillabee creek, while the same were situated on the lands of J. H. Chisolm, and while the same is near the section line between section 22 and 15, that part of the same is in section 16, and that 10 acres could not be laid off in section 16 and 22 so as to include Lindsey shoals, and while the same is described in the deed from Chisolm and wife to the Big Hillabee Power Company and from it to orator as being in section 16 and 22, that it was the intention of the parties in each instance to convey 10 acres of and so situated that the same should be available for the purpose of building a power plant on the said Lindsey shoals, and that neither the agent of the power company nor J. H. Chisolm knew the exact lines where the shoals were located, and that it was by mistake of the parties that the same was described as being in section 16 and 22, and that the description should have been in section 15, and that it was the intention of the vendor to convey 10 acres of land in section 15, which could include the Lindsey shoals, and it was the intention of the vendee to buy 10 acres of land in section 15 including Lindsey shoals, but by mistake as to where the lines were the lands are described as being in section 16, which by reason of that fact the line of section 22 was so near to the shoals that it was deemed probable by the parties at that time that some part of the 10 acres would necessarily be in section 22; that the description section 22 was put in the original deeds in order that there might be perfect and complete room for the laying off of 10 acres to be used for the best advantage in the development of the water power at Lindsey shoals. And orator avers that the said Roy Nolen was [543] fully informed by the record of said deed that it was the intention and purpose of the parties to said deed that said 10 acres of land should be so laid off as to include such land as would be best suited to the building of a plant for the development of the water power at Lindsey shoals."

The bill further shows that J. H. Chisolm died some time subsequent to May 19, 1909, and that his wife, Rebecca Chisolm, became the owner, either by inheritance from, or devise by, the husband, as we construe the bill, of all the lands belonging to her said husband; that prior to February 28, 1913, Rebecca Chisolm died, and that in due course of administration the lands of her said estate were sold by the administrator under the order of the probate court, and that as a part of the land ordered to be sold by said administrator was the west half of section 15, township 23, range 22, in Tallapoosa county, on which lands the Lindsey shoals were situated, and at said administrator's sale respondent became the purchaser of said lands, together with other lands then sold, the said 10 acres conveyed by J. H.

Chisolm and wife to the Big Hillabee Power Company was not excepted therefrom, but said lands were sold in a body; that the said deed to said power company was on record in the probate office of Tallapoosa county at the time of said administrator's sale.

It is alleged that the said power company, in March, 1913, conveyed to complainant said lands sold to it, by use of the same description as that contained in the deed by J. H. Chisolm and wife to it, and that at that time the surveyor had not filed a plat or description of the 10 acres as provided for in said deed; that in June, 1913, complainant, desiring to perfect said description, procured J. R. Hall, named in the deed to the power company, to make a survey, laying off 10 [544] acres of said lands so as to include the Lindsey shoals, and make a plat of the same, which said Hall did and filed in the probate office, and same has been recorded as a part of the deed.

The question considered and treated as of prime importance by counsel has reference to whether or not the description in the deed sought to be reformed is so uncertain as to render the same absolutely void.

(1-3) It is, of course, well settled that the law leans against the destruction of a deed for uncertainty of description, but will construe the deed, where it can be done consistently with legal rules, so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, and not to defeat it. "Every deed . . . ought to be so constructed, if it can, that the intent of the parties may prevail, and not be defeated." —Pollard v. Maddox, 28 Ala. 321.

In Cottingham v. Hill, 119 Ala. 353, 24 So. 552, 72 Am. St. Rep. 923, it was said: "This court has gone as far as any other in admitting parol evidence to sustain the validity of deeds, assailed upon the ground of indefiniteness in the description of the land; but the rule which we have adopted promotes justice, and does not open the door to fraud and perjury. In all cases the writing has been sufficient to show a bona fide sale and conveyance was intended by the parties, and when this appears no injustice results if by parol evidence the precise property intended to be conveyed can be clearly identified."

"Although a deed may be void on its face for want of a definite description of the land, a court of chancery will reform the deed upon proper allegata of extrinsic facts, and their proof." Greene v. Dickson, 119 Ala. 346, 24 So. 422, 27 Am. St. Rep. 920.

"The general rule, everywhere recognized, is that mere verbal declarations as to what was intended, are [545] not admissible in explanation of the terms of the writing itself. A just exception to this rule, however, is found in parol evidence going to the identification of the subject-matter, a principle which seems to have been much favored by the past decisions of this court." Mayer v. Mitchell, 75 Ala. 475.

"A description which furnishes the means of making it certain by proof is sufficient." Lodge v. Wilkerson, 165 Ala. 302, 51 So. 609.

The description here involved shows the quantity of land to be conveyed and the purpose for which it was purchased. It is by no means what might be termed by some a "roving 10 acres," but its location is fixed on a certain creek so as to include Lindsey shoals. A more definite and particular description is fixed and agreed upon by the parties, as shown in the deed itself, by the agreement for a survey to be made by one Hall, the land laid off in a plat, and same to become a part of the deed, so as to complete and make perfect this description. It was agreed, as shown by the deed itself, that such survey and plat should be attached to the deed and recorded as a part of the deed. The books abound with cases of this character; the facts of each being, of course, different. A review of them here we deem unnecessary. Suffice it to say we are well convinced that the description in this deed is one of those "uncertain descriptions" which may be aided by parol proof, and comes within the maxim, "Id certum est, quod certum reddi potest." Homan v. Stewart, 103 Ala. 644, 16 So. 35; Alabama Mineral Land Co. v. Jackson, 121 Ala. 175, 25 So. 709, 77 Am. St. Rep. 46; Pollard v. Maddox, supra; Wilkins v. Hardaway, 159 Ala. 565, 48 So. 678; Greene v. Dickson, supra; Cottingham v. Hill, supra; O'Neal v. Seixas, 85 Ala. 80, 4 So. 745; Meyer v. Mitchell, supra.

[546] (4, 5) It is insisted, however, that the survey and completion of the description thereby should have been accomplished within a reasonable time, no time being fixed, and that it was too long delayed. If it be conceded, without being decided, that this should have been done within a reasonable time, we are of the opinion the bill does not show such unreasonable delay as would defeat the right here sought to be enforced. Nor is it necessary, in order to maintain a bill seeking the correction of a mistake in the description of lands conveyed in a deed, that the complainant should be in possession of the lands. Bieler v. Dreher, 129 Ala. 384, 30 So. 22.

(6) It is next insisted that the record of the deed was not sufficient notice, and that if a mistake cannot be rectified without impairing the vested rights of innocent third parties, having no notice of the mistake, the aid of equity will be withheld, citing Berry v. Sowell, 72 Ala. 14. Without regard to any consideration of effect of the averment that respondent was a purchaser at a judicial sale, and without any decisions upon that feature (Lindsey v. Cooper, 94 Ala. 170, 11 So. 325, 16 L.R.A. 813, 33 Am. St. Rep. 105; Ezzell v. Brown, 121 Ala. 150, 25 So. 832), we are of the opinion that the deed of J. H. Chisolm and wife to the power company, which was on record at the time of the purchase by respondent, embraced sufficient description of the subject-matter to put a purchaser on inquiry, and therefore was such constructive notice as to meet the law's requirements. It gave notice to the world that the power company had purchased 10 acres of the land of said Chisolm, which was to be surveyed and laid off for a more perfect description by one J. R. Hall, selected and agreed upon by the parties, so as to include Lindsey shoals; that it [547] was for the purpose of erecting a dam for use of the stream of Big Hillabee creek, for the purposes of water power, with rights and easements to such end. It gives the township and range, but mistakes the section number, in placing the 10 acres in sections 16 and 22, while in fact a survey made in accordance with the provisions of the deed shows that the 10 acres laid off so as to include Lindsey shoals is situated in section 15. The plat made shows the section line, and how easily the mistake could occur. The deed gave notice, however, that it did not contain a complete description, but that such was to be perfected by a survey to be subsequently made, and that the purchaser had bought 10 acres, so as to include Lindsey shoals on Big Hillabee creek.

Counsel for appellant cites the case of Florance v. Morien, 98 Va. 26, 34 So. 890; but we are of the opinion that case tends to support our conclusions rather than the contrary. It was there said: "The recorded instrument is sufficient to operate as constructive notice under the registry laws, if the property be so described or identified that a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer would have the means of ascertaining with accuracy what and where it was, and the language used be such that, if he should examine the instrument itself, he would obtain thereby actual notice of all the rights which were intended to be created or conferred by it."

So here we think the language of this recorded deed was sufficient to give to a subsequent purchaser notice of what was intended to be conveyed, and a survey made in accordance with the very provisions of the deed itself would have disclosed the error as to the sections named, here sought to be corrected.

(7) Counsel further urge that the bill fails to show title to the said 10 acres in complainant, for that the [548] deed of the corporation, the power company, to complainant, is not signed as in the name of the corporation, but is signed only by L. W. Roberts, president of the Big Hallabee Company—citing Standifer v. Swann, 78 Ala. 88; Mickle v. Montgomery, 111 Ala. 415, 20 So. 441; Taylor v. West Alabama Agricultural etc. Assoc. 68 Ala. 229. The deed purports on its face to be the deed of the power company, the corporation. It begins: "This indenture, made on . . . between Big Hallabee Power Company, by its president, L. W. Roberts, . . . of the first part, and R. L. Henry, . . . of the second part."

And it concludes: "In witness, the said party of the first part has hereunto set its hands, affixed its seal, and delivered these presents the day and year first above written, by its president, L. W. Roberts, of Fulton Co., Ga.

"(Signed) L. W. Roberts, Pres't
Big Hallabee Power Co.

"Signed, etc., in the presence of

"J. W. Preston, Sr.

"W. P. Felker."

We need not stop to inquire as to whether or not the provisions of the act approved February 20, 1911 (Gen. Acts 1911, p. 31), are applicable to the above deed. This we do not determine, as it is unnecessary. In the fifth paragraph of the bill it is alleged that the said corporation conveyed said property to complainant. The above objection, therefore, relates only to a matter of form, and in a court of equity the defect would not be such as to render the bill subject to the demurrer. Assuming full authority to act, and the bona fides of the sale to complainant, a court of equity would not permit the mere defect in execution of the deed to defeat the right of the complainant. As was said in Taylor v. West Alabama Agricultural, etc. [549] Assoc. supra: "Equity will treat the subject-matter, as to collateral consequences and incidents, in the same manner as if the final acts contemplated by the parties had been executed exactly as they ought to have been; not as the parties might have executed them. . . . This power existing, and its exercise having been attempted, the parties are not to be disappointed, and their just rights defeated, merely because, from inadvertence, or from ignorance, or mistake as to the method which ought to be pursued to bind the association, passing its estate and interest in the lands, there is a defective execution of the power."

The maxim that equity will treat that as done which ought to have been done would, in such case, have controlling effect.

We have reviewed the questions presented by counsel in brief, and we conclude that the learned chancellor decreed correctly in over-ruling the demurrer to the bill, and his decree is accordingly affirmed.

Affirmed.

Anderson, C.J., and Somerville and de Graffenried, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The court in the reported case holds that the record of a deed containing a defective description of the premises operates to give constructive notice where the description is sufficient to put subsequent purchasers on an inquiry which would disclose the true facts. It is demonstrated in the reported case that the reformation of the description is not incompatible with the enforcement of constructive notice from the record containing the description. The question of constructive notice from the record of an instrument containing a defective description of real property is comprehensively discussed in the note to Neas v. Whitener-London Realty Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 780.

JOHNSON ET AL.

United States Supreme Court—January 8, 1917.

242 U. S. 339; 37 S. Ct. 176.

Physicians and Surgeons — Regulation of Drugless Treatment — Validity.

The exemption in favor of persons treating the sick by prayer from the application of Cal. Laws 1913, chap. 354, as amended by Laws 1915, chap. 105, which provides that persons may not practice drugless healing unless holding a "drugless practitioner certificate," obtainable only upon completion of a prescribed course of study and after an examination, does not render the statute invalid as denying the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by U. S. Const. 14th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416), to one who does not employ prayer in his treatment of disease, but does use faith, hope, and the processes of mental suggestion and mental adaptation, a form of treatment in which skill enhanced by practice is to be exercised.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The state's police power extends to requiring, as is done by Cal. Laws 1913, chap. 354, as amended by Laws 1915, chap. 105, that drugless practitioners employing faith, hope, and the processes of mental suggestion and mental adaptation in the treatment of disease shall have completed a prescribed course of study and passed an examination.

Appeal from United States District Court, Southern District of California.

Action by P. L. Crane, plaintiff, against Hiram W. Johnson, et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Tom L. Johnston for appellant.

Robert M. Clarke, Thomas Lee Woolwine, George E. Cryer and U. S. Webb for appellees.

[339] McKENNA, J.—Appeal from an order denying an interlocutory injunction, three judges sitting. The court took jurisdiction of [340] the action, citing Raich v. Truax, 219 Fed. 273, 283; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 36 S. Ct. 7, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 131, but denied the injunction on the ground that the averments of the complaint did not justify it.

Complainant is a drugless practitioner, he avers (we state the facts averred narratively), and has practiced his profession in City and County of Los Angeles for the last seven years and is dependent upon it for making a living. He does not employ either medicine, drugs or surgery in his practice, nor is there anything harmful in it to the individual or dangerous to society; but he does employ in practice faith, hope, and the processes of mental suggestion and mental adaptation.

Under a statute of the State that went into effect August 10, 1913, amended in 1915, a board of medical examiners was created which was empowered to prescribe a course of study and examination for those practicing medicine (using this word in a broad sense for convenience) and to issue certificates of qualifications and licenses.

Three forms of certificates were required to be issued, first, a certificate authorizing the holder thereof to use drugs, or what are known as medicinal preparations, in or upon human beings and to perform surgical operations, which certificate shall be designated "physician and surgeon certificate." Second, a certificate authorizing an opposite treatment to that which the first certificate authorized (we are using general descriptions), which certificate shall be designated "drugless practitioner certificate." Third, a certificate authorizing the holder to practice chiroprody. And the statute also provides for the issuance of what it designates as a "reciprocity certificate." Any of these certificates, on being recorded in the office of the county clerk, as provided in the act, shall constitute the holder thereof a duly licensed practitioner in accordance with the provisions of his certificate.

Applicants must file with the board testimonials of good [341] moral character and diplomas of a school or schools and, in addition, each applicant for a "physician and surgeon certificate" must show that he has attended four courses of study, each to have been not less than 32 weeks' duration, with some other additions; and each applicant for a "drugless practitioner certificate" must show that he has attended two courses of study, each of such courses to have been of not less than 32 weeks' duration, but not necessarily pursued continuously or consecutively, and at least ten months shall have intervened between the beginning of any course and the beginning of the preceding course; and the course in chiropody is to be of not less than 39 weeks' duration consisting of not less than 664 hours. There is a provision that, in lieu of a diploma or diplomas and preliminary requirements in the other courses, if the applicant can show to the board that he has taken the courses required by the statute in a school or schools approved by the board totaling not less than 64 weeks' study of not less than 2,000 hours for a "drugless practitioner certificate" or 128 weeks' study of not less than 4,000 hours for a "physician and surgeon certificate," he shall be admitted to examination for his form of certificate.

The statute sets out the course of instruction which the respective applicants must have pursued, giving the course that is necessary for a "physician and surgeon certificate" and the course for a "drugless practitioner certificate." The descriptions are very elaborate and technical. The statute also prescribes the manner of examination, states the exemptions from its provisions, the penalties for its violation, and for what conduct and upon what conditions the certificates may be revoked. Among the latter is the following:

"Ninth. The use, by the holder of a 'drugless practitioner certificate,' of drugs or what are known as medicinal preparations, in or upon any human being, or the [342] severing or penetrating by the holder of said 'drugless practitioner certificate' of the tissues of any human being in the treatment of any disease, injury, deformity, or other physical or mental condition of such human being, excepting the severing of the umbilical cord."

By § 22 of the original act (unaffected by the Act of 1915) it is provided: "Nor shall this act be construed so as to discriminate against any particular school of medicine or surgery, or any other treatment, nor to regulate, prohibit or apply to, any kind of treatment by prayer, nor to interfere in any way with the practice of religion."

It is alleged that the statute violates the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416), especially the equal protection clause thereof, in that it imposes greater burdens upon complainant than upon others in the same calling and position. That it discriminates in favor of the Christian Science drugless practitioner, distinguishes between the treatment of the sick by prayer, the treatment of the sick by faith, mental suggestion and mental adaptation, and treatment by laying on of hands, anointing with Holy oil or other kindred treatment.

Complainant does not employ prayer in the treatment of disease and is, therefore, not exempt from examination by the medical board, and is subject, therefore, to the penalties of the act if he practices his profession for which he has fitted himself by study and practice, and upon which he is dependent and by reason of his age he is in large measure unable to take up any new branch of work. That defendants, appellees here, are threatening prosecutions under the act and he is without remedy at law.

There is an allegation that the Supreme Court of the State of California has decided that the statute is not offensive to the Fourteenth Amendment, in habeas corpus proceedings prosecuted by one Chow Juyan, who was [343] convicted of practicing some form of Chinese healing which was adjudged a violation of the act.

The allegations of the bill set forth complainant's particular grievance to be that the statute discriminates between forms of healing the sick by the use of prayer and other drugless methods, and invoke the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. In other words, he attacks the classification of the statute as having no relation to the purpose of the legislation. Of course, complainant is confined to the special discrimination against him; he cannot get assistance from the discrimination, if any exist, against other drugless practitioners. The case, therefore, is brought to the short point of the distinction made between his practice and certain forms of practice, or, more specifically, between his practice of drugless healing and the use of prayer.

The principle of decision needs no exposition and the only question is whether it was competent for the State to recognize a distinction in its legislation between drugless healing as practiced by complainant and such healing by prayer. That there is a distinction between his practice and that of prayer, complainant himself, it seems to us, has charged in his bill. He has not only charged that he does not employ either medicine, drugs or surgery in his practice but that he does employ faith, hope and the processes of mental suggestion and mental adaptation. These processes he does not describe. Presumably they are different from healing by prayer, different from the treatment by Christian Science. But he alleges that for his practice he has become "particularly fitted, . . . by many years of study and practice therein." In other words, the treatment is one in which skill is to be exercised and the skill can be enhanced by practice, and the objects of the treatment are diseased human beings whose condition is to be diagnosed. To treat a disease there [344] must be an appreciation of it, a distinction between it and other diseases, and special knowledge is therefore required. And this was the determination of the State; but it determined otherwise as to prayer, the use of which, it decided, was a practice of religion. We cannot say that the State's estimate of the practices and of their differences is arbitrary and therefore beyond the power of government. And this we should have to say to sustain the contentions of complainant, and say besides, possibly against the judgment of the State, that there was not greater opportunity for deception in complainant's practice than in other forms of drugless healing.

Because of our very recent opinions we omit extended reply to the argument of counsel and the cases cited by him, not only of the general scope of the police power of the State but also of the distinctions which may be made in classifying the objects of legislation. And for like reason we do not review or comment upon the cases cited in opposition to complainant's contentions.

It is to be observed that the order of the court was put upon the narrow ground of the averments of the complaint, no opinion beyond such averments being expressed.

Decree affirmed.

NOTE.

Special Regulation of Christian Science or Other Drugless Treatment of Disease.

Generally.

Within a comparatively recent period there have developed various schools of drugless healing based in the main on prayer or mental suggestion or on manipulation or adjustment of parts of the body. Considerable diversity of opinion is manifested in the decisions as to whether such practices fall within the scope of statutes forbidding the "practice of medicine" without a license. See the notes to the following cases: State v. Herring, 1 Ann. Cas. 51 (osteopathy); State v. Marble, 2 Ann. Cas. 898 (Christian Science); Germany v. State, Ann. Cas. 1913C 477; and Com. v. Zimmerman, Ann. Cas. 1916A 858 (massage and chiropractic). Whichever way that question was decided the result was not wholly satisfactory, involving on the one hand the unregulated practice of a treatment of disease or on the other the subjection of one school of treatment to requirements primarily adapted to a wholly different school. As a result, statutes have been passed in a number of jurisdictions specially regulating the drugless treatment of disease, and the present discussion is devoted to regulations of that kind. As to the regulation of drugless treatment of diseases of the eye, see the note to McNaughton v. Johnson, reported post, this volume, at page 801.

The cases are agreed that the regulation of the treatment of disease is a proper exercise of the police power though no drug is administered and no surgical operation performed, and that a special regulation of drugless treatment of disease is not invalid as class legislation. Collins v. Texas, 223 U. S. 288, 32 S. Ct. 286, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 430, affirming 57 Tex. Crim. 2, 121 S. W. 501 (osteopathy); People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 391, 156 Pac. 451 (drugless healers); People v. Ratledge, 172 Cal. 401, 156 Pac. 455 (chiropractic); Ex p. Bohannon, 14 Cal. App. 321, 111 Pac. 1039 (osteopathy); People v. Chong, 28 Cal. App. 121, 151 Pac. 553 (chiropractic); State v. Siler, 169 N. C. 314, 84 S. E. 1015 (drugless treatment); Arnold v. Schmidt, 155 Wis. 55, 143 N. W. 1055 (osteopathy and chiropractic). And see the reported case. See also the following cases wherein statutes of that character have been applied without discussion of their validity: State v. Collins (Ia.) 159 N. W. 604 (osteopathy); Green v. Hodges, 91 Kan. 658, 138 Pac. 605 (chiropractic); Cutty v. Carson, 125 Md. 25, 93 Atl. 302 (osteopathy); Mills v. State Board of Osteopathic Registration, etc. 135 Mich. 525, 3 Ann. Cas. 735, 98 N. W. 19 (osteopathy); Stretch v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 88 N. J. L. 92, 95 Atl. 623 (osteopathy); People v. Reid, 135 App. Div. 89, 119 N. Y. S. 866 (osteopathy); State v. Greiner, 63 Wash. 46, 114 Pac. 897 (chiropractic); State v. Witter, 68 Wash. 356, 123 Pac. 471 (osteopathy); Piper v. State, 163 Wis. 604, 158 N. W. 319 (osteopathy). As to what is included in the practice of osteopathy, see State v. Bonham (Wash.) 161 Pac. 377, wherein the definition and history of that school are discussed at length.

"In view of the large increase of those who attempt remedies without drugs or instruments, legislatures in this and other states have found it necessary to deal with all who assume to treat or prescribe for physical ailments. Such regulations are within the state's police power." People v. Ellis, 162 App. Div. 288, 147 N. Y. S. 681. In Arnold v. Schmidt, 155 Wis. 55, 143 N. W. 1055, it was said: "Osteopathy is defined in Webster's New International Dictionary as 'a system of treatment based on the theory that diseases are chiefly due to a deranged mechanism of the bones, nerves, blood vessels, and other tissues, and can be remedied by manipulations of these parts.' 'Chiropractice' appears to be a newly coined compound word suggesting hand practice. To plaintiff's counsel it means an operation or manipulation founded in ignorance, ineffectual in results, and propagated and spread by fraud, while to defendant's counsel it indicates a very simple and beneficial massage of the spine. The state may well require a license for the purpose of regulation, and it may prescribe reasonable qualifications of the licensee having reasonable relation to the business or profession of osteopathy, understanding the latter as above defined. Some of the qualifications required in the case of osteopaths seem quite extreme; but we must grant something to the judgment of the legislature, and people must learn to hold their legislators responsible for unwise or extreme laws which are nevertheless constitutional." In Collins v. Texas, 223 U. S. 288, 32 S. Ct. 286, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 439, the court said: "An osteopath professes, the plaintiff in error professes, as we understand it, to help certain ailments by scientific manipulation affecting the nerve centres. It is intelligible therefore that the state should require of him a scientific training. Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114 [9 S. Ct. 231, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 623]; Watson v. Maryland, 218 U. S. 173 [30 S. Ct. 644, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 987]. He like others must begin by a diagnosis. It is no answer to say that in many instances the diagnosis is easy—that a man knows it when he has a cold or a toothache. For a general practice science is needed. An osteopath undertakes to be something more than a nurse or a masseur, and the difference rests precisely in a claim to greater science, which the state requires him to prove. The same considerations that justify including him justify excluding the lower grades from the law. Watson v. Maryland, 218 U. S. 173, 179, 180 [30 S. Ct. 644, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 987]. Again, it is not an answer to say that the plaintiff in error is prosecuted for a single case. If the legislature may prohibit a general practice for money except on the condition stated, it may attach the same conditions to a single transaction of a kind not likely to occur otherwise than as an instance of a general practice. A distinction between gratuitous and paid for services was made in the Maryland statute sustained in Watson v. Maryland, 218 U. S. 173, 178. Finally, the law is not made invalid as against the plaintiff in error by the fact that he had an established business when the law was passed."

In Louisiana State Board, etc. v. Charpentier (La.) 73 So. 248, a statute expressly exempting certain drugless treatments of disease from a medical licensing law was sustained, the court saying: "The water cure is a known method of treatment from which many persons have, no doubt, derived great benefit, and which, for the protection of the public, may not require a medical education of those by whom it is administered. And 'the practice of Christian Science, or the religious tenets of any church,' is a spiritual or psycholological matter which should, perhaps, best be left to the practitioners and their patients."

Particular Regulations.

In State v. Siler, 169 N. C. 314, 84 S. E. 1015, it was said: "By the Act of 1907 (chapter 764) it was intended to protect the public against imposition by those claiming to heal diseases without the use of drugs as osteopaths. Since then those claiming to heal without prescribing drugs have taken various and numerous appellations, and thus avoided the protection intended to be afforded the public as to 'nondrug-giving physicians' by the Act of 1907. In consequence the Act of 1907 was amended in 1913 to add after the word 'osteopathy' the words 'or other nondrug-giving school of practice.' The act also, as above set out, fully and elaborately prescribes that it should apply to all practice of healing of every kind that was not drug-giving, excepting only 'Christian Scientists or masseurs or any one following in his or her practice the orders of licensed drug-giving physicians.' The object of the Act of 1913 is simply to extend the protection to the public given by the Act of 1907 as against all other nondrug-giving practitioners of healing, with the exception just quoted. That this is the scope of the act, and that it is not intended to make compliance therewith a monopoly in the hands of 'osteopaths,' the act prescribes an examination only in the following subjects: 'Anatomy, physiology, pathology and diagnosis. Less could not be required reasonably of any one holding himself out as competent to prescribe for 'the ills that flesh is heir to.' The statute makes a violation of the Act of 1907 a misdemeanor, and the Act of 1913 makes a violation of the act in its extended scope, taking in other nondrug-giving practitioners, 'likewise a misdemeanor.' The object of the act, as already said, is not to give 'osteopaths' or any school of practice a monopoly but to protect the public by requiring of all nondrug-giving practitioners, with the exceptions named, the prescribed examination and license. To give this statute any effect, it was necessary to make its violation a misdemeanor. The power of the legislature to pass such enactments has been already considered in the cases above cited [relating to practice of medicine], and the intent of this statute is clearly and solely for the protection of the public. An uneducated, ignorant, and incompetent doctor turned loose on a helpless community is as deadly as a park of artillery. Upon the special verdict, the court should have held the defendant guilty."

In People v. Ratledge, 172 Cal. 401, 156 Pac. 455, it was held that certain requirements made with respect to chiropractors were not unreasonable, the court saying: "The argument is made that because the law includes such subjects as histology, elementary chemistry, toxicology, physiology, elementary bacteriology, and pathology in the examinations to be taken by applicants for certificates to practice as drugless healers, it is unfair, because these are standard courses of study in the preparation of physicians, and surgeons, but are not needed in the art of those who intend to alleviate human suffering by manual and mechanical means only. The answer is that the legislature is committed the duty of determining the amount and quality of scientific education necessary for the individual to possess before he may hold himself out to practice the healing art. Unless the legislative conclusion upon that subject is obviously unfair we may not interfere, for the scope of the police power is very extensive and the discretion of the legislature in exercising such power is very broad. It is not for us to substitute our discretion and judgment for those of the legislature, although we may say in passing that the wisdom of some of the requirements for practice mentioned above would strongly appeal to us, even if we did possess a broader power than is given to us. For example, the importance of a knowledge of toxicology will be evident to every one. Without it the drugless practitioner might apply his manipulations to one suffering from the effects of a poison and might continue his efforts until time for the successful administration of an antidote had passed."

In People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 391, 156 Pac. 451, the act sustained in the reported case was upheld as against a contention that in regulating drugless healers it discriminated against mechanical healers in favor of those treating by prayer. The court said: "Clearly the purpose of the law is to protect both the individual and the public from the dangers and evils which might result from treatment by those not possessing the knowledge and skill requisite in the treatment of diseases with which mankind is afflicted. It is likewise clear that the degree of knowledge and skill, as well as the character thereof required, depends upon the treatment in the practice of which the practitioner engages. Thus, different qualifications are prescribed for those engaging in practice as physicians and surgeons (section 10 of the act) from those designated as drugless practitioners; the intention as to each class being that they shall qualify as possessing the knowledge and skill deemed necessary for the practice of the treatment in which the individuals of each class engage. The physician and surgeon is required to possess a knowledge of many subjects which it is not deemed necessary that the drugless practitioner shall possess. By reason of the different treatment, there is a rational and intrinsic distinction which clearly justifies the classification. Coming to the exempted class of drugless healers, namely, those who treat by means of prayer, here, too, there exists an obvious ground for the classification. The treatment practiced by many, though not all, of the drugless practitioners is by manipulation of the bones and kneading of the muscles and tissues of the person treated. It is apparent that without a proper knowledge of the human body, its organs and functions thereof, or lack of skill, grave consequences to the patient might follow as a result of their treatment. Not so, however, as to one who in prayer invokes divine power to afford relief to one afflicted by disease. The possession of the prescribed knowledge and skill, without which the chiropractic, osteopath and neuropath is denied the right to practice his treatment, in no wise renders the prayers of one thus treating bodily ills more efficacious in the curing of disease; nor can it be said the prayer of an illiterate person may, in the consequences of the subject thereof, be more productive of harm or less beneficial than that of one possessing the learning and skill of an educated physician. To our minds, it is obvious that no reason exists for requiring the class engaged in treatment by prayer to possess the knowledge and skill required of others engaged in drugless treatment. The ground for the classification is as obvious as is the distinction between physicians and surgeons on the one hand, and drugless practitioners on the other, and as to each of which classes a different rule applies." See also Ex p. Bohannon, 14 Cal. App. 321, 111 Pac. 1039, wherein the court sustained an act regulating osteopaths and exempting faith healers.

wherein the court said: "It is impossible to dissociate diagnosis from the practice of the art of healing by any physical, medical, mechanical, hygienic, or surgical means. It is therefore competent for the legislature to permit only those persons who are proficient and who have been found to be educated up to certain standards to 'diagnose' ailments. The objection that those who profess to treat bodily afflictions by prayer are not required to be proficient in diagnosis, and that their exemption, under the law, is the extension of a favor to them which is withheld from others is met by the obvious answer that diagnosis is no part of such treatment. Those who believe that divine power may be invoked by prayer for the healing of the body believe also that God is all-powerful. Patients receiving their ministrations know this, and therefore no fraud or injury may be practiced upon such persons by reason of any lack of skill by the healers in determining the nature of the diseases to be treated. But those who elect to depend upon some other system of treatment have a right to protection by the state from the ministrations of unskillful, uneducated persons. For example, a sufferer from a fever who summons a licensed physician holding himself out to the public as one qualified to treat the sick, is entitled to the services of a doctor who has been taught to discriminate between typhoid and smallpox."

In People v. Chong, 28 Cal. App. 121, 151 Pac. 553, it was said: "Defendant contends that section 8 of the act is unconstitutional and void in that it is an unrestricted invasion of the art of osteopathy, chiropractic, and mechanotherapy, in that it prevents practitioners of said system of the healing art from practicing their profession 'without in any manner severing or penetrating any of the tissues of the human being.' Assuming, as asserted by defendant, that members of such schools, in practicing, as they do, by manipulation and adjustment, are constantly and continually severing tissues of human beings, and that the practice of their art is impossible without it, still it is very plain from a reading of the whole section that the word 'sever,' as therein used, means a severance by cutting. Under one form of certificate the holders thereof, as provided in the act, may not only prescribe and use drugs, but may also sever and penetrate with a knife the tissues of human beings. The holders of other certificates are drugless practitioners, and they may not prescribe or use drugs, nor may they operate with a knife or in that way sever or penetrate the tissues of human beings, except that they may sever the umbilical cord."

An exception of clairvoyants from a statute regulating the practice of medicine does not authorize a clairvoyant to prescribe medicine in accordance with revelations obtained while in a condition of trance. Com. v. DeLon, 219 Mass. 217, 106 N. E. 846.

A longer course of study cannot be required to obtain a limited license to practice as an osteopath than is required to obtain a full license to practice as a physician and surgeon. State v. Gravett, 65 Ohio St. 289, 62 N. E. 325, 87 Am. St. Rep. 605, 55 L.R.A. 791, wherein it was said: "Why the examination of four years of study should be made of those only who are to take a shorter examination, and receive a certificate of limited effect, we need not inquire. It is quite obvious that this additional requirement could not have been made of those contemplating the practice of osteopathy because of the number and character of the subjects upon which they are to be examined, nor of the effect of their certificates, nor because of any consideration affecting the public health or safety which does not involve a scientific conclusion adverse to the efficacy of osteopathy. A conclusion of that character cannot be drawn by a body to which legislative power alone is given, and for whose members there is no prescribed qualification of education, knowledge or intelligence. Authority to discriminate against osteopathy would imply authority to discriminate against any other school of medicine. It seems clear from the reasons involved, and from the discussion of the subject, and the points decided in The State v. Gardner, 58 Ohio St. 599, that this discrimination against those who occupy the position of the defendant is unwarrantable, and that compliance with it cannot be required."

JOHNSON ET AL.

United States Supreme Court—January 8, 1917.

242 U. S. 344; 37 S. Ct. 178.

Physicians and Surgeons — Regulation of Optometrists — Validity.

A state may, in the exercise of its police power, confine to registered optometrists who have passed the examination prescribed by Cal. Laws 1913, chap. 598, the right to employ means other than drugs to measure the range of human vision, and the accommodative and refractive states of the human eye.
[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The exemption in favor of duly licensed physicians and surgeons, which is made by Cal. Laws 1913, chap. 598, confining to registered optometrists who have passed the prescribed examination the right to employ means other than the use of drugs to measure the range of human vision, and the accommodative and refractive states of the human eye, does not deny the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by U. S. Const. 14th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416), to a regularly graduated ophthalmologist who employs drugless means for such purposes.

Appeal from United States District Court, Southern District of California.

Action by Kate P. McNaughton, plaintiff, against Hiram W. Johnson et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Tom L. Johnston for appellant.

Robert M. Clarke, Thomas Lee Woolwine, George E. Cryer, Ray E. Nimmo and U. S. Webb for appellees.

[435] McKENNA, J.—This case was submitted with Crane v. Johnson, 242 U. S. 339, 37 S. Ct. 176. It was considered in the District Court with that case, three judges sitting as in that case. It comes here on appeal from an order denying an interlocutory injunction. The court entertained jurisdiction upon the authority of Raich v. Truax, 219 Fed. 273, 283; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 36 S. Ct. 7, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 131.

The court in denying the injunction said "that the granting of such orders is within the sound discretion of the court, and in the exercise of such discretion, based upon the averments of the bills, we are of opinion that the application should be denied." The court did not pass upon the merits, expressing a doubt of its authority to do so as the court said it was composed of three judges "under statutory requirement."

Appellant—we shall call her complainant, and state [346] narratively the facts she alleged—is a regularly graduated ophthalmologist, which is a school of scientific learning and practice confined to the treatment of the inflammation of the eye and its membranes and in fitting glasses to the human eye. She has practiced her profession in the city and County of Los Angeles for the past three years and is dependent upon the proceeds of her labor and services. She does not employ either medicine, drugs or surgery, nor is there anything in her practice hurtful to the individual or dangerous to society.

In her practice it is absolutely necessary and indispensable that she measure the powers and range of human vision without the use of drugs and there is no law in the State of California prescribing an examination for and regulating the practice of ophthalmology.

At its 40th session the legislature of California enacted a statute by which it provided that it should be unlawful for any person to engage in the practice of optometry without first having obtained a certificate of registration from the State Board of Optometry under an act to regulate that practice approved March 20, 1903, and the acts amendatory thereof.

The practice of optometry is defined to be "the employment of any means other than the use of drugs for the measurement of the powers or range of human vision or the determination of the accommodative and refractive states of the human eye or the scope of its functions in general or the adaptation of lenses or frames for the aid thereof."

The board is given the power, among others, to visit schools where the science of optometry is taught and accredit such as the board finds give a sufficient course of study for the preparation of optometrists; to keep a register of all persons to whom certificates of registration have been issued and of all itinerant licenses, and to grant or refuse or revoke such certificates. The act [347] prescribes a course of examination, describes the particulars of the examinations, and provides that every applicant for an examination upon passing it shall be entitled to be registered in the board's register of optometrists and a certificate of registration shall be issued to him.

"At such examinations the board shall examine applicants in the anatomy of the eye, in normal and abnormal refractive and accommodative and muscular conditions and co-ordination of the eye, in subjective and objective optometry, including the fitting of glasses, the principles of lens grinding and frame adjusting, and in such other subjects as pertain to the science and practice of optometry, such subjects to be enumerated in publication by the board. . . . All such applicants without discrimination, who shall satisfactorily pass such examination shall thereupon be registered in the board's register of optometrists and a certificate of registration shall be issued to them, under the seal and signature of the members of said board upon payment of a fee of five dollars. Such certificate shall continue in force until the first day of August in the year next succeeding."

Before engaging in practice it shall be the duty of each registered optometrist to notify the board in writing of the place or places where he is to engage or intends to engage in practice and of changes in such places.

There are other provisions intended to fortify those above mentioned, and violations of the act are made misdemeanors, with fines and imprisonment, increasing with repetition of the offense.

It is provided that the act shall not be construed to prevent duly licensed physicians and surgeons from treating the human eye nor to prohibit the sale of complete ready-to-wear eyeglasses as merchandise from a permanent place of business in good faith and not in evasion of the act by any person not holding himself out as competent to examine and prescribe for the human eye.

[348] Registry certificates may be revoked for certain specified causes.

Complainant charges that the act offends the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416) in that it deprives her of her property without due process of law and denies her the equal protection of the laws, and as specifications of the last she instances the exemption from the provisions of the act of licensed physicians and surgeons; the appropriation to the sole use of registered optometrists of the right to employ any means other than the use of drugs in the measurement of the powers or range of vision; the denial to all other schools of scientific learning and practice the right to measure the range of human vision other than by the use of drugs on equal terms with the physician and surgeon; and contends generally that her occupation being a lawful one, not hurtful to the individual or dangerous to the community, the State has no power to impose discriminatory regulations upon it.

She alleges her competency to practice her profession and apply its treatment, that appellees are threatening to enforce the law, and hence prays temporary and permanent injunctions.

These specific objections are brought down to the general objection that the statute discriminates against those who employ any other means than the use of drugs and, therefore, "creates a monopoly favored and protected by law, in the interest of practitioners who employ drugs in determining the accommodative and refractive states of the human eye."

To sustain the statute appellees adduce the police power of the State; against the statute complainant urges the Fourteenth Amendment and its prohibition of discrimination. The case requires, under the averments of the bill, adjustment of these contentions.

It is established that a State may regulate the practice [349] of medicine, using this word in its most general sense. Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 9 S. Ct. 231, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 623; Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189, 18 S. Ct. 573, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 1002; Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 23 S. Ct. 390, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 563; Watson v. Maryland, 218 U. S. 173, 30 S. Ct. 644, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 987; Collins v. Texas, 223 U. S. 288, 32 S. Ct. 286, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 439.

Complainant tries to escape from the rulings in those cases by asserting a discrimination against her. She is an ophthalmologist, she avers, "which is a school of scientific learning and practice confined to the treatment of the inflammation of the eye and its membranes and in fitting glasses to the human eye," and that she has practiced her profession for the past three years, and does not employ medicine, drugs or surgery. She, however, attacks the statute because, to use the language of her counsel, it "arbitrarily discriminates against every other school of scientific knowledge and practice in favor of the school employing drugs in determining the accommodative and refractive states of the human eye." It undoubtedly does, but gives the name of the school that of "optometry" and its practitioners "optometrists." We cannot suppose that any injury is done her by the difference in names, and yet she gives no other tangible ground of complaint. Whether they are different and whether the difference is of substantial or unsubstantial degree she does not inform us. She practices one of them in preference to the other, and for the practice of that one the State has declared that its certificate of competency is necessary. The cases cited above establish that the State has such power and it requires no more of complainant than it requires of any other ophthalmologist, to use her word, or of any other optometrist, to use the word of the statute.

The District Court was, therefore, right when it decided that on the averments of the bill complainant was not entitled to an injunction.

Decree affirmed.

NOTE.

Special Regulation of Persons Treating Ocular Diseases.

Whether a person engaged in treating ocular diseases is a practitioner of medicine within statutes regulating such practice, has been held to depend largely on the nature of the treatment offered or administered. See the note to State v. Yegge, 9 Ann. Cas. 202.

In Louisiana State Board, etc. v. Charpentier (La.) 73 So. 248, a statute expressly exempting from a statute relating to the practice of medicine "opticians fitting glasses or testing eyes in their own establishments" was sustained, the court saying: "The optician is often found where the oculist is not, and may be better qualified than he to fit glasses, if not to test the eyes, is likely to inflict little or no injury in either case, and he who performs those functions in his own establishment may be regarded as more responsible than the itinerant vendor."

In recent years, however, statutes have been enacted in a number of jurisdictions regulating specially that class of persons, the regulations being ordinarily designed to embrace the so-called "optometrists" whose practice is defined by the regulations of their association (see Martin v. Baldy, 249 Pa. St. 253, 94 Atl. 1091) as "the employment of any means other than the use of drugs for the measurement of the powers of vision and the adaption of lenses for the correction and aid thereof." Such persons are held not to be engaged in the practice of medicine. Martin v. Baldy, supra. But statutes specially regulating them have been sustained. State v. Utah State Board of Examiners, 37 Utah 339, 108 Pac. 347. And see the reported case. The provisions of the Utah act were summarized in State v. Utah State Board of Examiners, supra, as follows: "The material parts of the act on which the petition of respondent is based are, in substance, as follows: Section 1686x provides that it shall be unlawful to practice optometry in the state of Utah without obtaining the certificate provided for in the act. Section 1686xl defines what shall constitute the practice of optometry in the following language: 'The practice of optometry is the employment of subjective and objective mechanical means to determine the accommodative and refractive conditions of the eye and the scope of its functions in general and the application and adjustment of lenses for the correction of errors of refraction, the relief of eye strain, and the aid of vision.' The three succeeding sections create a board to be known as the Utah State Board of Examiners in Optometry, to be appointed by the governor, and said sections also define the powers and duties of said board, and provide how and to what extent applicants shall be examined before being authorized to practice optometry in this state. There is, however, a proviso to these sections, which, in our judgment, is controlling in this case, which reads as follows: 'Provided further, that every person who shall have been engaged in the practice of optometry in the state of Utah on March 14, 1907, shall file an affidavit in proof thereof and satisfactory evidence with said board, who shall make and keep a record of each person and shall, in consideration of the sum of three dollars, issue to him a certificate of registration.'" Holding the act to be valid but not to warrant an examination of persons engaged in the practice before its enactment, the court said: "No one can doubt the power of the legislature to define and regulate the practice of optometry, and, to that end, to prescribe reasonable qualifications to be possessed by those who desire to engage in the practice, and to provide reasonable means by which such qualifications may be ascertained, in order to authorize those qualified to practice, and to prevent those who are not from doing so. We are of the opinion that it was the intention of the legislature to require all those who were not engaged in the practice of optometry in this state on March 14, 1907, to pass an examination and prove their fitness and qualifications to use and apply both subjective and objective mechanical means to aid them in the 'correction of errors of refraction, the relief of eye strain, and the aid of vision.' The board of examiners were thus by the act authorized to examine applicants, not then engaged in the practice with respect to their knowledge and proficiency in the application and use of both the means aforesaid, and to withhold a certificate from the applicants if the board was satisfied that the applicants were not so qualified. But we find no warrant in the statute to authorize the board of examiners to examine or pass upon the qualifications of any one who was engaged in the practice of optometry on March 14, 1907, provided such person made application for a certificate of registration 'by July 15, 1907,' and furnished proof of the fact that he was engaged in the practice of optometry at the time aforesaid. To make such proof is all that the law required of such applicants, and this is all that the board of examiners could require from them."

KNIGHTS OF MACCABEES OF THE WORLD.

Washington Supreme Court—June 3, 1915.

85 Wash. 665; 149 Pac. 7.

Beneficial Associations — Amendment of By-laws — Increase of Assessment — Validity.

A certificate, issued by a fraternal insurer, authorized the association to levy as many assessments as might be necessary to meet death losses. The by-laws under which the certificate was issued declared that the member should pay the same rate of assessment as long as he remained in good standing. The association reserved the right to change the by-laws. It is held that there was no contract in the ordinary sense, the insurance being but a mutual promise by every member to pay the certificate of every other member; hence the holder had no vested right, preventing the association from raising the assessment to such a rate as would pay death claims.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

As there was no contract, there could be no estoppel preventing the society from raising the assessments.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where the assessments paid by younger members were sufficient to pay their insurance, an older member cannot complain that an increase in assessments was made solely upon members of more advanced age.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

That a fraternal insurer, authorized to levy as many assessments as might be necessary to meet death losses, increased the amount of the assessments, but not their number, does not give a member any equitable rights; the effect being the same as if more numerous assessments were levied.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In view of Laws 1911, pp. 279, 281, §§ 210, 214, declaring that fraternal associations may create and invest a surplus and grant paid-up insurance, not exceeding in value the proportion of the reserve to the credit of such members, and that no member shall have individual rights or become entitled to any part of the reserve otherwise, a member of a fraternal insurer, which accumulated a reserve to pay death claims, has no right to require the insurer to apply the reserve to current deficiencies in assessments, where the reserve was not sufficient to make up the deficiency in assessments and pay the estimated claims.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where a fraternal order increased the assessments, as was its right, a member is not entitled to rescind his contract and recover back the sums already paid in; the order not breaching its contract.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Laws 1911, pp. 281, 290, §§ 214, 228, respectively, declaring that no fraternal association shall transact business in the state which does not provide for periodical assessments sufficient to provide for meeting its mortuary obligations, and that the laws of such societies shall provide that if the stated contributions are insufficient, increased rates shall be collected, a fraternal order has the right to increase the rates of members so as to be able to meet death claims.

Costs — Award against Successful Party — Test Case.

Where the suit by a member of a fraternal association to enjoin the collection of increased assessments to meet death claims was novel and of general interest, costs should be borne by the insurer, though it was successful on appeal, particularly where its brief and abstract were unnecessarily long.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pierce county: CLIFFORD, Judge.

Action by Jesse Thomas, plaintiff, against Knights of Maccabees of the World, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Reynolds, Ballinger & Hutson and Carlos S. Hardy for appellant.

Jesse Thomas, in propria persona.

George W. Miller, amicus curiae.

[667] CHADWICK, J.—Jesse Thomas, respondent, then thirty-eight years old, applied for and received a certificate of membership in the appellant order, a fraternal beneficiary association organized under the laws of the state of Michigan. The society was organized, and commenced to do business as such, in the year 1883. It is what is popularly known as a fraternal benefit association, having no other object than to promote social and fraternal intercourse among its members and to pay benefits in case of sickness or death. It is carried on by a lodge system having a secret ritual. It adopted and has maintained a representative form of government. Its subordinate or local bodies are called "Tents." A state body, known as the "Great Camp," is made up of delegates elected by the "Tents." The Great Camp in turn elects delegates to a national council or assembly known as "The Supreme [668] Tent." Each of these bodies have legislative powers, the Supreme Tent having a general revisory power over the acts of all subordinate bodies, as well as jurisdiction to make all changes in the substantive law of the order which in its judgment may be necessary for its preservation and well being. At the time it was organized, the society adopted a schedule of rates to be collected by assessment upon the membership, the fundamental thought being that the society would make an assessment upon the membership to meet each death loss as it occurred, and "in case one assessment per month shall not be sufficient to pay the death and disability claims as they occur, then the supreme record keeper is hereby authorized to levy such additional assessments as may be required from time to time to pay such claims."

There seems to have been an assumption that it would not be necessary to levy more than twelve assessments per annum to meet the maturing obligations of the society. In the first three years of its existence only eighteen assessments were levied. Thereafter assessments were levied with greater frequency, so that, notwithstanding an increase in rates, for example, from 60c per thousand at the time of organization (1883) for age thirty-eight, to 90c per thousand (1895) for the same age, the society was compelled from time to time to levy what is commonly known among fraternal insurance societies as "double headers," that is, two assessments at the same time.

Mr. Thomas joined the society in 1896. His rate was 90c per one thousand dollars. The increased rates did not apply to members who had joined before they were adopted. The resources of the society, if that term is proper, seemed to be still inadequate to meet its obligations. The Supreme Tent, through its officers and members, and through a commission aided by the advice of an actuary who is said to be an expert in the line of insurance, investigated its affairs. Without going into their findings in detail, it will be enough to say that they found that there were 234,000 members, with [669] benefit certificates aggregating $375,599,000, with accumulated funds, or so-called reserve, of $1,950,303. The commission also found and put into figures what the experience of the society had made manifest, that the original rates were wholly inadequate to mature the outstanding certificates at twelve assessments per year. It found that, although the then face value of the outstanding certificates was $375,599,000, the real value was not more than $123,597,104, and that the amount to be paid by the members (upon a basis of twelve assessments per year covering the term of their expectancy) to meet this insurance was $58,735,995, leaving a deficiency of $64,861,109. Or, to state it in another way, the members, not having met the current cost of their insurance, must (if their certificates were to be matured, not of those who may die first, but the last as well as the first) adopt some plan to meet this deficiency, either by the accumulation of a reserve of $64,861,109, or to so increase the rates as to make each member meet the future current cost of his own risk.

It would seem that the first plan was manifestly not feasible. The Supreme Tent adopted the only other alternative, that is, a general increase of rates. These were adopted at the session of 1904. We shall refer to them only in so far as they affect Mr. Thomas. The rate for age thirty-eight was increased to $1.65 per thousand for each assessment. Respondent was given an option to re-rate and carry his certificate, without medical examination, at that rate at his attained age of forty-six years. This he did not do. Had respondent done so, his monthly assessment would have been $1.65. In all other respects his certificate would have been as before. It was also provided that all members who did not elect to re-rate and who should thereafter attain the age of fifty-five should pay an assessment of $3 per month. Not having elected to re-rate in 1904 at his attained age of forty-six at the rate of $1.65, respondent was notified, when he had attained the age of fifty-five (1913), that he would thereafter be required to pay assessments at the rate of $3 per [670] month. He began this suit to enjoin the collection of the new rate, or, in the alternative, if the court could not enjoin the new rate, he asks that the contract be rescinded as for fraud, and that he recover all sums theretofore paid to the society. From a decree enjoining the collection of the new rate, the society has appealed.

Respondent rests his case solely upon his contract. He says: "Fortunately the questions involved are few and simple, not going beyond the elementary law of contracts." The contract calls for a whole life certificate with certain endowment features after seventy years, at an assessment rate per $1,000 of 90c. The society had adopted and published a constitution and by-laws in which the rates were published. A copy had been put into respondent's hands at the time his membership was solicited. The section fixing rates provides, among other things, that "He [the member] shall pay the same rate of assessment thereafter so long as he remains continually in good standing in the order." It is contended that this provision in the general law of the society entered into and became a part of the contract, and is in terms a specific assurance or guaranty that the rates will not be raised in the future, and because of its mention of rates, it will not be overcome by a so-called general provision on the face of the certificate that the member "will comply with the laws of the order now in force or that may hereafter be adopted."

It was so held in Wright v. Knights of Maccabees of World, 196 N. Y. 391, 89 N. E. 1078, 134 Am. St. Rep. 838, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 423; and Smythe v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 198 Fed. 967, and although his findings cover a wide range, it is the essence of the holding of the trial judge. In the Wright case, the whole contention of respondent is stated as follows, quoting from Ayers v. Grand Lodge, etc. 188 N. Y. 280, 80 N. E. 1020:

[671] "While the defendant may doubtless so amend its by-laws, for instance, as to make reasonable changes in the methods of administration, the manner of conducting its business and the like, no change can be made which will deprive a member of a substantial right conferred expressly or implied by the contract itself. That is beyond the power of the legislature as well as the association, for the obligation of every contract is protected from state interference by the Federal Constitution."

This holding is sustained by many New York cases, which are referred to and freely quoted by the writer of the opinion.

It may be fairly said that all cases holding as do the New York cases, do so upon the theory that the society and the members are contracting parties, the one assuming to pay a certain sum in event of certain contingencies, in consideration of intermittent payments by the other pending the happening of the event. Of necessity, then, our first inquiry must go to the character and nature of the contract or certificate.

It is elementary that a contract must have parties—a promisor and a promisee. We cannot assure ourselves that respondent bears or has ever borne the one relation to the society to the exclusion of the other. The society is not organized for profit and, from the nature of things, is no more than its membership, in whom all rights and all obligations are mutual. The so-called Tent, Great Tent and Supreme Tent are not separate entities, any more than a legislative assembly is an entity distinct from the people of a commonwealth. It is an institution for convenience only; a vehicle for the collection and disbursement of funds necessary to meet the mutual obligations of the members. Barrows v. Mutual Reserve L. Ins. Co. 151 Fed. 461, 81 C. C. A. 71.

"In the ordinary sense a fraternal order is not an insurance company." Peterson v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 244 Ill. 329, 18 Ann. Cas. 96, 91 N. E. 466.

The membership of such societies speak in mutual conclave through selected representatives, whose voice is their voice and whose act is their act.

[672] "Every member, in fact, stands in the peculiar situation of being party of both sides, insurer and insured." Korn v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 6 Cranch 192, 3 U. S. (L. ed.) 195.

"Insurance on the mutual plan being different from insurance on the old line plan, the members of the company are, so to speak, partners." Haydel v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 98 Fed. 200.

"The contractual relations between the members and the association should not be measured by the standard, or determined by the legal principles, which are applicable between an ordinary insurance company and the holder of one of its policies. The insured are members of the association; each has a voice in all proceedings pertaining to its business or general welfare, and in some ways it assimilates a partnership." Miller v. National Council, etc. 69 Kan. 234, 76 Pac. 830.

"The fraternal plan, with mutuality and without profit, distinguishes the work of such an association from a commercial enterprise." Reynolds v. Supreme Council of Royal Arcanum, 192 Mass. 150, 7 Ann. Cas. 776, 78 N. E. 129, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1154.

"The defendant was organized upon the principle of equality and mutuality among its members, and it must have been fairly within the contemplation of the parties that changes of membership might necessitate changes in rates, in order to preserve that equality. . . . Each member of the society is an insurer, as well as an insured. . . . The argument that the amount of the assessment was as fixed and unalterable as the amount of benefit to be paid entirely overlooks the purpose and character of the defendant and the dual relation of its members." Mock v. Supreme Council of Royal Arcanum, 121 App. Div. 474, 106 N. Y. S. 155.

The latest expression of this principle is found in Hartman v. National Council, 76 Ore. 153, 147 Pac. 931, L.R.A.1915E 152, where it is said:

"The contract is not purely between the individual member and the corporate organization. It is in spirit and in truth a covenant, not only with the central body, but with every other individual participating in the benefits afforded by the project, for the concern is mutual, and the co-operation [673] of every member is essential to its success as an insurance society. . . . Moreover [she was] controlled . . . by the terms of her certificate and the laws of the order, which are made a part thereof, and to which she was subject, having had her part in the enactment of the same through her representatives."

There being no contract in the commercial sense, but a mutual promise of every member to pay the certificate of every other member, there can be no vested right in any provision of the contract, either express or implied, that is not subject to and controlled by the duty of the member to pay the cost of his own insurance, for under no construction of a mutual contract can he demand more than he is willing to give.

"Each member participates in the business results and as there are profits or losses, so is his insurance affected in its cost to him." Swan v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 155 N. Y. 9, 49 N. E. 258.

A member cannot throw his brothers overboard under the guise of contract and vested right. He must share his life belt with all.

If it is not strong enough to sustain him he is in duty bound to sink to the same level with his fellow members, for whatever the words of his contract may imply, it is to be measured by the object of the society which he has bound himself to support.

The error of the New York case and the Federal case, relied on by respondent, is fundamental. It is assumed that the subject-matter of the contract is a promise to pay $1,000 at the death of the member, in consideration of a sum named. This is but one of the things to be considered. If we are to make any one consideration paramount over another, it must necessarily be the object of the society. When that is considered it cannot be said that any one member, or any number of members who have joined the society upon a misconception of the ability of the members to meet their mutual [674] obligations by the assessments agreed upon, can disassociate his own certificate or contract and insist that the object of the fraternity or society is to pay him in full without reference to his fellow members. The society being mutual and every member being subject to the same burdens and entitled to the same benefits, it follows that the society cannot be sustained unless the supreme representative body is granted authority to do that which will bring the greatest good to the greatest number. Or it being possible, in the light of present experiences, to do that which will reasonably insure the payment of all certificates, the agreement made by the member when accepting his certificate to abide by all the laws, rules and regulations of the society that may have been or that might thereafter be passed, binds him to observe such legislation as is calculated to insure a rate sufficiently adequate to pay the cost of his own insurance.

"Mutuality is its controlling feature. It is obvious, therefore, that for a benefit bestowed on one member, there must be a corresponding burden imposed on the other members collectively, and that a proper adjustment of the benefits to the burdens is essential to its existence as a mutual organization. The constitution is the fundamental compact between the members, and usually, as in the present instance, outlines the plan for the distribution of the benefits and adjustment of the burdens among them. Unerring foresight is not the gift of any man or body of men, and experience alone can demonstrate whether the plan authorized by a constitution is the best or even practicable. The welfare of the association, if not its existence, may demand a change in the constitution and a readjustment of the relations between the benefits and burdens. The association is a self-governing body, and it is for its members to determine when such change is required or advisable." Hall v. Western Travelers' Acc. Assoc. 69 Neb. 601, 96 N. W. 170.

"To justify interference by the courts and warrant the overthrow of by-laws enacted in the mode prescribed by the by-laws, it must be shown that there was an abuse of power, or that the later by-law is unreasonable. It is not enough to show that a better or wiser course might have been pursued, [675] for it must be shown that there was an abuse of discretion, or that the by-law is so unreasonable as to be void. We do not affirm that a benefit society may, by a change in its by-laws, arbitrarily repudiate an obligation created by a policy of insurance, but we do affirm that, where a change is regularly made in its by-laws, and the motive which influences the change is an honest one to promote the welfare of the society, and the members are all given an opportunity to avail themselves of the change, no actionable wrong is done the members or their beneficiaries. It may sometimes happen that the interests of one individual, or of a few individuals, may be impaired, but it is the right, and, indeed, it is the duty, of the society to protect the interests of the many rather than of the few. Persons who become members of such societies must take notice of this, and one person cannot, therefore, demand that the welfare of the society and the interests of the many be sacrificed for his sole benefit." Supreme Lodge, etc. v. Knight, 117 Ind. 489, 20 N. E. 479, 3 L.R.A. 409.

Nor are these observations met by the suggestion that appellant was in a way lured into an improvident undertaking by the provision of the by-law fixing rates which we have quoted, the speeches of the officers of the Supreme Tent, or other matters tending to show an estoppel. There being no contract in the strict sense, there can be no estoppel. When respondent joined he agreed, in consideration of a promise on the part of other members to pay him a certain sum, that he would, in turn, do all that would be required of him. He became an insurer as well as an assured. He cannot get away from his associates if he would. He must meet his obligation to them, and all this legislation does is to call upon him to pay his own cost as a member. To this end he agreed to be bound by the laws and rules of the order and such changes as might thereafter be made.

"There is no vested right in having the contract in the certificate remain unchanged, because the recognition of the power to make new by-laws is necessarily a recognition of the right to alter or amend those theretofore made." Klein v. Knights, etc. 79 Wash. 173, 140 Pac. 72.

[676] In the same case we said:

"To destroy a vested right arising out of a contract is, in some way, to impair or destroy the rights guaranteed by the contract; not to enforce them."

It seems idle to attempt to add to the force of this language. If we were to attempt it, we would say that there can be no vested right in any contract so long as a duty to the other contracting parties rests upon the one asserting it and his duty is unperformed.

It is lamentably true that most if not all of the fraternal benefit associations with which courts have been called upon to deal in recent years were founded upon false assumptions and self deceptions; a purpose to make something out of nothing; to have others do for us, without doing our whole duty to ourselves and to them. And the pity of it all is that those who promoted and organized such associations, as well as those of us who have joined them, were undoubtedly honest in our beliefs. We did not know the horse was blind until we took him out on the road. Insurance societies have been generally organized and built up among young men. Low death rates for the first few years made a show of prosperity. Time, the increasing age and mortality of the membership, has brought them face to face with the problem of paying those who die in age, as they have paid those who died in youth. It took nearly fifty years for the truth to rise to the surface of our infatuations, and the consequent realization that a new member who in fact was not paying the cost of his own insurance was a liability and not an asset. We were foolishly blind to the simple equation that if ten men mutually promise to pay each other $1,000 at death, $10,000 must be gathered from the promisors if all of the contracting parties are to be paid. To illustrate, it is asserted in the briefs, and is not denied, that respondent, between the time he joined the order and the time he brought this suit, had paid into the order $169. If he should attain the age of [677] seventy years he would have paid in an additional $162, at twelve assessments per year. Wherefore then can he claim that the society, himself and his co-members, shall continue a plan that must surely bring inevitable ruin and leave the greater part of its certificates unpaid, when a resort to business principles will insure stability? At fifty-five his life expectancy is 17.40 years. If he pays an assessment at the new rate from now on he will have paid in at the expiration of that time $628.40, which added to $169 makes a total of $795.40, which we may assume will be sufficiently increased by interest accumulations to make up a sum sufficient to mature his certificate or meet his obligation to the society, whichever way it is put. Hence respondent was bound to know, as were all members of the society, that their plan was inadequate; as much so as if they had each agreed to pay in so much from month to month for a term of ten years and buy a piece of property at a certain price. No one could thereafter claim imposition or fraud, when a simple calculation would have shown that the net accumulations would not be more than fifty per cent of the necessary amount.

"The theory that a mutual association can afford to carry its members at less than cost on account of its increasing membership is as fallacious as that of the merchant who said he could afford to sell goods at less than cost because he sold so many of them." Supreme Ruling of Fraternal Mystic Circle v. Ericson (Tex.) 131 S. W. 92.

For these reasons it is held by the greater number of cases and, as we think, by the greater weight of authority, that it is within the legislative power of these associations to increase rates to the plane of adequacy. As said by the supreme court of the United States:

"There is no vested right to a continuation of a plan of insurance which experience might demonstrate would result disastrously to the company and its members." Wright v. Minnesota Mut. L. Ins. Co. 193 U. S. 657, 24 S. Ct. 549, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 832.

[678] The test of a vested right is thus defined in 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 1065:

"The true criterion appears to lie in the determination of the question whether or not an actionable property right has in fact accrued; if so, it cannot be divested; but it is otherwise in case such rights are only prospective, or in process of accruing, when they may be changed or arrested by the association under the general governing power, provided the member, in his contract of membership, has agreed to conform to after-enacted laws."

This definition is sustained by practically all of the authorities. Respondent has no right to insist that the society shall carry his certificate at a loss because of the form of the by-law at the time he took out his certificate. His position is not tenable, for no member of a mutual insurance society has a right to insist that it continue to do business upon an unsound basis for his individual benefit.

Respondent complains that, in the plan proposed, no attempt was made to meet the alleged deficiency in rates by a general increase upon all of the members; that the entire burden is cast upon those who attain the age of fifty years, thus forcing members of fifty-five years and over into a class to take care of themselves as if there were no other members. Respondent overlooks the fact that the mortality tables show that, at about the age of fifty-five, the adequacy of the original system begins to break down. It is not an arbitrary age or date fixed by the society producing a class distinction. It is the working of the law of experience, which has demonstrated that the danger of default to the members among these societies has increased under old plans in geometrical proportion after the member has reached an age, approximating fifty-five years.

However, it would seem that in these days of understanding, born of experience, that the fallacy of the "new blood" theory had been exploded, or if there had ever been anything in it, that no lodge could hope to succeed by loading the rate upon men still young enough to find insurance at cost, or [679] upon men who have been paying their own way, to make up a deficiency for those who had not.

"The new blood theory is simply a method of selling obligations to mature in the future at less than their face or cost, and using the money thereby obtained to temporarily meet the maturing obligations of the institutions. It works out simply to the end of accumulating liabilities for which no provision has been made, and for which, under the cumulative force of increasing obligations maturing more and more rapidly, no provision can be made in the end, and thereby results in ultimate bankruptcy." Anon.

If we assume that a society might lawfully load young men and new members to make up the valuation (see Laws of 1911, Ch. 49, p. 292, § 229; 3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6059-229), the result would in all probability be disastrous. The young man in health would most likely go into some order where he would not be subject to such an imposition. There would be no new members.

"The chief complaint seems to be that other younger men were not raised so much in their assessments, and some were even reduced; but this was the result of making the basis of assessment the age of the member and the estimated cost of his insurance. It was evident that the old plan was a failure, and the court of chancery appeals report that some change in the assessment plan was necessary to accomplish the objects and purposes of the order and to save it from dissolution. It must be evident that the younger men would not be burdened with the heavy cost of insurance upon the older ones, and they would not join the order, and would withdraw, if such a rule was attempted; and this would leave the older men with no one but the old ones upon whom to rely for their protection. As we view it, the effect of this rule was only to accentuate the disabilities of old age, after the insured had enjoyed indemnity for many years at less than cost; and we cannot see that the basis of assessments was unreasonable." Conner v. Supreme Commandery Golden Cross, 117 Tenn. 549, 97 S. W. 306.

Respondent says that if the whole burden is put upon the old members he will be turned out and all fraternal features of [680] the society destroyed. This may be true in a sense, but experience has no doubt taught the lesson that the fraternal features of these societies cannot be depended on to mature deficiencies in other men's certificates running into the millions. Fraternity that will adorn a ritual is one thing; fraternity that will balance the debit side of the ledger is quite another thing. Each life must pay the cost of its own experiences and the penalties attaching to its own mistakes.

There are some cases which would sustain the decree of the lower court, but the great majority of the courts have held to the contrary. Among the more prominent cases sustaining our view and which we have not already cited in this opinion, are: Gaines v. Supreme Council of Royal Arcanum, 140 Fed. 978; Gaut v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 121 Fed. 403; Schmierer v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 153 Cal. 208, 94 Pac. 887; Champion v. Hannahan, 138 Ill. App. 387; Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor v. Bieler, 58 Ind. App. 550, 105 N. E. 244; Messer v. Grand Lodge, etc. 180 Mass. 321, 62 N. E. 252; Wineland v. Knights of Macabees of the World, 148 Mich. 608, 112 N. W. 696; Williams v. Supreme Council, etc. 152 Mich. 1, 115 N. W. 1060; Shepperd v. Bankers Union of World, 77 Neb. 85, 108 N. W. 188; Clarkson v. Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias, 90 S. C. 134, 82 S. E. 1043.

Respondent concedes the right of a society to increase rates from time to time if it has reserved the right to do so in its by-laws. He seems to distinguish the cases upon which appellant relies, by asserting that in none of them was there an assurance in the by-laws that the rate would continue for the life term. There is apparent ground for this contention, but it does not bear the test of reason. For, after all, the so-called warranty is a by-law. The right to amend does not except any one or more of the by-laws. It is a general reservation. And furthermore, there can be no difference in principle between an assertion in the by-laws that the member will be required to pay no more than the published rate during [681] his life, and the publication of the rates without such assurance. When it is remembered that the rates of such societies are almost always fixed in their by-laws, and that members join upon the understanding that they are taking a life certificate at a certain rate for life, we cannot escape the conclusion that there is no ground upon which the cases can be distinguished. In the one, the so-called contract is express, in the other it is implied. When reduced to their lowest terms, the fact that some cases hold one way and some another way is apparent to all. It will not be asserted that respondent did not assent to a representative form of government. It is provided for in the same way as the rates are fixed, by a by-law. The representative body has spoken for him. Its act is his act and is binding upon him, so that

"Whether this reasoning is strictly correct we need not decide, for here we have an objecting member, who on his own account has agreed not only to conform to the present laws of the order, but also to such future laws as may be from time to time enacted by the official body governing the same, and as to such contracts the better reasoned cases hold that assessments may be raised by such societies under such reserved power to amend by-laws." Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor v. Bieler, supra.

Neither are we prepared to hold that the increased rate is a violation of respondent's contract. Under his certificate as written, the society might levy any number of assessments. He agreed, in consideration of the promise of his fellow members to pay his beneficiary $1,000 at death, to pay all assessments necessary to meet death losses. It was held in Wineland v. Knights of Maccabees of the World, supra:

"We have no doubt that it was lawful, and no violation of contract rights, for defendant to increase the number of assessments to meet the demands arising from the death of members. There seems to be no good reason why fewer assessments, at a greater rate, should not be levied, so long as the increase in rates is proportional; young and old members, alike, contributing. Whether such action be a mere detail [632] in management aimed at procuring for distribution the same sum of money in a different way, or intended to actually increase the contributions over present necessities for distribution and to accumulate a fund, it may be, so long as it is proportional and reasonable, supported, as against a protesting member, by his agreement in his application to conform to and be governed by laws to be from time to time made by the representative governing body of the association."

See also Supreme Lodge, etc. v. Ray (Tex.) 166 S. W. 46.

Although it is not necessary to our decision, it may well be questioned whether a court of equity could interfere to protect respondent. His grievance goes not to the amount of his assessment, for the society could levy a like amount under its old rates, but to the method. Having in mind the character of the society and its objects, it would seem that there is no room for equitable interference, for by his assent to unlimited assessments, respondent has subscribed to the right of the society to perpetuate itself. In law he has acknowledged that "There must be a premium somewhere which represents the normal cost of permanent insurance, which is based upon the law of mortality, and below which point no organization, on any plan, can safely promise permanent insurance protection at a uniform price for life." Anon.

Respondent further contends that, inasmuch as there is a reserve fund of something like $12,000,000, the society cannot raise his rate until that is exhausted. In other words, granting the right to the society to raise rates in the event of a necessity, that such necessity is not present; that the society is, because of such surplus, in a flourishing and prosperous condition.

It is likely that there is no word in the lexicon of business terms so little understood or so misapplied as the word surplus or reserve, when used in connection with mutual insurance companies or societies. A surplus accumulated over the necessities of an old line life company is a tangible thing to [633] which any policy holder or creditor may look for the satisfaction of his claim. It is an asset of the company. On the other hand, an apparent surplus of a fraternal society may be merely a mortality fund, or an accumulation to meet a deficiency in rates, so that in the end the accumulation will balance the deficiency. It generally represents a loading, over what may be called a possible minimum contract rate. It is a modern thing among fraternal societies. Indeed, the thought was generally discountenanced in their earlier years. Necessity has driven them into the only open port. An accumulation to balance the deficiency in rates is a bridge over which the society may pass from the quicksands of bankruptcy to the high ground of business solvency. The surplus or reserve, whichever it may be called, is a trust fund, and in that sense is in truth a liability and not an asset. Its purpose is to pay death claims, not to retire policies during the life of the member; and until it is shown that the society is collecting more than is reasonably necessary to insure its solvency, no living member can claim a remedy or an individual interest in it. Under the record before us, the so-called surplus is a mortuary fund. The member has no vested interest and no power to control its disposition during his life. Its disposition, within legal bounds, is for the officers duly elected and authorized to act for the society. Niblack, Benefit Societies and Accident Insur- ance (2d ed.) p. 238; Kentucky Mut. Security Fund Co. v. Turner, 89 Ky. 665, 13 S. W. 104.

A like contention was made in the Ericson case, and answered in this way:

"The facts show that appellant had paid all death claims and other benefits that had accrued, and had left in its treasury in 1908 $225,000 subject to the payment of such claims as there should thereafter accrue. But that appellant was therefore 'in good financial condition,' or that this sum was 'surplus assets over all liabilities,' is a non sequitur—a fallacy that has proved the undoing of many life insurance companies, and especially fraternal associations. What are the [684] assets of a life insurance company? The money which it has in its treasury and the money which it will hereafter be able to collect under its contracts with its policy holders, above its necessary expenses. What are its liabilities? The amounts unpaid on claims that have already accrued and the amounts which it has promised to pay by its contracts of insurance which will accrue in the future. If its assets exceed its liabilities as thus stated, it is in good financial condition; otherwise it is not. Many fraternal insurance orders honestly conducted have been lured to their destruction by this mirage apparent of accumulated surplus during the early period of their existence. Among institutions born of the wisdom, philanthropy, and altruism of modern times, none are more capable of or are accomplishing greater good than mutual fraternal benefit societies, and it is encouraging to see some of them awakening from this delusion to which too many of them have been given over. A mutual insurance association has no capital stock, and can pay its policy holders only out of the money paid in by them and the accumulated interest thereon. A statement of its affairs at an early period of its existence may show what is frequently called a surplus, when it is hopelessly insolvent in the sense that it cannot possibly meet its future obligations. . . . In 1907 this order had insured its members in the sum of $39,937,000. This was its liability. Its real assets were not the so-called $225,000 surplus in its treasury, but the amount that it would collect from its members in the future. Whether or not it was in good financial standing depended upon the adequacy of its rates, which it appears was not considered by the court."

The insurance code seems to have been drawn upon this theory. After declaring that societies may create and invest a surplus, and that the society may grant paid up or extended insurance if so provided by the laws of the society, it says:

"Such grants shall in no case exceed in value the portion of the reserve to the credit of such members to whom they are made." Laws of 1911, p. 279, § 210 (3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6059-210); and

"No member or beneficiary shall have or acquire individual rights therein or become entitled to any apportionment or the [685] surrender of any part thereof, except as provided in section two hundred ten." Laws 1911, p. 281, § 214 (Id. § 6059-214).

The reserve is still far short of the deficiency in appellant's contracts, and inasmuch as the undisputed facts show that respondent has not met the cost of his own insurance, it follows, if his argument were otherwise sound, he has no interest in the reserve.

Respondent contends that his contract has been violated in this, that his insurance has been changed from a semi-endowment policy maturing at the age of seventy years, to a straight life policy. We do not concede that this question is before the court at the present time, although some of the authorities cited in this opinion sustain the right of the society to make such change.

Neither has respondent a right to rescind and recover the amount paid as dues and assessments. The society has not repudiated its contract; it is endeavoring to perform it. Respondent's contributions to the society have not met the cost of carrying his certificate, and so long as he has had protection for less than cost, he cannot complain.

This is the first time the question raised by this appeal has been before our court. Because of its importance and the far reaching effect of our decision, we have endeavored to make it plain that a member of a beneficiary society having a democratic or representative form of government has no right, under a certificate providing for a change of by-laws, as does the certificate held by respondent, that can be called vested, except a right to insist that the face or amount to become due under his contract shall not be lessened or impaired; that the object, plan, spirit and purpose of such a society is written into its certificate; that the true meaning of the promise to obey its rules and regulations and such changes and amendments as thereafter may be made is that the society may from time to time correct its mistakes, or take such steps as may be necessary to keep its promises, and further, where it appears to be necessary, it is a recognition [686] of a duty resting upon the society so to do; that a member has a vested interest only in the object of the society, and in turn impliedly agrees, notwithstanding the state of the by-laws at the time of joining, that the society may so legislate that its certificates, whether matured by death or time, will be worth their face; that the accomplishment of this purpose is a mere detail, and so long as all members similarly situated are treated alike and no member is called upon to pay more than the cost of his certificate, as may be determined by the mortuary and experience tables recognized by the laws of this state, there can be no just cause of complaint on the part of any one; that a by-law fixing impossible rates, followed by a clause saying that such rates shall continue so long as the member remains in good standing, is to be measured by the objects of the order and is of no higher order than any other by-law, for the very evident reason that the object of the society to pay the face of each certificate cannot be accomplished unless such by-law is amended.

It may seem that our holding works a hardship to those of us who became members in our younger days, but the mistake was ours. The society was not to blame. Our mistake was its mistake; but whatever the result may be to those of us who have passed the age limit, we have had insurance for which we have paid less than cost, and under the holding of the courts and legislative enactments in most of the states, such mistakes will not occur again, and fraternal insurance will be in the end what it assumed to be in the beginning—insurance at cost, and as sound as any insurance of whatever kind can be.

It should not be understood that we are holding that a member has no remedy against the fraudulent and arbitrary acts of the officers of a fraternal society. The question in this case goes solely to the power to legislate in representative assembly, and whether such legislation can affect respondent's initial rate of assessment. If we have not made these things plain and our reasoning is so far faulty, it would seem that our holding is nevertheless compelled by a consideration of [687] the provisions of the insurance code, Laws of 1911, p. 161, ch. 49 (3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6059-1 et seq.).

That these societies were organized, and for many years have continued to do business, upon a fundamentally unsound basis has become known to all who have had the interest or the courage to make a simple arithmetical calculation. It has been found that, in so far as maturing certificates upon the lives of members is concerned, fraternity is not always a dependable factor. This condition became apparent to most of these societies a long time ago, and some of them have attempted to meet the situation by their own efforts and by appropriate legislation within their governing bodies. Progress has been slow. Men are loath to lose faith in their ideals. Wherefore, to insure the future stability of societies then doing business, and to prevent the organization by designing men of new societies with inadequate rates and which could not be promoted, in the light of the experience of other societies, without practicing fraud upon prospective members, the state, in the exercise of its sovereign right to regulate insurance companies, has defined the status of fraternal benefit societies and provided the terms under which they may do or continue to do business in the state of Washington. Laws of 1911, p. 281, ch. 49, art. VI, § 214 (3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6059-214). It provides:

"That no society, domestic or foreign, shall hereafter be incorporated or admitted to transact business in this state, which does not provide for stated periodical contributions sufficient to provide for meeting the mortuary obligations contracted, when valued upon the basis of the National Fraternal Congress Table of Mortality," and that after 1913 all societies now doing business in the state shall be subject to the law. It provides for annual reports to the insurance commissioner and a valuation of existing and outstanding certificates and a standard of valuation, and further,

"The laws of such society shall provide that if the stated periodical contributions of the members are insufficient to pay [688] all matured death and disability claims in full and to provide for the creation and maintenance of the funds required by its laws additional, increased or extra rates of contribution shall be collected from the members to meet such deficiency; and such laws may provide that, upon the written application or consent of the member, his certificate may be charged with its proportion of any deficiency disclosed by valuation, with interest not exceeding five per cent per annum." Laws of 1911, p. 290, art. VI, § 228 (3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6059-228).

And further, that if the valuation shows a deficiency of more than ten per cent, the society must reduce such deficiency at a rate of not less than five per cent each three years succeeding. Section 229, p. 292 (Id. § 6059-229). It is made the duty of the insurance commissioner to wind up the affairs of any society which has not complied with the law or is not carrying out its contracts in good faith (we take it that good faith is to be measured not by the intent, but by the statute). Section 230, p. 293 (Id. § 6059-230).

The rate fixed by the society for the respondent, and which by reference to the statute we are bound to assume is necessary to mature his certificate, being no higher than the National Fraternal Congress rates, it follows that respondent cannot complain, for the society has done only what the state would have required but for its voluntary action. The law of the state is a part of every contract of insurance. Finnell v. Franklin, 55 Colo. 156, 134 Pac. 122.

"Compliance with the general laws of the state affecting such corporations [Benevolent and Beneficial Associations] is as essential to their continued existence as to their creation." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 1049.

This is a suit in equity, and the allowance of costs is a matter within the discretion of the court. The case has an importance to the appellant aside from the reversal of the case. It is a test case which affects, not alone the respondent, but every member of the society. A penalty should not be put upon a member because he has seen fit to question the act [689] of the appellant in raising its rates. The briefs and abstract filed by appellant are, in the judgment of the writer of this opinion, unnecessarily long, and if costs were allowed for them it would, in a way, operate as a penalty. Considering, then, the nature of the case and the good faith of the respondent, and the fact that the opinion affects every member of the order, we have decided that the costs shall be borne by the appellant.

The decree of the lower court is reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to enter a decree denying to respondent the relief prayed for in his complaint.

NOTE.

Validity of Amendments to By-laws of Fraternal Benefit Societies as Applied to Existing Members.

Introductory, 814.

Reasonable Amendment:

Generally, 814.

Suicide Clause, 815.

Other Amendments, 816.

Amendment Impairing Vested Rights:

Generally, 817.

Beneficiaries, 817.

Occupation of Insured, 817.

Amount Payable under Certificate, 818.

Sick Benefits, 818.

Increase in Assessments, 819.

Introductory.

It is the purpose of the present note to review the recent cases dealing with the validity of an amendment to the by-laws of a fraternal benefit society as applied to the existing members. The earlier cases on this subject are collected and discussed in the notes to Gilmore v. Knights of Columbus,

1 Ann. Cas. 715, 107 Am. St. Rep. 17; Olson v. Court of Honor, 10 Ann. Cas. 622, 117 Am. St. Rep. 676; Hart v. Life, etc. Assoc. Ann. Cas. 1913C 672; Supreme Conclave, etc. v. Rehan, Ann. Cas. 1914D 58; Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 83 Am. St. Rep. 699; Supreme Conclave, etc. v. Miles, 84 Am. St. Rep. 528, 553; and Wright v. Knights of Maccabees of World, 134 Am. St. Rep. 838.

It is the intention to include only those cases involving fraternal benefit societies, excluding all cases dealing with regular life insurance companies though they may be mutual in character.

Reasonable Amendment.

GENERALLY.

While the authorities differ greatly as to what is a reasonable amendment of a by-law, it seems to be well settled that where either the certificate or policy itself, or the by-laws or constitution in existence at the time of the issuance of the policy, contain a stipulation for future changes, reasonable changes may be made, and when made, apply to existing members. Eminent Household of Columbian Woodmen v. Hewitt, 122 Ark. 480, 184 S. W. 52; Streep v. Mutual Protective League, 186 Ill. App. 535; Moses v. Illinois Commercial Men's Assoc. 189 Ill. App. 440; Apitz v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 274 Ill. 196, 113 N. E. 63; Arold v. Supreme Conclave, etc. 123 Md. 675, 91 Atl. 829; Royal Arcanum v. Vitzthum, 128 Md. 523, 97 Atl. 923; Messer v. Grand Lodge, etc. 180 Mass. 321, 62 N. E. 252; Ledy v. National Council of Knights, etc. 129 Minn. 137, Ann. Cas. 1916E 486, 151 N. W. 905, L.R.A.1915D 1095; Newman v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 110 Miss. 371, 70 So. 241; Cunningham v. Supreme Council, etc. 165 App. Div. 52, 151 N. Y. S. 83; Cipriano v. Societa San Salvatore, 161 N. Y. S. 284, reversing 94 Misc. 130, 157 N. Y. S. 467; Faulk v. Fraternal Mystic Circle, 171 N. C. 301, 88 S. E. 431; McGovern v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, etc. 31 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 243; Clarkson v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 99 S. C. 134, 82 S. E. 1043; Dean v. Dean, 162 Wis. 303, 156 N. W. 135.

In Arold v. Supreme Conclave, etc. 123 Md. 675, 91 Atl. 829, the court stated the rule and the reason therefor as follows: "Where a member of a beneficial society in his application for membership has agreed to be bound by the rules or laws then in force, or which might thereafter be adopted, the society has the right to bind him by such after adopted by-law even though the by-law is not in its terms made retroactive, limited only by the qualification that such by-law must be reasonable in its character. This rule is supported by reason as well as by authority. The very foundation of organizations of this character is their mutual character, and if a member or his beneficiary is bound only by such regulations as are in force at the time when he joins the order the result will inevitably follow that different members will have entirely separate and distinct rights as between themselves and the order according to the time when they became members of it, and the mutuality of the organization would be destroyed." And in Dean v. Dean, 162 Wis. 303, 156 N. W. 135, the rule in Wisconsin was stated as follows: "It is settled in this state that, where the benefit certificate provides that the insured shall be bound by by-laws thereafter adopted, he will be so bound, provided the change made is simply a change in a matter of detail deemed necessary or advisable to carry out the fundamental principle or plan of insurance, and not a change in a substantial part of the plan itself of a nullification of any substantial part of the existing contract or insurance."

The changes need not be indispensable in order to be reasonable. Uhl v. Life, etc. Assoc. 97 Kan. 422, 155 Pac. 926, wherein it was said: "'Necessary' is a word the force of which depends upon the context. . . . Here it is not used as the equivalent of 'indispensable.' If some change in the association's methods was required to enable it to continue business, and while acting in good faith it effected a readjustment by means reasonably adapted to the end sought, its action must be regarded as necessary, although some other plan might also have been available. The requirement that a change in the rules shall be reasonable fairly implies that it shall be necessary in this sense, so that the former decisions of this court may be said to have determined that under its contract with the plaintiff the defendant had authority to make the changes in its by-laws now in controversy, provided they were reasonable."

But in Marshall v. Modern American Fraternal Order, 184 Ill. App. 224, it was held that an after enacted by-law did not affect pre-existing contracts unless it was clearly the intention that it should, the court saying: "A by-law passed after the issuing of a benefit certificate will not be held to be retroactive and applicable to certificates then in force, unless the intention that it shall be so operative is expressly declared or must necessarily be implied from its language, and this rule is adopted even where a member has stipulated that he will be bound by the laws of the order that may thereafter be enacted."

Where the facts are undisputed, the question whether a by-law, rule or regulation passed by a fraternal benefit society is reasonable, is one of law for the court. Uhl v. Life, etc. Assoc. 97 Kan. 422, 155 Pac. 926; Clarkson v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 99 S. C. 134, 82 S. E. 1043. In the case last cited it was said: "When the exercise of judgment and discretion is vested, either by law or contract, in an individual or governing body, a reservation is implied that it must be exercised in good faith and reasonably. In determining whether it has been so exercised, the court will not substitute its judgment for that of the individual or body in whom the discretion has been vested. In such a case, the inquiry is: Does the action under consideration fail to measure up to any fair test of reason? If the facts and circumstances are such that reasonable men may differ as to the wisdom and expediency thereof, the judgment and discretion of those vested with authority to decide must be upheld. It follows that a very clear case of abuse of discretion must be made out to warrant judicial interference."

SUICIDE CLAUSE.

It is generally held that where a member of a fraternal benefit society agrees in his certificate or application to be bound by the laws of the society then existing or which may be thereafter adopted, a by-law subsequently enacted which either reduces the amount to be paid in the event of suicide or totally abrogates all the rights of the insured on the happening of such an event is valid and binding on such existing members. Streesper v. Mutual Protective League, 186 Ill. App. 535; Ledy v. National Council of Knights, etc. 129 Minn. 137, Ann. Cas. 1916E 486, 151 N. W. 905, L.R.A.1915D 1095; Dessauer v. Supreme Tent, etc. 191 Mo. App. 76, 176 S. W. 461. In Ledy v. National Council of Knights, etc. supra, the court in upholding the reasonableness and validity of a suicide clause subsequently enacted said: "Where a fraternal beneficiary association, in the contract for insurance entered into with its members, stipulates that they shall be subject to, and bound by, the subsequently enacted laws and regulations of the order, the rule is well nigh universal that the association must exercise the power so reserved in a reasonable manner, and that a law of the order, enacted under such power, which would make an unreasonable change in the terms of prior contracts, is void as against such contracts. While the courts differ little as to the general rule, they differ much as to what amendments are unreasonable within the meaning of the rule. They agree quite generally, however, that an amendment, which relieves the association, in whole or in part, from liability in case the assured intentionally ends his own life, is not forbidden by the rule and is valid."

But in Marshall v. Modern American Fraternal Order, 184 Ill. App. 224, it was held that a by-law providing that the certificate should be void in case of suicide was not applicable to an existing member, where the society, by issuing a new certificate containing the original incontestable clause after the enactment of the amended by-law, had construed such amended by-law as not being applicable to pre-existing contracts, the society being bound by its own construction as to the retrospective nature of the new by-law.

OTHER AMENDMENTS.

A limitation on the time within which an action may be brought on the contract of insurance may be lawfully declared by a by-law subsequently enacted provided such limitation is reasonable. Thus it has been held that a limitation of one year is binding on holders of pre-existing contracts. Arold v. Supreme Conclave, etc. 123 Md. 675, 91 Atl. 829; Faulk v. Fraternal Mystic Circle, 171 N. C. 301, 88 S. E. 431.

Likewise an amended by-law, whereby a member's certificate was declared to be forfeited if death resulted directly or indirectly from his use of intoxicating liquors, has been held to be valid and binding as to existing members. Curtis v. Modern Woodmen of America, 159 Wis. 303, 150 N. W. 417.

In Cipriano v. Societa San Salvatore, 161 N. Y. S. 284 reversing 94 Misc. 130, 157 N. Y. S. 467, it was held that an amendment limiting the benefits of the society to members residing within greater New York was valid as against a member who had removed to New Jersey before the enactment of the amendment. In that case it was said: "Plaintiff's contract with the defendant was based upon the constitution and by-laws, which must be deemed part of the contract of insurance. . . . One of the provisions of the by-laws was that sick benefits should be given to every member residing within the territory limited by the by-laws. Another provision was that the by-laws could be modified or expanded with the assenting vote of two-thirds of the enrolled members. The amendment, therefore, was strictly in conformity with the contract between plaintiff and defendant, and was binding upon the plaintiff."

By-laws which change the rules of procedure or affect the nature of evidence have been held to be valid and binding on existing members. Thus it has been held that where the by-laws of a fraternal benefit society provided that a member could be expelled for conviction of crime after trial, a by-law subsequently enacted providing that proof of a judgment and conviction and sentence should be sufficient evidence was valid and applicable to existing members. Cunningham v. Supreme Council, etc. 165 App. Div. 52, 151 N. Y. S. 83. Similarly, a by-law which provided that a member claiming a benefit for a fractured arm must accompany the proof of the fracture by an x-ray photograph made by the society's physician has been held to be valid, but it was further held that if the x-ray did not show the fracture, the member could introduce other evidence to prove it. Eminent Household of Columbian Woodmen v. Hewitt, 122 Ark. 480, 184 S. W. 52. In answer to the contention that a by-law subsequently enacted, providing that the association would not be liable for death or disability resulting from the discharge of firearms when there was no witness except the member himself, was invalid on the ground that it was contrary to public policy because it undertook to make a rule of evidence, the court in Moses v. Illinois Com. Men's Assoc. 189 Ill. App. 440, said: "It was indispensable under the first part of the by-law for the plaintiff to prove an accidental death resulting from the discharge of the firearm and that there was an eyewitness to the discharge other than the assured. This was a condition precedent to the creation of a liability under the first part of the amendment of the by-law, even if the amendment had not specifically so provided. It follows, therefore, that the amendment does not establish a new rule of evidence and is not obnoxious to that objection."

Likewise by-laws subsequently enacted and providing for the suspension of a member after stated periods of disappearance have been held to be valid. Apitz v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 274 Ill. 196, 113 N. E. 63 (disappearance for one year); Royal Arcanum v. Vitzthum, 128 Md. 523, 97 Atl. 923. In the case last cited, the court, holding to be reasonable a by-law enacted after a member had joined the order which provided that if a member should disappear and should not be discovered within six months after the order first tried to locate him he should be suspended, said: "This law imposes no hardship upon the member, nor does it deprive him of any vested right acquired under the contract with the defendant. It does not prevent him from changing his domicile or abode. He may do so with impunity, but, should he disappear from his home and his whereabouts are unknown to the order, the law is then invoked, and, if he cannot be located within six months from the time when the first effort is made by the order to so locate him, or if he does not comply with the provisions of the by-law within such time, he is suspended from the rights and benefits of the order. This is not at all inconsistent with the agreement made with the defendant at the time he was admitted into the order; for at such time he expressly agreed that, should he voluntarily sever his connection with the order, such act of his should forfeit the rights of himself, family and dependents, to all benefits and privileges of the order."

But in Linneweber v. Supreme Council, etc. 30 Cal. App. 315, 158 Pac. 229, it was held that a provision in the by-laws in force at the time of membership relating to the presumption of death from absence governed pre-existing contracts, and that a by-law subsequently enacted providing that there should be no presumption of death from absence was not applicable.

In Benjamin v. Bankers' Union of World, 173 Ill. App. 620, where by the express terms of the certificate the constitution and by-laws were made a part of the contract, it was held that a subsequent amendment providing for forfeiture of the policy in case the premiums were not paid monthly in advance was not binding without the consent of insured, the court saying: "This was as binding on the association as it was on the member, and we do not think that in so important a matter as the time given by the by-laws then in existence for the payment of monthly dues a change could be made without the specific consent of the assured, which should place her in default because she did not conform to the more drastic provisions of the amendment."

Amendment Impairing Vested Rights.

GENERALLY.

While a fraternal benefit association may make changes in its by-laws so long as they are reasonable, it is well settled that it cannot by amending its by-laws deprive a member of vested rights. Brown v. Grand Fountain, etc. 28 App. Cas. (D. C.) 200; Uhl v. Life, etc. Assoc. 97 Kan. 422, 155 Pac. 926; Maheu v. L'Union Lafayette (Me.) 98 Atl. 821; Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 126 N. C. 971, 128 N. C. 465, 36 S. E. 352, 39 S. E. 55, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699, 54 L.R.A. 605; Palmer v. Protected Home Circle, 252 Pa. St. 201, 97 Atl. 188. See also Ellison v. District Grand Lodge, etc. 11 Ala. App. 442, 66 So. 872. In Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. supra, it was said: "A mere general consent that the constitution and by-laws may be amended, applies only to such reasonable regulations as may be within the scope of its original design. We must again repeat what we said in our former opinion: 'Whatever may be the power of a mutual association to change its by-laws, such changes must always be in furtherance of the essential objects of its creation, and not destructive of vested rights."
Ann. Cas. 1917B.—52.

BENEFICIARIES.

The cases are not in entire accord as to what constitutes vested rights in connection with the naming of beneficiaries in a policy or certificate of membership in a fraternal benefit society. It has been held that a by-law subsequently enacted which provided that in the event of the divorce of a member a policy originally made payable to the wife should be payable as if the beneficiary had died, was valid and binding. Knights of Maccabees of World v. Brown, 186 Mich. 284, 152 N. W. 1085. And so where a policy was issued to a member of a fraternal benefit society payable to a certain designated beneficiary, but was by express stipulation made subject to such modification as might be made by the grand lodge, a by-law adopted subsequently to the issue of the policy allowing a change of beneficiary to be made was valid, and a change made under its authority was enforceable. Knights of Pythias of North America v. Long, 117 Ark. 136, 174 S. W. 1197.

On the other hand it has been held that a policy made payable to a creditor under a by-law allowing the assigns of a member to be made beneficiaries, could not be affected by a subsequent change in the charter of the society restricting the beneficiaries of policyholders to their family, etc., and omitting assigns. Brown v. Grand Fountain, etc. 28 App. Cas. (D. C.) 200. And where by a by-law subsequently enacted it was provided that death benefit certificates should "only be issued to a wife, child or children," etc., it was held that it did not affect a certificate in which a friend of the member was made the beneficiary as it was clearly the intention from the language used that the new by-law was not to apply to pre-existing contracts. Wheeler v. Tolbert, 19 Pa. Dist. 845.

OCCUPATION OF INSURED.

Where a member agreed in his application for a beneficial certificate to accept the certificate subject to such laws, rules and regulations as then existed or might thereafter be adopted by the organization, it was held that a by-law subsequently adopted providing that any member who should engage in the liquor business should be expelled, was valid and binding, and that this was true even though a member was engaged in the liquor business at the time he joined the order and after a period in which he was not so engaged re-entered the business after the adoption of the by-law. Shutte v. Kibler, 55 Pa. Super. Ct. 199.

AMOUNT PAYABLE UNDER CERTIFICATE

The same lack of uniformity exists in regard to the right of a fraternal benefit society to abolish or diminish the amount payable under a certificate of insurance by an amendment of its by-laws made subsequent to the issuance of the policy. It has been held that an amended by-law which provided for the payment yearly, on arrival at the period of physical disability, of one-twentieth of the amount specified in the benefit certificate instead of one-half as provided by the by-laws in force at the time the policyholder became a member, was invalid, the court saying: "That certificate, issued by the appellant to the appellee on September 1, 1889, constituted the contract between them, and there is nothing to be found in it, or in the application for it, signed by the appellee, to justify the attempt of the appellant to impair or alter the terms of the contract. It is true that the appellee stipulated that compliance on his part with all the rules, regulations, and requirements then in force, or that might thereafter be enacted by the association, was the express condition upon which he was to be entitled to participate in the beneficiary fund, but that stipulation was not that the association might radically change the terms of its contract." Palmer v. Protected Home Circle, 252 Pa. St. 201, 97 Atl. 188. And it has been held that a provision in the contract reserving the right to alter, amend or rescind the existing laws when necessary was limited by a subdivision of the same rule providing that no member should be deprived of any right or privilege which he became entitled to under the code of rules which were in operation at the time he joined the society, and that reading the two together the society did not have the power to destroy or diminish benefits which it contracted to give its members when they became such. Stewart v. Thorborn, 171 App. Div. 258, 157 N. Y. S. 242. Likewise it has been held that where it was provided in the declaration of incorporation that on reaching the expectancy age a member should be entitled to one-half of the amount of his certificate, the remaining half to be payable at death, the society could not, by a by-law enacted after a member had attained the age of expectancy, cut off his right to the benefit contracted for, though it might under the reserved right to amend its rules and by-laws alter the method of payment. Graininger v. Order of Canadian Home Circles, 33 Ont. L. Rep. 116, 7 Ont. W. N. 649, affirming 31 Ont. L. Rep. 461, 6 Ont. W. N. 489. However, it has been held that a member might consent to such an amendment and a reduced assessment would be a sufficient consideration for a reduction of benefits. Ankele v. Workingman's Relief Soc. etc. 182 Ill. App. 470. The court said: "A member in a mutual benefit society may consent by his contract that subsequently enacted by-laws or amendments shall enter into and form parts of his contract modifying or varying it. He may also be bound by such new by-laws if he consents to be so bound for a sufficient consideration, although such consent or agreement be not a part of his original contract. Where in such case he acts under the new laws and clearly recognizes them as modifying his contract, and accepts the benefits accruing to him therefrom, he will be estopped to deny that he has consented to the modification." And in Niemyjski v. Schlessinger, 91 Misc. 50, 154 N. Y. S. 219, it was held that a member of a labor union who paid his dues after an amendment to the constitution repealing a section providing for death benefits was presumed to have consented to the amendment.

On the other hand it has been held that under the rights reserved in the certificate and the consent given in the application for membership, a benefit society has the power to amend its by-laws by providing that old age benefits shall not be paid unless accompanied by actual disability. Kirk v. Fraternal Aid Assoc. 95 Kan. 707, 149 Pac. 400, wherein the court distinguished the case of Hart v. Life. etc. Assoc. 86 Kan. 318, Ann. Cas. 1913C 672, 120 Pac. 363, on the ground that in that case the certificate had been fully paid before there was any change in the by-laws.

In Uhl v. Life, etc. Assoc. 97 Kan. 422, 155 Pac. 926, while admitting the right of a benefit society to change the rule by which the amount of a paid-up certificate should be determined, it was held that it could not deprive a member of the right wholly. In a headnote by the court the rule was stated as follows: "Where the certificate held by a member of a fraternal beneficiary society provides that after a certain time it shall be nonforfeitable, and that he shall be entitled to a paid-up certificate in proportion to the number of payments he has made, a change is unreasonable which denies him, unless he shall make further payments, any benefits whatever from his admitted present share of a reserve fund which has already accumulated."

SICK BENEFITS.

Where a society is authorized by its by-laws voluntarily to assist its members by the payment of sick benefits it has the implied power to suspend the by-laws providing for such voluntary payments when its funds become depleted. Faso v. LaCerdese Commadore Vito La Mantia Soc. 93 Misc. 163, 156 N. Y. S. 1090.

But, where a member has become ill and his rights to sick benefits have attached, a benefit society cannot defeat his right and repudiate its existing obligation by amending its by-laws. Maheu v. L'Union Lafayette (Me.) 98 Atl. 821.

INCREASE IN ASSESSMENTS.

Where the power to amend its constitution and laws is reserved by a fraternal benefit society, and a member agrees in his contract with the society to comply with and abide by its laws then existing or which may be thereafter adopted, an amendment increasing the rate of assessment is not an impairment of the vested rights of a member, and, if reasonable and necessary, is valid and binding. Supreme Lodge, etc. v. Mims, 241 U. S. 574, 36 S. Ct. 702, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 1179, L.R.A.1916F 919, reversing 167 S. W. 835; Haydel v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 104 Fed. 718, 44 C. C. A. 169, affirming 98 Fed. 200; Gaut v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 121 Fed. 403; Holt v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 235 Fed. 885; Schmierer v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 153 Cal. 208, 94 Pac. 887; Barbit v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 100 Ga. 681, 28 S. E. 498; Gibson v. Iowa Legion of Honor (Ia.) 159 N. W. 639; Miller v. National Council, etc. 69 Kan. 234, 70 Pac. 830; Moore v. Life, etc. Assoc. 93 Kan. 398, 95 Kan. 591, 148 Pac. 981, 96 Kan. 397 151 Pac. 1107; Uhl v. Life, etc. Assoc. 97 Kan. 422, 155 Pac. 926; DeGraw v. Supreme Ct. etc. 182 Mich. 366, 148 N. W. 703; Newman v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 110 Miss. 371, 70 So. 241; Sheppard v. Bankers Union of World, 77 Neb. 85, 110 N. W. 188; Clarkson v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 99 S. C. 134, 82 S. E. 1043. And see the reported case. See also Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America v. Fenwick, 169 Ky. 269, 183 S. W. 906. Compare Smyth v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 220 Fed. 438, 137 C. C. A. 32.

In DeGraw v. Supreme Ct. etc. 182 Mich. 366, 148 N. W. 703, the court upholding the right of a mutual benefit society to raise its rate of assessment, said: "It is clear that no one could tell to a certainty what the assessments in the future should be to make it possible for the defendant to pay the beneficiaries of its members definite sums of money. It is equally clear if it was selling insurance for less than it cost it would be only a question of time when it must go out of business. The record shows that it did insure those members joining prior to 1899, at a rate less than the cost of insurance.

We do not think it was against public policy or an infringement upon vested rights for the insured to agree that such changes might be made in the laws of the association during his membership, as would enable it to carry out its insurance agreements." And in Newman v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 110 Miss. 371, 70 So. 241, it was said: "When we consider the facts in this case—that appellee had the reserved power to amend its constitution and laws; that its laws designated the rate of assessments of its members, and provided that they should continue to pay the same amount as long as they remained a member, 'unless otherwise provided for by the Supreme Lodge, Knights of Pythias of the World;' that appellant agreed to pay all assessments for which he 'may become liable;' that he would be governed, and his contract should be controlled, by all the laws then in force, or that might thereafter be enacted; and that the certificate of insurance which he accepted was made dependent upon his payment of all the assessments 'as required,' and his full compliance with laws that might be thereafter enacted—we have no hesitation in deciding that the amendment in question, increasing appellant's rate of assessment, was valid and binding on him, as being within the scope of his contract." In Supreme Lodge, etc. v. Mims, 241 U. S. 574, 36 S. Ct. 702, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 1179, L.R.A.1916F 919, reversing (Tex.) 167 S. W. 835, it was held that the benefit certificate of a member "was not a contract, but was a regulation subject to the possibility inherent in the case." It was further said in that case: "Persons who join institutions of this sort are not dealing at arm's length with a stranger whose mode of providing for payment does not concern them, but only his promise to pay. They are joining a club the members of which have to pay any benefit that any member can receive. The corporation is simply the machine for collection and distribution. Its charter expressly provides by sec. 5 that it 'shall not engage in any business for gain; the purpose of said corporation being fraternal and benevolent.' It is manifest therefore that it would be a perversion of its purposes if, through some ambiguity of phrase, the necessary source of benefits were closed in favor of certain members, while their right to insist upon payment remained. The essence of the arrangement was that the members took the risk of events, and if the assessments levied at a certain time were insufficient to pay a benefit of a certain amount, whether from diminution of members or any other cause, either they must pay more or the beneficiary take less."

Setting out facts to show the necessity and therefore the reasonableness of a by-law increasing the rate of assessment, the court in Clarkson v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 99 S. C. 134, 82 S. E. 1043, said: "According to these experts, the defendant could not have adopted a less rate, without endangering its own existence as an insurance society, and the safety of the protection upon which its thousands of members rely for the benefits of their families, when they shall be taken from them. The defendant did not undertake to insure its members at less than cost. In the nature of things, it could not do so and live. The rates and the plan adopted provide for no more than the actual cost of carrying the risks on an adequate and equitable basis. That the rerating at their attained ages falls heavily upon the plaintiffs on account of their advanced ages is not the fault of defendant. It is their misfortune. And, regrettable as their situation is, it does not give them a right of action against defendant, for they cannot in reason ask that they be carried at a rate which is shown to be inadequate; or that they be rated at less than their attained ages, for that would be unfair to the younger members of the order. The rates are not unreasonably high, because they are shown to be necessary to afford the protection given. The action of the governing body was based upon good and substantial reason, and, therefore, it should not be interfered with by the courts."

In Haydel v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 104 Fed. 718, 44 C. C. A. 169, the fact that a table of rates was indorsed on the back of the policy was held not to alter the rule, the court saying: "In the first place, the defendant was a mutual company operating on the assessment plan. It had no means wherewith to pay expenses and death losses, other than such as it derived from assessments on its members. It is by no means probable, therefore, that by the indorsement in question it intended to divest itself of the authority plainly conferred by its constitution upon the board of directors to make such assessments as might at any time be found necessary to meet its liabilities, or to tie its hands so that it could not exercise this necessary power. In the second place, the cost per year to a person aged 56 of a policy for $10,000 at the rate indicated by the indorsement would only be $210, which is a sum so far below the usual cost of that amount of insurance to a person of that age as constrains us to believe that the deceased did not himself regard the indorsement as a contract binding the defendant to furnish insurance at that rate, without reference to what might be its actual experience. It is most probable, we think, that he understood it to be an estimate of the probable cost of insurance, the accuracy of which would be determined by the class of risks which it succeeded in obtaining. In the third place, if such a wide departure from the principle of operation described in the defendant's constitution was contemplated by the parties as an agreement for a fixed or level rate of assessment irrespective of the company's actual experience, then it is most likely that a stipulation of that nature would have been embraced in the body of the contract, instead of being indorsed in the form of a memorandum on the back of the policies. And lastly, if it be conceded that the memorandum in question is adequate to raise a doubt as to the proper interpretation of the contract, then the contract should be construed as the parties themselves saw fit to construe it in their dealings with each other."

While possessed of the power to increase its rates under the reserved power to amend its by-laws, an amendment to be valid and binding as to existing members must be adopted in strict conformity to the constitution and laws of the society both as to the method of its adoption and as to its scope. Gibson v. Iowa Legion of Honor (Ia.) 159 N. W. 639; Hicks v. Northwestern Aid Assoc. 117 Tenn. 203, 96 S. W. 962. In the case first cited an amendment increasing the rate of assessment was held to be invalid because of the failure to give proper notice of the change, as stipulated for in the contract, the court saying: "We are not unmindful of holdings . . . that members of a mutual insurance society are bound to take notice of and be governed by its laws, whether adopted prior or subsequent to the contract, if the contract makes such by-laws a part thereof, but have to say: . . . notwithstanding this general rule, it is competent for the parties to the contract to stipulate what alone shall be legal notice of a change, and in this case this was done. . . . If the change in law which raised the assessment of Cook and scaled his certificate was not legally adopted and legal notice thereof was not given, plaintiff was under no obligation to make or tender payment at the rate existing before the change. On renunciation there arose a right to elect whether to hold the insurer for damages or wait until the policy became payable according to its tenor and surviving the beneficiary." And in Hicks v. Northwestern Aid Assoc. supra, where it appeared that the insured had agreed in his certificate to be bound by future changes in the laws of the association, not "in conflict with the contract rights of the insured" herein and that the association had stipulated that it would not increase the rates except in the case of unusual emergency, it was held that such an emergency must exist as a condition precedent to making the increase, and the burden of proof thereof was on the association.

The right to increase its assessments reserved to the society in its laws and by contract does not empower it arbitrarily to discriminate against one class by requiring the members thereof to pay an increased assessment based on their attained age, while members of other classes are assessed as of their age of entry. Benjamin v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 146 Cal. 34, 79 Pac. 517; Ebert v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 81 Minn. 116, 83 N. W. 506, 834, 84 N. W. 457; Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 126 N. C. 971, 36 S. E. 352, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699, 54 L.R.A. 605, affirmed on rehearing in 128 N. C. 465, 39 S. E. 55, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699, 54 L.R.A. 605. In Ebert v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. supra, it was said: "It is evident that the contract contemplated an unsteady and varying death fund from which to pay death claims and that the amount of the assessments would vary according to the number of deaths, the growth of the association in membership, and earning capacity of the reserve fund. It is also clear that the law of self-preservation applied, and if, at any time, in order to meet maturing claims, it should become necessary to levy a larger amount than that stipulated as the maximum rate of the table, the power so to do was inherent in the association, and the directors would have authority to pass suitable rules and regulations for that purpose. But it is equally clear that neither by the contract of insurance, in contemplation of the laws of New York, the constitution and by-laws, nor from the natural, inherent power of the association, based upon the doctrine of the general good, does there exist authority to arbitrarily determine in favor of one class of members and against another class."

It has been held that a change in the by-laws cannot affect the contract of an existing member unless such intention is clearly shown. Bass v. Life, etc. Assoc. 96 Kan. 205, 150 Pac. 588, wherein it appeared that a provision of the certificate gave the members a right to cease payments at any time and to receive a paid-up certificate for a proportionate part of the amount reserved. In answer to the contention that the repeal of a by-law containing a similar privilege cut off the right to a paid-up certificate it was said: "Conceding the power of the association to deprive the plaintiff of his right in this respect, a purpose to do so was not shown. The by-law on the subject was merely repealed. No affirmative action was taken indicating an intention to change the effect of any certificate already issued. No showing was offered of any conduct or circumstance suggesting such a design, and it is not readily to be inferred."

Similarly it has been held that unless there is an express agreement that a member shall be bound by future by-laws, he is not so bound even though the certificate states that the by-laws shall constitute a part of the contract and that they are subject to amendment. Covenant Mut. L. Assoc. v. Kentner, 188 Ill. 431, 58 N. E. 966. And particularly is this so where it is stipulated that the application and certificate constitute the only contract between the parties and the rates of assessment are fixed in the certificate. Covenant Mut. Benefit Assoc. v. Baldwin, 49 Ill. App. 203; Covenant Mut. L. Assoc. v. Tuttle, 87 Ill. App. 309.

In each of the following cases it was held that as the societies were chartered and controlled by the laws of Canada the right to increase their assessments must also be governed by those laws, and as they were allowed by the law of Canada to increase their assessments when reasonable and necessary, by-laws providing for such increases must be held to be valid and binding: Supreme Council, etc. v. Green, 237 U. S. 531, 35 S. Ct. 724, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1089, L.R.A. 1916A 771, reversing 206 N. Y. 591, 100 N. E. 411; Stockwell v. Supreme Court, etc. 216 Fed. 205; Simmelink v. Supreme Court, etc. 152 App. Div. 892, 136 N. Y. S. 527; McClement v. Supreme Court, etc. 169 App. Div. 77, 154 N. Y. S. 700, reversing 88 Misc. 475, 152 N. Y. S. 136.

PEOPLE EX REL DWIGHT

v.

CHICAGO RAILWAYS COMPANY ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—October 27, 1915.

270 Ill. 87; 110 N. E. 386.

Pleading — Plea PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE — Waiver of Former Pleas.

Practice Act, § 50 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, c. 110, § 50), provides that the pleading of a plea puis darrein continuance shall not waive former pleas, so that the law, as it was prior to the revision of the Practice Act in 1907, that such a plea would supersede an answer theretofore filed and strike the answer from the record by operation of law, confessing the matters set forth in the petition, no longer applies.

Answer — Admission of Sufficiency — Replication.

By filing a replication plaintiff conceded that the allegations of the answer operated as a bar to the relief sought, unless the new allegations of the replication were sufficient to avoid the legal effect of the answer's allegations as a bar to the cause of action originally stated.

Demurrer — Effect — Admission of Allegations.

Defendant's demurrer to a replication admits as true new matters alleged in the replication, but challenges its sufficiency to avoid the bar to the originally stated cause of action presented by the plea.

Carrying Demurrer Back.

Where on demurrer to the replication no motion was made by plaintiff to carry the demurrer back to the plea, the sufficiency of the plea as a defense to the petition was not presented to the court for determination.

Municipal Corporations — Construction of Ordinance.

The rules for the construction of a city ordinance are the same as those applied in the construction of a statute.

Construction of Statute — Effectuating Legislative Intent.

The primary rule for the interpretation and construction of a statute is that the intention of the legislature is to be ascertained and given effect.

Aids to Interpretation — Opinions of Legislators.

The rule that in construing a statute the legislative intent is to be ascertained and given effect does not permit the court to consider statements made by the author of a bill, or by those interested in its passage, or by members of legislature adopting it, showing the meaning or effect of the language used in the bill as understood by the persons making such statements.

Municipal Corporations — Interpretation of Ordinance — Opinions of Members of Council.

Where a city ordinance embodies a contract between the municipality and street railways, the court, in construing it, should look solely to its text and the situation existing between the railways and the city when the ordinance was passed, and not to the letters, statements, and opinions of the aldermanic body that passed it, since justice to the street railways who accepted the contract demands that the intention of the city council be determined from a consideration of the enactment itself.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A city ordinance embodying a contract between the municipality and street railways could be construed only in the light of its text, and not in the light of letters, statements, and opinions as to its meaning of members of the local transportation committee of the city council which it did not appear were brought to the attention of the council itself at large when the ordinance was submitted to it for passage, since it is the intention of the city council which the courts must endeavor to determine, not the intention of committee members, in construing an ordinance.

Error to Superior Court, Cook county: FOELL, Judge.

Action for mandamus. Walter E. Dwight, relator, and Chicago Railways Company et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

S. S. Gregory, William R. Moes and B. F. Langworthy for plaintiff in error.

John J. Herrick and Horace Kent Tenney for defendant in error Chicago Railways Company.

John W. Beckwith and Chas. M. Haft for defendant in error city of Chicago.

[88] COOKE, J.—On February 14, 1911, a petition was filed in the circuit court of Cook county in the name of the People of the State of Illinois, on the relation of Walter E. Dwight, president of the village of Oak Park, praying for a writ of mandamus requiring the Chicago Railways Company and the County Traction Company to forthwith establish and thereafter maintain a rate of fare of five cents for transportation of each passenger in one direction between the Seventy-second avenue terminals of the County Traction Company in the village of Oak Park (Seventy-second avenue being the western boundary of the village of Oak Park) and the eastern terminals of the Chicago Railways Company in the city of Chicago, the said terminals in the city of Chicago being in that portion of the city commonly known as the loop district. The right to this relief was by the petitioner based primarily upon section 3 of an ordinance [89] passed by the board of trustees of the village of Oak Park on June 4, 1903, which ordinance conferred upon the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company, as the successor of the Cicero and Proviso Street Railway Company, the right to maintain and operate street railways upon certain streets in the village of Oak Park until December 1, 1948. Said section 3, so far as here material, is as follows:

"Sec. 3. From and after the passage and acceptance of this ordinance the rate of fare for each passenger, for any one ride in one direction, between Seventy-second avenue terminal points of the lines of said company in said village of Oak Park and the eastern terminal points of the lines of the Union Traction Company in the city of Chicago, which eastern terminal points shall be within that district of the city of Chicago bounded on the north by the Chicago river, on the west by the south branch of the Chicago river, on the south by VanBuren street and on the east by Lake Michigan, shall be five cents and no more, during the entire term of its franchise in said village, which shall include the right to a ride in each direction over and along the following routes, namely:

"(A) Upon the Chicago avenue line in Oak Park by way of Chicago avenue and Forty-eighth avenue to the Lake street surface lines in the city of Chicago, and thence by transfer to the eastern extremity of said Lake street lines.

"(B) Upon the Lake street line in the village of Oak Park by way of the Lake Street surface lines in the city of Chicago to Forty-eighth street, and thence by transfer to the eastern extremity of said Lake street line.

"(C) Upon the Madison street line in the village of Oak Park and the city of Chicago to West Fortieth street in the city of Chicago, and thence by transfer to the eastern extremity of said Madison street lines.

"(D) Upon the Twelfth street line in the village of Oak Park by way of Twelfth street to the eastern terminus [90] of said line, and thence by transfer upon the Union Traction lines to the eastern extremity of said Union Traction lines."

The obligation on the part of the County Traction Company to comply with the requirements of said section 3 was claimed by the petitioner to exist by reason of the fact that the County Traction Company had succeeded to the rights and franchises conferred by said ordinance on the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company, and was at the time of filing the petition herein operating the street railways in the village of Oak Park which had been formerly operated by the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company by virtue of said ordinance of June 4, 1903, and was and is therefore bound by all the terms and provisions of said ordinance. The obligation on the part of the Chicago Railways Company to comply with the requirements of said section 3 was claimed by petitioner to exist by reason of the fact, as charged in the petition, that the Chicago Union Traction Company, at the time of the passage and acceptance of the ordinance of June 4, 1903, owned, controlled and operated, under the name of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company, the system of street railways in the village of Oak Park, and the acceptance of the ordinance by the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company was, in effect, the acceptance of that ordinance by the Chicago Union Traction Company; that the defendant the Chicago Railways Company is the successor of the Chicago Union Traction Company and is the beneficial owner of the street railway system in the village of Oak Park, and is operating the same under the name of the County Traction Company, and by reason thereof is bound by the terms and provisions of the ordinance of June 4, 1903.

For the purpose of supporting the charge that the provisions of said section 3 are binding upon the Chicago Railways Company, the petition sets forth substantially all the facts disclosed by the opinions in Chicago Union Traction [91] Co. v. Chicago, 199 Ill. 484, 65 N. E. 451, 59 L.R.A. 631, and Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Chicago, 199 Ill. 579, 65 N. E. 470, which show the intimate relation existing between the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company and the Chicago Union Traction Company a short time prior to the passage of the said ordinance of June 4, 1903, and which we held in the last mentioned case established the charge there made that the Chicago Union Traction Company was the beneficial owner of the lines of street railways operated under the name of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company, including the lines in the village of Oak Park. The petition then alleges that on or about April 22, 1903, receivers were appointed by the Federal court for the Chicago Union Traction Company and for the West Chicago Street Railroad Company and the North Chicago Street Railroad Company, respectively, the two companies last named being then the owners and lessors of a large portion of the street railway system operated by the Chicago Union Traction Company. It is further alleged that the Chicago Railways Company was organized under the laws of this State on October 30, 1903, for the purpose of reorganizing the street railway system of the Chicago Union Traction Company, including the lines operated under the name of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company; that thereafter, as a result of negotiations between representatives of the Chicago Union Traction Company and its lessors and the city of Chicago, the city council of the city of Chicago, on February 11, 1907, passed an ordinance granting authority to the Chicago Railways Company, its lessees, successors and assigns, to construct, reconstruct, maintain and operate, for the term of twenty years (subject to the right of the city to purchase the same at any time,) a system of street railways in, upon and along certain streets in the city of Chicago upon which the receivers for the Chicago Union Traction Company were then operating street railways without any franchise from the city, one of the conditions [92] of the grant being that the Chicago Railways Company should within a specified time acquire all the property constituting the system of street railways then operated by the receivers for the Chicago Union Traction Company, and another condition being that the city of Chicago should receive fifty-five per cent of the net receipts from the operation of the system of street railways to be acquired by the Chicago Railways

Company. The petition then sets out various steps taken in the suits in the Federal court in which receivers were appointed for the Chicago Union Traction Company, the West Chicago Street Railroad Company and the North Chicago Street Railroad Company, which culminated in a sale on January 25, 1908, by a special master commissioner, under a decree of the Federal court, of all the property, estate, rights, franchises, contracts, credits, choses in action and effects of the Chicago Union Traction Company, the West Chicago Street Railroad Company and the North Chicago Street Railroad Company, to a committee acting under a plan and agreement of reorganization and readjustment promulgated by the Chicago Railways Company and approved by the Federal court and by the city of Chicago, and the petition then alleges that on February 25, 1908, the special master commissioner, acting under order of the Federal court, conveyed the property thus purchased by the said committee to the Chicago Railways Company, as the assignee and successor in interest of the said committee. The petition alleges that thereafter, on or about June 1, 1908, default was made in the payment of interest on certain bonds of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company, and foreclosure proceedings were brought in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois to foreclose the mortgage securing said bonds, and receivers were appointed; that on October 6, 1910, a decree of foreclosure was entered and a sale of all the property of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company was directed; that [93] accordingly, on November 30, 1910, all the property of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company was sold at public auction under said decree to one Andrew Cooke, acting for and on behalf of the Chicago Railways Company; that thereafter, on or about December 27, 1910, Andrew Cooke filed in said cause his petition asking that a portion of the property purchased by him at said sale be transferred to the Chicago Railways Company and the remainder thereof to the County Traction Company, which had been organized under the laws of this State on May 21, 1910, for the purpose of constructing, owning, purchasing, leasing or otherwise acquiring street railways in Cook county and in the cities, villages and municipalities of said county; that the court, upon the report of the special master as to said sale and upon the petition of Andrew Cooke, on December 27, 1910, ordered that the report be approved and the sale confirmed, and that the special master make conveyance of the property as Andrew Cooke might direct; that accordingly, by direction of Andrew Cooke, the special master on December 27, 1910, conveyed all the street railway property of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company within the limits of the city of Chicago to the Chicago Railways Company, and all the remainder of the property of said company, being that portion without the city of Chicago and including the lines of railway in the village of Oak Park, to the County Traction Company.

From the petition it appears that the terminal or transfer points between the lines of street railway operated by the Chicago Railways Company and its predecessors and the lines of street railway operated under the name of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company which extended into and through the village of Oak Park, were within the city of Chicago until the conveyances of December 27, 1910, above mentioned, were made, but that thereafter the terminal or transfer points between the railways operated by the Chicago Railways Company and those operated by [94] the County Traction Company were on the line between the city of Chicago and the village of Oak Park.

With reference to the incorporation of the County Traction Company, and the acquisition, on December 27, 1910, of the lines of street railway formerly operated by the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company outside the city of Chicago, including the lines in the village of Oak Park, the petition alleges that the County Traction Company was organized at the instance of the Chicago Railways Company and is virtually an agency or subsidiary thereof; that it is entirely controlled and dominated by the Chicago Railways Company and has no separate corporate existence or autonomy but is a mere dependency of the Chicago Railways Company, organized for the purpose of endeavoring to aid that company in escaping from its legal duties and obligations.

The petition alleges that the Chicago Railways Company having on February 25, 1908, acquired title to and possession of the street car properties formerly operated by the West Chicago Street Railroad Company, the North Chicago Street Railroad Company, the Chicago Passenger Railway Company, the Chicago Union Traction Company, and the subsidiary or suburban companies mentioned in Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Chicago, 199 Ill. 579, 65 N. E. 470, as having been merged in the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company, became, in law, liable for all the obligations of its predecessors, and accordingly, and in apparent recognition of this situation, continued to operate the lines of street railway in Oak Park and the connecting lines in the city of Chicago in substantially the same way they had been operated by the Chicago Union Traction Company and its receivers, and observed substantially all the conditions and provisions of the ordinance of June 4, 1903, securing to passengers a trip between the loop district in the city of Chicago and the village of Oak Park for one fare, until on or about December 27, 1910, when, [95] without any notice to the public authorities of the village of Oak Park, it suddenly discontinued this service and proceeded to carry passengers to the city limits of the city of Chicago and there compelled them to transfer and to pay an additional fare when they passed the city limits, and that since that time the Chicago Railways Company and the County Traction Company have refused to comply with the requirements of section 3 of the said ordinance of June 4, 1903, and insist upon charging two fares, of five cents each, for a trip between any point in the village of Chicago and any point in the village of Oak Park, wherefore the petitioner seeks a writ of mandamus against the Chicago Railways Company and the County Traction Company, as hereinbefore stated.

On May 17, 1911, by consent of all the parties, the cause was transferred from the circuit court to the superior court of Cook county, and on May 19, 1911, the city of Chicago was made a defendant to the petition, on the theory that by virtue of the terms and provisions of the ordinances under which the Chicago Railways Company was operating its street railway system in the city of Chicago the city was a necessary party to the proceeding. The Chicago Railways Company, the County Traction Company and the city of Chicago answered the petition, but as the cause, so far as the Chicago Railways Company and the city of Chicago are concerned, was finally determined upon the facts set forth in a plea thereafter filed, and as the rights of the County Traction Company are not involved upon this writ of error, it will not be necessary to mention any of the matters contained in the answers.

On April 2, 1913, the Chicago Railways Company filed a plea to the petition, which was adopted by the city of Chicago, in which it was alleged that on March 18, 1913, the city council of the city of Chicago passed an ordinance, which was thereafter, on March 20, 1913, signed by the mayor and accepted by the Chicago Railways Company, [96] authorizing the Chicago Railways Company to enter into an operating agreement with the County Traction Company with reference to the use of certain tracks in the town of Cicero, section 8 of this ordinance being as follows:

"Sec. 8. The consent, permission and authority hereby granted are so granted upon the express condition that the Chicago Railways Company shall not carry on any of its lines of railway in the city of Chicago or on any line authorized to be operated hereunder, without the payment of a cash fare to it, as provided by the ordinance of February 11, 1907, herein referred to, any passenger presenting a transfer issued on any line of street railway outside the limits of the city of Chicago, or carry any passenger over its said lines who has not paid a cash fare to it, on any transfer or transfers issued on any other lines of street railway, except such transfers as are expressly provided for and authorized by said ordinance of February 11, 1907, or the amendatory ordinance of October 10, 1910. Nor shall said Chicago Railways Company issue to any passengers transported on its lines within said city or on the lines authorized to be operated hereunder, any transfers entitling such passengers to be carried on any other lines of street railway, except such transfers as are expressly provided for and authorized by said ordinance of February 11, 1907, or said amendatory ordinance, and the aforesaid resolution or ordinance of the board of trustees of the town of Cicero shall expressly recite this provision of this ordinance: Provided, however, that it is not intended hereby to change, add to or detract from the said ordinances of February 11, 1907, and October 10, 1910, except as therein and thereby provided."

The plea sets forth the ordinance of February 11, 1907, and the ordinance of October 10, 1910, referred to in said section 8 of the ordinance of March 18, 1913, and a certain release executed in compliance with the ordinance of October 10, 1910. Among other provisions, the ordinance [97] of February 11, 1907, provides that the Chicago Railways Company shall be entitled to charge a fare of five cents for a continuous trip in one general direction, within the present or future limits of the city, over its street railways covered by the ordinance and all extensions thereof, whether owned, leased or operated by it, and that the company's obligation to pay the city fifty-five per cent of the net receipts from the operation of the system of street railways authorized by the ordinance is based upon its right to charge and receive the said rate of fare. It also provides that the Chicago Railways Company, at all times during the life of the grant, shall secure to passengers the same right of transfer between its lines and the connecting lines of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company for continuous travel in one general direction, for a single fare, within the limits of the city of Chicago as if the lines of the Chicago Railways Company and the lines of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company were owned and operated by the Chicago Railways Company under the provisions of the ordinance.

By the ordinance of October 10, 1910, it was recited that the receivers of the Chicago

Consolidated Traction Company and of certain of its grantor and lessor companies were then maintaining and operating a system of street railways in certain streets and public ways in the north and west divisions of the city of Chicago, but that the right of said companies and of their receivers to maintain and operate important parts of such system had expired by virtue of the limitations and conditions of the ordinances applicable thereto, and that the right to maintain and operate other portions of said system would soon expire, and that the system was not then being operated so as to furnish adequate or proper street car service upon the streets and public ways on which such system was then located. The ordinance then refers to the provisions in the ordinance of February 11, 1907, reserving to the city the [98] right at any time to require the Chicago Railways Company to make extensions of and additions to the lines of street railway expressly authorized by that ordinance, and recites that the city desires and has determined to require the Chicago Railways Company to extend street railway lines in, upon and over said streets and public ways then occupied, without license or franchise from the city, by the said consolidated system. The ordinance authorizes and requires the Chicago Railways Company to construct, maintain and operate, in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance of February 11, 1907, extensions of and additions to its lines of street railway in, upon and along certain street in the city particularly designated in the ordinance, and including all streets and portions of streets in the city upon and along which were located those lines of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company specified in section 3 of the said ordinance of June 4, 1903, of the village of Oak Park. The ordinance of October 10, 1910, also provided that for the purpose of complying with its terms and provisions the Chicago Railways Company was thereby authorized to acquire all the street railway property that was located in said streets and public ways of the city of Chicago belonging to or claimed by the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company or its receivers, together with the equipment thereof, and that such property should be acquired free and clear from all liens and claims of every description, including the release, waiver or extinguishment of all and every right and claim, of every kind and nature, in respect to the location, maintenance or operation of street railways in the said streets or public ways of the city then vested or claimed to be vested in or to belong to the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company and other companies mentioned, including the Cicero and Proviso Street Railway Company, or in the receivers of any of said companies. It was further provided that during the period of the grant the Chicago Railways Company should [99] sell tickets at the rate of five cents each, which should entitle the holder to one continuous ride, either way, to or from any lawful stopping place in the city of Chicago at or east of Austin avenue (Austin avenue being the boundary line between the city of Chicago and the village of Oak Park on the west) on the Chicago avenue line, and Madison street, Lake street and Forty-eighth avenue lines (those being the lines formerly operated by the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company over which passengers from the village of Oak Park were required to travel in order to reach the loop district of the city of Chicago), from and to any station on the Lake Street Elevated railroad and the Union Elevated railroad.

The plea further alleges that at the time of the passage of the ordinance of October 10, 1910, and until December 27, 1910, all the property of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company within and without the city was, and had been since June 24, 1908, in the possession of and was being operated by receivers appointed by the Federal court, but that upon the execution, on December 27, 1910, of the deeds referred to in the petition, possession of the property of the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company within the city of Chicago was delivered to the Chicago Railways Company and possession of that lying without the city was delivered to the County Traction Company. The plea further alleges that after the execution of said deeds the Chicago Railways Company, pursuant to the requirements of the ordinance of October 10, 1910, by a written instrument filed with the city, released to the city all the rights and claims in respect to location, maintenance and operation of street railways in the streets of Chicago vested or claimed to be vested in the Chicago Consolidated Traction Company and its grantor or lessor companies.

Thereafter, on April 2, 1913, the petitioner filed a replication to the plea, alleging that on March 10, 1913, the [100] city council of the city of Chicago passed an ordinance which had been on February 24, 1913, reported to the council by the local transportation committee, which was in all respects identical with the ordinance set up in the plea as having been passed on March 18, 1913, except that section 8 of said ordinance did not contain the proviso appended to said section in words and figures following: "Provided, however, that it is not intended hereby to change, add to or detract from the ordinances of February 11, 1907, and October 10, 1910, except as therein and thereby provided;" that thereupon counsel concerned in this case on behalf of the petitioner, on March 12, 1913, saw the mayor of the city and various members of the committee on local transportation regarding said ordinance, and that accordingly, on March 13, 1913, the mayor caused to be addressed to W. R. Moss, counsel for the petitioner, a communication, which is set out in full in the replication. The substance of this communication is that the clause of which Moss had complained (section 8) was inserted in the ordinance to protect the city against any conditions unprovided for in the ordinance of February 11, 1907, which would reduce the city's income from fifty-five per cent of the net receipts of the Chicago Railways Company; that the mayor did not feel justified in vetoing the ordinance, and that the corporation counsel did not agree with the contention of Moss that the interchange of transfers between the Chicago Railways Company and the County Traction Company would not affect the income of the city as fixed by the ordinance of 1907, and that the corporation counsel did not regard the insertion of section 8 in the ordinance as finally settling the controversy in the courts. The replication then alleges that thereafter, on March 18, there was a meeting of the committee on local transportation, at which Eugene Block, presiding, called the attention of the committee to section 8 of the ordinance passed by the city council on March 10, 1913, and that the following proceedings [101] were had, as appears from a stenographic report taken at the direction of the committee.

The chairman caused to be read a letter addressed by him to the corporation counsel of the city of Chicago under date of March 12, asking whether section 8 of the ordinance, as passed on March 10, strengthens the case of the Chicago Railways Company in any degree in the suits pending in the courts for a five-cent fare to the western suburbs, and caused to be read the reply of the corporation counsel thereto, under date of March 13, to the effect that section 8 consists perfectly with the terms of the ordinances of February 11, 1907, and October 10, 1910, and neither adds to nor detracts from the prior ordinances but simply reiterates what was said in the prior ordinances and adheres thereto. After a discussion between certain members of the committee and a representative of the village of Oak Park and an assistant corporation counsel of the city of Chicago, the representative of the village presented an amendment which he claimed would relieve section 8 of its objectionable feature, and read from the opinion of Judge Foell rendered in disposing of a demurrer, in which he held that the ordinances of February 11, 1907, and October 10, 1910, did not prohibit the relief in this case. Alderman Long, one of the members of the committee, then asked the assistant corporation counsel whether the amendment presented by the representative of the village was desirable, and the assistant corporation counsel replied that it was not desirable from a legal point of view, and that it would be better to defeat the ordinance than to adopt that amendment,—that the amendment would not protect the city's rights. Alderman Long then stated that the committee did not want to act contrary to the advice of the corporation counsel. The representative of the village then stated that the corporation counsel understood that the city council desired to assist the Chicago Railways Company to win the cases. Alderman Long replied that [102] they did not want to legislate the villages out of court, and asked the assistant corporation counsel if he could not prepare an amendment that would not legislate the villages out of court, and whether there was any objection to an amendment which, so far as pending litigation was concerned, would leave the parties just where they were before. The assistant corporation counsel replied that there was no objection to that, and in his opinion the ordinance as theretofore passed accomplished that very thing. Alderman Long then stated that he did not think they should do anything that would throw the villages out of court, and the assistant corporation counsel replied that the villages were already thrown out by the 1907 ordinance. Alderman Long then suggested that the assistant corporation counsel prepare an amendment as he thought it ought to be and that the committee would indorse it. Shortly afterwards the secretary of the committee read a communication from the assistant corporation counsel which was accompanied by a proposed amendment to said section 8 and which the communication stated was in accordance with the request made by Alderman Long. The amendment prepared by the assistant corporation counsel and thus transmitted to the committee was the proviso to said section 8 as it appears in the ordinance of March 18.

The replication then alleges that on March 18, at the meeting of the city council, Eugene Block moved to reconsider the vote by which the council, at its last preceding meeting, passed said ordinance, which motion prevailed; that thereupon Alderman Block moved to amend said ordinance by adding said proviso to section 8, whereupon Stanley Kunz, a member of the council, arose and inquired the purpose of the proposed amendment; that the mayor, who was then presiding, directed that the amendment be read again, which was accordingly done, and that Alderman Kunz then stated that he did not understand the amendment, whereupon the mayor stated from the chair that it [103] had been suggested that the ordinance without the amendment might affect pending suits brought by western villages against the traction companies, and that the purpose of the amendment was to prevent the ordinance from prejudicing the rights of the towns in those cases; that thereupon Alderman Block arose and in substance repeated what had been said by the mayor, and after some further remarks (which are not set forth) the amendment was duly adopted, and that the said ordinance of March 18, 1913, was thus, and not otherwise, adopted by the unanimous vote of those present; all of which the petitioner is ready to verify.

The Chicago Railways Company and the city of Chicago filed general demurrers to the replication, which the court sustained, and the petitioner declining to plead further, the petition was dismissed as to the Chicago Railways Company and the city of Chicago and judgment was rendered in their favor for costs. In the meantime the name of the County Traction Company had been changed to Chicago and West Towns Railway Company, and the change in name had been brought to the attention of the court by the petitioner by an amendment to the petition, and subsequently, after a hearing, a writ of mandamus was awarded against the Chicago and West Towns Railway Company in accordance with the prayer of the petition. The petitioner has sued out this writ of error to reverse the judgment rendered in favor of the Chicago Railways Company and the city of Chicago.

The plea filed by the Chicago Railways Company setting up the ordinance of March 18, 1913, as a defense to the petition was, in effect, a plea puis darrein continuance. Under the law as it existed prior to the revision of the Practice act in 1907 this plea would have superseded the answer theretofore filed, and by operation of law the answer would have been stricken from the record and the matters set forth in the petition confessed. (East [104] St. Louis v. Renshaw, 153 Ill. 491, 38 N. E. 1048; People v. Kipley, 171 Ill. 44, 49 N. E. 229, 41 L.R.A. 775.) Section 50 of the Practice act now provides that the pleading of a plea puis darrein continuance shall not waive former pleas, so that rule no longer applies. Instead of demurring to the plea and thereby testing its sufficiency as a defense to the cause of action stated in the petition, plaintiff in error filed a replication admitting the facts stated in the plea but setting up new matters intended to avoid the legal effect of the plea as a defense to the petition. By filing the replication plaintiff in error conceded that the ordinance of March 18, 1913, operated as a bar to the relief sought by the petition unless the new matters set forth in the replication were sufficient to avoid the legal effect of the ordinance as a bar to the cause of action stated in the petition. (Chicago Great Western R. Co. v. People, 179 Ill. 441, 53 N. E. 986.) The Chicago Railways Company demurred to the replication, thereby admitting as true the new matters set forth in the replication but challenging their sufficiency to avoid the bar presented by the plea. The action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the replication amounted to a holding that the new matters set forth in the replication were not sufficient, in law, to avoid the bar presented by the plea, and this was the extent of the holding of the trial court in disposing of the case. The sufficiency of the plea as a defense to the petition was not presented to the court for determination, as no motion was made by plaintiff in error to carry the demurrer back to the plea. (Schofield v. Settle, 31 Ill. 515; Mix v. People, 86 Ill. 329; Scott v. Artman, 237 Ill. 394, 86 N. E. 595; Heimberger v. Elliott Frog, etc. Co. 245 Ill. 448, 92 N. E. 297; People v. Strawn, 265 Ill. 292, 106 N. E. 840.) The arguments of counsel in this court embrace numerous questions which were not involved in the trial court in passing upon the demurrer to the replication and which are therefore not before us for determination. The only question proper for us to consider is whether, conceding the ordinance of March 18, 1913, as set forth in the plea, to [105] be a bar to the relief sought by the petition, the new matters contained in the replication are sufficient, in law, to avoid the effect of that ordinance as a bar.

The new matters in the replication are set forth for the purpose of showing the intention of the city council in adopting section 8 of the ordinance of March 18, 1913, it being the contention of plaintiff in error that such new matters show that the city council did not by said section 8 intend to limit or enlarge the obligation of the Chicago Railways Company, under the ordinances of February 11, 1907, and October 10, 1910, to issue and accept transfers. The matters claimed to show such intention consist of certain letters read and statements made at a meeting of the committee on local transportation before the ordinance was submitted to the city council, and certain statements made at the session of the council at which the ordinance was passed. Whether these extraneous matters can be considered by the courts in construing section 8 of the ordinance of March 18, 1913, is the question presented to us for determination.

We have held that the rules for the construction of an ordinance are the same as those applied in the construction of a statute. (People v. Hummel, 215 Ill. 43, 74 N. E. 68; People v. Mohr, 252 Ill. 160, 96 N. E. 893.) It is a primary rule in the interpretation and construction of a statute that the intention of the legislature is to be ascertained and given effect. (People v. Price, 257 Ill. 587, Ann. Cas. 1914A 1154, 101 N. E. 196.) This rule does not, however, permit the courts to consider statements made by the author of a bill or by those interested in its passage, or by members of the legislature adopting the bill, showing the meaning or effect of the language used in the bill as understood by the person or persons making such statements. Thus, in Belleville, etc. R. Co. v. Gregory, 15 Ill. 20, 58 Am. Dec. 589, it was said: "Nor can the presumed or even well known views of all the members of the legislature be allowed to repeal an express provision of a law or to control [106] its construction. The law, alone, can speak the legislative will. When the courts shall be driven to the lobbies of the legislature to learn the sentiments of the members, for the purpose of construing the laws, a new rule of construction will have been adopted." Again, in Eddy v. Morgan, 216 Ill. 437, 75 N. E. 174, we said: "While journals and proceedings of the legislature are sometimes looked to in an endeavor to ascertain a proper construction of the statute, so that the court may have before it what is authentic that surrounded the enactment of the law, we are aware of no authority, and none has been pointed out, where the action of the lobby or the opinion of the legislators as individuals has been taken into account. In fact, we understand the rule to be otherwise and that such matters are inadmissible." In U. S. v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assoc. 166 U. S. 290, 17 S. Ct. 540, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 1007, the United States Supreme Court, in considering this subject, said: "There is, too, a general acquiescence in the doctrine that debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body. . . . The reason is that it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction was put upon an act by the members of a legislative body that passed it, by resorting to the speeches of individual members thereof. Those who did not speak may not have agreed with those who did, and those who spoke might differ from each other, the result being that the only proper way to construe a legislative act is from the language used in the act, and, upon occasion, by a resort to the history of the times when it was passed."

While the language used in the cases above cited was used as applicable to the construction of statutes generally, an additional reason exists for refusing to consider the opinions of members of the legislative body as to the meaning of the proposed enactment, where, as here, the enactment is not for the government of the public generally, [107] but is a proposition for a contract. In such cases justice to the party accepting the contract demands that the legislative intention be determined from a consideration of the enactment itself. Belleville, etc. R. Co. v. Gregory, supra.

The principal matters intended to show the meaning of said section 8 as contended for by plaintiff in error, are the letters read and the statements made at the meeting of the local transportation committee. A further reason exists why these matters cannot be considered by the courts in construing that section. The ordinance was passed by the city council,—not by the local transportation committee,—and it does not appear from the replication that any of the correspondence referred to or any of the statements made at the meeting of the committee on local transportation were brought to the attention of the city council when the proposed ordinance of March 18, 1913, was submitted to the council. It is the intention of the city council which the courts must endeavor to determine,—not the intention of the members of some committee having the proposed ordinance before them for consideration before it was presented to the council. So far as this record discloses, the courts, in construing said section 8, are limited to the language used in the section; considered in connection with the situation existing between the Chicago Railways Company, the village of Oak Park and the city of Chicago at the time the ordinance was passed, which situation was fully disclosed by the petition and plea.

The replication set forth no new matters proper to be considered in construing said section 8. The demurrer thereto was therefore properly sustained.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Rehearing denied December 9, 1915.

NOTE.

Opinions, Acts, etc. of Members of Council as Aid to Interpretation of Ordinance.

In those cases wherein the question has arisen as to the admissibility of the acts, opinions or statements of members of a municipal council as an aid to the construction of an ordinance, the courts have applied the rules and principles applicable to the analogous cases arising with respect to members of legislatures. For a discussion of the cases of the latter class see the note to Tennant v. Kuhlemeier, 19 Ann. Cas. 1026.

It has been held that the acts and statements of the members of a municipal council at the time of the passage of an ordinance cannot be considered by courts in ascertaining the meaning thereof. Barnes v. Mobile, 19 Ala. 707. And see the reported case wherein it is held that the foregoing rule should particularly be applied where the ordinance is a proposition for a contract and not for the government of the public generally, for under such circumstances it is said that justice to the party accepting the contract demands that the intention of the enacting body shall be determined from a consideration of the enactment itself. In Barnes v. Mobile, supra, the court said: "It is for the court to construe the ordinance and gather the intention of the law-maker from the law itself, and not from the contemporaneous avowals of the individual law-makers."

The testimony or opinions of individual members of a municipal council are not admissible for the purpose of showing what in fact was intended or meant by an ordinance. The meaning is to be found from the language used. Vermillion v. Northwestern Telephone Exch. Co. 189 Fed. 289, 111 C. C. A. 21. See also Ex parte Goodrich, 160 Cal. 410, 117 Pac. 451, Ann. Cas. 1913A 56. In the case first cited it was said: "The meaning of municipal ordinances, like other legislative acts, must be ascertained from their language. The record of debates in Congress is official and contemporaneous with the acts to which they relate, and yet they are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body." . . . Much less can the private and undisclosed views of members of a city council be received, years after an ordinance is passed, and after litigation has arisen, to explain its scope or qualify its meaning. We must, therefore, find the meaning of this resolution in its language alone."

PEOPLE

v.

GIBBS.

Michigan Supreme Court—June 7, 1915.

186 Mich. 127; 152 N. W. 1053.

Municipal Corporations — Reasonableness of Ordinance — Judicial Review.

Whether an ordinance is reasonable, and within the discretionary power of the municipal authorities, is a judicial question.

Presumption of Reasonableness.

City licensing and regulation ordinances are primarily presumed to be reasonable unless the contrary appear on their face, but if the inherent character of their provisions appear to be unreasonable, the courts must declare such provisions void.

Motives of Municipal Council.

Since courts will not inquire into the motives which actuate the members of the legislative body in passing an ordinance, whether an ordinance regulating public auctions was passed to benefit special interests cannot be considered.

[See note at end of this case.]

Reasonableness of Ordinance — Evidence of Extrinsic Facts.

In certiorari to review a judgment based upon a city ordinance, evidence as to its reasonableness as applied to the subject-matter or local conditions is admissible.

Auctions — Validity of Regulation.

An ordinance of the city of Detroit prohibited the holding of public auctions except between the hours of 8 A.M. and 6 P.M., and also prohibited the use of musical instruments or cries to attract the attention of the public thereto. Defendant, being convicted of a violation of such ordinance, brought certiorari to determine its constitutionality. It is held that the prohibition in the ordinance being neither necessary nor proper for the public welfare or protection of society, it was a discrimination in restraint of trade and an unreasonable regulation.

Certiorari to Recorder's Court of Detroit: CONNOLLY, Judge.

Lipman A. Gibbs convicted of violating city ordinance and brings certiorari. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

William E. Tarsney and Richard I. Lawson for People.

Doyle & Cameron for respondent.

[128] STEELE, J.—Defendant seeks here by certiorari to review and reverse on constitutional grounds a judgment rendered in the recorder's court of the city of Detroit convicting him of violating an ordinance of said city entitled "An ordinance to license and regulate auctioneers and auctions held within the city of Detroit." The particular provision of said ordinance, under which he was convicted (section 12a) so far as directly material here, reads thus:

[129] "No such person doing business as a duly licensed auctioneer shall operate a public auction room, or sell goods at public auction, within the meaning of this ordinance, except on week days between the hours of 8 A. M. and 6 P. M. Any person convicted of a violation of the provisions of this section shall be fined," etc.—with resulting imprisonment in case of failure to pay said fine.

Section 12 of said ordinance, with which appellant contends section 12a should be construed, is as follows:

"SEC. 12. Noises Prohibited. No bellman or crier, nor any drum or fife, or other instrument of music nor any show signal or means of attracting the attention of the public, other than a sign or flag, shall be employed, or suffered or permitted to be used in connection with any auction sale at or near any place of such sale, or at or near any auction room."

The objections urged and argued against said conviction, as set out in appellant's brief, are as follows:

"(1) The court erred in refusing to rule that the power of the common council of the city of Detroit granted by the charter to license and regulate auctioneers is not sufficient authority to authorize the common council to prohibit auction sales entirely between the hours of 6 o'clock P. M. and 8 o'clock A. M.

"(2) The court erred in refusing to rule that section 12a of the ordinance in question when construed with section 12 thereof and other sections of said ordinance discloses great want of reasonableness and hence is invalid.

"(3) The court erred in refusing to rule that section 12a of the ordinance apart from its connection with section 12 is clearly unreasonable, unfair and partial in its operation, and hence invalid. It cannot be by its terms sustained as a legitimate exercise of the police power.

"(4) The court erred in refusing to rule that this ordinance is in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of this State."

[130] We do not understand any serious question is or can be raised as to the general power of the city under its charter to enact an ordinance to license and regulate auctioneers and auctions held within its limits, and therein prescribe such regulations as are necessary and appropriate in that connection to eliminate fraud, and protect the public from annoyance and imposition.

Divested of auxiliary elaborations, the substance of defendant's grievance is that the provision of the ordinance prohibiting auction sales in the evening after 6 o'clock, during customary evening business hours, is unreasonable and invalid, and is beyond the city's power of regulation, which is limited to protection of public safety, health, and welfare, to which objects this prohibition has no real and substantial relation.

The facts in this record are few and concise, briefly establishing without dispute that defendant was a duly licensed auctioneer, and, on February 14, 1914, the same being a week day, did business as an auctioneer and sold goods at public auction after 6 P. M. at 51 Monroe avenue in said city.

This does not purport to be an ordinance for revenue or to prohibit, but one within the police power, enacted to license, regulate, and control for the public welfare a calling or occupation of that class recognized as peculiarly requiring surveillance for the reason that when unrestrained their inherent tendency is often towards dishonest and annoying methods, inimical to the quiet, good order and general welfare of a community. When rightly conducted, the business of an auctioneer is regarded not only as a legitimate calling, but often as a useful and important line of vending in the sum total of business activities. The question therefore arises: Does this provision of the ordinance pass the limit of the power of reasonable regulation?

[131] In reviewing section 12a, which gives rise to the question, it is proper not only to take into consideration section 12, as urged by counsel for appellant, but also the entire ordinance and any fact or matter disclosed by the record which may throw light upon the contention. This ordinance, considered as a whole as originally enacted, is an unusually comprehensive, well worded, logically arranged, and readily understood piece of municipal legislation, keeping well within the scope of its title and the legislative power of the enacting body. It is confined and devoted strictly to the one general object and purpose of authorizing and regulating the business of auctioneering, and to that end licensing certain qualified persons to conduct auction sales, with the well known and generally understood evils attending such business when unrestrained, enumerated, and prohibited. It provides for licensing, as auctioneers, persons of good character, who must pay a stated license fee and give a bond in the sum of $1,000 to faithfully observe all provisions of applicable ordinances, with two freehold sureties, or a surety company, to be approved by the mayor, and imposes proper punishment for engaging in the business without a license. Among its salient restrictions are the following: The purchaser of jewelry of specified kinds at any auction held by a licensed auctioneer may within five days from the date of the sale return the same if not of the quality represented, when, upon demand, the auctioneer must return the purchase price of the article so purchased, he and his bondsmen being liable therefor; in case of refusal the auctioneer becomes liable to forfeit his license and pay a fine of from $25 to $100; as a further safeguard he is prohibited from closing the place of sale, for the purpose of avoiding an offer to return such articles, during the five days following such sale; substitution of any article in lieu of one sold; making [132] any false representation or statement as to the ownership or character of property offered for sale or as to the poverty of the owner; offering for sale goods, wares, and merchandise falsely representing or pretending them to be in whole or in part bankrupt stock, damaged goods or goods saved from fire; the making of any false representation as to the previous history or character of goods offered for sale; receiving for sale goods from any minor; "down-hill" selling, or offering an article at a high price and then offering the same at successive lower prices; conducting any auction sale of personal property in any street, avenue, alley, or public place in the city; and the use of bellmen, criers, musical instruments, etc., as specified in section 12 already quoted, are all strictly prohibited, with punishment by fine and cancellation of the license of any auctioneer violating any of these provisions.

With these safeguards thrown around the business, in what particular are the provisions of section 12a, prohibiting evening sales, related to, or necessary for, the preservation of public health, peace and safety? There is no evidence showing, and nothing is pointed out in this record which indicates what special wrong to the public would or could result from auctions during business hours after 6 P. M., when conducted according to the requirements of said ordinance, justifying their prohibition as a necessary police regulation. The most to be claimed is that such is to be inferred from the provisions of the enactment itself, because power to legislate upon the subject has been conferred upon the city council whose members are better able to judge the necessities to which local conditions give rise, and the discretion, or judgment, of that body rather than of the court should control.

Courts do not substitute their discretion for that of municipal authorities acting within the scope of discretionary [133] powers conferred upon them; yet it is settled textbook law that the question of whether an ordinance is reasonable and within the range of conferred discretionary power is always for the courts to determine. 2 Dill. on Mun. Corp. (5th ed.) § 589; Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 22 Am. Rep. 71; People v. Detroit United R. Co. 134 Mich. 682, 97 N. W. 36, 104 Am. St. Rep. 626, 63 L.R.A. 746.

"Where the power to legislate upon a given subject is conferred, but the mode of its exercise is not prescribed, the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof must be a reasonable exercise of the power, or it will be pronounced invalid." People v. Armstrong, 73 Mich. 288, 41 N. W. 275, 2 L.R.A. 721, 16 Am. St. Rep. 578.

"It is quite possible that some things have a greater tendency to produce danger and disorder in the cities than in smaller towns or rural places. This may justify reasonable precautionary measures, but nothing further; and no inference can extend beyond the fair scope of powers granted for such a purpose, and no grant of absolute discretion to suppress lawful action altogether can be granted at all. . . . It is lawful to provide for dealing with the mischief, but it is not lawful to go beyond reasonable measures and precautions in anticipating it." In re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396, 30 N. W. 72, 6 Am. St. Rep. 310.

This ordinance in its general scheme is within the grant of police power conferred upon the city to license and regulate the business of auctioneering, and such ordinances are primarily presumed to be reasonable unless the contrary appear on their face; but if the inherent character of any of its provisions appear upon the face of an ordinance to be unreasonable, or if upon a state of facts shown it so appears, the courts must declare such unreasonable provisions void. The only state of facts shown here is that respondent, a duly qualified and licensed auctioneer, therefore of good character and under bonds, sold goods at auction in a certain place of business after [134] 6 o'clock in the evening. No other misconduct or violation of the ordinance is charged or shown, and presumably the business was otherwise conducted honestly, without fraud or misrepresentation as to the goods offered and sold, off the street, without bellman, crier, or other prohibited noises and in general compliance with restrictions specified in the ordinance. In what manner the business so conducted did, or could, at that particular time of the day, annoy or disturb the public, or menace the peace, good order, health, or welfare of the community more than before 6 o'clock, or more than other lines of business carried on at the same time, is not shown or suggested.

The provision in question (section 12a) is an amendment to a municipal by-law enacted under a delegated police power of the State granted to license and regulate. Its validity is to be tested by the following limitations as stated by Justice Brown, defining the police power of the State in Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 137, 14 Sup. Ct. 499, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 385:

"To justify the State in thus interposing its authority in behalf of the public, it must appear, first, that the interests of the public generally, as distinguished from those of a particular class, require such interference; and, second, that the means are reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose, and not unduly oppressive upon individuals. The legislature may not under the guise of protecting the public interests, arbitrarily interfere with private business, or impose unusual and unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. In other words, its determination as to what is a proper exercise of its police powers is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts."

The contention that this amendment was enacted for the purpose of protecting or benefiting special interests and was inspired by other motives than guarding the general welfare is immaterial and cannot be considered here. Courts are not concerned with the [135] motives which actuate members of a legislative body in enacting a law, but in the results of their action. Bad motives might inspire a law which appeared on its face and proved valid and beneficial, while a bad and invalid law might be, and sometimes is, passed with good intent and the best of motives.

"Nothing is better settled than the rule that the motives of a legislature or of the members cannot be inquired into, for the purpose of determining the validity of laws." People v. Gardner, 143 Mich. 104, 106 N. W. 541.

Entirely apart from all question of motive we are impressed that, with the meager facts shown here, and upon its face, section 12a, necessarily treated as a part of the ordinance and considered in that relation, is a discriminatory and unreasonable interference with the freedom of trade beyond any necessities of the case, does not appear upon its face, and is not shown to be a necessary means to an end within the police power of public protection, and is therefore without the legitimate field of reasonable regulation.

Auctioneering, honestly conducted, is a business within the legitimate scope of trade, traffic or merchandizing. When by ordinance all fraud and misrepresentation in effecting sales and when all questionable methods of attracting attention or conducting sales, which are recognized as likely to develop in that special line of business, and which may tend to public annoyance, imposition, and disturbance of public peace and safety of a community, have been guarded against and prohibited, further restriction extends beyond the fair scope of powers granted to regulate for the protection of society. Though no directly controlling case in this court is found, we are satisfied that the reasoning and views expressed in cases where plainly analogous principles are involved tend towards the foregoing conclusions.

[136] Cases cited from other jurisdictions where the question has arisen cannot be entirely reconciled. In Butte v. Paltrovich, 30 Mont. 18, 75 Pac. 521, 104 Am. St. Rep. 698, an ordinance which made it unlawful to keep open and transact business in a pawnshop, loan office, or second-hand store after 6 o'clock in the evening, except the evening preceding a legal holiday, was sustained as within the Ann. Cas. 1917B.—53.

police power. That short ordinance, consisting of but one section, besides a concluding penal and repealing clause, contained no other regulating provisions, and it was shown that under the circumstances there was no discrimination in the particular complained of, as all other places in that city were accustomed to close for the day at 8 P. M.

In Hyman v. Boldrick, 153 Ky. 77, 154 S. W. 369, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1039, a short ordinance regulating pawnbrokers, second-hand dealers, junk merchants or junk dealers, similar in its provisions to the Montana case, was held to be a reasonable restriction. In support of and disclosing reason for the restriction it was shown that in the city (Louisville) there were many petty thieves difficult of detection in a city of its size, that:

"Thieves resort to second-hand stores especially at night to dispose of stolen goods, and as they do this under cover of darkness, it is almost impossible to apprehend them. Housebreakers and other thieves follow their calling usually under cover of darkness and when they get booty, try to dispose of it as soon as possible. If the second-hand stores are not allowed to remain open at night, they will be more easily detected, as they can safely carry things in the darkness which the police could detect in the daylight, and when property has been once sold to a second-hand dealer it is often difficult to find the thief." 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1040.

The case at bar is destitute of any proof even suggesting [137] any reason for the provision in question. It is recognized in this State that evidence bearing upon the reasonableness or unreasonableness of an ordinance, as applied to the subject-matter or to local conditions, is admissible (People v. Detroit United Ry. 134 Mich. 682, 97 N. W. 36, 63 L.R.A. 746, 104 Am. St. Rep. 626); but no such evidence was produced here.

Most directly analogous in facts to this case of any cited in briefs, or found, is Hayes v. Appleton, 24 Wis. 542, in which an ordinance that no licensed auctioneer should "sell any goods, wares, or merchandize after sundown," was held upon its face to be unreasonable as not manifesting any beneficial purpose within the meaning of the charter; therefore unconstitutional and void. What other provisions the ordinance contained is not shown by the published report. It was there said in part:

"It is not shown in the case what evil was to be prevented or good promoted by the passage of the ordinance in question; nor can we judicially see that any restriction of the kind was necessary. No cause for it, whether good or bad, is even suggested in the brief submitted by counsel for the city; and it is impossible for us to conjecture that any sufficient one existed. . . . And so, too, it might be proper to restrain such sales on particular days or at particular places; or, if the manner of conducting them was particularly objectionable, to prescribe how they should be conducted."

Here the ordinance does prescribe the manner of conducting them, and that the place shall not be in a public street or alley.

In harmony with and sustaining the general principles governing the Hayes case, Justice Marshall later, in State v. Redmon, 134 Wis. 89, 114 N. W. 137, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 229, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 15 Ann. Cas. 408, exhaustively discussed [138] the limitations, rules, and controlling elements of the police power, under which citizens may be restrained for the general good in their pleasures and business activities. This case was cited with approval and freely quoted from in Dougherty v. Thomas, 174 Mich. 371, 140 N. W. 615, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 699, Ann. Cas. 1915A 1163.

We are unable to discern from this record that section 12a was proper or necessary for the public welfare, or the protection of society; it does not appear, and certainly is not a matter of common knowledge, that the business of a licensed auctioneer of good character, under bond, is a menace to public peace, health, or safety when properly conducted, in his place of business, during general business hours, or that the excluded hours would be more disturbed by such business, than those which are not. This attempt to prohibit it during a portion of business hours without any disclosed, special reason therefore, impresses us as a discrimination in restraint of trade, and an unreasonable regulation, beyond the limits of police power conferred upon the municipality to license and regulate.

The judgment is reversed.

Brooke, C.J., and McAlvay, Kuhn, Stone, Ostrander, Bird, and Moore, JJ., concurred.

NOTE.

Judicial Inquiry into Motives Prompting Enactment of Legislative Ordinances.

The question of judicial inquiry into the motives prompting the enactment of legislative ordinances is considered at length in the note to Gardiner v. Bluffton, Ann. Cas. 1912A 713. The present note is confined to a discussion of the more recent decisions passing on that question.

The general rule that the motives which prompted the legislative branch of the state or federal government in exercising its legislative powers cannot be judicially inquired into, has in several recent cases been held to be applicable to the legislative bodies of municipalities. Hadacheck v. Alexander, 169 Cal. 616, 147 Pac. 259; Murphy v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 247 Ill. 614, 93 N. E. 381; Higgins v. Lacroix, 119 Minn. 145, 137 N. W. 417, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 737; Douglass v. Greenville, 92 S. C. 374, 75 S. E. 687, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 958; Knoxville v. Heiskell, 2 Tenn. Civ. App. 459. And see the reported case.

The rule has been applied where the ordinance in question provided for the regulation of business. Hadacheck v. Alexander, 169 Cal. 616, 147 Pac. 259 (brickmaking); Higgins v. Lacroix, 119 Minn. 145, 137 N. W. 417, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 737 (theatres); Douglass v. Greenville, 92 S. C. 374, 75 S. E. 687, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 958 (livery feed and sale stables). And see the reported case (auctioneers and auctions). In Higgins v. Lacroix, supra, the court said: "We think evidence of the motives of the individual members of the village council in passing the ordinance was erroneously received. Legislative acts would rest on insecure ground, indeed, if admissions of the individual legislators that the attainment of a nonpermissible or unlawful end was the motive and purpose in enacting a law are to be received in evidence and be considered by the courts when called to pass on their validity. . . . Manifestly it ought to be beyond the power of one who has been intrusted with authority to enact a law to impeach the same by any subsequent statement of secret or avowed motives entertained at the time of its passage that would work its invalidity."

The rule has also been applied to an ordinance providing for the vacation of a street. Murphy v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 247 Ill. 614, 93 N. E. 381. In that case the court said: "It is said that the members of the council, in the passage of the ordinance, were controlled by a corrupt motive. An ordinance passed by a city council, in the exercise of the legislative powers conferred upon it, for the purposes of police regulation or municipal government, cannot be impeached by an inquiry into the motives of the members of the council who voted for it. If within the legislative power granted to the council, a court cannot declare an ordinance invalid on account of the improper motives which induced its passage. It is a well-known rule of law that the knowledge and good faith of a legislature are not open to question and its motives cannot be inquired into. Courts must always assume that the legislative discretion has been properly exercised. . . . We know of no reason why the same rule should not govern in the case of the exercise of legislative power granted to a city council. . . . The ordinance was a valid exercise of the power of the city council. The motives for its passage cannot be inquired into."

In Knoxville v. Heiskell, 2 Tenn. Civ. App. 459, the rule was applied with reference to certain ordinances of the city of Knoxville, fixing the salaries of members of the police or fire department on a sliding scale, or scale varying with the length of service of the members of the departments affected.

HOUSER

v.

FAYSSOUX ET AL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—December 9, 1914.

168 N. Car. 1; 83 S. E. 692.

Bills and Notes — Notice of Dishonor — Accommodation.

Accommodation indorsers of a note are entitled to notice of dishonor.

Notice to Directors Indorsing Note of Corporation.

That accommodation indorsers of a note are directors of the corporation, which is the maker, and constitute a majority of the board of directors, does not deprive them of right to notice of dishonor.

[See note at end of this case.]

Renewal — What Constitutes — Part Payment.

A payment by the maker on a note before the bar of the statute does not operate as a renewal of the note as to mere accommodation indorsers, though it does as to sureties, as well as the maker.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gaston county: SHAW, Judge.

Action by Evon L. Houser, administrator, plaintiff, against T. M. Fayssoux et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

One day after date we promise to pay J. B. White or his order the sum of $2,000, for value received of him, interest at 6 per cent per annum from 1 July, 1902.

This the 2d day of July, 1902.

DALLAS COTTON MILLS,

(Seal)

J. R. LEWIS, President.

Attest: J. D. MOORE, Secretary and Treasurer.

[2] The defendants indorsed this note by writing their names on the back before delivery to plaintiff's intestate, said defendants being directors of Dallas Cotton Mills. The interest on the note was paid by the corporation semiannually to 1 July, 1910. On 1 October, 1910, $100 was paid by the corporation, and similar payments 15 November, 1910, and 1 February, 1911.

At the conclusion of the evidence the court rendered judgment for the defendants dismissing the action, and the plaintiff appealed.

S. J. Durham and F. I. Osborne for appellant.

Mason & Mason and Mangum & Woltz for appellees.

BROWN, J.—There are two defenses interposed: want of notice, of dishonor, statute of limitations. That the defendants were accommodation indorsers on the note sued on is admitted.

It appears that the defendants placed their signatures on the back of the note; that they were not otherwise parties to the note; and it not appearing that they intended to be bound in some other capacity, they became liable as indorsers and were entitled to notice of dishonor. J. W. Perry Co. v. Taylor, 148 N. C. 362, 62 S. E. 423; Eaton and Gilbert on Commercial Paper, sec. 108.

It is contended, however, that the defendants were directors of the cotton mills and, therefore, no notice of dishonor was required; and for this position the plaintiff cites Hull v. Myers, 90 Ga. 674, 16 S. E. 653.

It appears in the declaration in that case, and is admitted by the demurrer:

1. "That each of said directors so signing said notes did so as surety for the maker, and it was so understood and agreed between each of them;" and

2. "That the maker (the company) was 'utterly insolvent' at the time of the execution of the note."

The Court bases its decision upon these facts, and the inference from this opinion is that the Court would have decided the case differently if it had not been understood and agreed between the directors, who indorsed their names on the notes, that they were "doing so as sureties for the maker," or if the company had been solvent.

In the case at bar there was no understanding or agreement that the indorsers were signing the note in controversy as sureties, and there was no evidence tending to prove that the Dallas Cotton Mills was insolvent. The facts in that case distinguish it from this. If the defendants had "understood and agreed that they were signing the note in controversy as sureties," it would take the case out of the provisions of section 2212 of the Revisal; but nothing of that nature appears in the case. The Hall case is not in line with the great weight of authority.

[3] It is generally held that the fact that the indorsers constituted a majority of the board of directors of a corporation does not dispense with the necessity of notice of dishonor. Phipps v. Harding, 70 Fed. 468, 34 U. S. App. 148, 17 C. C. A. 203, 30 L.R.A. 513, C. P. A. and cases cited.

The prevailing doctrine is that the corporate entity is as distinct from its officers and directors as it is from third persons with whom it transacts business, and stockholders or directors who lend their individual credit to the corporation of which they are members by indorsement of negotiable paper, or otherwise, are entitled to the same rights and immunities which attach to the status of indorser or surety, where third parties have assumed those liabilities. Eaton and Gilbert on Commercial Paper, p. 486; Burgh v. Legge, 5 M. & W. (Eng.) 418; Carter v. Flower, 18 M. & W. (Eng.) 749; Brown v. Ferguson, 4 Leigh (Va.) 39, 24 Am. Dec. 707.

Referring to Hull v. Myers, the Circuit Court of Appeals in Phipps v. Harding, supra, says: "The case of Hull v. Myers, 90 Ga. 674, 16 S. E. 653, is urged upon our attention in support of this contention. The decision of the Court upon this question is bottomed, as we think, upon incorrect reasoning, and is without the support of authority."

A very full and able discussion of this subject is to be found in the case of McDonald v. Luckenback, 170 Fed. 434, 95 C. C. A. 604, in which it is said: "It is true that the defendant and the two other indorsers were officers and stockholders of the company, as was also the decedent and payee of the note; that they were interested in the success of the corporation of which they were directors and stockholders; that they were, so to speak, managing directors, and as such were financing the affairs of the corporation. . . . We think there is no evidence disclosed by the record tending to show that anything else was contemplated by those who negotiated this loan than that it was to be a loan to the corporation for the promotion of its business, for which the corporation was to be primarily bound by the promissory note, which it made, and that the directors who loaned their credit by indorsement assumed the secondary liability of indorsers, and none other."

"All evidence is consistent with this state of the transaction, and no other interpretation, it seems to us, can be given to it, unless, indeed, directors and officers of a corporation interested in its successful operation cannot, in negotiating a loan for the benefit of the corporation, insure its credit by assuming only the liability of indorser of its negotable paper. Such a proposition, of course, can be sustained neither by reason nor authority."

As to the plea of the statute of limitations, we think the note is barred.

It is true that it is well settled in this State that a payment by the principal on a note before the bar of the statute operates as a renewal [4] of the debt as to himself and also as to the sureties on the note. At one time this was true as to indorsers likewise, as an indorser was regarded as a surety. Green v. Greensboro Female College, 83 N. C. 449, 35 Am. Dec. 579; Garrett v. Reeves, 125 N. C. 529, 34 S. E. 636.

In Johnson v. Hooker, 47 N. C. 29, Pearson, J., says: "The act of 1827 makes an indorser liable as surety. The effect is to put him on the footing of a maker of the note and to make him liable to the holder, the same as if his name was on the face of the note instead of being on the back."

While the law remains the same as to a surety, and a payment by the principal will operate as a renewal of the debt, as to the surety, who is regarded as a maker of the note, an indorser is no longer so regarded.

There is a broad and well recognized distinction between a surety and an indorser, as is pointed out clearly in LeDuc v. Butler, 112 N. C. 461, 17 S. E. 428, in which case it is said: "Part payment of a note by the payee, who has indorsed it, will not repel the bar of the statute of limitations as against the maker, the statute confining the act, admission, or acknowledgment, as evidence to repel the bar, to the associated partners, obligors, and makers of a note."

The judgment is Affirmed.

NOTE.

Right to Notice of Dishonor of Stockholder or Officer Indorsing Corporate Paper.

General Rule.

The distinguishing feature of the liability of an indorser of negotiable paper is that his liability is contingent on due presentment for payment and notice of dishonor. The rule is based on the implied undertaking of the indorsee that he will use due diligence in the prosecution of his demand against the maker, and that he will present the paper for payment immediately on its maturity and will not, by his negligence, expose the indorser to a hazard of loss, against which he, in case of notice of dishonor, might be able otherwise to protect himself. And if the holder fails to perform this duty to give timely notice of nonpayment, the law presumes injury to the indorser and discharges him. 3 R. C. L. tit. Bills & Notes, p. 1224. It is also a general rule that a corporation is an entity distinct from the body of its stockholders, so that a director or stockholder of a corporation is not as a matter of law charged with actual notice of its business transactions. See 7 R. C. L. tit. Corporations, p. 302.

Accordingly the general rule is that a stockholder or officer of a corporation, who indorses its negotiable instruments, cannot be held liable thereon in the absence of notice of dishonor. Maltass v. Siddle, 6 C. B. N. S. 494, 95 E. C. L. 494, 141 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 549; Phipps v. Harding, 70 Fed. 468, 34 U. S. App. 148, 17 C. C. A. 203, 30 L.R.A. 513; McDonald v. Luckenback, 170 Fed. 434, 95 C. C. A. 604, reversing 164 Fed. 296; Grandison v. Robertson, 231 Fed. 785, 145 C. C. A. 605; Winter v. Cox, 41 Ala. 207; Louisville First Nat. Bank v. Bickel, 154 Ky. 11, 156 S. W. 856; Field v. New Orleans Delta Newspaper Co. 21 La. Ann. 24, 99 Am. Dec. 699. And see the reported case. Thus in Grandison v. Robertson, supra, it was said: "The question arises whether the president and treasurer of a corporation, who indorses in his individual capacity the note of his corporation, is an indorser entitled to presentment of the note for payment and notice of nonpayment. The question is somewhat analogous to that which arises in the case of an indorser who has become the executor of the maker of a note, who died before its maturity. The latter question came before the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in 1827, in Juniata Bank v. Hale, 16 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 157, 16 Am. Dec. 558, and it was held that the indorser was entitled under such circumstances to notice of nonpayment. 'Policy and the convenience of the public,' said the court, 'require a rigid adherence to the rule; for, otherwise, exception would creep in after exception, and leave the law, which ought to be certain, open to speculation and to doubt.' . . . It seems to be well settled that such is the law as to the right of an indorser who becomes the executor or the administrator of the maker to have notice that he is looked to personally for payment. 2 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments (6th Ex. 1913) sec. 1175. We are unable to see any distinction in principle between the case of an executor and that of a president or treasurer of a corporation. Each is entitled to a notice and for similar reasons." And in Field v. New Orleans Delta Newspaper Co. 21 La. Ann. 24, 99 Am. Dec. 699, in holding that the business manager of a corporation who had not received notice of dishonor could not be held liable on his indorsement of a note made by the corporation, the court said:

"The notes were made payable at the Canal Bank and although Leovy, as business manager, may have known that they were not paid, he did not, therefore, know without legal notice from the holder or other proper party that he would be looked to for payment as indorser." So in Phipps v. Harding, 70 Fed. 468, 34 U. S. App. 148, 17 C. C. A. 203, 30 L.R.A. 513, it was held that the fact that the indorsers of a corporate note constituted a majority of the board of directors of the maker of the note did not excuse the failure of the holder to give notice of its dishonor. Similarly in Winter v. Cox, 41 Ala. 207, it appeared that a note was executed by a corporation by its agent to his order and then transferred by his indorsement. In an action on the note against the agent, an averment that the defendant was, at the maturity of the note, the sole agent of the corporation giving the note and that no other person was authorized to pay the note for the corporation was held not to be sufficient to relieve the plaintiff from the giving of notice to the indorser of the nonpayment of the note, the allegation not being equivalent to an averment that the defendant was the sole agent to pay the note and that the officers of the corporation were not authorized to do so at the maturity of the note. In Louisville First Nat. Bank v. Bickel, 154 Ky. 11, 156 S. W. 856, it was held that the officer of a corporation who indorsed a corporate note was entitled to notice of dishonor of the note although he was also vice-president of the bank holding the note. The case of McDonald v. Luckenback, 170 Fed. 434, 95 C. C. A. 604, is discussed at length in the reported case.

Exceptional Holdings.

In Hull v. Myers, 90 Ga. 674, 16 S. E. 653, it appeared that the directors and stockholders of an insolvent corporation agreed among themselves to indorse its demand notes. In an action against the indorsers on the note it was held that they could not avail themselves of the failure of the plaintiff to give them notice of dishonor. It was said, however, that a single director or even a minority of the directors indorsing a note for the corporation might be entitled to notice of dishonor.

In Brooke v. Rutland, 15 Ga. App. 26, 82 S. E. 580, the facts were stated in the opinion of the court as follows: "Rutland & Co. brought suit against Geo. W. Brooke and T. J. Brooke upon a promissory note, executed in behalf of the Steel Elevator & Storage Company, by John W. Gartner, its general manager, and the judge of the city court of Atlanta directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for the principal of the note, with interest. The Brookes moved for a new trial, but Geo. W. Brooke abandoned the motion, and T. J. Brooke alone excepts to the judgment, overruling it. . . . As appears from the record, the following facts were admitted: (1) That the contract of defendants was a Tennessee contract: (2) that no notice of the dishonor of the note was ever given the defendants by the holder; (3) that, before and at the time the note was given, the defendants were stockholders and directors in the Steel Elevator & Storage Company, the maker of the note. . . . The uncontradicted evidence in this case shows that Brooke signed his name on the back of the note before delivery to Rutland & Co., and that the purpose of placing his signature upon the back of the note was to obtain credit for the maker, the Steel Elevator & Storage Company, of which he was a stockholder and director, so far, at least, as to procure the renewal of a previous obligation of that company, and that he was as much interested in the first obligation as he was in the latter. It appears that the note in the suit was given in renewal of a previous note which represented a debt of the Steel Elevator & Storage Company to Rutland & Co. When this note was brought to the plaintiffs, signed only by the Steel Elevator & Storage Company, they refused to accept it, and thereupon Geo. W. Brooke proposed to make the note satisfactory if the plaintiffs would consent to carry it a while longer for the Steel Elevator & Storage Company, and later, after the signatures of Geo. W. Brooke, T. J. Brooke, and John W. Gartner had been placed upon the back of the note, the plaintiffs accepted it." Following Mercantile Bank v. Busby, 120 Tenn. 652, 113 S. W. 390, it was held that the defendant was liable as a maker and that the failure to give him notice of the dishonor of the note did not affect his liability.

Where the directors of a corporation indorsed a note made by it and were indemnified against loss by a deed of trust of the corporate property it was held that the failure to give them notice of the dishonor of the note was no bar to their liability on the note as they put themselves in the place of the maker of the note by accepting the security. In re Alldred, 229 Pa. St. 627, 79 Atl. 141.

Under statutes providing that notice of dishonor may be in writing or merely oral and may be given in any terms which sufficiently identify the instrument and indicate that it has been dishonored by nonacceptance or nonpayment, it has been held that the knowledge of an officer of a corporation of the nonpayment of a note made by the corporation which he may have indorsed is sufficient to hold him liable on the note without a formal notice of its dishonor. Merrell Chemical Co. v. Root, 152 N. Y. S. 368; Gleeson v. Lichty, 62 Wash. 656, 114 Pac. 518. Thus in Merrell Chemical Co. v. Root, supra, it appeared that a corporation made and delivered to the plaintiff its note signed for it by its president and assistant treasurer. Prior to the delivery of the note it was indorsed by the assistant treasurer. On the maturity of the note payment was demanded of the corporation and a written notice of presentment was left at its office. All the checks of the corporation were required to be signed by the assistant treasurer. It was held that the failure to give notice of dishonor did not relieve him of liability because he had knowledge of the fact that the note was presented for payment and was not paid. So in Gleeson v. Lichty, 62 Wash. 656, 114 Pac. 518, it appeared that an officer of a corporation who had indorsed a corporate note was the agent of the payee in the making and collection of loans including the corporate note. In an action on the note against the indorser, the court in holding him liable, although he did not receive notice of dishonor, said: "Appellant argues that the note was not presented for payment to the maker on the 3d day of May, 1909, nor to the indorsers, and that no notice was given. As we have seen above, the note was in possession of Mr. Lichty, or under his control, at the time it became due. When the note was made, Mr. Lichty was an officer of the insurance company, the maker of the note. He was the person to whom Mrs. Gleeson looked for payment of the note. He was also her agent to collect the note. At the time the note matured, the insurance company was in the hands of a receiver, and Mr. Lichty was not in control of the affairs of the company. The evidence is not clear that Mrs. Gleeson knew this fact, but that we think is immaterial because it was Mr. Lichty's duty to present the note for payment. If he did not do so, it was because he knew that such presentment would be an idle ceremony. He had the note in his possession on the day it should have been paid. He knew that it was not paid. He was not entitled to further notice as an indorser. Rem. & Bal. Code, sec. 3486. Such notice was sufficient to bind him as an indorser."

In J. W. O'Bannon Co. v. Curran, 129 App. Div. 90, 113 N. Y. S. 359, it appeared that the indorser of a note was the president of the corporation making it. The corporation was adjudged bankrupt after a written admission by the president of its inability to pay its debts and a willingness so to be adjudged. In an action on the note against the president it was held that under the circumstances the president had waived notice of dishonor of the note.

ESTATE OF PHILPOTT

v.

PHILPOTT.

Iowa Supreme Court—March 17, 1915.

169 Iowa 555; 151 N. W. 325.

Bills and Notes — Demand Note — Reasonable Time for Transfer — Bona Fide Purchaser.

Whether a demand note negotiated six months after date was negotiated an unreasonable length of time after issue, so that, under Code Supp. 1907, § 3060a53, the holder was not a holder in due course, is held to be for the jury, in view of section 3060a193, requiring the facts of the particular case to be considered in determining what is a reasonable time.

Reformation of Instruments — Note Containing Blank.

Where a note recited that it was payable in "four —," the instrument may be reformed so as to supply the omission and give effect to the parties' intention.

Bills and Notes — Bona Fide Purchaser — Note Containing Blank.

Code Supp. 1907, § 3060a52, defines a holder in due course as one who, in good faith and for value, has taken a note regular on its face, before it was overdue, and without notice of dishonor or of any infirmity or defect in the title of the party negotiating. A note recited that it was payable in "four —." Section 3060a6 declares that the validity of a note shall not be affected because it is undated. It is held that the holder of the note was not a "holder in due course," for it was not complete and regular on its face; the omission not falling within the exception.

Same.

Under Code Supp. 1907, § 3060a14, providing that the person in possession has prima facie authority to complete a note by filling up blanks, and that if any such instrument after completion is negotiated to a holder in due course, it shall be effectual in his hands as if the blanks had been filled in in accordance with the authority given, the indorsee of a note payable in "four —" is not a holder in due course; the blanks not having been filled.

Burden of Proof as to Taking in Due Course.

Code Supp. 1907, § 3060a55, declares that the title of one who negotiates a note in breach of faith is defective. Section 3060a59 declares that every holder is deemed prima facie a holder in due course, but when it is shown that the title of one of the persons who negotiated the instrument was defective, the holder has the burden of proving that he or some one under whom he claimed had acquired title in due course. It is held that on proof that a note was indorsed in breach of an agreement that it should be returned for cancellation, plaintiff has the burden of proving that he was a holder in due course.

Evidence Insufficient.

In action on a note negotiated in breach of faith, evidence is held not to show conclusively that the plaintiff was a holder in due course.

Pledge — Note as Collateral — Right to Enforce — Payment of Debt.

A holder of notes received as collateral is not entitled to enforce them after payment of the principal obligation.

Payment — Evidence for Jury.

In an action on notes admittedly received as collateral, the question whether the principal obligation had been paid is held to be for the jury.

Appeal from District Court, Polk county: BRENNAN, Judge.

Claim against decedent's estate on two promissory notes. Ed. Le Clerc, claimant, and Eva B. Philpott, executrix, defendant. Judgment for claimant. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Mac. J. Randall and Read & Read for appellee.

Clinton L. Nourse for appellant.

[556] EVANS, J.—The defendant is the executrix of the estate of her husband, C. H. Philpott. On June 12, 1911, Philpott entered into a contract with the American-Canadian Land Company, a copartnership, for the purchase of certain Texas lands, and executed his notes therefor to a total of about $7,000. October 25, 1911, this contract was canceled by a written agreement and the land company agreed to return to Philpott his notes. The return was never made. Philpott died a year later. The claim herein is based upon two of said notes, one for $1,500 and the other for $1,000. The defense here indicated being good as to the payee of the notes, the ultimate question is whether upon this record it conclusively appears that the plaintiff was in good faith a holder in due [557] course, so as to require a directed verdict in his favor. This ultimate question depends upon two or three preliminary ones, viz.: (1) Was each note negotiable on its face? (2) Was the title of the person who negotiated the note to the plaintiff, defective? (3) Upon which party was the burden of proof as to the good or bad faith of the plaintiff?

I. First as to negotiability. The $1,500 note is conceded to be negotiable upon its face and due in three years after date. The defendant challenges the negotiability of the other note. It was drawn payable "on or before four ——— after date." It does not appear therein whether it was to become payable in four days, four months, or four years. The defendant contends that, because of this defect, the time of maturity was rendered uncertain and the negotiability of the instrument was thereby destroyed. On the other hand, plaintiff contends that inasmuch as no time of payment was actually expressed, it became a note payable on demand, under Sec. 3060-a7. Adopting for the moment the plaintiff's contention at this point, and reading the note as payable on demand, another difficulty confronts him. Upon the negotiating of such a note an unreasonable length of time after its issue, the holder is not deemed a holder in due course. Sec 3060-a53. In this case the date of issue was June 12, 1911, and that of negotiating, January 18, 1912. Under the authorities, a reasonable time for the negotiating of a demand note is rather brief. Its dishonor is not long delayed. In the following cases respectively, two days, seven days, and thirty days were held to be a reasonable time: Field v. Nickerson, 13 Mass. 131; Thurston v. M'Kown, 6 Mass. 428; Ranger v. Cary, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 369.

In the following cases respectively, two months and a half, three months and a half, and eight months have been held beyond a reasonable time and sufficient to dishonor a demand note: Losee v. Dunkin, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 70, 50 Am. Dec. 245; Stevens [553] v. Bruce, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 193; Ayer v. Hutchins, 4 Mass. 370, 3 Am. Dec. 232; American Bank v. Jenness, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 288.

There is, however, no definite rule to be applied, and among other elements "the facts of the particular case" are to be considered. 3060-a193. It is clear, therefore, that the defendant was entitled to go to the jury on this question if upon no other.

II. As to this particular note, there is a further consideration that militates against the plaintiff as a holder in due course. Sec. 3060a52 is as follows:

"A holder in due course is a holder who has taken the instrument under the following conditions:

"1. That the instrument is complete and regular upon its face.

"2. That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact.

"3. That he took it in good faith and for value.

"4. That at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it."

This note was not "complete and regular" upon its face. It indicated upon its face that some word had been omitted in an attempted specification of the time of payment.

If it were made to appear that the real contract between the parties was that the note should be payable in four months or four years, the instrument was reformable in equity at the suit of either party. This would not destroy the validity of the note, but it would destroy its negotiability until such reformation was had. The manifest irregularity in this case is not one of the "omissions" specified in Sec. 3060-a6, which section is as follows:

"1. It is not dated; or

"2. Does not specify the value given, or that any value has been given therefor; or

"3. Does not specify the place where it is drawn or the place where it is payable; or

"4. Bears a seal; or

"5. Designates a particular kind of current money in which payment is to be made.

"But nothing in this section shall alter or repeal any statute requiring in certain cases the nature of the consideration to be stated in the instrument."

Sec. 3060-a14 provides for the filling of blanks by the holder of an instrument duly signed within the scope of the holder's authority as follows:

"Where the instrument is wanting in any material particular, the person in possession thereof has a prima-facie authority to complete it by filling up the blanks therein. And a signature on a blank paper delivered by the person making the signature in order that the paper may be converted into a negotiable instrument operates as a prima-facie authority to fill it up as such for any amount. In order, however, that any such instrument when completed may be enforced against any person who became a party thereto prior to its completion, it must be filled up strictly in accordance with the authority given and within a reasonable time. But if any such instrument, after completion, is negotiated to a holder in due course, it is valid and effectual for all purposes in his hands, and he may enforce it as if it had been filled up strictly in accordance with the authority given and within a reasonable time."

Such instrument is thereby rendered negotiable. But it becomes so after the blanks are filled and not before. If the [560] real intent of the parties in interest was to make this instrument payable in four years, it may be that the payee could have lawfully corrected the oversight by inserting the word "years;" and it may be also that this would have rendered the note negotiable to a holder in due course as defined in the section above quoted. The question in that form is not now before us and we need not pass upon it. We think it quite clear that this irregularity upon the face of the note prevented its taker from becoming a holder in due course. It could be deemed a demand note, unless the agreement of the parties was in fact otherwise. If otherwise, such fact was suggested by the incompleteness of the terms actually used.

The controlling fact at this point is, not that the blank was not filled, but that it was filled imperfectly or irregularly. Though we grant that the note was presumptively good as a demand note, yet it was not "complete and regular" within the requirements of Sec. 3060-a52, and therefore was not negotiable.

III. As to the $1,500 note, the primary question is, Was the title of the payee defective when he negotiated the same to the plaintiff on January 18, 1912?

"The title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective within the meaning of this act (Negotiable Instrument Act) when . . . or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud." Sec. 3060-a55.

In this case, the plaintiff took the note in question from the payee. The evidence was abundant to show that such negotiation was in breach of faith on the part of the payee.

Sec. 3060-a59 provides as follows: "Every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove [561] that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as a holder in due course."

The defendant, therefore, having introduced sufficient evidence to show that the title of the payee was defective when the negotiation was made, the burden was thereby cast upon the plaintiff to show, notwithstanding, that he was a holder in due course within the conditions specified in Sec. 3060-a52. We find in the record little, if any, attempt to prove these conditions affirmatively. The field of good faith was involved, with its possible ramifications. Likewise the field of notice. The plaintiff was called to the witness stand by the defendant and testified as follows:

"I am the claimant herein. In January, 1912, The American-Canadian Land Company made two notes to me: one for $2,000 and the other for $4,700, and for these two notes I claim to hold the notes Exhibits 'B' and 'C' as collateral. I now produce the two notes above referred to, the one for $2,000 is dated January 18, 1912, and marked by the reporter, Exhibit 'E' and the other for $4,700 of the same date, marked by the reporter, Exhibit 'F'."

Exhibits "B" and "C," referred to in his testimony, were the notes in suit. The foregoing was his entire testimony as to the circumstances attending his acquisition of the notes. It is too clear for argument that such testimony did not conclusively meet the burden of proof laid upon him.

IV. It appeared in evidence that the plaintiff claimed to hold the notes in suit as collateral only for the security of two notes of the American-Canadian Land Company for $2,000 and $4,700 respectively. These notes purported to have been executed January 18, 1912. Upon notice served by defendant, they were brought into court. They appeared upon their faces to have been paid and canceled. The plaintiff testified that they were not in fact paid and that the cancellation was a mistake. An entry had been made upon the notes to that effect and the entry had been signed by members of the partnership. Manifestly, if such notes were paid, the plaintiff was no longer a holder in due course of the collateral. The appellant contends that upon the evidence here disclosed the question was for the jury as to whether such notes were paid and the collateral thus discharged. We see no escape from this contention. Surely the cancellation stamp upon the notes was prima facie sufficient to prove the discharge of the collateral. The truth and good faith of the explanation was pre-eminent a question of fact. It is urged by appellee that the pleadings made no issue at this point. It is true that no pleading of the defendant alleged the payment of the notes for which the collateral purported to be held. We do not think she was required to plead to such effect. The facts thus developed on the trial were peculiarly within the knowledge of the plaintiff and outside the knowledge of the defendant. The defendant's pleadings did challenge the plaintiff as not a [563] holder in due course and for that reason claimed the right to interpose her defense against the original payee. We think the pleading was sufficient to call in question the good faith of the plaintiff's claim as a holder in due course.

We reach the conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to a directed verdict and the order of the trial court is therefore

Deemer, C.J., and Ladd, Preston and Salinger, JJ., concur.

DEEMER, C. J. (concurring).—While I agree to the result reached, I am not satisfied with that part of the opinion holding that the note in suit is non-negotiable because of uncertainty as to the time of payment.

Code Sec. 3060-a7 provides that "an instrument is payable on demand:

"1. When it is expressed to be payable on demand, or at sight, or on presentation; or
 "2. In which no time of payment is expressed."

The first paragraph does not apply to the note in suit, but the second does, as I understand it.

The majority say that there is an unfilled blank in the note, and suggest that it was intended to insert therein days, months or years. How do we know that, except from inference? Surely no time for payment is expressed, and the statute says in terms that, if not expressed, it is payable on demand. It does not say that it is not negotiable if it be inferred that it was the intention of the parties to fill the bill, but specifically provides that if no time is expressed it is payable on demand. It is suggested that the note might be reformed in equity and the blank filled in such a suit. Any note is subject to be reformed in equity, but that does not necessarily destroy its negotiability.

The statute quoted is but a codification of the law merchant, and courts have held under that law that a note in [564] which there is an unfilled blank as to the time of payment is payable on demand, and is negotiable. See Daniel on Neg. Inst. Sec. 88, wherein he says: "If the time of payment be left blank, as for instance, if the instrument be payable ——— months after date," it is payable on demand. Citing: McLean v. Nichlen, 3 Viet. 107; Stowe v. Merrill, 77 Me. 550, 1 Atl. 684. See also, sustaining the same rule: Hotel Lanier v. Johnson, 103 Ga. 604, 30 S. E. 558; Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 297, 21 S. E. 480; McVeigh v. Howard, 87 Va. 599, 13 S. E. 31; O'Mohundro v. O'Mohundro, 21 Grat. (Va.) 626.

If payable on demand, it was negotiable and complete and regular on its face, and not subject to reformation in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value. Even if the note be not fair and complete on its face, the only uncertainty is as to the time of payment. This uncertainty did not give notice of any other infirmity in the note or indicate that the consideration had failed or that it was negotiated in bad faith. The blank could have been filled in by any holder, and in any event it could be filled to express the true date as agreed upon by the parties or by action in equity.

That the defect was not notice of infirmities see the following cases: Miller v. Crayton, 3 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 360; McSparran v. Neeley, 91 Pa. St. 17, and cases cited.

NOTE.

When Note Payable on Demand Is Overdue as between Maker and Indorser.

General Rule:

Rule Stated, 842.

What Constitutes Reasonable Time for Transfer, 843.

Rule in Georgia, 845.

Introductory.

The earlier cases passing on the question when a note payable on demand is overdue as between the maker and the indorser, are reviewed in the note to Northern Crown Bank v. International Electric Co. Ann. Cas. 1912A 472. This note presents the recent cases on the subject.

General Rule.

RULE STATED.

The recent decisions support the rule that a note payable on demand is not to be considered as overdue at the time of its date or delivery, thereby depriving a subsequent purchaser of the protection afforded by the law merchant to bona fide purchasers of negotiable notes before maturity. Chartered Mercantile Bank v. Dickson, L. R. 3 P. C. (Eng.) 574; Ottawa Bank v. Christie, 37

Ont. L. Rep. 330; Molson's Bank v. Parent, 18 R. L. N. S. (Eng.) 458; Martin v. Winslow, 2 Mason 241, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,172; Otis Elevator Co. v. Ford, 4 Boyce (Del.) 286, 88 Atl. 465; Leonard v. Olson, 99 Ia. 162, 68 N. W. 677, 61 Am. St. Rep. 230, 35 L.R.A. 381; Seaver v. Lincoln, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 267; Field v. Nickerson, 13 Mass. 131; Home Sav. Bank v. Hosie, 119 Mich. 116, 77 N. W. 625; Foley v. Emerald, etc. Brewing Co. 61 N. J. L. 428, 39 Atl. 650; German-American Bank v. Atwater, 165 N. Y. 36, 58 N. E. 763; Hussey v. Sutton, 160 N. Y. S. 934; Union Bank v. Ezell, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 385; Verder v. Verder, 63 Vt. 38, 21 Atl. 611; Bacon v. Bacon, 94 Va. 686, 27 S. E. 576; Turner v. Iron Chief Min. Co. 74 Wis. 355, 43 N. W. 149, 17 Am. St. Rep. 168, 5 L.R.A. 533. The foregoing rule is applicable to instruments indorsed and transferred after maturity, which are in legal effect payable on demand. Colt v. Barnard, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 260, 29 Am. Dec. 584; Gate City Nat. Bank v. Schmidt, 168 Mo. App. 153, 153 S. W. 101; Basenhorst v. Wilby, 45 Ohio St. 333, 13 N. E. 75; Gray v. Bell, 3 Rich. L. (S. C.) 71; Union Bank v. Ezell, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 385; Barger v. Brubaker (Tex.) 187 S. W. 1025.

The recent authorities also support the general rule that a promissory note payable on demand is payable within a reasonable time, so that, unless transferred within a reasonable time after its date, it is considered as overdue, and a subsequent purchaser takes it subject to every infirmity which it had in the hands of the payee. Otis Elevator Co. v. Ford, 4 Boyce (Del.) 286, 88 Atl. 465; Miller v. Del Rio Min. etc. Co. 25 Idaho 83, 136 Pac. 448, 25 Idaho 95, 136 Pac. 452; Brophy Grocery Co. v. Wilson, 45 Mont. 489, 124 Pac. 510; McAdam v. Grand Forks Mercantile Co. 24 N. D. 645, 140 N. W. 725, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 246. And see the reported case. See also in Re Wenatchee-Stratford Orchard Co. 205 Fed. 964; Elgin First Nat. Bank v. Russell, 124 Tenn. 618, Ann. Cas. 1913A 203, 139 S. W. 734.

WHAT CONSTITUTES REASONABLE TIME FOR TRANSFER.

In determining what is a "reasonable time" within which a demand note is to be transferred so as to entitle the holder to protection as a bona fide holder, regard is to be had to the nature of the instrument, the usage of trade or business with respect to such instruments, and the facts of the particular case. Murray v. St. Louis Third Nat. Bank, 234 Fed. 481; Lockwood v. Crawford, 18 Conn. 361; Hampton v. Miller, 78 Conn. 267, 61 Atl. 952; Sheffield v. Cleland, 19 Idaho 612, 115

Pac. 20 (Rev. Codes, § 3650); Mudd v. Harper, 1 Md. 110, 54 Am. Dec. 644; Seaver v. Lincoln, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 267; Field v. Nickerson, 13 Mass. 131; Merritt v. Jackson, 181 Mass. 69, 62 N. E. 987 (St. 1898, c. 533, § 193); Commercial Nat. Bank v. Zimmerman, 185 N. Y. 210, 77 N. E. 1020 (Law 1897, p. 719, c. 612, §§ 131, 4); Bacon v. Bacon, 94 Va. 686, 27 S. E. 576. See also German-American Bank v. Mills, 99 App. Div. 312, 91 N. Y. S. 142; Union Bank v. Ezell, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 385. And the term "a reasonable time" has reference to the ability of the holder of the note, and excludes any notion of credit to or indulgence of the maker. Gate City Nat. Bank v. Schmidt, 168 Mo. App. 153, 152 S. W. 101; Foley v. Emerald, etc. Brewing Co. 61 N. J. L. 428, 39 Atl. 651.

Whether the transfer of a note payable on demand is within a reasonable time, is a question of law for the court where the facts are few and simple and not in dispute, or are presented in a special verdict or a demurrer to the evidence. Murray v. St. Louis Third Nat. Bank, 234 Fed. 481; Oley v. Miller, 74 Conn. 305, 50 Atl. 744; Sheffield v. Cleland, 19 Idaho 612, 113 Pac. 20; Yates v. Goodwin, 96 Me. 90, 51 Atl. 804; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Zimmerman, 185 N. Y. 210, 77 N. E. 1020; Basenhorst v. Wilby, 45 Ohio St. 333, 13 N. E. 75; Turner v. Iron Chief Min. Co. 74 Wis. 355, 43 N. W. 149, 17 Am. St. Rep. 168, 5 L.R.A. 533. See also Mudd v. Harper, 1 Md. 110, 54 Am. Dec. 644. But if the evidence or probative facts are such that reasonable men might draw different inferences therefrom, the question must be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court. In other words between certain maximum and minimum limits there is a field where the unreasonableness of the delay is either a question of fact or a mixed question of law and fact, so that its determination falls within the province of the jury. Murray v. St. Louis Third Nat. Bank, 234 Fed. 481; Oley v. Miller, 74 Conn. 305, 50 Atl. 744; Sheffield v. Cleland, 19 Idaho 612, 115 Pac. 20; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Zimmerman, 185 N. Y. 210, 77 N. E. 1020; Hussey v. Sutton, 160 N. Y. S. 934; Basenhorst v. Wilby, 45 Ohio St. 333, 13 N. E. 75; Union Bank v. Ezell, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 385. And see the reported case.

In determining whether a demand note is to be considered as overdue, it has been said that the mere fact that the note draws interest does not make it the less a demand note, but is evidence of the probable or reasonable time which the parties intended should elapse before demand should be made, the periodical payments of interest tending to show an understanding, direct or inferential, that the loan was to be regarded as more or less continuing in character, and the indorsement as a continuing guaranty. Murray v. St. Louis Third Nat. Bank, 234 Fed. 481; Lockwood v. Crawford, 18 Conn. 361; Yates v. Goodwin, 96 Me. 90, 51 Atl. 804; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Zimmerman, 185 N. Y. 210, 77 N. E. 1020; Verder v. Verder, 63 Vt. 38, 21 Atl. 611. And especially is this true where, notwithstanding the fact that the holder of a demand note has the right to demand immediate payment, the note was given for a loan rather than for a debt in the current business, as this tends to show that the parties did not expect an immediate or early demand. Murray v. St. Louis Third Nat. Bank, 234 Fed. 481; Yates v. Goodwin, 96 Me. 90, 51 Atl. 804.

In Elgin First Nat. Bank v. Russell, 124 Tenn. 618, Ann. Cas. 1913A 203, 139 S. W. 734, it appeared that two promissory notes purported to be due and payable on certain fixed dates after the date of execution, but they contained a provision authorizing a confession of judgment in favor of the holder "at any time thereafter" and a "consent to immediate execution upon such judgment." The court held that they were non-negotiable, as they were not due at a fixed and determinable period, unless they were treated as due from and after delivery, and that, under such a construction, they were due in the payee's hands, and therefore were past due when they came into the hands of the payee's transferee, and were subject to all the defenses that would have existed against the payee.

In a case wherein it appeared that though by an express recital in the face of a note payable on demand the necessity for demand was waived, yet the payments indorsed on it disclosed that the principal sum named had been almost fully paid, it was held that this fact must of itself be deemed sufficient as a matter of law to give notice to any one dealing with it that the payee had already demanded payment, or, in any event, that the payee and the maker had regarded the obligation as due long prior to that time, and that therefore an indorsee did not become a holder in due course. Brophy Grocery Co. v. Wilson, 45 Mont. 489, 124 Pac. 510. In the reported case it is held that, adopting the contention that a note drawn payable "on or before four ——— after date," is to be treated as a note payable on demand, inasmuch as no time of payment is actually expressed, the question whether it was negotiated within a reasonable length of time after its issue, so as to make the holder thereof a holder in due course, was a question for the jury, under the statute (Code, 2a, Supp. 1907, § 3060a, 193).

In each of the following cases it was held that, under the circumstances disclosed by the particular case, a note payable on demand was transferred within a reasonable time so as to entitle the purchaser to protection: Lockwood v. Crawford, 18 Conn. 361 (sixty days); Seaver v. Lincoln, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 267 (seven days); German-American Bank v. Mills, 99 App. Div. 312, 91 N. Y. S. 142 (four months and six days); Schlesinger v. Schultz, 110 App. Div. 356, 96 N. Y. S. 383 (ten months—note bearing interest); Becker v. Horowitz, 114 N. Y. S. 161 (seven months); Hussey v. Sutton, 160 N. Y. S. 934 (two years).

In each of the following cases the transfer of a demand note was held to have been made after the lapse of an unreasonable length of time, and the note was treated as being overdue at the time it was transferred: Martin v. Winslow, 2 Mason 241, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,172 (seven months); Miller v. Del Rio Min. etc. Co. 25 Idaho 83, 136 Pac. 448, 25 Idaho 95, 136 Pac. 452 (three years and seven months); Leonard v. Olson, 99 Ia. 162, 68 N. W. 677, 61 Am. St. Rep. 231, 35 L.R.A. 381 (ten years); Mudd v. Harper, 1 Md. 110, 54 Am. Dec. 644 (three years and nine months); Field v. Nickerson, 13 Mass. 131 (eight months—note bearing interest); Yy-lie v. Cotter, 170 Mass. 356, 49 N. E. 746, 64 Am. St. Rep. 305 (fourteen months); Merritt v. Jackson, 181 Mass. 69, 62 N. E. 987 (sixty days); Home Sav. Bank v. Hosie, 119 Mich. 116, 77 N. W. 625 (two and one-half years—note bearing interest); Gate City Nat. Bank v. Schmidt, 168 Mo. App. 153, 152 S. W. 101 (one year); Oleson v. Wilson, 20 Mont. 544, 52 Pac. 372, 63 Am. St. Rep. 639 (nearly twelve years); German-American Bank v. Atwater, 165 N. Y. 36, 58 N. E. 763 (one year, and notice of protest two weeks later); Commercial Nat. Bank v. Zimmerman, 185 N. Y. 210, 77 N. E. 1020 (three and one-half years—note bearing interest); McAdam v. Grand Forks Mercantile Co. 24 N. D. 645, 140 N. W. 725, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 246 (time cannot be extended beyond year); Turner v. Iron Chief Min. Co. 74 Wis. 355, 43 N. W. 149, 17 Am. St. Rep. 168, 5 L.R.A. 533 (ten months—note bearing interest).

Under the Vermont statute (R. L. 2013), a promissory note payable on demand is overdue in sixty days from its date. Verder v. Verder, 63 Vt. 38, 21 Atl. 611.

The Kentucky Negotiable Instruments Act (Ky. St. sec. 3720b) provides (subsection 71) that where a note is payable on demand, presentment must be made within a reasonable time after its issue, and (subsection 192) that "in determining what is a 'reasonable time' or an 'unreasonable time' regard is to be had to the nature of the instrument, the usage of trade or business (if any) with respect to such instruments, and the facts of the particular case." In Frazee v. Phoenix Nat. Bank, 161 Ky. 175, 170 S. W. 532, under that statute and in view of the fact that "it is a matter of common knowledge that in the banks of Central Kentucky commercial paper is rarely permitted to run longer than four months without renewal, and it may be said to be a custom, or usage of trade, that such paper is ordinarily payable within that time," it was held that a demand note should be treated as due at least four months from its date.

In Kerby v. Wade, 101 Ark. 543, 142 S. W. 1121, the rule that demand paper is considered as overdue if it remains unpaid for an unreasonable time after its date or the date of delivery was declared to be applicable to a mortgage given to secure a note in which no date of maturity was fixed, but which was past due.

Rule in Georgia.

In Georgia a statute [Civil Code, § 3700 (Code 1910, § 4292)] provides that a note payable on demand is due immediately, and so it has been held that the purchaser of such a note takes it subject to the equities between the original parties. Brinson R. Co. v. Springfield Exch. Bank, 16 Ga. App. 425, 85 S. E. 634; Oakfield Exchange Bank v. Odum (Ga.) 90 S. E. 977. So, a note payable "on demand next after date," and not otherwise expressing any time for payment, has been held to be a note payable on demand, and not a note payable on time, and therefore to be due immediately and within the foregoing statute, which subjects the purchaser thereof to the equities of the original parties to the note. Oakfield Exchange Bank v. Odum (Ga.) 90 S. E. 977.

v.

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY ET AL.

United States Supreme Court—January 8, 1917.

242 U. S. 311; 37 Sup. Ct. 180.

Intoxicating Liquors — State Regulation — Shipment for Personal Use.

A state may, consistently with the due process of law clause of U. S. Const. 14th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416), forbid all shipments of intoxicating liquor, whether intended for personal use or otherwise.

[See 19 Ann. Cas. 163; Ann. Cas. 1916E 780.]

Validity and Effect of Webb-Kenyon Law.

Any immunity from the prohibitions of W. Va. Code 1913, chap. 32A, as amended by Laws 1915, chap. 7, § 7, Laws 1915, 2d Ex. Sess. p. 660, § 34, against the shipment from without the state of intoxicating liquors intended for personal use, and the receipt and possession of liquors so transported, which the interstate character of such a shipment might otherwise give, is taken away by the provisions of the Webb-Kenyon Act of March 1, 1913 (37 Stat. at L. 699, chap. 90, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 208), forbidding the interstate shipment or transportation of intoxicating liquor which is intended by any person interested therein to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of the law of the state to which the liquor is transported, although individual use may not have been prohibited by the West Virginia law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Congress did not exceed its power under the commerce clause in enacting the provision of the Webb-Kenyon Act of March 1, 1913 (37 Stat. at L. 699, chap. 90, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 supp. p. 208), forbidding the interstate shipment or transportation of intoxicating liquor which is intended by any person interested therein to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of the state into which the liquor is transported.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

There is nothing repugnant to the due process of law clause of U. S. Const. 5th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 288), in the provisions of the Webb-Kenyon Act of March 1, 1913 (37 Stat. at L. 699, chap. 90, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 208), under which an interstate shipment of intoxicating liquor, though intended for personal use, may be subjected to the state prohibitory laws.

[315] WHITE, C. J.—To refer to the principal state law relating to these suits, to the pleadings and the decision of the court below will make the issues in these cases clear and point directly to the elements required to be considered in deciding them.

West Virginia in February, 1913, enacted a prohibition [316] law to go into effect on July 1st of the following year. Code 1913, c. 32A. Putting out of view the right of druggists under stringent regulations provided by the statute to sell for medicinal purposes and the right otherwise to sell wine for sacramental and alcohol for scientific and manufacturing purposes, the law forbade "the manufacture, sale, keeping or storing for sale in this state, or offering or exposing for sale" intoxicating liquors, and the intoxicants embraced were comprehensively defined. The statute contained many restrictions concerning hotels, restaurants, clubs and so-called associations where liquor was kept and served either as a result of membership or by gift or otherwise, which were evidently intended to prevent the frustration of the prohibitions against the keeping of intoxicants for sale and purchase by subterfuge in the guise of the exercise of an individual right. There was no express prohibition against the individual right to use intoxicants and none implied unless that result arose (a) from the prohibition in universal terms of all sales and purchases of liquor with the State, (b) from the clause providing that every delivery made in the State by a common or other carrier of the prohibited intoxicants should be considered as a consummation of a sale made in the State at the point of delivery, and (c) from the prohibitions which the statute contained against solicitations made to induce purchases of liquor and against the publication in the State of all circulars, advertisements, price-lists, etc., which might tend to stimulate purchases of liquor.

Under this statute and in reliance upon the provisions of the act of Congress known as the Webb-Kenyon Law (Act of Congress of March 1, 1913, 37 Stat. 699; Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 208) the State of West Virginia in one of its courts sued the Western Maryland Railway Company and the Adams Express Company to enjoin them from carrying from Maryland into West Virginia liquor in violation of law. In substance [317] it was charged that very many shipments had been taken by the carriers contrary to the law both as to solicitations and as to the use for which the liquor was intended. Preliminary injunctions were issued restraining the carrying of liquor into the State subject to many conditions as to investigation, etc., etc. With these injunctions in force, these suits were commenced by the Clark Distilling Company to compel the carriers to take a shipment of liquor which it was asserted was ordered for personal use and deliver it in West Virginia, on the ground that the Act of Congress to Regulate Commerce imposed the duty to receive and carry and that besides the West Virginia prohibition law when rightly construed did not forbid it. The carriers, not challenging the asserted meaning of the West Virginia law, set up the injunctions and averred that to receive and carry the liquor would violate their provisions and therefore there was no duty under the United States law to do so. West Virginia intervened in the suits, relying upon the state law and the injunctions which had been issued. At the trial it was shown that the plaintiff Distilling Company had systematically solicited purchases and constantly shipped liquor from Maryland into West Virginia in violation of the prohibition law. The court held that the West Virginia law did not prohibit personal use, and did not forbid shipments for such use and that as there was no state prohibition, the Webb-Kenyon Law had no application, and that as the solicitations forbidden by the state statute were solicitations to do that which was forbidden, that consideration was irrelevant. The construction of the statute made by the state court was held not authoritatively binding, as that court was not one of last resort, and the right to practically modify the injunctions was declared to exist because West Virginia by making herself a party to the suits had submitted herself to the jurisdiction of the court. All questions concerning the power of the State of West Virginia [318] to pass the prohibition law if it meant otherwise, and of the right of Congress to adopt the Webb-Kenyon Act under a like hypothesis, were reserved. 219 Fed. 333. Before the decrees entered became final the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in a case pending before it (West Virginia v. Adams Express Co. 219 Fed. 794. 135 C. C. A. 464, L.R.A. 1916C 291) decided directly to the contrary. It held that the law of West Virginia did prohibit shipments for personal use; that it did forbid solicitations therefore for such purchases; that by operation of the Webb-Kenyon Act there was no longer a right to ship liquor into the State in violation of its laws; and that both the state law and the Webb-Kenyon Act were constitutional. Controlled by such decision.

the trial court recalled its opinion, heard a re-argument, and, although not changing its view, accepted and gave effect to the conclusions reached by the Circuit Court of Appeals because they were deemed to be authoritative, and the cases were brought directly here, because of the constitutional questions, to review such action.

The issues to be decided may be embraced in four propositions which we proceed separately to consider.

1. The correct meaning of the West Virginia law as to the subjects in dispute.

The difference as to the meaning of the statute in the court below was whether or not the West Virginia law prohibited the receipt of liquor for personal use; and if it did, whether or not the prohibitions of the law equally applied to shipments from outside and to those originating in the State. But the possibility of dispute over these subjects no longer exists because after the decision below and since the cases were first argued (for they have been here argued twice) the State of West Virginia amended the statute so as to leave no room for doubt that it does forbid all shipments, whether for personal use or otherwise, and whether from within or without the State. The pertinent [319] provisions of the amendments are placed in the margin.¹ As the relief sought is the permanent right to ship in the future, the meaning of the statute now, that is, as amended, is the test by which we must consider the questions requiring solution. Indeed, this is frankly admitted by the [320] parties since it is unequivocally declared that the question is the operation and effect of the statute as amended and its constitutionality. We therefore come to the second question, which is:

2. The power of the State to enact the prohibition law consistently with the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416) and the exclusive power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States.

That government can, consistently with the due process clause, forbid the manufacture and sale of liquor and regulate its traffic, is not open to controversy; and that there goes along with this power full police authority to make it effective, is also not open. Whether the general authority includes the right to forbid individual use, we need not consider, since clearly there would be power, as an incident to the right to forbid manufacture and sale, to restrict the means by which intoxicants for personal use could be obtained, even if such use was permitted. This being true, there can be no doubt that the West Virginia prohibition law did not offend against the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

But that it was a direct burden upon interstate commerce and conflicted with the

1 "Sec. 7. It shall be unlawful for any person to keep or have, for personal use or otherwise, or to use, or permit another to have, keep or use, intoxicating liquors at any restaurant, store, office building, club, place where soft drinks are sold (except a drug store may have and sell alcohol and wine as provided by sections four and twenty-four), fruit stand, news stand, room, or place where bowling alleys, billiard or pool tables are maintained, livery stable, boat house, public building, park, road, street or alley. It shall also be unlawful for any person to give or furnish to another intoxicating liquors, except as otherwise hereinafter provided in this section. Any one violating this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned in the county jail not less than two nor more than six months; provided, however, that nothing contained in this section shall prevent one, in his home, from having and there giving to another intoxicating liquors when such having or giving is in no way a shift, scheme or device to evade the provisions of this act; but the word 'home' as used herein, shall not be construed to be one's club, place of common resort, or room of a transient guest in a hotel or boarding house. And, provided, further, that no common carrier, for hire, nor other person, for hire or without hire, shall bring or carry into this state, or carry from one place to another within the state, intoxicating liquors for another, even when intended for personal use; except a common carrier may, for hire, carry pure grain alcohol and wine, and such preparations as may be sold by druggists for the special purposes and in the manner as set forth in sections four and twenty-four; and, provided, further, however, that in case of search and seizure, the finding of any liquors shall be prima facie evidence that the same are being kept and stored for unlawful purposes."

"Sec. 34. It shall be unlawful for any person in this state to receive, directly or indirectly, intoxicating liquors from a common, or other carrier. It shall also be unlawful for any person in this state to possess intoxicating liquors, received directly or indirectly from a common, or other carrier in this state. This section shall apply to such liquors intended for personal use, as well as otherwise, and to interstate, as well as intrastate, shipments or carriage. Any person violating this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than two hundred dollars, and in addition thereto may be imprisoned not more than three months; provided, however, that druggists may receive and possess pure grain alcohol, wine and such preparations as may be sold by druggists for the special purpose and in the manner as set forth in sections four and twenty-four."

power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, and therefore could not be used to prevent interstate shipments from Maryland into West Virginia, has been not open to question since the decision in Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 10 S. Ct. 681, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 128. And this brings us to consider whether the Webb-Kenyon [321] Law has so regulated interstate commerce as to give the State the power to do what it did in enacting the prohibition law and cause its provisions to be applicable to shipments of intoxicants in interstate commerce, thus saying that law from repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States, which is the third proposition for consideration.

3. Assuming the constitutionality of the Webb-Kenyon Act, what is its true meaning and its operation upon the prohibitions contained in the West Virginia law?

Omitting words irrelevant to the subject now under consideration, the title and text of the Webb-Kenyon Act are as follows:

"An Act Divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases.

" . . . That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, . . . into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, . . . which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, . . . is hereby prohibited."

As the state law forbade the shipment into or transportation of liquor in the State whether from inside or out, and all receipt and possession of liquor so transported without regard to the use to which the liquor was to be put, and as the Webb-Kenyon Act prohibited the transportation in interstate commerce of all liquor "intended . . . to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State," there would seem [322] to be no room for doubt that the prohibitions of the state law were made applicable by the Webb-Kenyon Law. If that law was valid, therefore, the state law was not repugnant to the commerce clause. It is insisted that this view gives too wide an effect to the Webb-Kenyon Law since that act was only intended to include state prohibitions in so far as they forbade the shipment, receipt and possession of liquor for a forbidden use, and hence as individual use was not forbidden by the state law, the shipment, receipt and possession for such use was not embraced by the Webb-Kenyon Act and the state law, so far as it was outside of that act, was repugnant to the commerce clause. This is sought to be supported by the historical environment of the Webb-Kenyon Act as evidenced by the debates on its passage and by a decision of this court, as well as decisions of state courts (which are in the margin¹) which, it is insisted, have so construed that act.

Assuming, for the sake of argument only, that the debates may be resorted to for the purpose of showing environment, we are of opinion they clearly establish a result directly contrary to that which they are cited to maintain. Undoubtedly they show that it was insisted the act was not intended to interfere with personal use, as of course it was not, since its only purpose was to give effect to state prohibitions, not to compel the States to prohibit personal use. Indeed, the meaning which it is sought to affix to the Webb-Kenyon Act, if accepted, would cause that act to have the effect of compelling the States to prohibit personal use, since if all the prohibitions of state laws against manufacture, sale, receipt and possession of intoxicants remained subject to the danger of indirect [323] violation by permitting shipment, receipt and possession for personal use, it would follow that a necessary and immediate incentive was imposed upon the States by the Webb-Kenyon Act to enact a provision against personal use.

The antecedents of the Webb-Kenyon Act, that is, its legislative and judicial progenitors, leave no room for the contention made. To correct, the great evil which was asserted to arise from the right to ship liquor into a State through the channels of interstate commerce and there receive and sell the same in the original package in violation of state prohibitions, was indisputably the purpose which led to the enactment of the Wilson Law (Act of Congress of August 8, 1890, 26 Stat. 313; 3 Fed. St. Ann. 853) forbidding the sale of liquor in a State in the original package even although brought in through interstate commerce when the existing or future state laws forbade sales of intoxicants. And this was recognized by the long line of decisions (a few of the leading cases are in the margin²):

which upheld that law and pointed out that it permitted the state prohibitions to take away from interstate commerce shipments a right which they otherwise would have embraced, that is, the right to sell after receipt in the original package, any state law to the contrary notwithstanding. At the same time it was recognized, however, that as the right to receive liquor was not affected by the Wilson Act, such receipt and the possession following from it and the resulting right to use remained protected by the commerce clause even in a State where what is known as the dispensary system prevailed. Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. 170 U. S. 438, 18 S. Ct. 674, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 1100. Reading the Webb-Kenyon Law in the light thus thrown upon it by the Wilson Act and the decisions of this court which sustained and applied it, [324] there is no room for doubt that it was enacted simply to extend that which was done by the Wilson Act, that is to say, its purpose was to prevent the immunity characteristic of interstate commerce from being used to permit the receipt of liquor through such commerce in States contrary to their laws, and thus in effect afford a means by subterfuge and indirection to set such laws at naught. In this light it is clear that the Webb-Kenyon Act, if effect is to be given to its text, but operated so as to cause the prohibitions of the West Virginia law against shipment, receipt and possession to be applicable and controlling irrespective of whether the state law did or did not prohibit the individual use of liquor. That such also was the embodied spirit of the Webb-Kenyon Act plainly appears since if that be not true, the coming into being of the act is wholly inexplicable.

The case in this court relied upon to establish the contrary (Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky, 238 U. S. 190, Ann. Cas. 1915D 1167, 35 S. Ct. 824, L.R.A.1916C 273) clearly does not do so. All that was decided in that case was that as the court of last resort of Kentucky into which liquor had been shipped had held that the state statute did not forbid shipment and receipt of liquor for personal use, therefore the Webb-Kenyon Act did not apply, since it only applied to things which the state law prohibited. The leading state case cited is Van Winkle v. State, 4 Boyce (Del.) 578. It is true in that case the state law prohibited shipment to and receipt of intoxicants in local option territory, and if the Webb-Kenyon Law had been applied, there would have been no possible ground for claiming that the state prohibitions could be escaped because the liquor was shipped in interstate commerce. But the shipment was held to be protected as interstate commerce despite the state prohibition because the Webb-Kenyon Law was not correctly applied, for the following reason: Coming to consider the text of that law, the court said that as the Webb-Kenyon Act prohibited [325] the shipment of intoxicants "only when the liquor is intended to be used in violation of the law of the state," and as the liquor shipped was intended for personal use, which was not forbidden, therefore the shipment, although prohibited by the state law, was beyond the reach of the Webb-Kenyon Act. But we see no ground for following the ruling thus made since, as we have already pointed out, it necessarily rested upon an entire misconception of the text of the Webb-Kenyon Act, because that act did not simply forbid the introduction of liquor into a State for a prohibited use, but took the protection of interstate commerce away from all receipt and possession of liquor prohibited by state law.

The movement of liquor in interstate commerce and the receipt and possession and right to sell prohibited by the state law having been in express terms divested by the Webb-Kenyon Act of their interstate commerce character, it follows that if that act was within the power of Congress to adopt, there is no possible reason for holding that to enforce the prohibitions of the state law would conflict with the commerce clause of the Constitution; and this brings us to the last question, which is:

4. Did Congress have power to enact the Webb-Kenyon Law?

We are not unmindful that opinions adverse to the power of Congress to enact the law were formed and expressed in other departments of the government. Opinion of the Attorney General, 30 Op. A. G. 88; Veto Message of the President, Cong. Rec. vol. 49, pt. 5, p. 4291. We are additionally conscious, therefore, of the responsibility of determining these issues and of their serious character.

It is not in the slightest degree disputed that if Congress had prohibited the shipment of all intoxicants in the channels of interstate commerce and therefore had prevented all movement between the several States, such action would have been lawful because within the power [326] to regulate which the Constitution conferred. Lottery Case, 188 U. S. 321, 23 S. Ct. 321, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 492. Hoke v. U. S. 227 U. S. 308, Ann. Cas. 1913E 905, 33 S. Ct. 281, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 523, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906. The issue, therefore, is not one of an absence of authority to accomplish in substance a more extended result than that brought about by the Webb-Kenyon Law, but of a want of power to reach the result accomplished because of the method resorted to for that purpose. This is certain since the sole claim is that the act was not within the power given to Congress to regulate because it submitted liquors to the control of the States by subjecting interstate commerce in such liquors to present and future state prohibitions, and hence in the nature of things was wanting in uniformity. Let us test the contentions by reason and authority.

The power conferred is to regulate, and the very terms of the grant would seem to repel the contention that only prohibition of movement in interstate commerce was embraced. And the cogency of this is manifest since if the doctrine were applied to those manifold and important subjects of interstate commerce as to which Congress from the beginning has regulated, not prohibited, the existence of government under the Constitution would be no longer possible.

The argument as to delegation to the States rests upon a mere misconception. It is true the regulation which the Webb-Kenyon Act contains permits state prohibitions to apply to movements of liquor from one State into another, but the will which causes the prohibitions to be applicable is that of Congress, since the application of state prohibitions would cease the instant the act of Congress ceased to apply. In fact the contention previously made that the prohibitions of the state law were not applicable to the extent that they were broader than the Webb-Kenyon Act is in direct conflict with the proposition as to delegation now made.

So far as uniformity is concerned, there is no question [327] that the act uniformly applies to the conditions which call its provisions into play—that its provisions apply to all the States,—so that the question really is a complaint as to the want of uniform existence of things to which the act applies and not to an absence of uniformity in the act itself. But aside from this it is obvious that the argument seeks to engraft upon the Constitution a restriction not found in it, that is, that the power to regulate conferred upon Congress obtains subject to the requirement that regulations enacted shall be uniform throughout the United States. In view of the conceded power on the part of Congress to prohibit the movement of intoxicants in interstate commerce, we cannot admit that because it did not exert its authority to the full limit, but simply regulated to the extent of permitting the prohibitions in one State to prevent the use of interstate commerce to ship liquor from another State, Congress exceeded its authority to regulate. We can see, therefore, no force in the argument relied upon tested from the point of view of reason, and we come to the question of authority.

It is settled, says the argument, that interstate commerce is divided into two great classes, one embracing subjects which do not exact uniformity and which, although subject to the regulation of Congress, are in the absence of such regulation subject to the control of the several States (Cooley v. Philadelphia, 12 How. 299, 13 U. S. (L. ed.) 966), and the other embracing subjects which do require uniformity and which in the absence of regulation by Congress remain free from all state control (Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 10 S. Ct. 681, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 128). As to the first, it is said, Congress may, when regulating, to the extent it deems wise to do so permit state legislation enacted or to be enacted to govern, because to do so would only be to do that which would exist if nothing had been done by Congress. As to the second class, the argument is, that in adopting regulations Congress is wholly without power to provide for the application [328] of state power to any degree whatever, because in the absence of the exertion by Congress of power to regulate, the subject-matter would have been free from state control, and because, besides, the recognition of state power under such circumstances would be to bring about a want of uniformity. But granting the accuracy of the two classifications which the proposition states, the limitation upon the power of Congress to regulate which is deduced from the classifications finds no support in the authority relied upon to sustain it. Let us see if this is not the case by examining the authority relied upon. What is that authority? The ruling in Leisy v. Hardin, supra. But that case, instead of supporting the contention, plainly refutes it for the following reason: Although Leisy v. Hardin declared in express terms that the movement of intoxicants in interstate commerce belonged to that class which was free from all interference by state control in the absence of regulation by Congress, it was at the same time in the most explicit terms declared that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce in intoxicants embraced the right to subject such movement to state prohibitions and that the freedom of intoxicants to move in interstate commerce and the protection over it from state control arose only from the absence of congressional regulation and would endure only until Congress had otherwise provided. Thus in that case in pointing out that the movement of intoxicants in interstate commerce was under the control of Congress despite the wide scope of the police authority of the State over the subject, it was said (p. 108): "Yet a subject matter which has been confided exclusively to Congress by the Constitution is not within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State, unless placed there by congressional action." Again, referring to the uniform operation of interstate commerce regulations it was said (p. 109): "Hence, inasmuch as interstate commerce, consisting in the transportation, purchase, [329] sale and exchange of commodities, is national in its character, and must be governed by a uniform system, so long as Congress does not pass any law to regulate it, or allowing the States so to do, it thereby indicates its will that such commerce shall be free and untrammelled." Further the court said (p. 119): "The conclusion follows that, as the grant of the power to regulate commerce among the States, so far as one system is required, is exclusive, the States cannot exercise that power without the assent of Congress, . . ." Again after pointing out that the question of the prohibition of manufacture and sale of particular articles was a matter of state concern, it was said (pp. 123, 124): "But notwithstanding it is not vested with supervisory power over matters of local administration, the responsibility is upon Congress, so far as the regulation of interstate commerce is concerned, to remove the restriction upon the State in dealing with imported articles of trade within its limits, which have not been mingled with the common mass of property therein, if in its judgment the end to be secured justifies and requires such action." And finally, after pointing out that the States had no power to interfere with the movement of goods in interstate commerce before they had been commingled with the property of the State, it was said that this limitation obtained "in the absence of congressional permission" to the State (p. 124).

Thus it follows that although we accept the classification of interstate commerce in intoxicants made in Leisy v. Hardin, we could not accept the contention which is now based upon that classification without in effect overruling that case, or what is equivalent thereto, refusing to give effect to the doctrine of that case announced in terms so certain that there is no room for controversy or contention concerning them. But we would be required to go further than this, since it would result that we would have to shut our eyes to the construction put upon the [330] ruling in Leisy v. Hardin by Congress in legislating when it adopted the Wilson Act and also to practically overrule the line of decisions which we have already referred to sustaining and enforcing that act. Let us see if this is not certain. As we have already pointed out, the very regulation made by Congress in enacting the Wilson Law to minimize the evil resulting from violating prohibitions of state law by sending liquor through interstate commerce into a State and selling it in violation of such law was to divest such shipments of their interstate commerce character and to strip them of the right to be sold in the original package free from state authority which otherwise would have obtained. And that Congress had the right to enact this legislation making existing and future state prohibitions applicable, was the express result of the decided cases to which we have referred, beginning with In re Rahrer, supra. As the power to regulate which was manifested in the Wilson Act and that which was exerted in enacting the Webb-Kenyon Law are essentially identical, the one being but a larger degree of exertion of the identical power which was brought into play in the other, we are unable to understand upon what principle we could hold that the one was not a regulation without holding that the other had the same infirmity, a result which, as we have previously said, would reverse Leisy v. Hardin and overthrow the many adjudications of this court sustaining the Wilson Act.

These considerations dispose of the contention, but we do not stop with stating them but recur again to the reason of things for the purpose of pointing out the fundamental error upon which the contention rests. It is this: the mistaken assumption that the accidental considerations which cause a subject on the one hand to come under state control in the absence of congressional regulation, and other subjects on the contrary to be free from state control until Congress has acted, are the essential criteria by which to test the question of the power of Congress to [331] regulate and the mode in which the exertion of that power may be manifested. The two things are widely different, since the right to regulate and its scope and the mode of exertion must depend upon the power possessed by Congress over the subject regulated. Following the unerring path pointed out by that great principle we can see no reason for saying that although Congress in view of the nature and character of intoxicants had a power to forbid their movement in interstate commerce, it had not the authority to so deal with the subject as to establish a regulation (which is what was done by the Webb-Kenyon Law) making it impossible for one State to violate the prohibitions of the laws of another through the channels of interstate commerce. Indeed, we can see no escape from the conclusion that if we accepted the proposition urged, we would be obliged to, announce the contradiction in terms that because Congress had exerted a regulation lesser in power than it was authorized to exert, therefore its action was void for excess of power. Or, in other words, stating the necessary result of the argument from a concrete consideration of the particular subject here involved, that because Congress in adopting a regulation had considered the nature and character of our dual system of government, State and Nation, and instead of absolutely prohibiting, had so conformed its regulation as to produce co-operation between the local and national forces of government to the end of preserving the rights of all, it had thereby transcended the complete and perfect power of regulation conferred by the Constitution. And it is well again to point out that this abnormal result to which the argument leads concerns a subject as to which both State and Nation in their respective spheres of authority possessed the supremest authority before the action of Congress which is complained of, and hence the argument virtually comes to the assertion that in some undisclosed way by the exertion of congressional authority, power possessed has evaporated.

[332] It is only necessary to point out that the considerations which we have stated dispose of all contentions that the Webb-Kenyon Act is repugnant to the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment (9 Fed. St. Ann. 288) since what we have said concerning that clause in the Fourteenth Amendment as applied to state power is decisive.

Before concluding we come to consider what we deem to be arguments of inconvenience which are relied upon, that is, the dread expressed that the power by regulation to allow state prohibitions to attach to the movement of intoxicants lays the basis for subjecting interstate commerce in all articles to state control and therefore destroys the Constitution. The want of force in the suggested inconvenience becomes patent by considering the principle which after all dominates and controls the question here presented, that is, the subject regulated and the extreme power to which that subject may be subjected. The fact that regulations of liquor have been upheld in numberless instances which would have been repugnant to the great guarantees of the Constitution but for the enlarged right possessed by government to regulate liquor, has never that we are aware of been taken as affording the basis for the thought that government might exert an enlarged power as to subjects to which under the constitutional guarantees such enlarged power could not be applied. In other words, the exceptional nature of the subject here regulated is the basis upon which the exceptional power exerted must rest and affords no ground for any fear that such power may be constitutionally extended to things which it may not, consistently with the guarantees of the Constitution, embrace.

NOTE.

In the reported case the Federal Supreme Court affirms the validity of the Webb-Kenyon

Law (Act March 1, 1913, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 208) and holds that the act renders applicable to interstate shipments a state statute forbidding the possession of liquor in the state or the transportation of liquor into the state for any purpose. In other words, while the act of Congress adds nothing to a state regulation, it relieves any and every state regulation of intoxicants from the objection that it is an attempted regulation of interstate commerce. The validity and construction of the Webb-Kenyon Law are discussed in the note to Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky, Ann. Cas. 1915D 1167.

As to the validity of certain state regulations whose operation is by that law extended to interstate shipments, see the note to Longmire v. State, Ann. Cas. 1917A 726 (discussing the validity of a statute forbidding the bringing of liquor into prohibition territory) and the notes to Com. v. Campbell, 19 Ann. Cas. 159, and Cortland v. Larson, Ann. Cas. 1916E 775 (discussing the right to prohibit the possession of intoxicating liquor for personal use).

ONTARIO ASPHALT BLOCK COMPANY

v.

LUKE MONTREUIL.

Canada Supreme Court—February 21, 1916.

52 Can. Sup. Ct. 541.

Vendor and Purchaser — Breach of Contract — Inability to Make Title — Measure of Damages.

A vendor who, without fault on his part, is unable to make title is not liable in damages to the vendee for the loss of his bargain though the contract to sell is part of a lease to the vendee which binds him to make extensive improvements.

Appeal for Appellate Division of Supreme Court of Ontario.

Action by Ontario Asphalt Block Company, plaintiff, against Luke Montreuil, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court. Judgment modified by Appellate Division. Plaintiff appeals. DISMISSED.

[541] On the 2nd day of February, 1903 the respondent leased to the appellants a certain parcel of land in the Township of Sandwich East, and extending from [542] the front River Road to the water's edge and from there to the channel bank of the Detroit River, for a term of ten years at a rental of $1,000 a year. The lease contained a provision giving the appellants the right to purchase the premises at the end of the term of ten years for $22,000, provided the company gave six months previous notice in writing of its intention to do so.

The appellant company was incorporated for the purpose of manufacturing asphalt blocks, and upon entering the premises under the lease they erected a large expensive manufacturing plant and built expensive docks, partly on the land and partly on the water lot, the whole of the expenditure amounting to about $200,000, and from year to year the company spent some $8,000 to $12,000 a year for betterments and improvements, including the necessary repairs.

The company gave the required six months notice in pursuance of the terms of the lease, and on the 2nd day of February, 1913, at the end of the said term granted by the lease, tendered to the respondent the sum of $22,000 demanding a conveyance of the lands and premises. But the respondent refused to accept said sum and refused to make the conveyance as provided under the terms of the lease.

The company commenced an action on the 10th day of February, 1913, claiming specific performance of the covenant contained in the lease, and damages.

The action came on for trial before the Honourable Mr. Justice Lennox without a jury on the 27th day of May, 1913, and it appeared at the trial from the evidence of the respondent, Montreuil, that he had made the lease in question under the assumption that he was the owner in fee simple of the property set out [543] in the lease, but that he discovered in 1908 that he only had a life estate in the property.

The respondent was advised by counsel at that time that the property went to his children after his death, but no evidence was offered of any effort being made by the respondent to get in a title to the property, nor was any evidence offered of any refusal by the respondent's children to join in a conveyance of the property to the appellant company under the terms of the lease. But there is evidence that they did join with him in the conveyance of other portions of the property.

Evidence was given that the property had increased enormously in value since the making of the lease.

The learned trial judge reserved judgment, and subsequently on the 19th day of June, 1913, delivered judgment decreeing specific performance of the agreement for the interest of the defendant in all the demised lands and an abatement in the purchase money for the difference in value on the 2nd day of February, 1913, of an estate in fee simple and an estate for the life of the defendant in respect of so much of the land as the defendant was not able to convey in fee, and also in respect of the damages which the plaintiffs might suffer by reason of such breach of contract over and above the difference in value of an estate in fee simple and for the life of the defendant; and directed reference to the master of the court at Sandwich.

The respondent appealed to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, which gave judgment on the 27th day of November, 1914, varying the judgment of the trial judge by directing that the abatement in the purchase money should be based upon the assumption that the value of the fee simple [544] was, at the date of expiry of the term, the proportionate part of the purchase price agreed upon attributable to the land in which the lessor had only a life estate and by directing further that the plaintiff company should have no damages for any loss sustained by reason of the money expended upon the property or by reason of any other matter except the abatement aforesaid.

Cowan K. C. for respondent.

Rodd, Wigle & McHugh, solicitors for appellant.

Kenning & Cleary, solicitors for respondent.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting).—The respondent granted to the appellant a lease dated 2nd February, 1903, of certain parcels of land in the Township of Sandwich East fronting on the Detroit River for the term of ten years at the rents and subject to the [545] covenants and conditions therein mentioned. The lease contained the following (amongst other) provisions:—

"It is agreed between the parties hereto that the lessee, its successors and assigns shall have the right to purchase the demised premises at the end of the demised term of ten years for the cash sum of $22,000, provided it shall have given six months' previous notice in writing of its intention so to do.

"And the said lessor for himself, his heirs, administrators, executors and assigns, covenants that he will on the exercise by the lessee of said option to purchase and on payment of said sum of $22,000 execute and deliver to the lessee, its successors and assigns, a good and sufficient deed in fee simple free of incumbrances of the land hereinbefore described.

"It is also agreed that in case said lessee fails to exercise said option to purchase by giving said notice it may on giving three months' notice in writing before the expiration of the demised term have a renewal of this lease for a further term of ten years on the same terms as to rent, payment of taxes and water rates.

"The lessee for itself, its successors and assigns agrees to build a dock on the demised premises within one year from the date hereof at a cost of at least $6,000, which dock is to become the property of the lessor at the end of the demised term or after the renewal term in case of renewal as aforesaid unless in the exercise of the option the lessee purchases the said lands."

The appellant constructed the dock stipulated for in the lease and during its currency expended many thousand dollars in buildings on and improvements to the property.

The appellant duly gave the requisite notice to purchase the demised premises. It then appeared that the respondent was not possessed of the fee simple of the premises and was consequently unable to carry out his agreement to sell. Such title as the respondent had was derived from the will of his father, Luc X. Montreuil.

The devise which covers the lands in question in this suit is in the following terms:—

"I give and devise to my son Luc all that, etc., . . . to him said Luc during his natural life, then to his children, should he [546] marry and have issue share and share alike their heirs and assigns forever."

The respondent had nine children.

The appellant claimed:—

1. Specific performance of the covenant to convey contained in the indenture of lease.

2. Damages.

The judgment of the appeal court proceeds on the rule established by the jurisprudence of the English courts that the contract for sale of real property is an exception to the ordinary rules of law applicable to the question of the damages recoverable upon a breach of contract.

This rule, first laid down in the case of Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, is that upon a contract for the purchase of real estate if the vendor, without fraud, is incapable of making a good title the intended purchaser is not entitled to any compensation for the loss of his bargain.

Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, was much disputed and in several cases held open to exceptions. It was, however, discussed and approved in the case of Bain v. Fothergill, L. R. 7 H. L. (Eng.) 158, in the House of Lords when the judges were summoned to advise the House.

Though it is claimed to have been introduced from the civil law it has been said that the exception to the general rule as to damages established by Flureau v. Thornhill,

2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, is not founded upon any principle. In the case of Engell v. Fitch, L. R. 4 Q. B. (Eng.) 659, 666, Lord Chief Baron Kelly speaks of the rule as a "qualification of the rule of common law, . . . founded entirely on the difficulty that a vendor often finds in making a title to real estate, [547] not from any default on his part, but from his ignorance of the strict legal state of his title."

Where the condition for this reason for the rule does not exist, at any rate to the same extent, it would seem that the latter would have a more limited application. The state of the title to real estate in England is undoubtedly vastly more complicated than in this country. The defect in the title in the present case is so obvious that it does not require a lawyer to discover it; the property is left to the devisee "during his natural life, then to his children;" if the respondent had looked to his title at all he could hardly have thought himself the absolute owner of the property to dispose of as he alone pleased.

There is another ground which distinguishes this case from Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078. It was held that the case of Hopkins v. Grazebrook, 6 B. & C. 31, 13 E. C. L. 100, provided an exception to the rule in the former case and one of the grounds on which the decision was based was that the defendant expressly undertook to make a good title. The respondent in this case expressly undertook to execute a conveyance in fee simple.

The rule in Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, finds little favour in the United States. In Sedgwick on Damages, 9th ed. vol. 3, at p. 2121, we read:—

"If the defendant fails to convey because he has not a good title, he is always liable in substantial damages. This is commonly called the United States Supreme Court Rule, and represents one extreme of the series of principles of which the highest English court has adopted the other extreme. It seems to be the correct one on principle."

I have thought it well to make the foregoing remarks as perhaps affording support to the appeal, but [548] the real ground on which I rest my judgment is that in any event this case is outside the transactions to which in its widest interpretation the rule making exception to the general law of contracts has any application.

The rule deals solely with a simple contract for an immediate sale of real estate. According to the English practice this is directly followed by the delivery by the vendor to the purchaser of the abstract of title. If it then appears that the title is defective the expenses to which the purchaser has been put are ordinarily little more than for the investigation of the title and these he is entitled to recover; beyond this actual outlay he has lost nothing but the fancied goodness of his bargain and for this he is not entitled to damages.

It must be remembered that the practice of giving options does not obtain to any great extent in England and there is very little to be found in the books on the subject.

Now in Bain v. Fothergill, L. R. 7 H. L. (Eng.) 158, Mr. Justice Denman speaking of the case of Engell v. Fitch, L. R. 4 Q. B. (Eng.) 659, in which it was held that the rule in Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, did not apply, said:—

"The case is of great value as shewing beyond all question that the rule in Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, is a rule wholly confined to cases of inability to make a title, and not to breaches of contract in respect of the sale of real property from whatever cause arising."

And criticising the judgment in Hopkins v. Grazebrook, 6 B. & C. 31, 13 E. C. L. 100, he says:—

"When carefully examined, I think that all the observations of the learned judges in that case, read with reference to the facts of the case, amount to no more than a decision that mere inability to [549] make a good title does not, of itself, bring a vendor within the rule laid down in Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, as to damages; but that it depends upon the nature of the contract, and also upon the reasons for the inability, whether he can avail himself of that rule; and that in such a case as that of Hopkins v. Grazebrook, 6 B. & C. 31, 13 E. C. L. 100, a vendor was not within the rule. . . . In my opinion the judgments are to be read as only containing some of the reasons for holding that whether Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, was correctly decided or not, it certainly was no authority for the proposition that under all circumstances, and whatever the cause of the default, a vendor unable to make a good title should have a right to break his contract, subject to a certain limited amount of damages."

In Mayne on Damages (8 ed.) p. 245, we read:—

"It has also been held that the rule in Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078, does not apply in cases where the agreement shews upon its face that the vendor has not as yet got and, therefore, possibly may never get the title which he undertakes to convey; yet he expressly undertakes at once, or on a given date, to put the purchaser in possession; and the purchaser, in consideration of such agreement, undertakes to do, and does, something which cannot be undone, and which is of permanent benefit to the vendor; for the very nature of the undertaking, on both sides, shews that it is not dependent on the contingency of a good title being made out. In such a case damages for breach of agreement will not be merely nominal. The purchaser will be entitled, under the general rule of common law, to such a pecuniary amount as is the difference between the present state of things, and what it would have been if the contract had been duly carried out."

A case in support of this is Wall v. London Real Property Co. L. R. 9 Q. B. (Eng.) 249.

Now what is the contract in this case? The respondent leases to the appellant for ten years at $1,000 a year with onerous covenants by the lessee; it is agreed that the lessee shall at the expiration of the term have the option to purchase for $22,000, the lessor covenanting to execute a good and sufficient deed in fee simple; in case the lessee fails to exercise the option to purchase it may have a renewal of the [550] lease for a further ten years; the lessee agrees to build a dock at a cost of at least $6,000 to become the property of the lessor unless the lessee purchases.

The lessee has not only fulfilled all the agreements in the lease and done everything requisite to obtain a conveyance in fee simple, but has expended further large sums in improvement of the property, of course, in anticipation of becoming the owner at the expiration of the lease.

Is it not obvious that the damages sustained by the appellant by reason of the failure of the respondent to implement his agreement are altogether special and by no means such loss of a bargain as alone is contemplated by the rule in Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078?

I think it is impossible to hold that such an agreement is to be governed by an admittedly anomalous rule of law in England, one based on reasons which may have little application here; presupposing entirely different conditions and intended to have application not to any damage sustained by the purchaser, but solely to the possible loss of his prospective profit on a resale of the property.

It cannot, I think, be necessary to treat this very special rule as absolutely inflexible regardless of all attendant conditions. I am not quite able to follow the learned judge of the Appellate Division in what he says as to the anomaly of a purchaser who has elected to take what the vendor can convey recovering damages as well. He states that he has not found any cases in which such damages have been awarded. Inasmuch as the rule provides that no damages can be recovered even if partial performance of the contract [551] is not decreed, this would appear to be only natural since the decision of Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 1078. I think before this time cases might be found. In Cleaton v. Gower, Finch (Eng.) 164, the defendant agreed to lease to the plaintiff for ten years with the right to take out coal and other minerals, and in his defence pleaded that he was only tenant for life and, therefore, he could not execute the agreement because " 'tis inconsistent with his power so to do." The court decreed that Gower should execute his agreement in specie as far as he was capable of doing it, and likewise shall satisfy the plaintiff, such damages as he hath sustained in not enjoying the premises according to the agreement, and seal a lease for ten years, etc.

There is no objection to the court in a proper case decreeing specific performance and also awarding damages. In the head-note in Phelps v. Prothero, 7 De G. M. & G. (Eng.) 722, we read:—

"In a case decided before 21 & 22 Vict. ch. 27, came into operation, held that the court has jurisdiction to award damages for the want of a literal performance of a contract of which it directs the specific performance and will in general do so."

Of course the "Chancery Amendment Act," 21 & 22 Vict. ch. 27 ("Lord Cairns' Act") gave express power to the court to award damages either in addition to or in substitution for specific performance.

Then as to the remarks of Chief Justice Meredith concerning the appellants' means of knowledge of the respondent's title. The latter being only tenant for life could, of course, make no demise to endure beyond [552] his own life and, therefore, was in no position to make the lease for ten years, still less to covenant for its renewal for a further term of ten years. The lessee could not call for or dispute the lessor's title and until the option to purchase was exercised there was no contract for sale which would have entitled the appellant to call for the title.

The Chief Justice says that the appellant had the same opportunity of knowing what the nature of the respondent's title was as the respondent himself had. I think this must be going too far in any case; the respondent must surely as devisee under the will of his father be credited with better knowledge than the appellant. But in any case such knowledge would have been accidental in this particular case and cannot, I think, affect the principle involved.

That it would have been the more prudent course for the appellant when making the contract to have insisted on immediate preliminary proof of the respondent's title may be admitted and perhaps the company may have to suffer loss in any event as a consequence of not doing so, but that is no reason for relieving the respondent from liability for failure to fulfil his contractual obligations. Chief Justice Meredith says that it may seem a hardship that the rights of the appellants should be limited to the relief to which his judgment holds them entitled. I think myself the appellant would suffer a great wrong in such case and am glad to think that there is no absolute rule of law which deprives them of their remedy.

As regards the damages to which the appellant is entitled I do not know that I can do better than refer to the case above cited of Wall v. London [553] Real Property Co. L. R. 9 Q. B. (Eng.) 249. The question in that case were:—

"1st. Whether the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages only?

"2nd. On what principle the damages are to be assessed?"

And the Court:—

"We answer the first question by saying that the plaintiff is not confined to nominal damages only. To the second we answer that the arbitrator must apply the general rule of common law, and ascertain as well as he can what the pecuniary amount is of the difference between the present state of things and what it would have been if the contract had been performed and the plaintiff had got a title."

The only difference in the present case is that the Master must ascertain as well as he can what is the pecuniary amount of the difference between the state of things as it will be under the limited estate which the appellant takes in accordance with the judgment and what it would have been if the contract had been performed.

I would allow the appeal with costs.

DAVIES J. (dissenting).—The question in this case to be determined is whether the facts bring it within the rule of law laid down in Bain v. Fothergill, L. R. 7 H. L. (Eng.) 158, that if a vendor of land without fraud is incapable of making a good title the intending purchaser is not entitled to recover compensation in damages for the loss of his bargain.

That rule has for many years been adopted as part of their jurisprudence by the Ontario courts and it is not my desire or intention to call that adoption in question.

The question arising in this appeal is not whether [554] that rule is in force in Ontario, but whether the facts of this case bring it within the rule.

I understand a majority of the court holds that the rule applies and I desire to state very shortly my reasons for dissenting.

In the case of Day v. Singleton [1899] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 320, the Court of Appeal held that:—

"A purchaser of leasehold property which the vendor cannot assign without a license from his lessor, is entitled to damages (beyond return of the deposit, with interest and expenses) for loss of his bargain by reason of the vendor's omission to do his best to procure such license."

In delivering the judgment of the court, Lord Lindley, M. R. said, p. 328:—

"Singleton never asked the lessors to accept Day as their tenant without a bar and consequently it would be for him, Singleton, to shew that if he had asked them they would have refused."

Now, in the present case, it is contended that when the respondent Montreuil ascertained that he could not give the Ontario Asphalt Company a good title and that he had only a life estate, the remainder being in his children, it became his duty as between him and the Asphalt Company with whom he had covenanted to give a good title to do all that lay in his power to enable him to carry out his contract and to shew that he had applied to his children to join with him in conveying to the Asphalt Company and that they had refused to do so.

There was evidence that they did join with him upon request in the conveyance of other portions of the same property, but no evidence that he had applied to them to do so with respect to the property in dispute.

[555] I confess I was much struck with this argument. If it was Montreuil's duty "to do all that lay in his power" to give appellants a good title, then it seems reasonable to say that it would be part of his duty to the Asphalt Company under the peculiar facts of this case to try and obtain the signature of his children to the deed and so complete his contracts with them. Lehmann v. McArthur, L. R. 3 Ch. (Eng.) 496, at pp. 500 and 503; Williams v. Glenton, L. R. 1 Ch. (Eng.) 200, at pp. 208–209, and Godwin v. Francis, L. R. 5 C. P. (Eng.) 295, 306.

I do not desire, however, to rest my judgment upon that ground, but rather upon the ground that the special facts of this case and the special terms of the lease to the company with the option of purchase at the end of the term of ten years, provided six months' notice of the lessee's intention to purchase was given, together with the covenant on the lessor, Montreuil's part to convey a good title in fee simple, and a covenant from the lessee to build a dock on the demised premises within a year from the granting of the lease at a cost of at least $6,000, which dock was to become the property of the lessor at the end of the demised term, unless the lessee purchased under his option, all combine to convince me that this is not a case in which the rule in Bain v. Fothergill, L. R. 7 H. L. (Eng.) 158, should be applied, but rather one in which on the neglect, refusal or inability of the lessor to comply with his covenant to give a good title free from incumbrance substantial damages should be awarded.

The evidence shewed that the company had after entering upon the lands under the lease erected an [556] expensive manufacturing plant and docks partly on the leased upland and partly on the water lot in front of it as to which latter lot Montreuil had obtained a grant from the Crown, the whole expenditure aggregating $200,000, besides yearly betterments and improvements. A part of this expenditure at least was made in pursuance of respondent's covenant in the lease to expend at least $6,000 in dock construction.

The Appellate Division, reversing the trial judge, who had decreed specific performance and an abatement in the price amounting to substantial damages the latter to be determined on a reference, directed that the abatement in the purchase money should be based upon the value of the interest in the lands which the defendant could convey, having regard to the "purchase price" of the whole and refusing other damages beyond the abatement.

I cannot accede to the principle on which the Appellate Court has directed the abatement, basing it upon the stipulated purchase price and limiting it to that while ignoring the expenditure which as part of the consideration for the granting of the lease the lessees covenanted to make in building a dock on the lands.

This expenditure, the minimum amount of which was placed at $6,000 and the maximum of which might reach $60,000 or more, was really and substantially as much a part of the purchase price as the $22,000 mentioned and has just as much right to be considered in determining what abatement should be made as the latter sum.

But over and beyond that I do not think the case [557] is one within the principle of Bain v. Fothergill, L. R. 7 H. L. (Eng.) 158, nor that substantial damages should be denied the vendee. That principle is as Lindley, M. R. says in Day v. Singleton [1899] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 320, "an anomalous rule based upon and justified by difficulties in shewing a good title to real property in this country, but one which ought not to be extended in cases to which the reasons on which it is based do not apply."

Now, I take it that one of the reasons on which the rule is based is that it is not within the contemplation of both parties in the ordinary case of a contract for sale of land, that if the vendor is incapable of making a good title the intending purchaser is to receive compensation for the loss of his bargain beyond the expenses he has incurred.

But if there are special facts in the case shewing that it was and must have been in contemplation of both parties that failure on the part of the vendor to carry out his covenant to "execute and deliver to the purchaser a good and sufficient deed in fee simple of the land" must inevitably cause the intending purchaser great damage, as was the case here: and if, in addition, the purchaser has bound himself on the faith of this covenant to expend very large sums of money on dock and other improvements as the purchaser did here, then I say in the event of the vendor failing to give the good title he covenanted to give, the common-law rule as to damages for breach of contract applies and the "anomalous rule" laid down in Bain v. Fothergill, L. R. 7 H. L. (Eng.) 158, relating to ordinary contracts between vendor and vendee with respect to the sale of lands does not apply.

[558] I do not contend that any damages can be recovered in respect of anything that the purchaser did or incurred after he discovered the defect in the title; I limit my observations to those incurred by him before such discovery.

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal.

INGTON J.—I think the judgment appealed from is right for the reasons assigned in support thereof by the learned Chief Justice for Ontario.

The case seems a hard one, but that is no reason for our adopting bad law and disturbing the minds of those who prefer that well-settled law should be upheld.

In truth we are asked to assess damages besides giving such relief in way of specific performance as can be given.

Assuming for argument's sake damages recoverable at all in such a case (which I do not admit) the basis therefor must be proved as in any other claim for damages. It is not enough to rouse mere suspicion.

The respondent was a witness and counsel for appellant refrained from asking him a single question, much less anything tending to shew he had acted in bad faith or failed in any regard to do what his contract bound him to do. It can only be in such a case as shews a failure of duty on a defendant's part that damages would be assessable even if all questions relative to specific performance were out of the case. The circumstances relied on do not supply such proof as required.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

DUFF J.—I concur in the judgment of the court dismissing the appeal.

[559] ANGLIN J.—Admitting the applicability of the rule laid down in Bain v. Fothergill, L. R. 7 H. L. (Eng.) 175, to the original option in this case, the appellants have sought to bring it within the qualification upon that rule recognized in Day v. Singleton [1899] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 320. But in the latter case the Court of Appeal, as the judgment of Lord Lindley shews (p. 328), took the view that the correspondence between Singleton's solicitors and the lessor established that if Singleton (the vendor of the leasehold) did not actually procure the refusal of the lessors' assent to the assignment to Day, he "certainly made no effort to obtain it . . . as it was the duty to do . . . and it ought to be inferred as against Singleton that the lessors would have accepted Day if Singleton had asked them to do so."

The decision there proceeded upon the fact, held to have been sufficiently proven, that it was within the vendor's power to carry out his contract and that he refused or neglected to take the means available. Here the plaintiffs rely upon the fact that the defendant maintained silence after his inability to make title had become known and they had asked him to obtain confirmation of the option from the remaindermen, the fact that the remaindermen had (under what circumstances, or for what consideration does not appear) confirmed the title of some other grantees of the defendant who were in like plight with the plaintiffs, and the further fact that, in answer to the plaintiff's suit for specific performance, other defences were set up in addition to that of inability to make title. I am quite unable to find in these bald facts—and the plaintiffs have nothing else—enough [560] to warrant an inference that the defendant after discovery of the defect in his title made no effort to procure the concurrence of the remaindermen; still less do I find enough to warrant the inference that such an effort, if made, would have been successful.

The appeal, in my opinion, fails and should be dismissed with costs.

BRODEUR, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Measure of Damages for Breach of Contract to Sell Land Due to Vendor's Inability to Make Title.

Rule in Kentucky, 862.

Introductory.

The earlier cases passing on the measure of damages for the breach of a contract to sell land, due to the vendor's inability to make title, are collated in the notes to Arensten v. Moreland, as reported in 2 Ann. Cas. 628 and 106 Am. St. Rep. 951. The recent cases, which are reviewed in the present note, disclose the same conflict of authority which appeared in the former discussions of the question. In some jurisdictions the courts regard as settled law the English rule which allows only nominal damages in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the vendor, and adhere to that doctrine though confessing in some instances their inability to find a satisfactory reason for its existence. In other jurisdictions the damages actually sustained by the vendee are allowed, irrespective of the vendor's good faith.

View Allowing Substantial Damages for Breach.

In many jurisdictions the vendee is allowed to recover substantial damages against a vendor who fails to perform through inability to make title, the courts either ignoring the question of good faith on the part of the vendor or repudiating the view that it is material in determining the right of the vendee to recover the damages actually sustained by him. Clark v. Belt, 223 Fed. 573, 138 C. C. A. 1; Bender v. Barton, 182 Ala. 181, 62 So. 732; Crandall v. Kirk, 185 Ill. App. 460; Cullumber v. Winter, 154 Ia. 263, 134 N. W. 601; White v. Harvey (Ia.) 157 N. W. 152; Adams v. North American Ins. Co. 210 Mass. 550, 96 N. E. 1094; Nolde v. Gray, 73 Neb. 373, 102 N. W. 759, 104 N. W. 165; Beck v. Staats, 80 Neb. 482, 114 N. W. 633, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 768; Anderson v. Ohnoutka, 84 Neb. 517, 121 N. W. 577; Beetem v. Follmer, 87 Neb. 514, 127 N. W. 858; Merritt v. Adams County Land, etc. Co. 29 N. D. 496, 151 N. W. 11; Francis v. Brown, 22 Wyo. 528, 145 Pac. 750. Compare Eggert v. Pratt, 126 Ia. 727, 102 N. W. 786; Portsmouth Sav. Bank v. Yeiser, 81 Neb. 343, 116 N. W. 38.

Thus in Clark v. Belt, supra, the court said that the rule, which was supported by the weight of state authority in the United States, was that the measure of damages was the difference between the purchase price and the market value of the property at the time of the contract of sale. See to the same effect Nolde v. Gray, 73 Neb. 373, 102 N. W. 759, 104 N. W. 165; Beck v. Staats, 80 Neb. 482, 114 N. W. 633, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 768; Merritt v. Adams County Land, etc. Co. 29 N. D. 496, 151 N. W. 11; Francis v. Brown, 22 Wyo. 528, 145 Pac. 750. So in Crandell

v. Kiek, 185 Ill. App. 460, the court said that the measure of damages for the breach of a contract to deliver a merchantable title was the difference between the actual value of the title delivered and its agreed value. Likewise in Adams v. North American Ins. Co. 210 Mass. 550, 96 N. E. 1094, wherein it appeared that the property contracted to be sold, when the time came for making the conveyance, was subject to attachments to an amount far exceeding its apparent value, the court said that the purchaser could not have been compelled to accept a conveyance and that the vendor would have been liable for damages in a sum equal to the value of the property. In Bender v. Barton, 182 Ala. 181, 62 So. 732, it appeared that the vendor had wrongfully obtained possession of the deed of the property which he had contracted to convey to the vendee. The court said that the vendor could not show his own wrong for the purpose of defeating the vendee's claim and that he was liable for all the damages suffered by the vendee as the natural and proximate result of the breach and which might reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made as a probable result of the breach. So in White v. Harvey (Ia.) 157 N. W. 152, wherein it appeared that the defendant was unable to comply with the terms of his contract because of a defect in the title of the land, the court said that the purchaser was entitled to damages for the breach of the contract, which might include compensation for the loss of his bargain. See also Anderson v. Ohnoutka, 84 Neb. 517, 121 N. W. 577; Beetem v. Follmer, 87 Neb. 514, 127 N. W. 858.

But in Eggert v. Pratt, 126 Ia. 727, 102 N. W. 786, it appeared that the defendant, being the owner of the undivided one-third of the land in question, and guardian of her minor daughter who owned the other undivided two-thirds, entered into a written contract to convey the entire property to the plaintiff. In entering into the contract, the plaintiff knew the condition of the title, and knew that a conveyance of the daughter's interest could be had only by authority of the court. Proceedings were afterward begun to obtain the necessary authority to make a conveyance, but were dismissed. It appeared that about the time the contract was made, land in that vicinity was advancing rapidly in value, and that the sale, if carried into effect, would have materially prejudiced the interests of the ward. The court below refused specifically to enforce the agreement, except as to the one-third owned by the defendant, and refused to allow the plaintiff more than nominal damages on account of the defendant's failure to make title to the remainder of the property. The court said:

"The question presented in argument is upon plaintiff's demand for substantial damages. It is shown that the land, at the date when it should have been conveyed according to the contract, was worth materially more than the agreed purchase price, and it is plaintiff's contention that defendant is answerable to him for the margin of profit thus lost. Had defendant represented herself as the owner of the land, and as such entered into the contract to convey it, she would ordinarily be subject to the rule relied upon by plaintiff, and liable to him in damages in the amount by which the market value of the land exceeds the contract price. But this rule has been held by us not to apply where, to the knowledge of both buyer and seller, the latter has no title, and without fraud or bad faith on his part fails to make or convey title in discharge of his contract. In such case there can be no recovery for loss of profits."

View Refusing Substantial Damages in Absence of Fraud.

In some jurisdictions the rule obtains that where a vendor contracts to sell believing that he possesses a good title, on his failure to perform through inability to do so, the vendee is not entitled to damages for loss of his bargain. But if the vendor is guilty of fraud or misrepresentation, substantial damages are recoverable. Smith v. Bangham, 156 Cal. 359, 104 Pac. 689, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 522; Kiger v. McCarthy Co. 10 Cal. App. 308, 101 Pac. 928; Horner v. Beasley, 105 Md. 193, 65 Atl. 820; Fossum v. Requa, 218 N. Y. 339, 113 N. E. 330, reversing 163 App. Div. 890, 147 N. Y. S. 1112; Blate v. Clarry, 50 Misc. 668, 99 N. Y. S. 463; Empire Realty Corp. v. Sayre, 107 App. Div. 415, 95 N. Y. S. 371; Haney v. Hatfield, 241 Pa. St. 413, 88 Atl. 680; Dobson v. Zimmerman, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 394, 118 S. W. 236; Yzaguirre v. Garcia (Tex.) 172 S. W. 139; West Coast Mfg. Co. v. West Coast Imp. Co. 31 Wash. 613, 72 Pac. 455; Babcock v. Marquhart, 53 Wash. 168, 101 Pac. 713; Crosby v. Wynkoop, 56 Wash. 475, 106 Pac. 175; Seymour v. Jaffe, 78 Wash. 1, 138 Pac. 276; Mullen v. Cook, 69 W. Va. 456, 71 S. E. 566; McLennan v. Church, 163 Wis. 411, 158 N. W. 73. See also Willard v. Smith, 34 Mont. 494, 87 Pac. 613; Marsh v. Johnson, 125 App. Div. 597, 109 N. Y. S. 1106. Compare Bowen v. Speer (Tex.) 166 S. W. 1183; Spaulding v. Smith (Tex.) 169 S. W. 627. Thus in Seymour v. Jaffe, 78 Wash. 1, 138 Pac. 276, the court said: "By repeated decisions, it has become the settled doctrine of this court that, where a person contracts to sell real property and is unable to make the conveyance through failure of title, the measure of damages is the purchase money paid, with interest, or nominal damages where no payments have been made; provided that such vendor acts in good faith in the transaction, and without intentional fault or wrongdoing." And in Empire Realty Corp. v. Sayre, 107 App. Div. 415, 95 N. Y. S. 371, it was said: "Whatever the origin of the rule may be, we regard the law as settled that where the vendor, without fraud on his part, is unable to convey a marketable title, the vendee is not entitled to damages for the loss of his bargain, beyond the money paid with interest and expenses resulting from the obligations of the contract itself, although the completion of the bargain might have been profitable to him. But where the vendor is guilty of collusion, tort, artifice or fraud, the vendee is then entitled, not only to compensatory damages, but to damages arising from the loss of the bargain, or the money he might have derived from its completion." So in Horner v. Beasley, 105 Md. 193, 65 Atl. 820, an action for breach of contract to convey real estate on the ground that the title to the property was involved in litigation, the court said there was no error in an instruction that if the jury found that the defendant acted in good faith in failing to perform the contract of sale, the plaintiff was entitled to recover only the amount of his deposit with interest and the expense, if any, incurred in the investigation of the title; but if they found that the defendant had not acted in good faith then in addition to the amounts mentioned the plaintiff could recover the excess, if any, of the market value of the property, at the time of the sale, over the contract price. Likewise in Smith v. Bangham, 156 Cal. 359, 104 Pac. 689, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 522, it appeared that the defendant was unable to give title to land in accordance with the contract entered into by him with the plaintiff for the reason that his wife had a right of homestead in the property and refused to release it. Nominal damages only were allowed. The court said: "The measure of damages in such cases is clearly defined by section 3306 of the Civil Code. The difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate may be recovered only where there has been bad faith on the part of the vendor. Here the court came to the conclusion that the defendant Bangham did not act in bad faith. On this appeal on the judgment-roll, we cannot, therefore, direct the allowance of damages for any greater sum than that recovered. But the question of good or bad faith should be considered anew by the trial court in the light of our views on the main question discussed in this opinion."

In Marsh v. Johnson, 125 App. Div. 597, 109 N. Y. S. 1106, the court said: "Where a vendor, knowing he has no title, engages to deliver a title upon a particular day, without providing for the contingency which he knows is likely to happen, he is not taken out of the rule which requires the vendor to respond in damages for the value of the bargain as well as for the deposit and expenses. He knew the situation; acting in good faith he could easily provide for limiting the damages in his contract in the event that he was unable to close the transaction at the appointed time, and, failing to do this, he must answer for the breach, the same as in any other contract not coming within the exception."

In Bowen v. Speer (Tex.) 166 S. W. 1183, it was said: "Where an owner, after his offer has been accepted, or during the time in which the proposed purchaser is given to accept, sells to some other person, and in the latter case when the offer is accepted within the time limited, without notice of the withdrawal thereof by the owner, a liability for damages as for breach of contract arises, and the measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the property at the time of the breach and the price at which the owner had so offered to sell it."

In Willard v. Smith, 34 Mont. 494, 87 Pac. 613, the action was brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract to convey real property. The defendant was unable to convey a good title. On this account the plaintiff was compelled to purchase the property from the real owner for the consideration of $500 to protect himself for improvements which he had made on the premises. The plaintiff proceeded on the theory that he was entitled to recover the amount paid by him to secure title after his discovery that the defendant could not convey it to him. Affirming a judgment for the defendant the court said: "What is the proper measure of damages? There is a conflict in the decision of the courts of the different states upon this question, but the rule in this state has been fixed by statute. Section 4306 of the Civil Code provides: 'Section 4306. The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property is deemed to be the price paid, and the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon; but adding thereto, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach, and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land.' Here no bad faith is alleged; therefore the rule stated in the first part of the section must apply, viz., that the amount recoverable, if anything, is the price paid, together with the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon. Upon his own statements the plaintiff has secured the title. He therefore has the land with the improvements and thus has the advantage of any enhancement of value since the contract was made. So that the only detriment he has suffered has been his payments to defendant, together with the incidental expenses, if any." In Prentice v. Townsend, 143 App. Div. 151, 127 N. Y. S. 1006, in refusing to allow a purchaser expenses incurred for the services of an architect to prepare plans on the vendor's failing to give good title, the court said: "The general rule is that expenditure by the purchaser for improvements, while he is uncertain about his title, cannot be recovered."

In Meighen v. Couch, 23 Manitoba 117, 9 Dominion L. Rep. 829, 23 West. L. Rep. 523, it was held that a purchaser was not entitled to compensation by way of damage for loss of his bargain where the vendor was unable to make title which on entering into the contract she believed she could do. The court said: "On the 10th June, 1910, the defendant having, between the 2nd and 10th June, discovered that the land did not belong to her, but to the estate of her deceased husband, wrote the plaintiff advising him of the fact, and that she was told she could not sell it, and stating that she wished to sell for the purpose of clearing up a debt on the estate."

Her prompt action in advising the plaintiff of the condition of the title seems to me an answer to any suggestion of improper conduct on her part. The evidence disposes of any question of fraud. The agreement as stated was by correspondence. There was no representation as to the title. The defendant could make no provision for compensation. I believe she was honest in the belief that on the death of her husband she could deal with the property and, upon discovery of her mistake, she immediately advised the plaintiff. As the widow, it is urged that she is the owner of one-third interest in the property, and that, to the extent of this interest, she should be ordered to convey. It is true she is entitled as the widow to one-third of the estate after payment of debts. She has no ascertained or fixed interest in this land, and it is impossible until the debts of the estate are paid to know what her interest may be. So that the cy-pres principle cannot be invoked. I doubt if, indeed, it could even were she the absolute owner of a one-third interest, such interest being so out of proportion to the entirety." And see the reported case. In McNiven v. Pigott, 31 Ont. L. Rep. 365, 33 Ont. L. Rep. 78, 19 Dominion L. Rep. 846, 5 Ont. W. N. 921, 6 Ont. W. N. 341, 7 Ont. W. N. 593, the court said that if a vendor is unable to make title the purchaser cannot obtain damages for the loss of his bargain unless he could recover damages in an action for deceit or unless the failure to make a good title is caused by fault on the part of the vendor.

Rule in Kentucky.

In Freeman v. Falconer, 201 Fed. 785, 120 C. C. A. 32, the court said: "We understand the rule in Kentucky to be that in contracts for the sale of land situated in that state, and in cases not involving his fraud or bad faith, the vendor, in the event of his failure to convey, is liable to the vendee on the basis of the value of the land at the date of making the contract, rather than such value at some later date contemplated for conveyance, and is liable, also, for such expense as the vendee may reasonably and properly incur under the contract." The foregoing rule is supported by the weight of earlier authority in Kentucky jurisdiction, but in a recent decision in that jurisdiction (Jenkins v. Hamilton, 153 Ky. 163, 154 S. W. 937) the court, without referring to the earlier cases, said: "The court properly instructed the jury that the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the fair and reasonable market value of the land on the day it was to have been conveyed under the contract, if the value was in excess of the contract price, and further, that if the value and the contract price were the same on that day, they could find for the plaintiffs only nominal damages for the breach of the contract."

APPEAL OF DELLARIPA.

Connecticut Supreme Court of Errors—
November 10, 1914.

88 Conn. 565; 92 Atl. 116.

Taxation — Local Assessment — Time within Which Proceeding May Be Discontinued.

Until an assessment for a public improvement has been made and adopted by the court of common council, the obligation of the city is not fixed, and the proceeding may be discontinued, notwithstanding the electors of the city have voted to appropriate a sum of money for the construction of the improvement.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1913E 1062.]

Appropriations — Diversion.

An appropriation of public moneys for one object cannot be used for another.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The electors of a municipality voted to appropriate a sum of money to pay the cost of the construction of certain portions of a proposed sewer. The layout by the board of street commissioners was rejected by the court of common council, under the charter, which gave it plenary powers over the layout for sewers, and a new layout made. It is held that an assessment for the sewer as newly laid out was valid, notwithstanding the appropriation had not been apportioned, for until the assessment was made the court of common council had the right to discontinue the original proceeding, and the appropriation could be used only for the construction of the sewer on the original layout.

Municipal Corporations — Debt Limit — Expenditure Assessed against Property.

Though the charter of a municipality provided that the common council should not order any public work requiring an expenditure of more than $10,000, unless approved by a majority at a city meeting, the board of street commissioners may make a valid assessment for the construction of a sewer, costing much more than $10,000, before any appropriation has been made, for until the amount of the special assessment has been laid, the portion to be paid by the city cannot be determined.

Taxation — Local Assessments — For What Purpose — Improvement Abating Nuisance.

Where the power of a city to construct sewers was plenary, the fact that a proposed sewer would also do away with a public nuisance which it was the duty of the city to abate will not invalidate an assessment of benefits on the ground that the construction of the sewer was merely to abate a public nuisance.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1912A 718.]

Assessment of Benefits — Conclusiveness of Finding.

A finding by the committee of special benefits to landowners from the construction of a sewer is conclusive on appeal, where no facts appear of record showing that such finding could not reasonably have been made.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Hartford county: SMITH, Judge.

Appeal to court of common pleas by Francesco Dellaripa from assessment by board of street commissioners for local improvement. From judgment rendered, Dellaripa appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Birdsey E. Case for appellant.

John W. Coogan and William J. Hamersley for appellee.

[566] WHEELER, J.—The Gully Brook sewer ran along the course of the stream known as Gully Brook in Hartford, and for quite a distance in the bed of the brook, being in part an open sewer. Thence it was extended in part on private land and in part on highways.

While the sewer was in this location, the board of street commissioners of the city of Hartford made its report to the court of common council of the city, recommending the layout and construction of a conduit to enclose the part of the sewer located in Gully Brook. The common council board amended the resolution accompanying [567] the report by appropriating $50,000 to be applied toward the cost of constructing a certain part of the conduit, and directed the mayor to insert in the warning of the next city meeting a clause providing for a vote at the meeting upon the question of such appropriation. The report of the street board was accepted, and the resolution, as amended, adopted by both branches of the court of common council. The resolution was then duly referred to the board of street commissioners for assessment of the benefits and damages. Up to this point all the provisions of the charter had been complied with.

Subsequently the city meeting voted to appropriate $50,000 to be applied toward the cost of constructing certain portions of this conduit in accordance with the amendment, and this part included the portion of the conduit crossing the appellant's land. Thereafter the court of common council rejected this resolution of layout. The board of street commissioners thereupon recommended to the court of common council a new layout and construction of a conduit to enclose the Gully Brook sewer. The court of common council accepted the report and adopted its accompanying resolution for the layout and construction of the new conduit.

All proceedings were duly had and the report referred to the board of street commissioners for assessment. The board made report of its assessment to the court of common council, which accepted it. The cost of the conduit was therein estimated to be $132,789.65. The assessments to those specially benefited was $22,789.65, and this amount included the sum of $404.07 of special benefits to property of the appellant. The remainder of the cost was assessed against the city of Hartford, viz., $110,000.

The appeal attacks the assessment made upon the [568] appellant upon four grounds, which we shall consider in order.

1. That the city of Hartford was without power to levy this assessment, because the appropriation of $50,000 had not been apportioned or applied toward the construction of this conduit.

The appropriation was voted by the city meeting to apply toward the cost of constructing the Gully Brook conduit as then laid out. The power of the court of common council of Hartford over the layout of sewers is plenary. Charter (Revision of 1908) pp. 58, 59, §§ 112, 113. This layout was duly made by it. Before the proceeding was complete and the assessment adopted, it rejected the report of the board of street commissioners with the accompanying resolution of layout, and in lieu of the layout theretofore made adopted a new layout for this conduit which was in part along the course before adopted. Until the assessment had been made and adopted by the court of common council, the obligation of the city did not become fixed; before that time it had the right to discontinue the proceeding. Kelly v. Waterbury, 83 Conn. 270, 76 Atl. 467. The final rejection of the report with the accompanying resolution, it is conceded, was equivalent to a reconsideration and repeal of the former action of the court of common council. The action theretofore taken upon this layout was thus rescinded and the old layout became nonexistent. The new layout was a new proceeding wholly separate from and independent of the old. The power of the court of common council under the charter to reject the old layout and adopt the new is not open to question. The existence of the appropriation of the city meeting did not affect the power of the common council to reject the old layout. The appropriation, by the terms of the vote, was applicable only to the construction [569] of a sewer along the old layout. There was nothing in the vote which made the expenditure of the appropriation obligatory upon Hartford for any conduit save that authorized by the old layout. An appropriation of public moneys for one object can be used solely for that object. It was beyond the power of the officials of Hartford to divert the appropriation to the construction of a conduit based upon a new layout, since that constituted in law a new purpose and a different use.

2. That the board of street commissioners was without power to make the assessment, because no legal appropriation had ever been made of the sum assessed as the share of the city of Hartford of the cost of construction of this conduit.

The foundation upon which the appellant rests this claim is § 163 of the charter (Revision of 1908, p. 79), which provides that the common council shall not order a public work or improvement, which shall require an expenditure of more than $10,000, unless approved by a majority at a city meeting. The amount of special assessments cannot be known until laid, and hence the net amount to be paid by those specially benefited, and the amount remaining to be paid by the city, cannot be ascertained until that time. No made according to law with a specified board, and it was therefore not a county debt.

Where an appropriation is made to pay claims for a certain period, claims arising without that period cannot be paid out of the money appropriated. Allen v. Watts, 88 Ala. 497, 7 So. 190; Klein v. Johnson, 33 La. Ann. 587; State v. Seibert, 103 Mo. 401, 15 S. W. 761; Opinion of Judges, 5 Neb. 566; State v. Hallock, 20 Neb. 73, 15 Pac. 472. Compare In re Taxpayers, etc. 157 N. Y. 78, 51 N. E. 512. Thus, in Allen v. Watts, supra, the statute under consideration (Code of Alabama, 1886, § 908) made the claims of jurors preferred claims and required the county treasurer to "set apart a sufficient fund from the moneys of the county for their payment." Under that statute the treasurer set apart the funds for the coming year. A claim was presented for services rendered during the preceding year. It was held that the claim could not be paid out of the fund appropriated for a different year. The reasons for the decision were given as follows: "The purpose of this, as well as all former laws on the subject, was to assure a fund to pay such current expenses of the body politic, as were essential to its very existence, and the continued discharge of the functions for the performance of which it was created. It is clear, on the one hand, that the purposes of this statute would not be met by a construction which would admit of the payment, out of the fund thus set apart, of claims, even of the classes mentioned, which had accrued for services already rendered, and, on the other, that to hold it to be the duty of the treasurer to pay other claims out of this fund would be to emasculate the law of all meaning and effect." In Klein v. Johnson, supra, it was held that where a constitutional provision declared that the revenue raised should be devoted solely to the expenses of the year for which it was raised, the legislature could not divert the funds to the payment of a claim arising during a previous year. In Opinion of Judges, supra, it was said that a constitutional provision declaring that appropriations should be made for only two years precluded the right to apply an appropriation for one period to claims arising during another period. But in the case of In re Taxpayers, etc. 157 N. Y. 78, 51 N. E. 512, it was held that in the absence of a contrary charter provision, a debt of a previous year could be paid out of an appropriation for the same purpose. The court said: "One of the fundamental rules laid down by the learned judge, and upon which the order largely rests, is the proposition that trustees acted illegally in paying out, from the proper village fund, debts chargeable to that fund, but contracted during previous years. For instance, the charter provides that the trustees may raise by taxation in each year a sum not to exceed $3,000 for the purpose of constructing necessary sewers. The order under review shows that during the year 1896 the trustees paid out more than that sum, but the excess was for sewers actually constructed during that and previous years, which had not yet been paid for. I do not think this can be said to be an illegal payment. It may happen in a perfectly honest and prudent administration of village affairs that the trustees may be required by the local board of health to construct in some one year sewers costing $6,000, whereas they have raised only $3,000 to pay for them; but, if in the next year they should conclude not to construct any sewers at all, they would have in the treasury $3,000 applicable to the payment of the expense of constructing sewers. I have no doubt that they may legally pay out this money for the balance due and unpaid on sewers constructed in previous years, and what is true with regard to sewers or the sewer fund is equally true of many of the other funds referred to in the order. There is no prohibition in the charter against paying an honest debt incurred during previous years, from the proper fund, when there is money in the treasury, although the debt was not contracted during the year when the payment was made."

Where a fund is set aside as a sort of endowment for a specified purpose, that fund cannot be diverted to another use. In re Canal Certificates, 19 Colo. 63, 34 Pac. 274; Davis v. Muscatine County, Morris (Ia.) 161; Halbert v. Sparks, 9 Bush (Ky.) 259. And see Collins v. Henderson, 11 Bush (Ky.) 74; State v. Westerfield, 23 Neb. 468, 49 Pac. 119; People v. Board of Education, 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 400; People v. Allen, 42 N. Y. 404; State Female Normal School v. Auditors, 79 Va. 233; Hall's Free School Trustees v. Horne, 80 Va. 470; State v. Donald, 160 Wis. 21, 151 N. W. 331. Thus the case of In re Canal Certificates, supra, involved the following provision of the state constitution: "The public school fund of the state shall forever remain inviolate and intact. . . . No part of this fund, principal or interest, shall ever be transferred to any other fund or used or be appropriated except as herein provided." It was held that the legislature could not provide for the sale of school lands under a proposed canal in order to facilitate the construction of the canal. In Halbert v. Sparks, 9 Bush (Ky.) 259, it was held that a provision of the state constitution that the common-school fund should be held to be inviolate for the purpose of sustaining a system of common schools, precluded the legislature from appropriating a portion of the fund for the use of a private school. In People v. Board of Education, 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 400. Under a constitutional provision (New York constitution, art. 9) similar to that involved in the preceding case it was held that a Roman Catholic orphan school was precluded from participating, because it was not a common school. And, similarly, in People v. Allen, 42 N. Y. 404, it was held that the legislature could not lend the fund to a school not in the common school system, where the security was so insufficient as to amount to a donation. And in Hall's Free School Trustees v. Horne, 80 Va. 470, it was held that where the state constitution provided a fund for the support of the public school system, the legislature could not appropriate a part of that fund to a school not included in that system. In State v. Westerfield, 23 Nev. 468, 49 Pac. 119, under a provision of the constitution that the legislature should provide for public schools, and that the proceeds derived from certain designated sources should be pledged for educational purposes, and should not be transferred to any other fund for other purposes, it was held that since the school of the state orphanage was foreign to the state public school system, the legislature could not appropriate any of the school fund to maintain the orphans' school.

In a few cases it has been held, apparently without any intention of questioning the soundness of the general rule, that under the circumstances therein appearing a diversion of public money from the purpose of its appropriation was proper. Thus, in Power v. May, 123 Cal. 147, 55 Pac. 796, it was held that a part of a hospital fund could be used to pay commissions to a collector for collecting the fund. In Fuller v. Heath, 80 Ill. 296, there was involved a requirement of the charter of Chicago that the annual appropriation bill should specify the amount appropriated for each object or purpose, and that the treasurer should keep a separate account of each fund or appropriation and the debts and credits belonging thereto. It was held that if sufficient taxes were collected to pay all necessary expenses, the money from one appropriation could be taken from one fund and applied to another, if the whole of the first fund was not needed for the purpose specified. The court said: "It may turn out that the entire amount of the appropriation made for one purpose may not be needed for that purpose, while the whole of the appropriation for some other purpose may be needed. In such case, if the amount of all taxes collected be sufficient to meet all the necessary expenses, it is not perceived that there is anything in the statute to forbid the application of the funds in the treasury to the full payment of the sums needed, to exhaust one appropriation, even if that should not leave money enough in the treasury to cover the full amount of another appropriation, when the exigencies of the city do not require that the whole of the latter appropriation should be expended." In Spokane, etc. Trust Co. v. Lavigne, 14 Wash. 681, 45 Pac. 664, it was held that where a statute (Act of March 26, 1890, § 36) created a salary fund and provided that if that fund was insufficient the treasurer should supply the deficit from the general fund, the transfer from the general fund was valid even though it left that fund insufficient to meet other demands thereon.

DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS.

Generally, the surplus remaining after the purpose for which the appropriation was made has been accomplished, may be diverted to other uses. In re House Resolution No. 25, 15 Colo. 602, 26 Pac. 145; People v. Cairo, 50 Ill. 154; Field v. Stroube, 103 Ky. 114, 44 S. W. 363; Smith v. Lowell, 190 Mass. 332, 76 N. E. 956; In re Taxpayers, 157 N. Y. 78, 51 N. E. 512. And see Flowers v. Logan County, 148 Ky. 822, 147 S. W. 918. In Union Pac. R. Co. v. Cheyenne County, 64 Neb. 777, 90 N. W. 917, it was said that a statute which provides for the transfer of the unexpended balance remaining in a fund to the general fund, does not apply to funds for which a levy is required each year.

The surplus cannot be diverted until the original claims have been paid. Thus in Shotwell v. New Orleans, 36 La. Ann. 938, there was involved an act providing that the municipal council should adopt an annual budget and should state the purpose of each fund. It prohibited a diversion of the funds from their purposes so long as any claims for which the appropriation was made remained unpaid. It was held that the funds could not be diverted by the council, until all of the budget claims had been paid. In Bacon v. Dawes County, 66 Neb. 191, 92 N. W. 313, the statute involved (Comp. St. 1901, c. 18, art. 3, § 4) provided that the county commissioners of the several counties might appropriate to the county general fund any county moneys from whatever source, excepting the school fund, that remained on hand in the county treasury and were no longer required for the purposes for which the same were levied. It was held that this did not give the commissioners the power to make the transfer before the taxes were collected and before the claims against the funds were paid.

In George S. Chatfield Co. v. Waterbury, 88 Conn. 322, 91 Atl. 436, the court applied a statute (Waterbury charter of 1895, § 93) providing as follows: "Any appropriation, regular or special, so made for any specific purpose shall not be expended for any other purpose, but, if unexpended, shall be covered back into the treasury thirty days after the expiration of the fiscal year for which it is so made." On the recommendation of the board of education, the municipal council appropriated $40,000 for a "New School and Land, North End." The board bought land and erected a building in that section at a cost of $22,000, and sought to use the surplus for another school. It was held that this would be diverting the appropriation to a new purpose, and was therefore unlawful. The court said: "Appropriations of municipal funds, whether general or specific, for a given object or a definite purpose, cannot be diverted to any other purpose. This is a general rule of the law. . . . The board asked for a specific appropriation for a new Locust street school, which location was in the section of the city known as the north end. The board of aldermen made the appropriation for 'New School and Land, North End, $40,000.' This was a specific appropriation, not for new schools, but for a new school. The board of education had requested it in its estimate, and the appropriation as made was responsive to its request, and must be read in connection with it. It was an appropriation for a school to be located in any part of the section known as the north end. The estimate of the board of education located the new school on a designated street; the board of aldermen made its appropriation for a designated section. It extended the range of selection of the board of education. That board, when it selected the Hill street site in the north end and built a school thereon at an expenditure of $22,000 from the $40,000 appropriated for a new school in the north end, exercised the discretion vested in it to use this appropriation for a new school in the north end. It cannot use the balance of the unexpended appropriation either for another school site or any other school purpose. Its power over the appropriation was exhausted when it purchased a site and built a school thereon in the north end. The board of aldermen had the undoubted right to appropriate this fund for one school; the board of education cannot disregard the terms of the appropriation and use the fund for several schools. If the departments of the municipality can use the funds voted for their several departments for specific objects for purposes of their own choosing, the power over the purse strings vested in the municipal legislative body is shorn of much of its efficacy as an instrument for the protection of the funds of the community."

Fund Raised for Particular Purpose.

Where, by a special tax, bond issue or the like, a special fund is raised for a particular purpose, it cannot be used for a different purpose. New Castle-upon-Tyne v. Atty.-Gen. [1892] A. C. (Eng.) 568; Gray v. Matheny, 66 Ark. 36, 48 S. W. 678; Jenkins v. Williams, 14 Cal. App. 89, 111 Pac. 116; People v. Auditor, 30 Ill. 434; Cook County v. McCrea, 93 Ill. 236; Davis v. Muscatine County, Morris (Ia.) 161; Bradley v. Love, 76 Ia. 397, 41 N. W. 52; Doty v. Ellsbree, 11 Kan. 209; Adams v. Helms, 95 Miss. 211, 48 So. 290; Pine Tree Lumber Co. v. Fargo, 12 N. D. 380, 96 N. W. 359; Red River Val. Nat. Bank v. Fargo, 14 N. D. 88, 103 N. W. 390; State v. Mikkelsen, 24 N. D. 175, 139 N. W. 525; Daley v. Board of Public Works, 9 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 118, 11 Cinc. L. Bul. 25; Northrup v. Hoyt, 31 Ore. 524, 49 Pac. 754; Wolff Chemical Co. v. Philadelphia, 217 Pa. St. 215, 36 Atl. 344; State v. Cardozo, 8 S. C. 71, 28 Am. Rep. 275; Kennedy v. Montgomery County, 98 Tenn. 165, 38 S. W. 1075. Thus, in Jenkins v. Williams, supra, there was involved a statute (Pol. Code § 4088, Stat. 1907, p. 382) which set forth the manner in which bonds could be issued for county purposes. The board of supervisors should by order specify the purpose for which the indebtedness would be incurred. The revenue derived from the sale of the bonds could be used for the purpose so specified and for no other. Any surplus must be applied toward redeeming the bonds. The supervisors ordered an election for a bridge fund specifying the bridges to be built and their individual costs. It was held that the surplus from one bridge could not be transferred to the fund for another bridge. The case of Cook County v. McCrea, supra arose under a statute (Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. "Counties," sec. 39) providing that whenever a tax should be levied for the payment of a specific debt, the amount of that tax collected should be kept as a separate fund in the county treasury, and expended only in the liquidation of that debt. Any surplus after the payment of the debt could be transferred to the common fund of the county. A tax was levied to create a sinking fund to pay off certain "fire bonds." It was held that the county board could not compel the treasurer to invest this fund in bonds to build a courthouse. The decision, however, seems to depend on the fact that the investment in the new bonds would not be readily convertible into money. In Adams v. Helms, 95 Miss. 211, 48 So. 290, it was held that where a courthouse was destroyed by fire, and insurance was collected for the building, the insurance money became a trust fund for the erection of a new courthouse, and that a creditor whose claim should be paid out of the general county fund could not be paid out of the insurance proceeds.

In State v. Mikkelsen, 24 N. D. 175, 139 N. W. 525, construing a statute (R. C. 1905, § 1832, as amended by Session Laws 1907, p. 127) providing that the drain tax should be collected by the county treasurer and all moneys so collected should be credited to the drain fund to which they belonged, it was said that the drain fund became a trust fund, and that any diversion thereof would render the county liable. In Davis v. Muscatine County, Morris (Ia.) 161, there was involved a fund created by an act of Congress, by which certain lands were granted, the proceeds from the sale thereof to be used to pay the current expenses of a county. The court said: "The counties availing themselves of this right become trustees of the fund, and are bound to carry out the trust which is undertaken. They take the grant upon the condition specified, and no act of the counties, or of the board of county commissioners (their agents and representatives of the counties in fiscal transactions) could divest them of the liability to perform the trust, or divert this fund from the object to which the grantor and grantee intended it; much less can individuals do so. It is admitted by the plaintiffs in error that the debt was contracted for and on account of funds arising from the sale of lands pre-empted under the act of Congress referred to. Now if the plaintiffs in error can be allowed to set off county orders, which are issued to pay the usual expenses of the county; for instance, for the payment of the per diem allowance of the commissioners, or their clerk, or that of the sheriff for attending court, it would put it out of their power to appropriate the fund to the objects for which those orders were issued, and thus wholly defeat the object of the grant. . . . The principles at law which apply to cases where a trust is created for the benefit of individuals, apply to this case. In these cases it has never been contended that the indebtedness of the person who is to be benefited by the trust could be made the means of defeating the trust; but on the contrary, in most cases the insolvency of the person thus to be benefited by it, or the apprehension of such insolvency, is in most cases the reason for creating the trust. To permit the object of the grant to be defeated in this way, would be virtually saying that the grantor shall not do what he will with his own." In People v. Auditor, 30 Ill. 434, there was involved an article of the Illinois constitution providing as follows: "There shall be annually assessed and collected, in the same manner as other state revenue may be assessed and collected, a tax of two mills upon each dollar's worth of taxable property in addition to all other taxes, to be applied as follows, to wit: the fund so created shall be kept separate, and shall annually, on the first day of January, be apportioned and paid over pro rata, upon all such indebtedness, other than the canal and school indebtedness, as may for that purpose be presented by the holders of the same, to be entered as credits upon and to that intent, in extinguishment of the principal of said indebtedness." By virtue of an act of the general assembly, the auditor transferred to the general revenue fund the remainder of the fund realized from the two mill tax. This transfer was held to be unconstitutional and void. The court said: "The fifteenth article of the constitution is plain and explicit, not a doubtful or ambiguous expression in it, and it is peremptory to the legislature. It contains, in no part of it, nor by reference to any other article or clause of the constitution, the slightest suggestion or intimation that the consent of the holders of state indebtedness, to call for and receive the funds when collected, was indispensable, or any other condition, to the assessment and collection of this tax, and to the creation of this fund. . . . However honest may have been the motives of the legislature—and we do not question them—however praiseworthy may be the desire to relieve the people from a heavy and apparently an unnecessary tax, and however obligatory it may be so to legislate, the injunction of the constitution should be a consideration above them all."

On the other hand, it has been held that where a fund has been raised for a specific purpose, other funds cannot be diverted to that purpose. Tippecanoe County v. Cox, 6 Ind. 403.

Where a fund is raised for a special purpose, it cannot be temporarily used for another purpose, even though it will be returned before needed for the original purpose. Thus, in the case of In re State House Fund, 19 R. I. 393, 33 Atl. 870, it appeared that at an election, bonds were voted for $1,500,000, so much thereof as might be necessary to be applied to the purchase of a site for and the erection of a state house. The surplus was to be used for other purposes. It was held that before the completion of the building, the amount necessary would not be determined, and that, therefore, no part of the fund could be used temporarily for general state purposes even though the amount borrowed would be returned before needed for the state house. The court said: "The proposition submitted to the people, by which authority was given for the issue of the state house bonds, was as follows: 'Shall the general assembly be authorized and directed to provide for the issue of state bonds in an amount not to exceed the sum of $1,500,000, so much of said money as may be necessary to be applied to the purchase of a site for, and the erection and completion of, a new state house?' Pub. Laws R. I. cap. 1093, of May 19, 1892. It thus appears that, by the vote of the people adopting that proposition, so much of the money received from the bonds as was necessary for the purchase of a site for a new state house and its erection and completion was to be devoted to that specific purpose. The surplus only, which may remain after this purpose has been accomplished, can be devoted to other uses. It is impossible to determine in advance what, if any portion of the moneys, the proceeds of these bonds, will not be needed for the purpose for which they were authorized. This being the case, and no authority having been conferred, by vote of the people, on the general treasurer, or any general officer, or on the general assembly, to divert so much of the fund as may be required for the specific purpose for which it was voted, and there being no inherent authority known to us in any general officer or the legislature to do so, we feel constrained to answer the first two questions propounded in the negative, notwithstanding the moral certainty, amounting almost to absolute certainty, that the money can be returned with interest to the state house fund, before it will be needed by the state house commissioners, from the regular income of the state to come in during the next eight months. The fund is analogous to a trust fund, and cannot be legally applied to any other purpose than that for which it was created, except by the consent of the people by whom it was created." Similarly, in Weik v. Wausau, 143 Wis. 645, 128 N. W. 429, the statute under consideration (Stat. 1898, § 925-142a) provided that the common council should have power to levy annually such sum or sums of money as might be sufficient for the several authorized purposes and to apportion the same into such funds for city or ward purposes as they might provide by ordinance or resolution. It was held that this did not give a city council the power to divert a special fund temporarily even though the money would be replaced upon the collection of the next tax levy. In Park v. Candler, 113 Ga. 647, 39 S. E. 89, it was held that an appropriation could not be diverted temporarily, even though it was idle, and though it would be returned as soon as a tax already levied could be collected. A constitutional provision (P. 1, sec. 13, art. 7) involved in the case was to the effect that "the proceeds of the sale of the . . . railroads held by the state, and any other property owned by the state . . . shall be applied to the payment of the bonded debt of the state, and shall not be used for any purpose whatever, so long as the state has any existing bonded debt." The reasons for the decision were given as follows: "The public property fund is set apart by the constitution for a particular purpose, and it is distinctly declared that it must be applied to no other, and that purpose is the discharge of the public debt of the state. When the time arrives for the public debt, or any part thereof, to be discharged, this fund must be intact, so that it may be used for that purpose. That the setting apart of this fund for a number of years when it is not needed to discharge the public debt, and during a time when other demands due by the state must be discharged by taxation, which demands could be temporarily met by the use of the public property fund, is an unwise policy and bad financiering, is an argument which cannot be considered in the face of a plain and unambiguous provision in the constitution declaring that the fund can be used only in a given way. . . . The use of the public property fund in the discharge of any obligation or demand due by the state, other than the public debt or some portion thereof, would be a violation of the constitution; and this is true whether the fund, or such portion thereof as is so used, is or can be replaced by funds arising by taxation and in the treasury before the public property fund is needed for any purpose for which it may be lawfully used under the constitution."

Where the purpose for which a special fund is raised has been accomplished the fund may sometimes be diverted to other purposes. Thus, in Queens County v. Phipps, 35 App. Div. 350, 54 N. Y. S. 946, it was held that where bonds were issued to create a fund for the improvement of a certain road, an unexpended balance might be applied to the cost of erecting a jail house in the county, that balance being the property of the county. The court said: "The purpose for which the fund, of which this is a part, was created, had been fully accomplished. The improvement was made, and no more money was necessary for that purpose. Consequently, the money was the money of the county; and as the purpose for which it had been raised had been accomplished, and the balance left, the rule which finds application to special funds and particular objects, and forbids appropriation for any other purpose, either expressly or by implication, has no application, as in the present case it could not be applied to the purpose for which it was created, as that purpose was accomplished. This, as it appears to us, leaves the bare question, untrammelled by other considerations, as to whether money, the property of the county and in its hands, can be used for the payment of its obligations created in accordance with law. We think the question must be answered in the affirmative."

But where it is permissible to transfer the surplus of a special fund, the change cannot be made until the original purpose has been accomplished. Lee County v. Robertson, 66 Ark. 82, 48 S. W. 901. Thus, in Crocker v. Wolson, 30 Cal. 663, it appeared that a county treasurer had on hand about $13,000 in a special fund. By statute it was provided that if after paying the July interest there should be as much as $2,000 in the fund, some of the bonds should be redeemed. The treasurer sought to transfer the excess to another fund by virtue of a statute (Stat. 1863, p. 515, § 38). It was held that the transfer could not be made until all the bonds presented for redemption should be redeemed, and a transfer prior to that time would be an unauthorized diversion of moneys. In Union Pac. R. Co. v. Dawson County, 12 Neb. 254, 11 N. W. 307, the statute involved (Act of Feb. 15, 1877) provided "that the board of county commissioners of the several counties of the state might appropriate to the county general fund any sinking fund in the county treasury not levied for the payment of the bonded indebtedness; also any county moneys from whatever source, . . . that remained on hand in the county treasury, and were no longer required for the purposes for which the same were levied." It was held that the sinking fund would be needed for the purpose for which it was raised until the debt was paid and up to that time it could not be transferred. In People v. Hummel, 215 Ill. 71, 74 N. E. 78, the statute under consideration (Act of Feb. 13, 1863, §§ 13, 32) provided that all funds derived from the sale of certain water loan bonds, or from water rents, or otherwise for the waterworks of the city, should be used exclusively for purposes pertaining to the water supply of the city, nor should the same, or any part thereof, be used for any other purpose. It was held that the city council could not transfer to the corporate fund any of the water fund which was left after the payment of the current expenses of the waterworks.

CRAIG ET AL.

Washington Supreme Court—August 4, 1915.

86 Wash. 465; 150 Pac. 1179.

Wills — Testamentary Capacity — Person Partly Paralyzed.

One who knows his property, his relatives and heirs at law, and what disposition he desires to make of his estate and informs the scrivener of his wishes has testamentary capacity, though he is suffering from a paralytic stroke depriving him of the use of a part of his body, and so affecting his speech as to cause him to speak with difficulty, though he can be understood.

Sufficiency of Execution — Signature by Mark.

A testator who signs his will by mark, while another has written his name, signs and executes the will himself, within Rem. &

Bal. Code, § 1320, providing that every will shall be in writing, "signed" by testator, and section 1321, providing that every person who shall sign testator's name to any will by his direction shall subscribe his own name as a witness and state that he subscribed testator's name at his request, applies only to a case in which the name of testator is subscribed by another at testator's request and testator himself does no act, by making his mark or otherwise, to sign the will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pierce county: CLIFFORD, Judge.

Action by Thomas Wilson et al., plaintiffs, against William Craig et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Jas. J. Anderson and Wesley Lloyd for appellants.

Burdick & McQuesten for respondents.

[465] CROW, J.—On August 20, 1913, John Wilson, a bachelor sixty-seven years of age, died in Pierce county. On August 23, 1913, an instrument purporting to be his last will and testament was admitted to probate by the superior court, and Anna Craig was duly appointed and qualified as executrix. By the terms of this will, the testator devised and bequeathed one-fourth of his estate to each of the following persons: William Craig, Anna Craig his wife, Joe McKnight and Maggie McKnight. The record shows, that all of these [466] legatees except Anna Craig were heirs at law of the decedent, William Craig and Joe McKnight being nephews, and Maggie McKnight being his niece; that he left other heirs at law for whom he made no provision, as follows: Thomas Wilson, a brother, Eliza Watts and Jane Hilton, sisters, Thomas Craig, Samuel Craig, and John Radcliff, nephews, who, upon January 7, 1914, by petition, commenced this action to set aside the will and vacate the order of probate. The grounds upon which they seek to set aside the will are, (1) want of testamentary capacity, and (2) that the alleged will was not executed in the manner required by law.

The trial court found, that the will had been duly admitted to probate; that at the time of its execution, the decedent was partially disabled by a stroke of paralysis, received on August 17, 1913, the previous day; that his right side, arm, and leg were so paralyzed as to deprive him of their use; that his power of speech was so affected as to cause him to speak with difficulty, although he could speak with sufficient distinctness to be heard and understood by those around him; that the will was written by one G. Dowe McQuesten, an attorney, who read it to the testator; that the testator requested Mr. McQuesten to write the testator's name to the will, which he did, writing the name "John Wilson" and the words "his mark;" that the testator thereupon made his mark as the same appears on the will; that the witnesses to the will thereupon, at the request of the testator, in the testator's presence and in the presence of each other, signed their names as witnesses; that Mr. McQuesten did not state in his certificate as such witness that he wrote the name of the testator at the testator's request; that on August 18, 1913, the day on which the will was executed, John Wilson was of sufficiently sound mind and memory to comprehend and understand the nature and effect of his acts in making the will and to dictate the terms thereof; that he was competent to make distribution of his estate, and that he was not acting under duress or undue influence of any person whomsoever. Upon [467] these findings, a decree was entered sustaining the will and dismissing the petition. The contestants have appealed.

Appellants' first contention is that the decedent did not have testamentary capacity. On this question we have carefully examined the evidence and conclude that, by a clear preponderance, it sustains the findings of the trial judge. The only persons present with the testator, at the time the will was drawn and executed, were Mr. McQuesten, decedent's attorney, and J. W. Burgan, cashier of a Tacoma bank, a particular friend of the testator. They signed the will as witnesses, and their testimony clearly shows, that the decedent had complete testamentary capacity; that he knew his property, knew his relatives and heirs at law, knew what disposition he desired to make of his estate, and informed Mr. McQuesten of his wishes in that regard. The will was signed and executed in the following form:

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 18th day of August, A. D. 1913.

mark

"The foregoing was signed, sealed, published and declared by the above named testator, John Wilson, as and for his last will and testament in the presence of us who at his request and in his presence and in the presence of each other, have subscribed our names as attesting witnesses thereto this 18th day of August, A. D. 1913.

"G. Dowe McQuesten,
"Residing at Tacoma, Washington.
"J. W. Burgan,
"Residing at Tacoma, Washington."

The evidence shows that, after the will was drawn and had been read to the testator by Mr. McQuesten, the testator said he could not write as his right arm was "no good;" that he requested Mr. McQuesten to write his name, which he did; that the testator then took the pen in his left hand and made his mark on the will and that Mr. McQuesten and Mr. Burgan, [468] in his presence and in the presence of each other, witnessed it.

Section 1320, Rem. & Bal. Code, provides: "Every will shall be in writing, signed by the testator or testatrix, or by some other person under his or her direction in his presence, and shall be attested by two or more competent witnesses, subscribing their names to the will in the presence of the testator."

Section 1321 provides:

"Every person who shall sign the testator's or testatrix's name to any will by his or her direction shall subscribe his own name as a witness to such will, and state that he subscribed the testator's name at his request."

Appellants' second contention is that, as Mr. McQuesten signed the testator's name to the will at the testator's direction, he should not only have subscribed his name as a witness, but should have stated that he subscribed the testator's name at his request; that he failed to do so; that by reason of such omission, the will was not executed in the manner provided by law; that all formalities required by the statute are mandatory and must be strictly construed, and that the will, for want of such strict compliance, is void. In support of this contention, appellants cite the following cases from Missouri, decided under a statute substantially identical with Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1321, supra; McGee v. Porter, 14 Mo. 612, 55 Am. Dec. 129; St. Louis Hospital Assoc. v. Williams, 19 Mo. 609; Northcutt v. Northcutt, 20 Mo. 266; St. Louis Hospital Assoc. v. Wegman, 21 Mo. 17; Simpson v. Simpson, 27 Mo. 288; Catlett v. Catlett, 55 Mo. 330.

There is no question but that these cases, predicated on a similar statute, sustain appellants' position. For reasons hereinafter stated, we cannot yield our assent to the rule therein announced, being convinced that it is not well founded in reason and is contrary to elementary principles. It will be noticed that, in the earliest case, McGee v. Porter, upon which all the others are directly or indirectly based, the [469] name of the testator was signed by his wife at his request, and that, although witnesses testified she then carried it to him and he dotted over his name, the court says: "The record shows nothing more than a mere subscription of the name, no mark, no dot; the testator's name is written as if he had written it himself." With the will executed in this manner, no mark of any kind being made by the testator, the statute invoked might well be applied and the will held void. In the next case, however, St. Louis Hospital Assoc. v. Williams, supra, it appeared that, after the name of the testator had at his request been written by another, he made his mark as in the case now before us, and the Missouri court, following the McGee case, held the will void for noncompliance with the statutory requirements. The McGee case, followed by the later cases cited, does not sustain or authorize this holding. Appellants also cite Pool v. Buffum, 3 Ore. 438, in which a statute similar to Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1321, was construed, and in which the will was executed by the testator in the same manner as the will now before us. The Oregon court, however, while apparently yielding its consent to the doctrine of the Missouri cases, fails to follow them, as it sustains the will, and in the course of its opinion said:

"If making one's mark is a signing within the law, it may be doubted, whether the writing of the name by another at the same time is a signing within the meaning of the statute."

In the later case of Moreland v. Brady, 8 Ore. 303, 34 Am. Rep. 581, which appellants do not cite, the Oregon court sustained a will executed in the same manner, and said:

"It is claimed by the appellant that the will of Bernard Brady is void, because it appears that he signed it by making his mark, and that some other person signed his name to the same without stating that he signed the testator's name at his request, and as a witness, as required by the statute of Oregon. The manner in which the will was signed by the testator, and attested by the subscribing witnesses, was in substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute [470] in that respect, as was held by this court in Pool v. Buffum, 3 Ore. 438, to which we refer as decisive of this point."

As above stated, Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1320, provides that a will may be signed by the testator. If in legal contemplation he does so sign when he makes his mark, there is no occasion for complying with the requirements of that portion of § 1321 upon which appellants now rely. Authorities are numerous to the effect that a testator by making his mark meets the requirements of a statute requiring him to sign his will, and that his mark is such a signature. Cases may be found where a mark alone has been held sufficient, where a mark added to the testator's name written by another has been sustained, and where a mark added to the testator's name incorrectly written has also been approved; the courts in each and every instance holding the mark to be the signature of the testator. Jarman, Wills (6th ed.) p. 106, § 79; Greenleaf, Evidence (16th ed.) § 674; Upchurch v. Upchurch, 16 B. Mon. (Ky.) 102; In re Flannery, 24 Pa. St. 502; In re Guilfoyle, 96 Cal. 598, 31 Pac. 553, 22 L.R.A. 370; In re Mullin, 110 Cal. 252, 42 Pac. 645; Stephens v. Stephens, 129 Mo. 422, 31 S. W. 792, 50 Am. St. Rep. 454; Rook v. Wilson, 142 Ind. 24, 41 N. E. 311, 51 Am. St. Rep. 163; Thompson v. Thompson, 49 Neb. 157, 68 N. W. 372.

In Upchurch v. Upchurch, supra, the court said:

"A literal adherence to the words of the statute would operate harshly, and exclude all persons unable to write their names, as witnesses, to wills, however worthy of credence. A more liberal construction will as effectually accomplish the ends of the statute, and not violate its language, nor render invalid a paper proved, as we think this is, beyond all reasonable doubt, to be the last will of the testator by the requisite number of witnesses, whose names were subscribed, though by another, in their presence and at their request. In this conclusion, we are supported by direct authority in a case arising under the statutes of Virginia respecting wills, where the same mode of authentication is required. (6th Grattan's Report, 57.)"

[471] Many other citations might be made in support of the proposition that, by making his mark, a testator himself signs his will. We call attention to an Arkansas case, In re Cornelius, 14 Ark. 675, which is directly in point and in which the will was signed and executed by the testator in identically the same manner as the will now before us. Section 4 of the Arkansas statute, as stated in the opinion, provides that every will "must be subscribed by the testator at the end of the will, or by some person for him, at his request." The succeeding section 5 reads as follows:

"Every person, who shall sign the testator's name to any will, by his direction, shall write his own name as a witness to such will, and state that he signed the testator's name at his request."

It will be noticed that these sections are substantially the same as Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 1320, 1321, supra. The Cornelius will was assailed in the same manner, and for the same reasons, that appellants now assail the will of John Wilson. The Arkansas court held the will had been signed by the testator, and that it was properly executed. The case is well considered and founded on supporting authorities cited in the opinion. The conclusion of the court is tersely stated in the following words:

"And we think we are giving full effect to the 5th section above quoted, by holding that when the testator's name is signed to a will by his direction, and he does nothing more, thereby adopting such signature as his subscription, in such case the person, so signing for the testator, must also write his own name as a witness, and state that he signed the testator's name at his request, and that it ought not to apply to a case where the testator does himself sign though by making his mark."

The substance of this holding, which we adopt, is that, when the testator signs by making his mark, he signs and executes the will himself, although his name may have been subscribed by another at his request. This conclusion is in line with the authorities above cited, to the effect that a testator [472] may sign by making his mark. In the later case of Guthrie v. Price, 23 Ark. 396, a vigorous attempt was made by counsel to prevail upon the Arkansas court to overrule the Cornelius case, but the court, at page 403, said:

"The court, in giving the first and fourth instructions, moved by the petitioners, and in refusing the instruction asked by the defendants, ruled directly contrary to the decision of this court in In re Cornelius, 14 Ark. 675, where it was held, that where the testator's name was written to the will by another person, and he made his mark, it was a valid subscription within the meaning of the statute. The counsel for the petitioners have asked us to review the opinion in that case, criticizing, with much ingenuity, the words of the statute, to show that the opinion is not well founded. But the decision is supported by adjudications upon statutes similar to ours, and by the standard text books, and we think it should not be disturbed."

Our conclusion, from a consideration of our statutes in the light of the authorities which we have carefully examined, is that we cannot follow the early Missouri cases cited by appellants; that when John Wilson, the testator himself, made his mark, he signed the will in compliance with Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1320, although the witness, at the testator's request, had previously subscribed the testator's name, and that the requirements of § 1321, upon which appellants rely, apply only to a case in which the name of the testator is subscribed by another at the testator's request, and the testator himself does no act, by making his mark or otherwise, for the purpose of signing the will.

The judgment is affirmed.

Scope of Note.

In the case of Bradford's Succession, 124 La. 44, 18 Ann. Cas. 766, the court discussed the sufficiency of a testator's signature under the civil law, and held that a misspelled signature to a holographic will was not insufficient. This note presents the recent decisions on the question what is a sufficient signature by a testator to a will with reference to the form or manner of signing. It excludes the question of the proper place in the will for affixing the signature, which is considered in the notes to Matter of Seaman, 2 Ann. Cas. 726; Sears v. Sears, 11 Ann. Cas. 1008; and Matter of Field, Ann. Cas. 1913C 842. It also excludes the question whether "attestation" includes "subscription," which is treated in the note to International Trust Co. v. Anthony, 16 Ann. Cas. 1087; and the question whether the testator must sign before the witnesses sign, which is discussed in the notes to Lane v. Lane, 5 Ann. Cas. 462, and In re Horn, 20 Ann. Cas. 1364.

Signature by Mark.

Under statutes requiring that a will shall be signed or subscribed by the testator, it is well settled that the requirement of the statute is satisfied, if the signature of the testator is made by his mark. In re Dombrowski, 163 Cal. 290, 125 Pac. 233; In re Clark, 170 Cal. 418, 149 Pac. 828; *Ahnert v. Rep. 399, which reversed 42 Quebec Super. Ct. 385, 2 Dominion L. Rep. 148; Campbell v. McGuiggan (N. J.) 34 Atl. 383.

When the testator signs the will by making his mark, he signs and executes the will himself, although his name is subscribed by another at his request, or the mark is made with assistance. Travis v. Straus, 170 Cal. 418, 149 Pac. 828; Points v. Nier, 91 Wash. 20, 157 Pac. 44. And see the reported case. See also Campbell v. McGuiggan (N. J.) 34 Atl. 383.

In California a statute (Civ. Code Cal. § 1276) provides among other requisites to the execution of a written will other than holographic as follows: "It must be subscribed at the end thereof by the testator himself, or some person in his presence and by his direction must subscribe his name thereto." Another statute (§ 1278) contains the following provision: "A person who subscribes the testator's name, by his direction, must write his own name as a witness to the will. But a violation of this section does not affect the validity of the will." It has been held that a signature by mark to a will was sufficient where it appeared that the testatrix was, by reason of illness, unable at the time to write her name and requested her legal adviser and one of the persons named as executors to write her name, which he did, adding the words "her mark," and the testatrix then made a cross (x) in the space left between her given name and her surname, and the three witnesses signed the attestation clause and also signed their names under the words "witnesses to mark," also written by her legal adviser, who did not, however, write his own name on the paper as witness or otherwise. In re Domrowski, 163 Cal. 290, 125 Pac. 233.

In a case wherein it appeared that a testator signed his name to the will, and acknowledged it before the attesting witnesses, who subscribed it as such, and the testator then placed a mark between his Christian name and surname, it was held that the placing of the mark was wholly unnecessary. Sechrest v. Edwards, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 163.

Signature by Initials.

In Pilcher v. Pilcher, 117 Va. 356, 84 S. E. 667, L.R.A.1915D 903, the validity of a holographic will, at the end of which the writer, in order to authenticate the paper, had attached his initials by way of signature instead of his full name, was upheld. The court said: "Va. Code, 1904, sec. 2514, reads as follows: 'No will shall be valid unless it be in writing and signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature; and moreover unless it be wholly written by the testator, the signature shall be made or the will acknowledged by him in the presence of at least two competent witnesses, present at the same time; and such witnesses shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary.' It will be observed that the statute makes no distinction in the character of the signature, or what constitutes a sufficient signature, between holograph and attested wills. It gives precisely the same force and effect to the former that it accords to the latter. By force of the statute one is made the equivalent of the other, though the manner of proving the two kinds of instruments is different; nevertheless, each possesses the same authenticity. Now, all the authorities, English and American (including the quære in McBride v. McBride [28 Grat. 476]), agree, that if this will had been attested, it would have been well signed under the English statute. Therefore, being holograph, it must follow that it is well signed under the Virginia statute, since that statute does not require attestation in such case. Nor does the Virginia statute define what shall constitute a 'signature,' but only prescribes that the will shall be signed 'in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature.' . . . No dictionary, so far as we are advised, restricts the meaning of 'signature' to a written name; therefore, according to these definitions, what constitutes a signature must largely depend upon the circumstances of each particular case, though in all cases the intent is a vital factor. Whatever symbol is employed, it must appear that it 'is intended as a signature.' Although, as remarked, there is no decision of this court directly in point, authority in this country is abundant for the proposition that the use of his initials by a testator animo signandi is a sufficient signing of his name. . . . Adverting for a moment to the facts: We have before us a paper which, though exceedingly brief, is distinctly testamentary in character and terms, and by which the disposition of the property, in the circumstances, was a natural one. Testator was a lawyer in full possession of his mental faculties, and there is no question that the paper was wholly written by him, and signed with his initials at the appropriate place for his signature—the end of the instrument. Immediately before the paper was written, testator said to his wife and her sister, Mrs. Woods, 'I am going to make my will,' and after it was written, holding the paper up, he said: 'Girls, this is my will. I have left Allie everything I have.' In response to Mrs. Woods' comment on the brevity of the document, he remarked, 'The shorter, the better.' When she called attention to the use of his initials, he replied, 'Why, that is as good a will as any man can make; that will hold in any court—almost a mark will go, Bell.' He then said to Mrs. Woods, 'I want you to preserve this. That is my will. I have left everything to Alice. I want you to see that she takes care of it.' This evidence, and it is uncontradicted, plainly establishes testamentary intent and that the initials were used animo signandi. . . . We entertain no doubt, either from the standpoint of reason or authority, that the writing in controversy was executed in substantial compliance with the statute, and, as the chancery court held, is the true last will and testament of Edwin Pilcher, deceased."

Under an English statute (Wills Act, s. 21) providing that interlineations or alterations made in a will are not valid unless executed in the same manner as is required for the execution of a will, and that a will with alterations as a part thereof will be deemed to be duly executed if the signature of the testator and the subscription of the witnesses are made in the margin, it has been held that where two interlineations were introduced into a will after execution and attestation, and the testatrix signed with her initials in the margin against the interlineations, and the witnesses subscribed their initials in attestation of this signature of the testator, the signature and subscription by initials only were sufficient. In re Blewitt, L. R. 5 P. D. (Eng.) 116, 49 L. J. P. 31, 4 L. T. N. S. 329, 28 W. R. 520, 44 J. P. 768.

In the case of In re Severance, 96 Misc. 384, 161 N. Y. S. 452, it appeared that at the foot of the printed form of will used by the testator there was a dotted line, followed by the letters "L. S." in brackets, and intended for his signature. But instead of signing it, the testator, near the end of the line and partially covering the initials "L. S.," affixed a wafer seal, printed in colors and containing the inscription "Merry Christmas. American Red Cross. 1912 Happy New Year," and wrote on this seal the inscription "C S Seal C S." The court said: "If the testator intended this holiday seal with his inscription upon it as a signature, and adopted it as such, I think it satisfies the requirements of the statute that a will must be subscribed by the testator. It is well settled that a subscription by making a mark and without any written name is a compliance with the requirements of the statute (Jackson v. Jackson, 39 N. Y. 153), and it would seem logical to say that a signature by initials is entitled to as much respect as a signature by mark. . . . It is a debatable question, incapable of exact solution, whether the testator intended to adopt this seal with this inscription as his signature, or whether he intended it as a seal only and neglected to sign his name. The disposition which the testator has attempted to make of his property is such a natural one, and the proofs are so clear that he intended this document as a testamentary disposition of his property, that I feel that the surrogate should not be astute to search for reasons for rejecting this will, but, on the other hand, should strive to sustain it, especially where the interested parties all being of full age raise no objections. I therefore hold that the testator adopted this seal and his indorsement upon it as a signature."

Signature by Wrong or Assumed Name.

In a case wherein it appeared that a will was in proper form as a noncupative testament by public act, it was held that the testator's signature by an assumed name was a sufficient descriptio personae, he having assumed the name by which he signed the will for political reasons, and being generally known in the city in which he resided by that name. Balot y Ripoll v. Morina, 12 Rob. (La.) 552, 14 Prob. Rep. Ann. 402 note.

In the case of Ex p. Walker, 15 Quebec Pr. 15, it was held that a holographic will, which was signed "mother," and which will and the signature thereto were alleged in the petition for probate to be in the true and actual handwriting of the decedent, was valid and should be admitted to probate.

Sealing as Signing.

It has been held that the impress of his notarial seal by a testator who was a notary public was a sufficient signature to his will. In re Wilson, 19 Dominion L. Rep. 698. And see the case of In re Severance, 96 Misc. 384, 161 N. Y. S. 452, cited supra, in the subdivision, Signature by Initials.

Adoption of Previous Signature as Signing.

Under the New Jersey statute (4 Comp. St. 1910, p. 5867, pl. 24) a distinction is drawn between the act of the testator and the act of the subscribing witnesses. He must sign, while they must subscribe their names. And the construction put on the word "signed" by the courts is the original meaning of a signum or sign, rather than the derivative meaning of a sign manual or handwriting. Thereunder, it has been held that a will was signed as the statute requires, where it appeared that the testator, after he had signed the will and had made an interlineation to effect a bequest, published the will and acknowledged his signature in the presence of the witnesses, who thereupon subscribed their names as witnesses. The court held that the acknowledgment by the testator of his own sign manual amounted to a signing. In re Bullivant's Will, 82 N. J. Eq. 340, Ann. Cas. 1915C 72, 88 Atl. 1093, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 72. To the same effect, see Matter of Engler, 56 Misc. 218, 107 N. Y. S. 222.

Misspelled Signature.

In a case wherein it appeared that the testator omitted the "n" in his signature in writing his first name, Emanuel, on one of the sheets of the will, it was held that this fact in no wise affected the validity of the will, for there was no contention even that he did not intend to and that he did not sign the will, but the whole testimony on that point showed that he did intend to and did sign it. Boone v. Boone, 114 Ark. 69, 169 S. W. 779.

COMMISSIONERS FOR EXECUTING OFFICE OF LORD HIGH ADMIRAL OF UNITED KINGDOM

v.

OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP AMERIKA.

England—House of Lords—December 19,
1916.

[1917] A. C. 38.

Ships and Shipping — Damages Recoverable for Collision — Death of Human Being.

In a proceeding on behalf of the Crown against persons negligently causing the sinking of a naval vessel, no recovery can be had for the value of pensions paid by the Crown to the dependents of sailors and officers whose deaths were caused thereby.

[39] Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal in so far as it affirmed an order of the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division [1914] P. 167.

On October 4, 1912, His Majesty's submarine B 2 was run into and sunk in Dover Strait by the steamship Amerika, and all the crew of the submarine, except one officer, were drowned, namely, an officer and fifteen sailors of the Royal Navy.

In an action for damage by collision instituted by the appellants, the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom, against the respondents, the owners of the steamship, in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, the respondents admitted that the Amerika was alone to blame for the collision, and agreed to pay to the appellants 95 per cent of their damages, to be assessed by the Admiralty Registrar assisted by merchants. Among the items of damage claimed by the appellants was a sum of 5140*l.* representing the capitalized amount of pensions and grants payable to the relatives of the men who were drowned. These pensions and allowances were granted under statutory authority according to scales authorized by Orders in Council and prescribed by the King's Regulations.

The Assistant Registrar disallowed the claim, but assessed at 4100*l.* the sum which the appellants ought to recover if the claim was recoverable at law.

The report of the Assistant Registrar was affirmed upon this point by the President, and the order of the President was affirmed, so far as regards the question under appeal, by the Court of Appeal (Buckley, L.J., Kennedy, L.J., and Scrutton, J.) on the principle laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton, 1 Camp. 493, that "in a civil court the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury."

Sir George Cave, S.-G., Laing, K.C., Sir John Simon, K.C., and Robertson Dunlop for appellants.

Inskip, K.C., and Arthur Pritchard for respondents.

Treasury Solicitor, solicitor for appellants.
Pritchard & Sons, solicitors for respondents.

[41] EARL LOREBURN.—My Lords, in my opinion this appeal fails. It is far too late for this House to disturb the rule expressed by Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493, even were we of opinion that the common law ought originally to have been differently interpreted, of which I am by no means persuaded. When a rule has become inveterate from the earliest time, as this rule appears to have been, it would be legislation pure and simple were we to disturb it. I also think that the damages sought are not in any way recoverable, because they represent sums of money which the appellants were not legally required to pay.

Your Lordships have been interested in ascertaining the origin of Lord Ellenborough's decision. I share in that interest, but I cannot throw any light on the subject beyond what may be derived from the opinions of Lord Parker and Lord Sumner, both of which I have had the advantage and the pleasure of reading.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—My Lords, I agree. There are in my opinion two sufficient reasons why this appeal cannot [42] succeed. The first is that the items of damage which the appellants desire to be allowed are too remote. The second is that no sufficient case has been made for overruling Lord Ellenborough's decision in Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493, to the effect that in a civil court the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury. I will deal with each of these reasons separately.

The items of damage which the appellants desire to have allowed consist of certain pensions and allowances, particulars of which will be found at pp. 39-42 of the appendix. These pensions and allowances are granted under statutory authority, but it does not appear that their grant formed any part of the contract between the Admiralty and the seamen whose lives have been lost through the respondents' negligence. They are, it seems, compassionate pensions and allowances only, which, from a legal standpoint, the Admiralty might have granted or withheld at its discretion. Under these circumstances they cannot constitute an item of damage. No person aggrieved by an injury is by common law entitled to increase his claim for damage by any voluntary act; on the contrary, it is his duty, if he reasonably can, to abstain from any act by which the damage could be in any way increased. But further, even if the pensions and allowances in question were granted pursuant to contracts between the Admiralty and the deceased seamen, I should still be of opinion that they could not properly constitute an item of damage for loss of service. They would in this case constitute deferred payment for services already rendered, and have no possible connection with the future services of which the Admiralty had been deprived.

Passing to the second of the reasons above mentioned, I may point out that the correctness of the ruling in Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493, has since been accepted, not only by all Courts in this country, but by the Supreme Court of the United States, nor can anything be found in the earlier authorities inconsistent with it. It was, it is true, severely criticized by Lord Bramwell in Osborn v. Gillett, L. R. 8 Exch. (Eng.) 88. It was, he considered, anomalous that a master should be entitled to recover for loss of service if his servant were wrongfully injured, but should be without any remedy if his servant were wrongfully killed. If it were any part of the functions of this House to consider [43] what rules ought to prevail in a logical and scientific system of jurisprudence, much might no doubt be said for this criticism; though it is not, in my opinion, by any means clear that the anomaly does not in reality consist rather in granting the remedy in the former case than in refusing it in the latter. In a society based so largely as our own is at the present day upon contractual obligations, it does not appear why the wrongful injury of A. whereby he is prevented from fulfilling his contractual obligations to B. should confer on B. a right of action only where these obligations are those arising out of the relationship of master and servant, or, indeed, why the right should not be extended so as to cover all loss,

This House, however, is bound to administer the law as it finds it. The mere fact that the law involves some anomaly is immaterial unless it be clear that the anomaly has been introduced by erroneous judicial decision. The appellants have accordingly attempted to show that Lord Ellenborough's ruling was erroneous, as being based either (1.) upon a misconception of the limits within which the maxim actio personalis cum persona moritur is applicable, or (2.) upon the mistaken notion that the rule of public policy which, in cases of felony, admittedly requires the person aggrieved to institute criminal proceedings before pursuing any civil remedy against the felon, precluded such civil remedy altogether, or (3.) upon doctrines of Roman law which ought not to be applied at all. It is to be observed that Lord Ellenborough gave no reasons for his ruling: he treated the proposition he laid down as a well-known proposition of law, and the reasoning on which the proposition was based must therefore be found, if at all, in the earlier authorities. The only earlier authority to which your Lordships' attention was called was the case of Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89. This was an action in trespass by a husband for wrongful injury causing his wife's death. The action was dismissed. If it were looked on as an action in right of the deceased wife, the maxim actio personalis, &c. was clearly applicable. If on the other hand it were looked on as an action by the husband in his own right, then the trespass was "drowned in the felony." Obviously the limits within which the maxim mentioned is applicable were already well known when [44] Higgins's Case, Noy 18, Yelv. 89, was decided, and Lord Ellenborough with that case in his mind can hardly have fallen into the error suggested. Nor can I find any reason to suppose that any weight has ever been given in the Courts of this country to the Roman law on the subject. It remains, therefore, to consider whether the reason given in Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89, that the trespass was drowned in the felony can be rejected as erroneous. It was contended that the reason must be rejected as a misconception of the rule of public policy above referred to. Whatever may have been thought in the early part of the seventeenth century, or even in Lord Ellenborough's day, it is now quite clear that the rule only suspends and does not require the destruction of the civil remedy. There can therefore, it is argued, be no drowning of the trespass in the felony, and if the reason given for the decision in Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89, be bad, there is, it is contended, no reason why that case should stand, or why Lord Ellenborough's ruling, which was dependent on it, should not now be overruled by this House.

My Lords, before proceeding to deal with this point I should like to call the attention of the House to certain historical considerations which appear to me to be of considerable materiality. I do this with some diffidence, as I cannot lay claim to any special knowledge. I have, however, read a good deal of history in connection with this case, for it is almost a commonplace that apparent anomalies in our law can generally be explained if we consider the conditions of its historical growth.

If we carry our minds back to a period prior to the development under the influence of the Statute of Westminster the Second (13 Edw. 1, c. 24) of the action on the case, we find that the law of contract based on the doctrine of consideration had not yet taken shape. The basis of society was still status rather than contract, and the King's Courts had not yet invented any procedure for the enforcement of simple contract obligations. Nevertheless, among the writs which had become de cursu, there were several writs which a master could obtain from the Chancery in respect of wrongs done to his servant. Fitzherbert in his De Natura Brevium mentions (1.) a writ of trespass for taking away an apprentice or servant, and (2.) a writ of trespass for injury done to a servant per quod [45] servitium amisit. These writs are in all respects analogous to the writs of trespass for taking away a wife or child, or for injury done to a wife or child per quod consortium or servitium amisit, and also to the writs of trespass for debauching a wife, daughter, or female servant. The inference is that all these writs arose out of status at a time when the servant or apprentice, as well as the wife and child, was a member of the family, and the relation between him and the head of the family had not yet come to be looked upon as resting upon contract. This would appear to me to account for the fact that, except in the case of master and servant, the loss of A. arising out of an injury whereby B. is unable to perform his contract is not actionable. It is only in a society based on contractual obligation that the existence of such an action in the case of master and servant and in no other case can appear illogical.

Further, during the period in question the writ of trespass was the only remedy for wrongs such as those we are considering. According to Professor Maitland, trespass was a remedy for acts of violence not amounting to a felony. Certainly no writ of trespass can be found in which the acts of which the plaintiff complains necessarily amount to a felony. In some cases they may or they may not. Take for example the writ for breaking into the plaintiff's house and taking away his money. The acts complained of do not constitute burglary or larceny. There may be a burglary or larceny, according to whether certain additional facts be or be not proved, but the defendant cannot plead these additional facts: Lutterell v. Reynell (1670) 1 Mod. (Eng.) 282. He cannot set up his own felony by way of defence. The facts alleged in the writ are wrongful and actionable, whether these additional facts be proved or otherwise. It is not the felony which is made the subject of complaint. It should be remembered that for felony there was the appeal, and that, to use Professor Maitland's expression, the writ of trespass may be called "an attenuated appeal" dealing with acts of violence for which the appeal did not lie. It arose out of the appeal, and was a criminal as well as a civil proceeding, leading not only to the plaintiff recovering damage, but to the defendant being fined or imprisoned.

My Lords, during the period we are considering it is probable that all homicide by act of violence amounted to felony. Certainly [46] intentional homicide or homicide through negligence was felonious. It follows that the death of a human being occasioned by an act of violence on the part of the defendant could not be the ground of complaint in an action of trespass. It could not be alleged without alleging felony, and for felony trespass would not lie. If the writ alleged only an injury per quod servitium or consortium or consortium amisit, the writ would be unobjectionable, but if death ensued, damage could be obtained up to the date of the death only. If the injured person had been killed on the spot the action would fail altogether. The plaintiff's remedy, if he had any, would be the appeal.

My Lords, if for the reasons above suggested trespass did not lie on the part of a master for an injury causing the death of his servant, it is easy to see how this fact would influence the subsequent development of the action on the case. The writ-making powers of the Chancery, which for a time had fallen into disuse largely because they were thought to infringe on the legislative function of Parliament, received in 1285 A. D. a new impulse by the passing of the Statute of Westminster the Second, and began to be again used, as they had been originally used, to meet the needs of a growing civilization by providing legal remedies for grievances which, however much they might be recognized as such by the general sense of the community, were not yet actionable in the King's Courts. Consider for a moment the following examples: First, A's servant, in the course of serving A., negligently throws a beam of wood on to a highway, and in so doing injures B.'s servant. Under these circumstances B.'s servant had a writ of trespass against the wrong-doer, and B. also had a writ of trespass (per quod servitium amisit), but neither of them had any remedy against A., for trespass was in fact a criminal proceeding, and according to the common law no one could be called upon to answer in a criminal proceeding for another's crime. Nevertheless, the general sense of the community demanded such a remedy, and this was supplied by giving B. and B.'s servant an action on the case against A. By this means the modern law as to a master's liability for the acts of his servant was enabled to develop. The remedy of B's servant against A.'s servant was always confined to an action in trespass: see Holmes v. Mather (1875) L. R. 10 Exch. (Eng.) 261, 268, per Lord Bramwell. Secondly, suppose A.'s servant, in the course [47] of serving A., placed a beam of wood on the highway and negligently left it there, so that B's servant fell over it and was injured. Under these circumstances neither B's servant nor B. himself had any remedy in trespass, for A's servant had committed no act of violence, for which alone a writ of trespass could be obtained from the Chancery. Nevertheless, the general sense of the Community demanded a remedy, and such a remedy was again supplied by giving both B. & B.'s servant an action in case against both A's servant and A.

If in the first of the two examples I have given B's servant had been killed and not injured only, A.'s servant would have committed a felony and no action against him would lie in trespass. In developing the principle of respondeat superior it may well have been thought that A.'s liability for the act of his servant ought not in any case to be greater than the liability of the servant himself. Again, if in the second of the two examples B's servant, in falling over the beam, had broken his neck, it may well have been thought that neither A's servant nor A. himself ought to incur, by reason of mere non-feasance, a liability greater than would have been incurred by actual violence. These considerations may well account for the doctrine that the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury in an action on the case any more than it could in an action of trespass.

My Lords, I will now return to the case of Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89, and I desire to suggest that it was not really based on any rule or supposed rule of public policy, but merely on the nature of an action in trespass. The declaration was by a husband for an injury to his wife. Prima facie, therefore, what was complained of was a trespass, but the declaration proceeded to state that the wife died of the injury. What was prima facie a trespass thus became a felony for which no action in trespass lay. The trespass was drowned in the felony. "For the King only is to punish felony, except the party brings an appeal." Noy (Eng.) 18. If the case had turned on a rule of public policy, such rule would have been applicable to a writ in trespass for breaking into the plaintiff's house and taking away his money, where what had been done in fact amounted to burglary or larceny. I cannot discover that it was ever so applied. On the contrary [48] Markham v. Cob (1625) Latch (Eng.) 144, Noy 82, decided in 1625, and Dawkes v. Cove-neigh (1652) Style (Eng.) 346, decided in 1652, are authorities that in such a case the trespass is not drowned in the felony, so as to preclude an action for the trespass, provided the requirements of public policy are first satisfied. These cases were quoted with approval by Sir Matthew Hale (1 Hale, Pleas of the Crown, p. 546) and it cannot be disputed that they are good law. Lord Ellenborough himself acted on them in Crosby v. Lang (1810) 12 East (Eng.) 409, without any apparent hesitation, though Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. 493, had been decided by him only a few years previously, namely, in 1808. It is true that neither Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89, nor Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493, were cited in argument. Of course, this may have been due to carelessness in examining the authorities, but it is quite possible that counsel did not consider that they had any bearing on a question of public policy.

The case of Gimson v. Woodfull (1825) 2 C. & P. 41, 12 E. C. L. 20, strikes the first discordant note. This was in 1825, and in 1827 the matter was discussed in the case of Stone v. Marsh (1827) 6 B. & C. 551, 13 E. C. L. 249, Lord Tenterden using language which might be construed to favour the view taken in Gimson v. Woodfull (1825) 2 C. & P. 41, 12 E. C. L. 20. The point was left open in White v. Spettigue (1845) 13 M. & W. (Eng.) 603, though that case overruled Gimson v. Woodfull (1825) 2 C. & P. 41, 12 E. C. L. 20, on other grounds.

In Wellock v. Constantine (1863) 2 H. & C. (Eng.) 146, decided in 1863, the plaintiff sought to recover damages for rape. Of course, if she had consented to the act alleged, there could be no civil remedy. If, on the other hand, she had not consented, she was in fact complaining of a felony, for which an action in trespass at any rate would not lie. Willes, J., being of opinion that no civil action would lie for a felony, intimated that he would direct a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff thereupon consented to a nonsuit. The case, therefore, appears to resemble Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89, and has no necessary reference to public policy, though Pollock, C.B., in discharging a rule for a new trial, seems to suggest that public policy was the real ground of decision. This also appears to have been the view of Blackburn, J. in Wells v. Abrahams (1872) L. R. 7 Q. B. (Eng.) 554, for he disapproves Wellock v. Constantine, [49] 2 H. & C. (Eng.) 146, on the ground that public policy demands only the suspension and not the destruction of the civil remedy, thus approving the earlier authorities to which I have referred. He obviously disagreed with the ruling of Willes, J. that no civil action would lie for a felony, for, though he expressly approves the case of Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89, he says it is a mistake to suppose it was decided on that ground. Unfortunately he does not suggest on what grounds he thought the decision could be supported.

That the rule of public policy only suspends and does not destroy the civil remedy is also shown by the subsequent cases of Ex p. Ball (1879) 10 Ch. D. (Eng.) 667, and Midland Ins. Co. v. Smith (1881) 6 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 561.

It should be noticed that Baggallay, L.J., in laying down in Ex p. Ball (1879) 10 Ch. D. (Eng.) 667, the propositions resulting from the authorities, says that a felonious act may (not that it must) give rise to a civil action. Before any question of public policy can arise it has first to be ascertained whether civil proceedings will lie at all. Most felonies involve a wrong less than a felony, and for such a wrong civil proceedings will lie when once the demands of public policy have been satisfied. But there may be felonies where the only wrong is the felony itself, and it may well be that the felony cannot be made the subject of complaint in civil proceedings.

My Lords, it was in this state of the law as to public policy that Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493, came up for consideration before the Court of Appeals in Clark v. London Gen. Omnibus Co. [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 648, 6 Amer. Cas. 198, and if that case be referred to it is quite apparent that neither the counsel who argued it nor the judges who were party to the decision considered that public policy had anything to do with the matter. Not one of the cases on the latter subject to which I have referred was so much as mentioned. Under these circumstances it seems impossible to suppose that the decision in either Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89, or Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. 493, depended on a misconception of the rule of public policy. I think it more probable that this misconception, which at one time no doubt prevailed but which has been now dispelled, was itself due to a mistake as to the meaning of what was said in Higgins's Case, Noy (Eng.) 18, Yelv. 89, that case itself merely deciding that felony could not be [50] made a ground of complaint in trespass, a decision which in Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493, was extended to cover all civil proceedings.

Perhaps I ought to add one word on the case of Smith v. Selwyn [1914] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 98. That case resembled Wellock v. Constantine, 2 H. & C. (Eng.) 146. The statement of claim alleged and complained of a felony. There was an application to stay further proceedings or dismiss the action on the ground that it was based on a felony for which there had been no prosecution. Liberty was given to amend the claim by alleging only a wrong less than felony; otherwise the action was ordered to be stayed pending criminal proceedings. The question whether a felony could itself be made a ground of complaint in a civil action, quite apart from any rule of public policy, does not appear to have been considered, and supposing the statement of claim had been amended in the way suggested, it would still seem that, under the authorities I have cited, public policy would, if there had been an actual felony, demand a stay until the plaintiff had done her duty by prosecuting the felon.

My Lords, under these circumstances I do not think the appellants can be said to have advanced any sound reasons why your Lordships' House should disturb a rule of law which has been so long recognized in our Courts, and which, however anomalous it may appear to the scientific jurist, is almost certainly explicable on historical grounds.

I agree that the appeal fails.

LORD SUMNER.—My Lords, this appeal has been brought principally to test the rule in Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493, that "in a civil court the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury," a rule which has long been treated as universally applicable at common law. Some attempt was made to contest it only in its application to the case of master and servant. I will discuss both the narrower and the wider proposition, but it is clear that the action was not brought for the loss to a master of the services of his employee, but for the respondents' bad navigation, which sank the Crown's submarine, and the item of damage now in dispute, namely, pensions and allowances to dependents of seamen who were drowned, was claimed merely as one of the natural consequences of [51] the tort, which consisted in sinking the ship. No claim has been made and no evidence has been given relating to damage sustained by the appellants in losing the further services of those who were drowned, and so different both in its nature and its incidents is the service of the seamen of His Majesty's Navy from the service of those who are in private employment that it may be questioned whether in any case an action per quod servitium amisit could have been brought at all.

My Lords, never during the many centuries that have passed since reports of the decisions of English Courts first began has the recovery of damages for the death of a human being as a civil injury been recorded. Since Lord Ellenborough's time the contrary has been uniformly decided by the Court of Exchequer and by the Court of Appeal. In addition to the weight of Lord Ellenborough's name (no mean authority even when sitting at nisi prius in spite of Lord Campbell's sneer), the rule has been definitely asserted by Lord Selborne (Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co. [1891] A. C. (Eng.) 412, 414, Lord Bowen (The Vera Cruz (1884) 9 P. D. (Eng.) 96, 101) and Lord Alverstone and Lord Gorell (Clark v. London General Omnibus Co. [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 648). It has been accepted as the rule of the common law by the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada (Monaghan v. Horn (1882) 7 Can. Sup. Ct. 409) and the Supreme Court of the United States of America (The Corsair (1892) 145 U. S. 335, 12 S. Ct. 949, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 727).

That the rule has also received statutory recognition appears to me to be abundantly plain. I agree that the preamble to the first section of Lord Campbell's Act should be read as applying to the particular defect in the existing law which it was passed to remedy, namely, the disadvantageous position of widows and children, and not to the limited rights of masters and employees, though only Bramwell B.'s intrepid individualism could dismiss it as a "loose recital in an incorrectly drawn section of a statute, on which the Courts had to put a meaning from what it did not rather than did say." Osborn v. Gillett, L. R. 8 Exch. (Eng.) 95. Still I think that the view taken by the Legislature in 1846 is clear. Sect. 6 of Lord Campbell's Act provides that "nothing therein contained shall apply to that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland." Why? Because Scotch [52] law differed from English law in the very point in question, and in this respect is for once illogical. The rule, says Lord Watson in Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co. [1891] A. C. (Eng.) 418, and again in Wood v. Gray [1892] A. C. (Eng.) 576, 581, which allows "actions for solatium and damages . . . at the instance of husband, wife, or legitimate child, in respect of the death of a spouse, a child, or a parent . . . does not rest upon any definite principle . . . but constitutes an arbitrary exception from the general law which excludes all such actions, founded in inveterate custom, and having no other ratio to support it." "Lord Campbell's Act," says Turner, L.J. with the concurrence of Knight Bruce, L.J. in Glaholm v. Barker (1865) L. R.

1 Ch. (Eng.) 223, 227, "first introduced into the law of this country a remedy in case of injuries attended with the loss of life; the law up to the time of the passing of this Act having stood thus—that in case of death resulting from injury the remedy for the injury died with the person." It provided a new cause of action and did not merely regulate or enlarge an old one. It excluded Scotland from its operation because of sufficient remedy already existed there when in England none existed at all. So much seems to me to be indubitable. It did not deal with the case of master and servant as such, presumably because the Legislature found nothing in the common law rule in this regard which called for reconsideration. I think the observation of Pigott B. in Osborn v. Gillett, L. R. 8 Exch. (Eng.) 93, was perfectly just. "We are not at liberty to disregard the law thus established so long ago and expressly recognized by the Legislature, nor in effect to add by the decision of this Court another clause to Lord Campbell's Act." It is worthy of observation that the passing of Lord Campbell's Act was followed shortly afterwards by similar legislation in the States of New York in 1847 and 1849 and of Maryland in 1852, and statutes similar in effect have since been passed in most of the older States of the Union where the common law prevails. Massachusetts has already dealt with the matter, though only tentatively, by direct enactment (c. 81 of 1786) which made the township as the highway authority liable in certain cases, when death was caused on highways, and by an Act of 1840, which provided that a railway company, whose negligence had caused a fatal accident, should be liable on indictment to payment of a fine to the use of the personal representative of the [53] deceased for the benefit of his family. Plainly it was, and long had been, the general opinion among students of the common law that the rule was as stated by Lord Ellenborough. "The authorities are so numerous and so uniform to the proposition," said the Supreme Court of the United States in 1877 in Union Pac. Ins. Co. v. Brame (1877) 95 U. S. 754, 756, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 580, "that by the common law no civil action lies for an injury which results in death, that it is impossible to speak of it as a proposition open to question." Since the early part of the last century the subject has been learnedly discussed on many occasions in the United States, both in connection with claims for the death of a servant and claims for the death of a relative. The re-argument in Hubgh v. New Orleans, etc. R. Co. (1851) 6 La. Ann. 496, is particularly valuable for its contrast of the common law with the old French law and with the effect of art. 1382 and art. 2294 of the Code Napoléon, as repeatedly interpreted in the Cour de Cassation. So much for this rule as a proposition of general application.

My Lords, I think that, as the appellants have argued this case as if the action had been brought by a master for the loss of a servant's service, it is better to deal also with this aspect of it. The point was concluded against the appellants in the Courts below by Osborn v. Gillett, L. R. 8 Exch. (Eng.) 88, and Clark v. London Gen. Omnibus Co. [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 648, 6 Ann. Cas. 198. The question is whether there is any ground of principle of which your Lordships ought to overrule decisions of such authority and long standing. The case is put thus: "It is admitted that a master has an interest in his servant's life, such as to support an action if the servant is maimed; how can it be right that the tortfeasor should escape if instead of maiming the servant he kills him? Is the general rule of liability for tortious injury to the servant's health subject to an exception in relief of the tortfeasor if death ensue?" Some most learned writers have expressed dissatisfaction with the rule. It has been even suggested that Lord Ellenborough was "the victim of a confusion of ideas" and that the rule arose from a misunderstanding of the principle that a right of action for a tort, where the act done was felonious, is suspended till the tortfeasor has been prosecuted. The hope—perhaps a faint one—was long [54] ago expressed that some day your Lordships might overrule Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493.

I think it is clear that the relation of master and servant presents in this matter some peculiar features. What is the right in the master which the tortfeasor infringes, or the duty towards him which he disregards? Ordinarily an action of tort is given to defend rights of property or rights of personal safety, personal freedom and personal reputation. The latter must be confined to the person of the master, and in the person of the servant he has no property. Here is the beginning of anomaly.

I do not know, and doubt if it can now be ascertained, when or pursuant to what theory this special right of the master in relation to his servant was first established. The inquiry belongs to history rather than to positive law. Tindal C.J. in Grinnell v. Wells (1844) 7 M. & G. 1033, 1041, 49 E. C. L. 1033, 1041, observes of the most artificial aspect of this cause of action "the foundation of the action by a father to recover damages against the wrong-doer for the seduction of his daughter, has been uniformly placed, from the earliest times hitherto, not upon the seduction itself, which is the wrongful act of the defendant, but upon the loss of service of the daughter, in which service he is supposed to have a legal right of interest. . . . It is the invasion of the legal right of the master to the services of his servant, that gives him the right of action for beating his servant; and it is the invasion of the same legal right, and no other, which gives the father the right of action against the seducer of his daughter." So nearly did the wrong, which is the subject of this cause of action, approximate to wrongs to his property that a count for debauching the plaintiff's daughter could be joined with a count for breaking and entering his house: Woodward v. Walton (1807) 2 B. & P. N. R. (Eng.) 476; and a man could join with a count for an assault on himself another for an assault on his wife "per quod consortium uxoris for three days amissit:" Guy v. Livezey (1618) Cro. Jac. (Eng.) 501. Thus it is that the tortfeasor is liable to another's servant if he beats him, for the act is actionable per se; but he is only liable to the master of the servant if the beating interferes with the service, for at the master's suit it is only actionable per quod: [55] Marys's Case (1612) 9 Rep. 113a. They are two separate causes of action in two different persons in respect of the same act. Again, where there is no capacity for service, as in the case of an infant of tender years, the father's action per quod servitium amissit will not lie: Hall v. Hollander (1825) 4 B. & C. 660, 10 E. C. L. 436. If the contract of service had already determined before the wrongful act had any disabling effect upon the capacity to serve, as might be the case when a wrongful act is done to a servant who is under notice, I take it likewise that the action would not lie. It is the loss of service which is the gist of the action and loss of service depends upon right to the service, and that depends on the contract between the master and the servant. The contract of service being purely personal determines with the servant's death. As he dies, eo instanti the master's right is extinguished. A cause of action, which essentially depends on the present existence of a right to services, cannot be asserted in respect of a state of things which is inconsistent with the existence of such a right. It cannot be changed from an action for injury to the right (for in tort the wrongful act of the defendant and an invasion of the right of the plaintiff must concur) into an action for damage arising upon an event, otherwise an action would lie for causing the death of one's cestui que vie. A similar explanation is applicable to the case of a husband's action for injury to his wife per quod consortium amissit. The right is not in the life but in the service or consortium during life. "Death following instantly upon the act complained of," says the Supreme Court of the United States in Lucas v. New York Central R. Co. (1855) 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 245, "there was no time during her life when it could be said that the husband had lost the services of his wife in consequence of the injury complained of." Such an explanation was offered by the Court in Monaghan v. Horn, 7 Can. Sup. Ct. 409, and it has the approval of Sir Gorell Barnes P. in Clark v. London General Omnibus Co. [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 648, 6 Ann. Cas. 198. For my own part I think it is sound in this sense, that whether or not it be the theory on which those who introduced these causes of action would have justified them, as indeed we may be sure it is not, it at any rate provides, though somewhat imperfectly, an intelligible basis for the existing rule sufficient to prevent [56] your Lordships from interfering with long-standing decisions on the plea that they are insensible or arbitrary.

Mr. Solicitor urged that such a principle is highly technical and that, if a minor hurt to a servant gives a cause of action to a master, a fortiori must the major hurt which results fatally, and he reminded your Lordships that this House in the case of Mills v. Armstrong (1888) 13 App. Cas. (Eng.) 1, overruled Thorogood v. Bryan (1849) 8 C. B. 115, 65 E. C. L. 114, a case of long standing, and exhorted your Lordships to take heart and do likewise. This is hardly the right view to take of your Lordships' judicial functions nowadays, nor does it follow in the case of a legal system such as ours, that a principle can be said to be truly a part of the law merely because it would be a more perfect expression of imperfect rules, which, though imperfect, are well established and well defined. Again, an established rule does not become questionable merely because different conjectural justifications of it have been offered, or because none is forthcoming that is not fanciful. The explanations given of the rule in question are singularly varied. Hale (Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, p. 477) says that a man shall forfeit his goods, though the verdict be quod interfecit per infortunium et non per feloniam, "because the King hath lost his subject and that men may be the more careful." Certainly the idea of liability for breach of a duty to use care towards one's fellow-subjects was of slow growth. Again, Parke B. says in Armstrong v. Southeastern Ry. Co. (1847) 11 Jur. (Eng.) 758, 759, that the rule had two reasons, "first, because the law provides remedies for such mischiefs only as affect legal rights; and a man has not such legal right in the life of his parent as he has in his own." while, secondly, "it was considered impossible to form an estimate of the value of human life either to a man himself or to others connected with him." Whether, as some have thought, the Roman law affected the matter in the distinction which it drew in various connections between the value of a slave's life and that of a free man it is probably impossible now to tell. The true explanation and the basis may be, as in our law they often are, purely historical. As is well known, it was long part of English law, when civil injuries and criminal offences had not been clearly distinguished, that among emendable offences there was included homicide, for which payment of wite to the King, [57] or in some cases to the lord, and of bot to the kinsfolk constituted satisfaction. The elaboration of this tariff and the heavy burden of the payments for which it provided in the case of various injuries seem to have been the cause of the disappearance of this system. It passed away very rapidly, partly through the rise of criminal jurisdiction over offences against the King's peace and partly through the attraction of the new action of trespass. The change had taken place before records of decisions begin. Thereafter, while damages were recoverable by the injured man in his lifetime for trespass to his person, homicide became punishable upon indictment, and in Bracton's day was regarded as felonious. Those homicides which were due to negligence could be and were dealt with by the exercise of the King's mercy. On the one hand homicide, which deserved punishment, ceased to be emendable; on the other personal torts, actionable in trespass, were compensated in damages; the intermediate case of an act, tortious but not heinous, causing death was dealt with by the Royal mitigation of the punishment naturally attaching to homicide. There was, I imagine, in early times no actual decision in which it was held that in a civil court the death of a human being could not be complained of, still less was an legal theory advanced in justification of such a rule. Following the development of law through the modification and development of procedure, the system of making satisfaction for homicide by payment of wer and wite died out after the twelfth century; it was dealt with as a punishable felony, with or without mitigation of punishment, in proceedings on the King's behalf. Relatives, who in the time of Henry I. would have been paid by the man-slayer in accordance with the rank of his victim, in the time of Edward I. had lost that right and yet could not bring trespass, and this by a process of procedural change and not, so far at least as is known, on any analysis of the nature of the cause of action. Doubtless lawyers as familiar with fatal accidents due to mere negligence as we are would have analysed the injury and have distinguished fully between killing with intent to kill, killing by an intended act without intent to kill but in breach of a duty towards the victim, and killing without either intent or breach of duty by mere misadventure; but in days when negligence causing death was probably rare as compared with our day, and the guilty party more often [58] than not had nothing with which to pay damages, men acquiesced without discussion in a procedure by which the Royal justice dealt with homicide of all kinds, and actions of trespass did not deal with homicide at all. No doubt it is the tradition of this change that was preserved in the language of Tanfield, J. in Higgins v. Butcher, Yelv. (Eng.) 89, "the servant dying of the extremity of the battery, it is now become an offence to the Crown, being converted into felony," to which the report in Noy, p. 18, adds, "for the King only is to punish felony except the party brings an appeal." Though no longer in accordance with the formal law as stated by Cockburn, C.J. in Wells v. Abrahams, L. R. 7 Q. B. (Eng.) 554, and by Baggallay, L.J. in Ex p. Ball, 10 Ch. D. (Eng.) 674, this was historically not far from the truth.

Parallel with the respective proceedings in trespass and on the case and on indictment there remained the right of appeal. For many years an appeal was more common than an indictment in cases of homicide, and the judges were careful to preserve the relatives' private right to the appeal and to secure that they should not be prejudiced by the course taken by or in the name of the Crown. The liability of the manslayer to punishment might be discharged by the King's pardon, or by the appellant's release, but in case of the former the appellant's right was saved, so that the King's pardon could not be pleaded to defeat the appeal. Out of this there arose the practice of using the appeal as an engine of compulsion, by which the slayer was driven to make compensation in order to obtain the appellant's release. In the appeal there were risks on both sides, for if the appeal failed the appellee had his action on the case for a false and malicious appeal. Down to the end of the fifteenth century appeals were nevertheless common, but the statute 3 Hen. 7, c. 1, after reciting that in appeals "the party is oftentimes slow, and also agreed with . . . also he that will sue any appeal, must sue in proper person, which suit is long and costly, that it maketh the party appellant weary to sue," enacts that indictments should no longer be held back "so that the suit of the party may be saved," but are to be proceeded with at once. Eventually appeals fell much into disuse; but they are mentioned from time to time, and a reported instance occurs, which is instructive, [59] in 1 Croke's Eliz. (Eng.) (1599) pp. 632 and 682, Shackborough v. Biggins. Here in a widow's appeal for murder, in which the act was held to have only been manslaughter, the Queen's pardon was relied on. It was decided, with some difference of opinion, that the pardon did not get rid of the appellee's liability to be burnt in the hand, it being the suit of the party and not an information in the Star

Chamber, which was the suit of the Queen. On this the appellee promptly paid the appellant forty marks, and the suit was discontinued. There is little subsequent record of similar cases. In 1770 in Bigby v. Kennedy, (1770) 5 Burr. (Eng.) 2643, it is stated that there had been no such case for nearly half a century, and, as eventually the appellant did not appear and a nonsuit was entered, no doubt the appellee had satisfied her demands. In Ashford v. Thornton (1818) 1 B. & Al. 405, 457, in 1818, the case which led to the abolition of appeals by 59 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 1, Bayley, J., observes: "This mode of proceeding, by appeal, is unusual in our law, being brought, not for the benefit of the public, but for that of the party, and being a private suit, wholly under his controul. It ought, therefore, to be watched very narrowly by the Court; for it may take place after trial and acquittal on an indictment at the suit of the King; and the execution under it is entirely at the option of the party suing, whose sole object it may be to obtain a pecuniary satisfaction." In this sense down to 1819 the death of a human being could be complained of in a civil court, for the appeal, though "a vindictive action," was on the civil side of the Court, but it could not be complained of "as an injury," and the rule as stated by Lord Ellenborough stands untouched.

My Lords, I think the history of the disappearance of wergild and the persistence of the appeal for homicide, which is to be found in full in the works of Hawkins, Fitzjames Stephen, and Pollock and Maitland, proves, if proof were needed, that Lord Ellenborough's cannot correctly states the law and is one which is now susceptible of expansion of judicial interpretation. There never was an action to recover damages for the death of a human being in the sense now contended for, and the remedy by appeal which so long persisted in the case of the widow, the most crying case of all, was one which the most hardened formalist would not have tolerated, had any such [60] action at law been possible, for it was long a form of legalized blackmail.

The historical explanation of the absence of such an action at the suit of relatives applies equally to the case of a master's claim for the death of a member of his familia, for example, a servant. It is equally incapable of judicial creation. Indeed, what is anomalous about the action per quod servitium amisit is not that it does not extend to the loss of service in the event of the servant being killed, but that it should exist at all. It appears to be a survival from the time when service was a status.

The canon in question has often been classified under the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona, and ill-advised arguments have sometimes suggested that, even as applied to the case of master and servant, it has something to do with the abatement of actions. The maxim itself has many critics; it has been coldly disparaged as post-classical, meaning thereby that it is bad Latin: Finlay v. Chirney (1888) 20 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 494, 502; it has been suggested to be a mistake for actio poenalis (Poste's Gaius, 2nd ed. p. 493), whence it is sometimes insinuated that it is bad law; and it has been peevishly described as "a wretched saw" and as "a purely identical proposition:" Austin's Jurisprudence, 3rd ed. vol. 2, p. 1013. Of course reliance on the maxim in this connection leads to the effective retort that the person who has the action is the master and he is alive and sues just because some one else, his servant to wit, is dead. If, however, this maxim is put aside, since in the present case it is irrelevant, I think that the argument that your Lordships should discover under this ancient form of action some principle hitherto undetected is really an appeal to this House in its legislative and not in its judicial capacity.

My Lords, apart from the question of civil liability for the death of a human being, there is another aspect of this case. Injury is the gist of any action of negligence; if the negligence does no damage no action lies. In the present case the sums claimed were paid to widows and other dependents of the drowned men under Admiralty Regulations (pars. 1974 A1 and 2011A), which expressly declare that these are compassionate payments, and granted of grace and not of right, both in kind and in degree. True that in such cases they are always made, and most properly made, but none the less the money [61] claimed was lost to the Exchequer directly because the Crown through its officers was pleased to pay it. The collision was the causa sine qua non; the consequent drowning of the men was the occasion of the bounty; but the causa causans of the payment was the voluntary act of the Crown. Had the present action been brought upon a contract it might well be the case that these payments would have been within the contemplation of the contracting parties, but they are not the natural consequences of the tort which is sued for. Nor would it have assisted the appellants' case if they could have established that the making of these compassionate allowances by the Crown was in the nature of a contractual obligation. In any case the contract would have been a contract with the deceased man, and the damages must be measured by the value of his services which were lost, not by the incidents of his remuneration under the terms of his contract of employment. Just as the damages recoverable by an injured man cannot be reduced by the fact that he has effected and recovered upon an accident policy (Bradburn v. Great Western R. Co. (1874) L. R. 10 Exch. (Eng.) 1, and those recovered under Lord Campbell's Act are not affected by the fact that his life was insured, so conversely a master cannot count as part of his damage by the loss of his employee's services sums which he has to pay because his contract of employment binds him to pay wages to the servant while alive and a pension to his widow when he is dead. The appeal is enterprising and has been of considerable interest, but I think it fails.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed and appeal dismissed with costs.

NOTE.

Death of Human Being as Element of Recovery in Civil Action between Third Persons.

While many courts have confessed their inability to find a satisfactory reason for the rule, it is established beyond controversy that at common law no action will lie to recover damages for the death of a human being caused by the negligence or wrongful act of another, however clearly the death may have involved pecuniary loss to the plaintiff. See 8 R. C. L. tit. Death, p. 719. That doctrine which had its origin in the decision of Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493, is authoritatively established as the law of England by the decision of the House of Lords in the reported case. As is pointed out in that case it has the sanction of the court of last resort in Canada (Monaghan v. Horn, 7 Can. Sup. Ct. 409) and in the United States (Mobile L. Ins. Co. v. Brame, 95 U. S. 754, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 580; The Corsair, 145 U. S. 335, 12 S. Ct. 949, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 727). In Mobile L. Ins. Co. v. Brame, supra, the rule was stated and the decisions of the state courts discussed, the court saying: "The authorities are so numerous and so uniform to the proposition that by the common law no civil action lies for an injury which results in death, that it is impossible to speak of it as a proposition open to question. It has been decided in many cases in the English courts and in many of the state courts, and no deliberate, well-considered decision to the contrary is to be found. In Hilliard on Torts, p. 87, sec. 10, the rule is thus laid down: 'Upon a similar ground it has been held that at common law the death of a human being, though clearly involving pecuniary loss, is not the ground of an action for damages.' The most of the cases upon the subject are there referred to. Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 493; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. New York, etc. R. Co. 25 Conn. 265; Kramer v. San Francisco Market St. R. Co. 25 Cal. 434; Indianapolis, etc.

R. Co. v. Keely, 23 Ind. 133; Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180; Shields v. Yonge, 15 Ga. 349; Peoria Marine, etc. Ins. Co. v. Frost, 37 Ill. 333. The only cases that tend to the contrary of this rule, so far as we know, are Cross v. Guthery, 2 Root (Conn.) 90; Plummer v. Webb, Ware 69 [19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,234] and Ford v. Monroe, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 210. They are considered by the New York court of appeals in Green v. Hudson River R. Co. 2 Keyes (N. Y.) 294, and compared with the many cases to the contrary, and are held not to diminish the force of the rule as above stated."

The foregoing rule is given a somewhat novel application in the reported case wherein it is held that a person who negligently caused the sinking of a naval vessel and the death of sailors thereon was liable to the Crown for the value of the vessel but not for the value of the pensions paid by the Crown to the dependents of the deceased.

The decision thus goes beyond the settled rule that there can be no common-law recovery directly for death, and holds that a person not in privity of estate with the deceased is not entitled to reimbursement for expenditures which the death has imposed on him. In the United States the law with respect to such an application of the doctrine seems to be unsettled. The court in the reported case bases its decision in part on a proposition of indubitable validity, i. e., that the pensions in question were voluntary and not compulsory payments. But respecting compulsory payments the American decisions are somewhat in conflict. The holding of the reported case finds support in Mobile L. Ins. Co. v. Brame, supra, wherein it was held that a life insurance company which had paid the amount of a policy was not entitled to recover against a person whose negligence caused the death of the insured. To the same effect see Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. New York, etc. R. Co. 25 Conn. 265, which overruled the early case of Cross v. Guthery, 2 Root (Conn.) 90, 1 Am. Dec. 61, wherein doctrine of Baker v. Bolton, supra, was repudiated.

A somewhat analogous situation is presented by the cases passing on the right to recover, independent of a statute, for medical expenses and funeral expenses against a person whose negligence caused the injury and death from which those expenses arose. The English rule appears to be that no such recovery can be had. Clark v. London Gen. Omnibus Co. [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 648, 6 Ann. Cas. 198. That doctrine has found some support in the United States. See Jackson v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 140 Ind. 241, 39 N. E. 663, 49 Am. St. Rep. 192. But in at least one jurisdiction a right of recovery independent of statute is recognized. Philby v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 46 Wash. 173, 13 Ann. Cas.

A like conflict exists on the closely related question whether an employer whose servant has been killed by the negligence of a third person may recover from that person the amount which he has been compelled to pay to the servant under a Workman's Compensation Act. In Turaquist v. Hannon, 219 Mass. 560, 107 N. E. 443, a recovery over for the amount paid to the dependents of a servant killed by the negligence of a third person was allowed on the principle of subrogation. In New Jersey, however, the right to recover reimbursement is denied. Newark Paving Co. v. Klotz, 85 N. J. L. 432, 91 Atl. 91; Inter-State Telephone, etc. Co. v. Public Service Electric Co. 86 N. J. L. 26.

DEVINE

v.

BRUNSWICK-BALKE-COLLENDER COMPANY.

Illinois Supreme Court—December 22, 1915.

270 Ill. 504; 110 N. E. 780.

Coroners — Inquest — Validity of Statute.

Coroner's Act (Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, c. 31), § 14, making it the duty of coroners' juries to inquire how, in what manner, and by whom or what dead bodies came to their death, and of all other facts of and concerning the same, together with all material circumstances in any wise related to or connected with the death, and to make up and sign a verdict and deliver it to the coroner, is not unconstitutional as investing the coroner's jury with judicial power in violation of Const. art. 6, § 1, by which all judicial powers are vested in the courts, as "judicial power" is the power which adjudicates upon and protects the rights and interests of individual citizens, and to that end construes and applies the laws, and this power involves, not only the power to hear and determine a cause, but also the power and jurisdiction to adjudicate and determine the rights of the parties to the controversy and to render a judgment or decree which will be effectual and binding upon them in respect to their personal or property rights in controversy in such proceedings, and the power to hear without the power to adjudicate and determine the rights of the parties is not judicial power, as that term is used in the constitution.

Same.

As no rights, property or otherwise, are fixed or established by a verdict of a coroner's jury, under Coroner's Act, § 14, that section is not void as depriving persons of property without due process of law.

Evidence — Admissibility of Coroner's Verdict.

In an action for the death of a person struck by defendant's automobile truck, a verdict of a coroner's jury, in which it was stated that in the opinion of the jurors the driver of the truck was blameless, is properly admitted, as the finding of a coroner's jury is admissible in evidence, and the question whether the driver was blameless was an essential matter before the jury for its investigation, and properly included in its verdict.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where, in an action for the death of a person struck by an automobile truck, a verdict of the coroner's jury, exonerating the driver of the truck, is admitted in evidence, it is error to charge that this verdict was not conclusive, but that the jury should consider it in determining whether or not the driver was guilty of the negligence charged in the declaration, since, while the verdict was competent evidence, its weight was for the jury, and the court had no right to invade the province of the jury and tell them, or attempt to tell them, what weight should be attached thereto, and the instruction was equivalent to a statement that the court regarded such verdict as very strong evidence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such instruction is also objectionable, as it was no more the duty of the jury to consider such verdict than to consider any other competent evidence, and their attention should not have been particularly directed to such verdict.

[See note at end of this case.]

Master and Servant — Liability to Third Person — Care and Skill of Servant.

In an action for the death of a person struck by an automobile truck, an instruction that if the driver of the truck was a person of ordinary and reasonable skill in the business in which he was engaged, and if he exercised the ordinary judgment and skill of a reasonably careful and prudent driver at and just before the time of the injury, the jury should find defendant, the driver's employer, not guilty, is proper.

Presumption as to Competence and Care of Servant.

There is no presumption one way or the other as to the skill or want of skill of the driver of a vehicle, when all of the facts and circumstances out of which a charge of negligence arose are before the jury, and whether the driver of the vehicle was a reasonably careful and skilful driver, and exercised that degree of care and skill which an ordinarily careful and skilful driver would have exercised under the circumstances, is a matter of proof, and hence, in an action for the death of a person struck by defendant's automobile truck, it is error to charge that the law presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the driver of the truck was a reasonably careful and skilful driver, and that if plaintiff had failed to prove that he was not a reasonably careful and skilful driver, defendant was entitled to the presumption that he was reasonably careful and skilful in such work.

Automobiles — Negligence in Operation — Instructions.

In an action for the death of a person struck by an automobile truck, an instruction that if, as the driver of the truck approached the place where deceased was injured, there was no apparent necessity appearing for him to stop or slacken the speed of the truck in order to prevent injury to deceased, then the law did not require him to stop or slacken its speed is erroneous, as the question was not whether there was an apparent necessity for stopping or slackening the speed of the truck, but whether or not the driver was operating the truck with that degree of care and skill which an ordinarily prudent and skilful driver would have exercised, having due regard to the location, circumstances, and surroundings.

Error to Superior Court, Cook county:
POMEROY, Judge.

Action by John F. Devine, administrator, plaintiff, against Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Earl J. Walker for plaintiff in error.

Frank M. Cox and R. J. Fellingham for defendant in error.

[505] CRAIG, J.—This is an appeal by John F. Devine, administrator of the estate of Stanley O. Thompson, deceased, from a judgment of the superior court of Cook county in favor of the defendant in error, the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company, in an action on the case brought against it to recover damages for negligently causing the death of the plaintiff's intestate. It appears that the plaintiff's intestate, a child, in attempting to cross Milwaukee avenue, in the city of Chicago, was struck by an automobile truck driven by a servant of defendant in error and sustained injuries from which he died. A coroner's inquest was held, resulting in [506] a finding exonerating the driver of the truck from all responsibility.

On the trial of this case the verdict of the coroner's jury was introduced in evidence over the objection of plaintiff in error, and the jury were instructed, with respect to said evidence, as follows: "You are further instructed that the coroner's verdict in evidence is not conclusive, but you should consider the verdict of the coroner's jury in this case in considering whether or not defendant's truck driver is guilty of the negligence charged in the declaration or any count thereof." The admission of the coroner's verdict in evidence and the giving of this instruction are the principal errors relied upon for reversal.

It appears from the evidence that Milwaukee avenue runs in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction through the northwestern part of the city of Chicago. Two street car tracks are laid along this street, and at the time the accident occurred the street was torn up on account of certain repairs that were being made. The accident happened between four and five o'clock in the afternoon of October 25, 1911, and was witnessed by several persons. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff in error tends to show that Sebastian W. Foy, an employee of defendant in error, was driving the truck of defendant in error in a northwesterly direction along the east street car track, and that there was another wagon some three hundred feet ahead of the truck, going in the same direction; that plaintiff's intestate, a boy of the age of about six years, with three other boys,—two about his own age and one about five years his senior,—came down Milwaukee avenue and jumped on the rear of a wagon going southeast, on which they rode a short distance before they were ordered off by the driver, and that they then crossed to the east side of the street, where they remained from a minute to a minute and a half and then started to re-cross the street. At this time the wagon on which they had been riding was about one hundred and fifty [507] feet southeast of them and the automobile truck considerably farther away. Plaintiff's intestate was the last child to attempt to cross the street, and at the time he stepped upon the first rail of the car track the automobile truck was from fifty to one hundred feet distant, traveling at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five miles per hour, and was going at about that rate when plaintiff's intestate was struck by the left front wheel or bumper of the truck and knocked down and sustained the injuries from which he died. The evidence on the part of defendant in error tends to show that the automobile truck was proceeding at the rate of from four to six miles per hour at a distance of from fifteen to thirty feet behind the wagon which was ahead of it. Another wagon was proceeding in a southeasterly direction on the opposite track towards the city, and just as the horse's head was about even with the front of the automobile truck the boys suddenly came out from behind this wagon on the other track and attempted to cross in front of the automobile truck, resulting in the accident in question. As soon as the driver saw the first boy come from behind the wagon he applied his brakes, including the emergency brake, but was unable to bring his vehicle to a stop until after it struck the plaintiff's intestate, who was picked up about five feet west of the automobile truck, and the same did not travel more than from ten to forty feet from the time the first boy came into view until it was brought to a full stop.

The finding of the coroner's jury introduced in evidence was as follows: "An inquisition was taken for the People of the State of Illinois at 2859 North Spaulding avenue, in the city of Chicago, in said county of Cook, on the 26th day of October, A. D. 1911, before me, Peter Hoffman, coroner in and for said county, upon view of the body of Stanley O. Thompson, Jr., then and there lying dead, upon the oaths of six good and lawful men of said county, who being duly sworn to inquire on the part of the People of the [508] State of Illinois into all the circumstances attending the death of said Stanley O. Thompson and by whom the same was produced, and in what manner and when and where the said Stanley O. Thompson came to his death, do say upon their oaths, as aforesaid, that the said Stanley O. Thompson, now lying dead at 2859 North Spaulding avenue, in said city of Chicago, county of Cook and State of Illinois, came to his death on the 25th day of October, A. D. 1911, in the office of Dr. Hannig, 2812 Milwaukee avenue, from injuries received by being struck and thrown to the ground by an auto-supply car owned by the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company and driven by one Sebastian W. Foy on Milwaukee avenue between Sawyer avenue and Diversey street at about 4:45 P. M., October 25, 1911. From the testimony presented, we, the jury, believe the aforesaid Sebastian W. Foy was blameless for this unfortunate occurrence, and we therefore recommend his discharge from further custody."

Plaintiff in error objected to the introduction of the verdict of the coroner's jury in evidence, and urged in support of his objection that the Coroner's act, and particularly section 14 of that act, is unconstitutional and void. The objection was overruled. He thereupon made a motion to strike out the last paragraph of the verdict, which motion was also overruled, and it was introduced in evidence, as above stated, and taken by the jury to the jury room. By appropriate assignment of error the constitutionality of this section of the statute is raised in this court, and it is by reason of such assignment of error that the appeal has been prosecuted direct to this court.

manner, and by whom or what, the said dead body came to its death, and of all other facts of and concerning the same, together with all material circumstances in anywise related to or connected with the said death, and [509] make up and sign a verdict, and deliver the same to the coroner." (Hurd's Stat. 1913, p. 560.)

The particular objections urged to the constitutionality of this section are, first, that it invests the coroner's jury with judicial power, in violation of section 2 of article 6 of the constitution of this State, by which all judicial powers are vested in the courts; and second, that it deprives a person of his property without due process of law, in violation of the provisions of article 2 of the constitution of this State and of sections 4 and 14 of the amendments of the constitution of the United States, in that it permits one to be deprived of his property by a proceeding of which he has no notice and in which he is not allowed to participate and examine and cross-examine the witnesses produced at such hearing. In our judgment neither of these positions is well taken. No definition of the term "judicial power," as the term is used in the constitution, is given by that instrument. On the contrary, it is there used to designate one of the three great branches or departments into which the powers of government are divided and by which its affairs are to be administered, viz.: The legislative department, which makes, alters and repeals the laws; the judicial department, which interprets, construes and applies the laws; (Cooley's Const. Lim.—6th ed.—108;) and the executive department, which executes and compels obedience to the laws. (Witter v. Cook County, 256 Ill. 616, 100 N. E. 148.) Generally speaking, there is no great difficulty in distinguishing between the different departments and the duties and functions of each, but in the practical application of those various functions to the affairs of State it is often difficult to determine to which of these three departments the duties and functions of many officers properly belong. This arises from the fact that in the practical administration of State affairs there is often such a blending and admixture of the different powers of government that instances will occur in which officers are charged with functions [510] and duties which partake of the nature of all three of these departments. As said in State v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 246 Ill. 188, on page 231, 92 N. E. 814: "Administrative and executive officers are frequently called upon, in the performance of their duties, to exercise judgment and discretion, to investigate, deliberate and decide, and yet it has been held that they do not exercise judicial power, within the meaning of the constitutional provision. (Land Owners v. People, 113 Ill. 296; People v. Bartels, 138 Ill. 322, 27 N. E. 1091; People v. Simon, 176 Ill. 165, 52 N. E. 910, 68 Am. St. Rep. 175, 44 L.R.A. 801.) The power exercised is ministerial or executive, but as an incident to it the official is called upon to perform acts which are in their nature judicial,—very nearly akin to those exercised by the courts. Such powers, when conferred upon other officials than judges, are often termed quasi-judicial or discretionary. They are said to 'lie midway between the judicial and ministerial ones. The lines separating them from such as are thus on their two sides are necessarily indistinct, but in general terms, when the law, in words or by implication, commits to any officer the duty of looking into facts and acting upon them, not in a way which it specifically directs but after a discretion in its nature judicial, the function is termed quasi-judicial.' Bishop on Non-Contract Laws, secs. 785, 786; Mecham on Public Officers and Agents, sec. 637." Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (6th ed. p. 109), defines judicial power as follows: "The power which adjudicates upon and protects the rights and interests of individual citizens and to that end construes and applies the laws." This general definition of the judicial power has been adopted and approved by this court in the following among other cases: Land Owners v. People, supra; People v. Chase, 165 Ill. 527, 46 N. E. 454, 36 L.R.A. 105; People v. Simon, supra; State v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. supra. The power involves not only the power to hear and determine a cause, but also the power and jurisdiction to adjudicate and determine the rights of the parties [511] to the controversy and to render a judgment or decree which will be effectual and binding upon them in respect to their personal or property rights in controversy in such proceedings. (O'Brien v. People, 216 Ill. 354, 3 Ann. Cas. 966, 75 N. E. 108, 108 Am. St. Rep. 219.) The power to hear without the power also to adjudicate and determine the rights of the parties to such proceedings cannot be said to be the exercise of the judicial power as that term is used in the constitution of this State. The duties and functions of a coroner and the coroner's jury are of this character. While the duties and functions of such jury are of a judicial nature to the extent that they are authorized to inquire into and investigate how, by whom and in what manner the deceased came to his death and of all the facts and circumstances connected with or in any manner related to or connected with such person's death, and may subpoena and examine witnesses under oath for that purpose, they have no power, on such hearing, to adjudicate and determine the rights and liabilities of the parties growing out of the matter under investigation by them, and their finding has none of the attributes of a judgment or decree. No rights or liabilities, either civil or criminal, are established or fixed by it. A person exonerated from all liability by the coroner's jury is still subject to be indicted by the grand jury for causing the death of the person of which he was exonerated by the coroner's jury, and he may be tried and convicted of such act as a criminal offense notwithstanding the verdict of the coroner's jury exonerating him; and the same is true with respect to the civil liability growing out of such occurrence. Their powers, then, are not judicial, but, at most, are only quasi-judicial in their nature, and the statute in question is therefore not invalid as a delegation of the judicial power of the State.

For the same reason the act is not void as depriving a person of his property without due process of law, as no rights, property or otherwise, are fixed or established by the verdict rendered in such a proceeding. At most the [512] finding of a coroner's jury is but a public document containing prima facie evidence of the facts properly before the jury for investigation,—that is, as to the person and the manner in which such person came to his death,—and as such, as held in U. S. Life Ins. Co. v. Vocke, 129 Ill. 557, 22 N. E. 467, 6 L.R.A. 65, their finding is admissible in evidence. In the Vocke case, on pages 566 and 567, it is said: "We are satisfied, both upon principle and authority, that the coroner's inquisition was admissible in evidence. The inquisition was made by a public officer, acting under the sanction of an official oath, in the discharge of a public duty enjoined upon him by the law, and when it is returned into court and is filed, we see no reason why it should not be competent evidence tending to prove any matter properly before the coroner which appears upon the face of the inquisition. We do not hold that such evidence is conclusive, but only that it is competent evidence to be considered." This holding has since been approved in the following among other cases: Grand Lodge, etc. v. Wieting, 168 Ill. 408, 48 N. E. 59, 61 Am. St. Rep. 123; Stollery v. Cicero, etc. St. R. Co. 243 Ill. 290, 90 N. E. 709; Foster v. Shepherd, 258 Ill. 164, Ann. Cas. 1914B 572, 101 N. E. 411, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167. The admissibility in evidence of the finding of a coroner's jury is now too well established by the authorities in this State. The question as to whether or not Foy was blameless of the accident was an essential matter before the coroner's jury for their investigation and a proper matter to be included in their verdict and as such to go to the jury. For the reasons given we think the court did not err in admitting the coroner's verdict in evidence.

As to the instruction calling the attention of the jury to the verdict of the coroner's jury and directing them to consider it in determining the question of defendant's negligence, we are of opinion it should not have been given. The verdict of the coroner's jury, like any other public document, was competent evidence tending to prove any matter of fact properly appearing on the face of the inquisition, [513] but its weight as evidence, like any other document or other evidence in the case, was for the jury, in connection with all of the other facts and circumstances proven on the trial. (Hartshorn v. Byrne, 147 Ill. 418, 35 N. E. 622.) The court had no right to invade the province of the jury and tell them, or attempt to tell them, what weight should be attached to such finding of the coroner's jury. The instruction is also objectionable in directing the jury's particular attention to the verdict of the coroner's jury, and telling them that they should consider it in determining whether or not defendant was guilty of the negligence charged in the declaration or some count thereof. It was no more the duty of the jury to consider the evidence on that question than it was their duty to consider all of the other competent evidence in the record bearing upon that question. In Rumbold v. Supreme Council Royal League, 206 Ill. 513, 69 N. E. 590, we held it was error to give an instruction which told the jury that the coroner was a public officer acting under the sanction of an official oath in the discharge of his duties, and that the inquisition was competent evidence tending to prove the cause of death which appears upon the face of the inquisition, and that they should consider the finding of the coroner's jury, together with all the other facts and circumstances in the case, in determining whether or not the deceased committed suicide, but that "the finding of the coroner's jury or inquest is, however, not conclusive upon you in determining the cause of death," and we there said, on page 518: "All that was admitted in evidence was the verdict of the coroner's jury, and while it would have been proper to have told the jury, by an instruction, that the verdict of the coroner's jury could be considered by them in determining the nature and cause of death, it should have stated that in very simple language, and have coupled with it the statement, not that it was not conclusive, as is the conclusion of the instruction here, but that it was simply evidence that might be considered with other evidence. As we interpret the instruction, [514] it in effect tells the jury that while the verdict is not conclusive, it comes under the sanction of the official oath of an officer in the discharge of his duty and is of a very high class of evidence. We think the court had as well said to the jury that while the law does not make the verdict of the coroner's jury conclusive upon the question before them, the court regards it as very strong evidence of the matters contained in it. The vice of the instruction is not relieved by telling the jury that they should consider it in connection with the other evidence, facts and circumstances in the case." What is there said with respect to the use of the word "conclusive" in the instruction is equally applicable to the instruction given in the case at bar. It was error to give this instruction.

Complaint is made of the giving of other instructions, all of which have been considered. Two of them are of such a character as to demand consideration at this time.

By the sixth instruction the jury were told that if they believed, from the evidence, that the driver of the defendant's truck was a person of ordinary and reasonable skill in the business in which he was engaged, and that he exercised the ordinary judgment and skill of a reasonably careful and prudent driver in driving the truck at and just before the time of the injury complained of, then they should find the defendant not guilty. This instruction, standing alone, was proper.

The seventh instruction was as follows:

"The law presumes, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the driver of the truck in question was a reasonably careful and skillful driver of auto trucks; and in this case, if you believe, from all the evidence, plaintiff has failed to prove that the driver of the truck in question was not a reasonably careful and skillful driver of automobile trucks, then the defendant is entitled to the presumption that the said driver was reasonably careful and skillful in such work."

[515] The last instruction should not have been given. There is no presumption, one way or the other, as to the skill or want of skill of the driver of a vehicle, whether horse-drawn or propelled by mechanical power, when all of the facts and circumstances out of which the charge of negligence arose are before the jury. When negligence is charged and there is evidence in support of such charge, the fact that the driver of the vehicle was a reasonably careful and skillful driver and that he exercised that degree of care and skill which an ordinarily careful and skillful driver would have exercised under the circumstances was a matter of proof by the defendant. The instruction should not have been given.

The court also gave at the instance of defendant in error the following instruction, numbered 17:

"If you believe, from all the evidence in this case, that as the driver of the defendant's truck at the time and place in question approached the place where the deceased was injured there was no apparent necessity appearing for the driver of said truck stopping or slackening the speed of the truck in order to prevent injury to the deceased, then the law did not require the driver of the truck to stop or slacken the speed of the truck."

This instruction was clearly erroneous. It is not a question as to whether or not, in approaching the place in question, there was no "apparent necessity appearing for the driver of said truck stopping or slackening the speed of the truck in order to prevent injury to the deceased," but whether or not the driver was operating the car with that degree of care and skill which an ordinarily prudent and skillful driver would have exercised under the circumstances, having due regard to the location, circumstances and surroundings in which the driver was operating his car at the time. The evidence on the question of negligence was close and conflicting, and in this condition of the record [516] it was essential that the jury should have been clearly and accurately instructed as to the law of the case.

For the errors indicated in giving the instructions complained of, the judgment of the superior court must be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Reversed and remanded.

Introductory.

The earlier cases discussing the admissibility of the verdict of a coroner's jury as evidence in subsequent proceedings are reviewed in the notes to Boehme v. Sovereign Camp, etc. 4 Ann. Cas. 1019, and Cox v. Royal Tribe, 95 Am. St. Rep. 752. This note presents the recent cases on the subject.

The authorities are in conflict, as is stated in the previous note. At common law the verdict of a coroner's jury was admissible in evidence on the ground that the proceedings of the coroner's inquest were judicial in their nature, and hence the verdict was a judicial finding in rem, and as such, conclusive. And in a few jurisdictions the courts have followed the common-law rule and admitted the verdict of a coroner's jury as competent evidence of the cause of death. In Illinois it is provided by statute that the verdict of a coroner's jury, when filed with the clerk of the proper court, is a public record of the county, and as such, it has been held that it is competent, though merely prima facie and not conclusive evidence, to be considered as tending to prove any matter properly before the coroner, which appeared at the inquest. Stollery v. Cicero, etc. St. R. Co. 243 Ill. 290, 90 N. E. 709, affirming 148 Ill. App. 499; Foster v. Shepherd, 258 Ill. 164, 101 N. E. 411, Ann. Cas. 1914B 572, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, reversing 164 Ill. App. 199; Armour v. Industrial Board, 273 Ill. 590, 113 N. E. 138; Novitsky v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 276 Ill. 112, 114 N. E. 545; Variety Mfg. Co. v. Landaker, 129 Ill. App. 630; Devine v. Rothschild, 178 Ill. App. 13; Devine v. Johnston, etc. Co. 189 Ill. App. 556. And see the reported case. In most jurisdictions, however, the verdict is not deemed to be a record and has no evidentiary value.

In Criminal Action.

In a prosecution for homicide, it is well settled that the proceedings before the coroner, including the verdict of the coroner's jury, are inadmissible in evidence. State v. Row, 81 Ia. 138, 46 N. W. 872; State v. Turner, Wright (Ohio) 20; Whitehurst v. Com. 79 Va. 556; Hedger v. State, 144 Wis. 279, 128 N. W. 80. See also Wheeler v. State, 34 Ohio St. 394, 32 Am. Rep. 372. Likewise, a copy of a certificate of death, purporting to be made by the coroner, is inadmissible. State v. Garth, 164 Mo. 553, 65 S. W. 275. In Whitehurst v. Com. supra, the court said: "As to the branch of it (the exception) which relates to the refusal of the court to admit the proceedings and verdict of the coroner's jury, it may be observed that these proceedings are usually conducted in this state, in the absence of the accused, without the aid of counsel, and often in the absence of the most material witnesses, both for the prosecution and the defense. To admit those proceedings, and a verdict thus arrived at, to be used as evidence upon the trial, to influence, perhaps to control, the verdict of the jury, would, in our judgment, lead to the subversion and final overthrow of the jury system; whilst in nearly every case the rights of either the commonwealth or the accused would be inevitably prejudiced." In Smalls v. State, 101 Ga. 570, 28 S. E. 981, 40 L.R.A. 369, it was said that the verdict of a coroner's jury was merely advisory to the officers charged with the execution of the public law, and might make it the duty of the coroner to issue a warrant for the arrest of the person suspected of the homicide, but that further than that, it was without effect, and that the verdict itself had no probative effect as evidence, and was binding on no one as evidence.

In Louisiana, however, the coroner's certificate or proces verbal which gives the name of the deceased and states the cause of death is admissible in evidence in a prosecution for the murder of the person over whose body the inquest was held. State v. Hopkins, 118 La. 99, 42 So. 660.

On an information for libel, it has been held that a coroner's inquisition, on paper, which charged the prosecutor with the murder of a person, was admissible on proper evidence showing that an inquest had been held, that the person on whom it was held had been murdered, and that the person murdered was called by a certain name. Reg. v. Gregory, 8 Q. B. 508, 55 E. C. L. 508, 15 L. J. M. C. N. S. 38, 10 Jur. 387, 115 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 966.

In Action on Insurance Policy.

GENERALLY.

In a few jurisdictions in an action on an insurance policy, where the defense is suicide or death resulting from a cause precluding liability on the part of the insurer, the verdict of a coroner's jury is admissible, and, together with the other evidence, is for the consideration of the trial jury in determining the cause of the death of the insured. Zimmerman v. Masonic Aid Assoc. 75 Fed. 236; Sharland v. Washington L. Ins. Co. 101 Fed. 206, 41 C. C. A. 307; Hassencamp v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 120 Fed. 475, 56 C. C. A. 625; Rumbold v. Supreme Council Royal League, 206 Ill. 513, 69 N. E. 590; Knights Templars' etc. L. Indemnity Co. v. Crayton, 209 Ill. 550, 70 N. E. 1066, affirming 110 Ill. App. 648; Peckham v. Modern Woodmen of America, 151 Ill. App. 95; Lundholm v. Mystic Workers, 164 Ill. App. 472; Genna v. Continental Casualty Co. 167 Ill. App. 413; Miles v. Court of Honor, 173 Ill. App. 187; Mittelstadt v. Modern Woodmen of America, 143 Ia. 186, 121 N. W. 803, 136 Am. St. Rep. 765; Tomlinson v. Sovereign Camp, etc. 160 Ia. 472, 141 N. W. 950; Boeck v. Modern Woodmen of America, 162 Ia. 159, 143 N. W. 999. Compare U. S. Life Ins. Co. v. Kielgast, 26 Ill. App. 567. In Tomlinson v. Sovereign Camp, etc. supra, the following instruction was approved as being as favorable to the defendant as it was entitled to: "The verdict of the coroner's jury as to the inquest held upon the body of Ralph V. Collier at the time of his death, has been offered in evidence upon the trial of this cause. This evidence is competent and should be considered by you as bearing upon the question of whether the death of Ralph V. Collier was by accidental or suicidal means. This verdict, standing alone, would be prima facie evidence that his death was caused by suicidal means, but such verdict is not conclusive; and the actual manner in which he did meet his death may be inquired into by you, and determined by a preponderance of the evidence before you, bearing in mind also the presumption of his death being accidental, together with all the other facts and circumstances surrounding the manner of his death by all the evidence introduced upon the trial of this cause."

But it has been held that the verdict of a coroner's jury is not conclusive. Rumbold v. Supreme Council Royal League, 206 Ill. 513, 69 N. E. 590; Mittelstadt v. Modern Woodmen of America, 143 Ia. 186, 121 N. W. 803, 136 Am. St. Rep. 765; Tomlinson v. Sovereign Camp, etc. 160 Ia. 472, 141 N. W. 950. In Rumbold v. Supreme Council Royal League, supra, it was held to be error to give an instruction which told the jury that the coroner was a public officer acting under the sanction of an official oath in the discharge of his duties, and that the inquisition was competent evidence tending to prove the cause of death which appeared on the face of the inquisition, and that they should consider the finding of the coroner's jury together with all the other facts and circumstances in the case, in determining whether the deceased committed suicide, but that "the finding of the coroner's jury or inquest is, however, not conclusive upon you in determining the cause of death." The court said: "All that was admitted in evidence was the verdict of the coroner's jury, and while it would have been proper to have told the jury, by an instruction, that the verdict of the coroner's jury could be considered by them in determining the nature and cause of death, it should have stated that in very simple language, and have coupled with it the statement, not that it was not conclusive, as is the conclusion of the instruction here, but that it was simply evidence that might be considered with other evidence. As we interpret the instruction, it in effect tells the jury that while the verdict is not conclusive, it comes under the sanction of the official oath of an officer in the discharge of his duty, and is of a very high class of evidence. We think the court had as well said to the jury, that while the law does not make the verdict of the coroner's jury conclusive upon the question before them, the court regards it as very strong evidence of the matters contained in it. The vice of the instruction is not relieved by telling the jury that they should consider it in connection with the other evidence, facts and circumstances in the case." In Supreme Lodge, etc. v. Beck, 181 U. S. 49, 21 S. Ct. 532, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 741, affirming 94 Fed. 751, 36 C. C. A. 467, it was said: "The plaintiff in her proofs of loss stated that the deceased came to his death by suicide, and to that effect was the verdict of the coroner's jury. With respect to this matter the court charged that there was no estoppel; that the plaintiff could explain the circumstances under which she signed the statement, and that while standing alone it would justify a verdict for the defendant, yet if explained and the jury were satisfied that the death did not arise from suicide, she was not concluded by this declaration. We see no error in this ruling." To the same effect, see Hassencamp v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 120 Fed. 475, 56 C. C. A. 625. The presumption against suicide and in favor of death from natural causes is not overcome by the introduction at the trial of the verdict of a coroner's jury. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Durden, 9 Ga. App. 797, 72 S. E. 295. And in Peckham v. Modern Woodman of America, 151 Ill. App. 95, it was held that a coroner's verdict, while competent to be considered in connection with the other evidence pertaining to the issue, was not sufficient to establish prima facie the fact that the insured committed suicide; and that an instruction that, notwithstanding such verdict, it was necessary for the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the insured committed suicide before the defendant could under its defense of suicide defeat a recovery by the plaintiff, stated the law correctly.

In a few recent instances the verdict of a coroner's jury has been received in evidence without any objection as to its admissibility and the court without passing on its admissibility proceeded to discuss its weight as evidence. See Leman v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 46 La. Ann. 1189, 15 So. 388, 49 Am. St. Rep. 348, 24 L.R.A. 589. See also Puls v. Grand Lodge, etc. 13 N. D. 559, 102 N. W. 165, wherein the court said: "The respondent was not present and had nothing to do with the post mortem examination or the coroner's inquest. Consequently neither the report of death nor the verdict of the coroner's jury were in the nature of admissions by the beneficiary. As neither of the documents was objected to, we express no opinion as to their admissibility. It is clear that neither of the documents was conclusive evidence against the plaintiff, but had only such evidentiary weight as the circumstance attending the making of them entitled them to."

In the majority of the jurisdictions the rule is that coroner's inquisition proceedings are not judicial in their nature, and hence, in an action on an insurance policy, the verdict of a coroner's jury, while competent to be received in evidence as part of the proof that the death of the insured occurred, is inadmissible as original, substantive evidence of the cause of the insured's death. American Nat. L. Ins. Co. v. White (Ark.) 191 S. W. 25; Craig v. Modern Woodmen of America, 40 Ind. App. 279, 80 N. E. 429; Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Milward, 118 Ky. 716, 4 Ann. Cas. 1092, 82 S. Ins. Co. v. Brown*, 2 Tex. Unrep. Cas. 160; Krogh v. Modern Brotherhood of America, 153 Wis. 397, 141 N. W. 276, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 404. See also Fey v. I. O. O. F. Mut. L. Ins. Soc. 120 Wis. 358, 98 N. W. 206. Compare Grand Lodge, etc. v. Banister, 80 Ark. 190, 96 S. W. 742; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hayward (Tex.) 27 S. W. 36. In American Nat. L. Ins. Co. v. White (Ark.) 191 S. W. 25, the court said: "The next assignment of error presents the question of whether the verdict of the coroner's jury was admissible as original evidence of the cause of the insured's death. This question has never been decided by this court. . . . 'The law gives such high credit to an inquisition of death, found before a coroner, that anciently the judges would not receive a verdict acquitting a person of the death of a man found against the accused by the coroner's inquest, unless the jury finding such acquittal had also found what other person did the act, or by what other means the party came to his death, because it appeared by the coroner's view, on record, that a person was killed.' 2 Bac. Abr. 431. Under our statute the coroner's jury makes an ex parte investigation of supposed crime resulting in homicide for the purpose of aiding in the administration of the criminal laws of the state. Other persons having property interests depending upon the cause of the death are not allowed to participate in the hearing before the coroner's jury with the view to establish rights by the verdict. While the coroner's inquest is made on behalf of the state and a record of it is required to be made and kept it cannot, on any well-grounded principle of American common law, become evidence in another suit as to the cause of the death investigated. There is no good reason why a stranger to the proceedings should be in any wise bound by the verdict, or that it should be evidence against him of the cause of the death. If such verdict be admissible as evidence, it follows from its very nature that it might also constitute proof of the main fact and of every essential fact in issue. It might not only show the fact of death by violent and external means within a day covered by the policy, but might also find that the person slaying the insured was justified or was not justified in killing him. In either event a property right of one or the other litigants would be determined by a verdict of which no notice was given to him, and without an opportunity to cross-examine the witness whose oaths established it. He would be deprived of his property without due process of law; for the first verdict might be sufficient to maintain the action or sustain the defense, as the case might be, if it was the only evidence offered or obtainable, and thus the verdict of the trial jury would be merely a formal ratification of the coroner's verdict. We cannot see any well-grounded reason why such a verdict should be evidence against a stranger to the proceedings."

AS PART OF PROOFS OF LOSS.

When by the terms of an insurance policy or the by-laws of the company the record or verdict of a coroner's jury is required to be attached to the proofs of death made by the beneficiary, a verdict so attached is admissible in evidence on the trial of a case on the ground that it contains admissions of the beneficiary against his interest as to the cause of death. American Nat. L. Ins. Co. v. White (Ark.) 191 S. W. 25; Queatham v. Modern Woodmen of America, 148 Mo. App. 33, 127 S. W. 651; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 562, 19 Ohio Cir. Rep. 502; Dougherty v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 154 Pa. St. 385, 25 Atl. 739; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Wagner, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 233, 109 S. W. 1120; Bachmeyer v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc. 82 Wis. 255, 52 N. W. 101 (reversed on other grounds, 87 Wis. 325, 58 N. W. 399); Hart v. Fraternal Alliance, 108 Wis. 490, 84 N. W. 851. See also Krogh v. Brotherhood of America, 153 Wis. 397, 141 N. W. 276, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 404. In Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Wagner, supra, the court said: "Ordinarily the verdict of a coroner's jury is inadmissible in this state to prove the cause of death (Boehme v. Sovereign Camp, etc. 98 Tex. 376, 4 Ann. Cas. 1019, 84 S. W. 422); but when, as in this case, it is expressly provided by the policy that proofs of death 'shall contain the record and verdict of the coroner's inquest, if any be held,' and 'the proofs of death shall be evidence of the facts therein stated in behalf of . . . Company,' a different question is presented. The undisputed evidence shows that a coroner's inquest was held over the insured's dead body; that a record of the proceedings was made, and that it was expressly found by the coroner: 'That some time during the 1st day of December, 1904, the said Frederick Wagner, with suicidal intent, in said county and state, did cut himself on the bend of the right elbow, inflicting a wound two and one-half inches in length, which probably caused a severance of the ulnar artery, and (11) distinct punctures within an area of two inches in the region of the left nipple, all apparently made by a penknife, from the effects of which said wounds the said deceased died at the time and place hereinbefore stated,' which was certified to as well as proved by the depositions of the coroner himself; and that neither the record nor verdict was attached to the proofs of death furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant. In view of these facts the record and verdict of the inquest, when offered in evidence by the defendant, should not have been excluded upon the objection of plaintiff that the proceedings were ex parte. There can be no doubt that the record of such proceedings, which were duly proved and attested, was evidence of the fact that the inquest was held and a record of the proceedings was preserved. This, in connection with the proofs of death furnished by plaintiff, would have conclusively shown that such proofs were not made in compliance with the provisions of the policy, and there can be no question as to its admissibility as evidence to establish such fact. But in view of the stipulation in the policy referred to, if it were shown that plaintiff knew of such proceedings and could have obtained the record and wilfully refused to attach it to the proofs of death, we would not be prepared to hold that the record of such proceedings was not evidence of the fact that deceased came to his death by his own hand. If the record had been attached to the proofs of death, as was required by the express terms of the policy, it would under the agreement between the insurer and assured have been evidence for the former of such fact. And we are not inclined to hold that the beneficiary in the policy, by wilfully omitting from the proofs the record of the proceedings, in violation of its express terms, can deprive the defendant of evidence that was expressly agreed upon by the parties to the contract."

It has been held that a report of an inquest was admissible in an action on an insurance policy for the purpose of enabling the jury to decide whether the report, with the other information obtained by the directors, ought to have satisfied them that the cause of death was an accident within the terms of the policy, where the policy expressly required that satisfactory proof of the external, violent and accidental means of death should be furnished to the directors. Nichols v. Commercial Travelers' Eastern Acc. Assoc. 221 Mass. 540, 109 N. E. 449.

In Fisher v. Fidelity Mut. L. Assoc. 188 Pa. St. 1, 41 Atl. 467, it appeared that in the "claimant's statement," filed as "proof of death," to which a copy of the coroner's inquest and the testimony given thereon were attached, the plaintiff entered the following protest: "I have been informed the verdict was suicide, but I decline to be bound by it." It was held that while by attaching a copy of the verdict and depositions the plaintiff admitted their existence, their force as admissions by him was very much weakened, if not wholly overcome, by his protest, wherein he expressly declined to admit the truth of the facts which the defendant company sought to prove by them.

In Craig v. Modern Woodmen of America, 40 Ind. App. 279, 80 N. E. 429, while recognizing the foregoing rules, the court said: "The beneficiary in this case was required by the by-laws of the company to submit a duly authenticated and duly certified copy of the coroner's proceedings, all evidence, and the verdict. Compliance with such requirement amounted to an admission that an inquest was had; that certain evidence was heard, and a certain verdict rendered, but it could not, by any stretch of imagination, be taken as an admission of the truth of the testimony or the accuracy of the verdict. So that the quality essential to the introduction of the coroner's verdict and proceedings, as evidence of the truth of the facts therein recited, was wholly lacking. It has been heretofore held by this court that the coroner's verdict is not admissible in evidence. . . . The mere fact that such record was furnished to appellant by appellee can in nowise change either the reason for the rule or the rule itself. In this case the proofs themselves show that appellant refused to admit the truth of the facts found by the coroner, but explicitly announced her disbelief in their truth. She cannot be held to have admitted the truth of the fact which she expressly denied."

The rule does not apply where the coroner's verdict is furnished by the company's agents, as nothing they do without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff or beneficiaries can be received as admissions against them; and in such a case, the verdict of the coroner's jury is properly excluded. Krogh v. Brotherhood of America, 153 Wis. 397, 141 N. W. 276, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 404. And see Brotherhood of American Yeomen v. Hickey (Tex.) 191 S. W. 162, wherein the court held that the certificate of the coroner, furnished to the defendant with the proofs of death by the plaintiff under the terms of the policy, and offered for the purpose of showing the cause of the death of the insured and as admissions of the plaintiff, was inadmissible, since there was no condition in the policy that the proofs of death furnished under the terms of the policy should be evidence of the fact in a trial on behalf of the defendant.

No such rule of evidence obtains, moreover, and the verdict of a coroner's jury is inadmissible, where the terms of the policy or the by-laws of the company do not require the verdict or the record of the coroner's inquest to be furnished to the company as part of the proof of death, as in such a case the proof of death is made in an effort to settle the loss without a suit, and has no connection whatever with the trial, when the company has refused to make payment. American Nat. L. Ins. Co. v. White (Ark.) 191 S. W. 25; Queatham v. Modern Woodmen of America, 148 Mo. App. 33, 127 S. W. 651. Nor has the rule any application when a copy of the verdict at the coroner's inquest is not furnished as a part of the proofs of death, pursuant to the requirements of the policy, but merely as a voluntary act in an effort to secure a settlement. American Nat. L. Ins. Co. v. White (Ark.) 191 S. W. 25; Queatham v. Modern Woodmen of America, 148 Mo. App. 33, 127 S. W. 651. Thus, where the conditions of the policy required the representative to make legal proof of the death and cause of death, as a condition precedent to liability, and he voluntarily sent to the company as part of the proofs the coroner's inquest and examination, it was held that the finding at the coroner's inquest was admissible as evidence of the compliance of the representative of the deceased with the terms of the contract, and that the statements made in them might be used as admissions against the representative, but that he was not estopped by such statement to show the facts. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 562, 19 Ohio Cir. Rep. 502.

The admission resulting from the inclusion of a coroner's verdict as part of the proofs of loss is prima facie only and may be rebutted. Queatham v. Modern Woodmen of America, 148 Mo. App. 33, 127 S. W. 651; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 562, 19 Ohio Cir. Rep. 502; Dougherty v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 154 Pa. St. 385, 25 Atl. 739. In Action for Damages for Death.

GENERALLY.

In an action for death due to negligence, it has been held that the record and verdict of a coroner's jury is not admissible, for the purpose of proving the cause of death, as it cannot in any way affect the rights of private parties, not parties to the coroner's proceeding. Central R. Co. v. Moore, 61 Ga. 151; Olwell v. Milwaukee St. R. Co. 92 Wis. 330, 66 N. W. 362. So, where it was admitted that the deceased died from the injury, and the only purpose of the offer of the verdict of the coroner's jury was to prove negligence, the verdict was held to be inadmissible, since the opinion of the jury on the question of negligence was but hearsay; and even viewing it as a judicial proceeding, the inquest could not bind the defendant, who was not a party to it. Rowe v. Such, 134 Cal. 573, 66 Pac. 862, 67 Pac. 760. In Fleming v. Canadian Pac. R. Co. 11 Ont. W. Rep. 982, wherein Meredith, C. J., said: "With regard to the other point, the reception of the finding of the coroner's jury, it may be that for some purpose—the finding of the death of the man or something of that kind—the finding may be admissible, but it is a new proposition, as it occurs to me, that it is admissible as evidence against some one who may not have been at the inquest, to fix him with civil liability for the death of the person whose death was the subject of the inquiry. I am of opinion that the learned trial judge properly rejected the finding as evidence for that purpose."
Ann. Cas. 1917B.—57.

The report of a coroner has also been held to be inadmissible to prove the cause of death. Sullivan v. Seattle Electric Co. 51 Wash. 71, 97 Pac. 1109, 130 Am. St. Rep. 1082, wherein the court said: "It is simply a report made to the auditor by the coroner as a part of the vital statistics of the state, under the provisions of the act creating the state board of health, and, as said by the court in Sovereign Camp, etc. v. Grandson, 64 Neb. 39, 89 N. W. 448: 'It is a mere police regulation, and is not intended for supplying the public at large with information upon which reliance may be placed in the business affairs of the community. We do not think the record is of such a character as to entitle it to be received in evidence, as affecting the interest of a party to a litigation.'"

A coroner's death certificate is inadmissible in an action for damages for death by wrongful act to show what caused the death of the intestate, nor can it be made evidence indirectly by requiring the coroner to identify it and then state what reason was assigned by him as the cause of the death. District of Columbia v. Washington, 44 App. Cas. (D. C.) 120, 43 Wash. L. Rep. 722, L.R.A. 1916C 379.

In Massachusetts, in an action for damages for death by wrongful act, the report of the inquest is not admissible as substantive evidence. Jewett v. Boston El. R. Co. 219 Mass. 528, 107 N. E. 433; Carney v. Boston El. R. Co. 219 Mass. 552, 107 N. E. 411.

RULE IN ILLINOIS.

In Illinois, under a statute providing that the verdict of a coroner's jury is a public record when filed and therefore is competent but not conclusive evidence in another proceeding as tending to prove any matter properly before the coroner which appeared at the inquest, it has been held that a coroner's verdict is admissible as evidence in an action for damages for death due to negligence. Stollery v. Cicero, etc. St. R. Co. 243 Ill. 290, 90 N. E. 709, affirming 148 Ill. App. 499; Foster v. Shepherd, 258 Ill. 164, Ann. Cas. 1914B 572, 101 N. E. 411, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, reversing 164 Ill. App. 199; Novitsky v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 276 Ill. 112, 114 N. E. 545; Variety Mfg. Co. v. Landaker, 129 Ill. App. 630; Devine v. Rothschild, 178 Ill. App. 13; Newell v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 179 Ill. App. 497; Novitsky v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 180 Ill. App. 188; Devine v. Johnston, etc. Co. 189 Ill. App. 556. And see the reported case. See also Victor Chemical Works v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 11, 113 N. E. 173; Callaway v. Spurgeon, 63 Ill. App. 571. In Stollery v. Cicero, etc. St. R. Co. supra, it was held that the verdict of a coroner's jury, which found that the deceased came to his death by being caught and crushed by a coal conveyor, was admissible, though the coroner's name and seal were attached. In Foster v. Shepherd, 258 Ill. 164, Ann. Cas. 1914B 572, 101 N. E. 411, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, it appeared that the verdict of the coroner's jury, which was admitted in evidence, was as follows: "In the matter of the inquisition on the body of Ralph M. Foster, deceased, held at Lovington, Illinois, on the 20th day of August, 1909, we, the undersigned jurors, sworn to inquire of the death of Ralph M. Foster, on oath do find that he came to his death by reason of a gunshot wound in the right shoulder and ranging downward through the heart. The said wound was caused from a bullet fired from a gun held in the hands of Homer Shepherd, who fired the shot thinking Ralph M. Foster was a burglar on watch while other burglars were trying to enter his home, and that said Homer Shepherd fired the shot in protection of his home and in our opinion was justified in the act." The trial court thus instructed the jury: "Court instructs the jury that you should entirely disregard the following portion or part of the verdict of the coroner's jury which has been admitted to evidence, to wit: 'Who fired the shot thinking Ralph M. Foster was a burglar on watch while other burglars were trying to enter his home, and that said Homer Shepherd fired said shot in protection of his home and in our opinion was justified in the act.' And you are further instructed that it will be highly improper for you to consider the above and foregoing portion of the verdict of the coroner's jury." The appellate court said: "The verdict of a coroner's jury in an inquest over a dead person is required by the state to be sealed up and returned to the clerk of the circuit court, where it shall be filed and preserved. It thus becomes a public record of the county, and as such is competent evidence to be considered in another proceeding as tending to prove any matter properly before the coroner which appears on the fact of the inquest. . . . It is contended by defendant in error that the part of the coroner's verdict excluded by this instruction was not a proper finding to be made, and that it was therefore properly excluded. By section 14 of the Coroner's Act it is made the duty of a coroner's jury to inquire how, in what manner and by whom or what the dead body came to its death, and to make up and sign a verdict and deliver the same to the coroner. The principal object of an inquest is to determine whether a crime has been committed. It is further by section 23 of the act made the duty of the coroner, if any person is implicated by the inquest as the unlawful slayer of the deceased or as an accessory thereto and is not in custody, to apprehend and commit to the county jail such person so implicated or cause him to be apprehended or committed, there to remain until discharged by due process of law. Under these provisions of the coroner's act the finding that 'the said wound was caused from a bullet fired from a gun held in the hands of Homer Shepherd, who . . . in our opinion was justified in the act,' was a necessary and proper part of the verdict. That Homer Shepherd fired the shot in the protection of his home, thinking the deceased was a burglar, was merely the finding of an evidentiary fact and might properly have been stricken as surplusage. The instruction as given was too board."

But the verdict of the coroner's jury is only prima facie proof of the various circumstances therein stated and is not conclusive, and hence the trial jury, after considering the evidence as a whole, may, from the preponderance of the evidence, find any fact differently from the way in which it is stated in the coroner's verdict. Grant v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 176 Ill. App. 292; Novitsky v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 180 Ill. App. 188. And see the reported case.

In the reported case, an action for damages for the death of a child caused by the negligence of the driver of an automobile truck, a servant of the defendant, it is held that the verdict of a coroner's jury stating that they, the jurors, believed that the driver was blameless, was properly admitted in evidence, as the question whether he was blameless was an essential matter for investigation by the coroner's jury, and a proper matter to be included in their verdict.

S. LOWMAN AND COMPANY

v.

BALLARD.

But, as a coroner is given no power or authority by the Illinois statute to make a finding on the question of the negligence of either the deceased or of his employer, with a view to fixing or defeating personal liability against the employer for his death, it has been held that a verdict imputing negligence to the defendant is not admissible in evidence against the defendant in an action for damages for such death. Roloff v. Luer Bros. Packing, etc. Co. 158 Ill. App. 614. To the same effect, see Novitsky v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 276 Ill. 112, 114 N. E. 545. And see Casey v. Chicago, 189 Ill. App. 188, an action against a city for the death of a child owing to a defect in the street, wherein it was held that that part of a coroner's verdict which found that the condition of the street was the cause of the accident, was incompetent. In Callaway v. Spurgeon, 63 Ill. App. 571, it was held that a finding in a coroner's verdict admitted in evidence, that death was not occasioned by negligence of a character sufficient to support an action at law for civil damages, was extra-judicial and void.

Under the Illinois Workmen's Compensation Act, the rule is regarded as settled that the inquest of the coroner and the verdict of the jury are competent evidence in an inquiry as to the cause of death in a case arising under the statute. And while the verdict is not conclusive, yet it is to be regarded as prima facie evidence tending to prove the cause of death. Armour Co. v. Industrial Board, 273 Ill. 590, 113 N. E. 138; Victor Chemical Works v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 11, 113 N. E. 173.

On Question of Survivorship.

It has been held that the verdict of a coroner's jury which did not purport to contain a statement of any facts within the knowledge of the coroner, or any juror, as to the time or manner of the death of two persons, who were murdered on the same occasion and whose bodies were burned in their house, was inadmissible on the question of survivorship, as being a matter of mere opinion and hearsay. Hollister v. Cordero, 76 Cal. 649, 18 Pac. 855.

On Question of Testamentary Capacity.

In proceedings to contest the probate of a will, wherein it appeared that both the testatrix and the testatrix's mother had committed suicide, it was held that the verdict of a coroner's jury in an inquisition on their bodies was inadmissible on the issue of lack of testamentary capacity by reason of the insanity of the testatrix. In re Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 Pac. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795.

Justices of the Peace — Invalid Judgment — Procedure for Vacation.

Where judgment is rendered by a justice of the peace on insufficient service, defendant's remedy is by motion to vacate before the justice who tried the case.

Process — Service — Reading to Defendant over Telephone.

Under Revisal 1905, § 439, providing that summons shall be served by the sheriff or other officer reading the same to the party or parties named as defendant and such reading shall be a legal and sufficient service, service cannot be made by the officer reading the summons to the defendant over the telephone, though the officer may recognize defendant's voice and know he is talking to the proper person.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Anson county:
SHAW, Judge.

Action by S. Lowman and Company, plaintiff, against T. J. Ballard, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. REVERSED.

[17] Motion to set aside judgment, heard on appeal from a justice's court.

On the hearing it appeared that in 1911 plaintiff instituted an action on account against defendant, before a justice of the peace in said county, and on 16 March, 1911, recovered judgment for $173.75, defendant not appealing at this time; that defendant instituted a civil action against plaintiff to set aside said judgment, claiming that he owned plaintiff nothing and that he had never been served with summons in said cause, and, for many months after its rendition, he had no notice or knowledge of the existence of the judgment or of any suit against him by plaintiff.

Judgment in that cause was entered in favor of the present plaintiff, and, on appeal, judgment was affirmed, the court being of opinion that, on the facts presented in that record, defendant could only proceed by motion before the justice to set aside the judgment. See case, Ballard v. Lowry, 163 N. C. 487, 79 S. E. 966. Pursuant to that intimation, defendant, on notice duly served, made the present motion to set aside the judgment before the justice, J. H. Benton, Esq., and on the ground, among others, that the summons in the action had been originally served by telephone, the sheriff being at Wadesboro and defendant at Morven, 9 miles distant.

On the hearing the justice found that the sheriff had "read the summons by telephone to defendant, and, recognizing that it was defendant, by conversation had between them at the time he had made the return on the process served," etc. The justice being being of opinion that there had been a valid service, refused to set aside the judgment, and on appeal to Superior Court this ruling was affirmed, the material portion of his Honor's judgment being as follows: "The court finds as a fact that J. T. Short was a deputy sheriff of Anson County on 27 February, 1911, and read the summons issued in said cause by said justice of the peace to the defendant T. J. Ballard over the telephone line connecting Wadesboro and Morven, and that the said deputy sheriff was well acquainted with said defendant and recognized his voice over the telephone in the conversation between them at said time, whereupon said deputy sheriff made the return and indorsement upon the summons. Upon these facts the court finds that, as a matter of law, said service and reading of said summons over the telephone was a legal and valid service of said summons over the telephone was a legal and valid service of said summons, and the court so holds. From this judgment the defendant excepts and appeals to the Supreme Court."

Lockhart & Dunlap for appellant.
Gulledge & Boggan for appellee.

[18] HOKE, J.—On the facts appearing of record, and in like case whenever the remedy is available to him, the procedure open to defendant is by motion before the justice who tried the cause. This was virtually held on a former appeal between the parties, 163 N. C. 486, and the position is in accord with our decisions on the subject. Thompson v. Lynchburg Notion Co. 160 N. C. 519, 76 S. E. 470; Clark v. Deloach Mills Mfg. Co. 110 N. C. 111, 14 S. E. 518; Whitehurst v. Merchants', etc. Transp. Co. 109 N. C. 342, 13 S. E. 937; McKee v. Angel, 90 N. C. 60.

In Thompson v. Lynchburg Notion Co. supra, that being a case where service had been regularly made by publication and defendant had neither appeared nor answered, the decision was made to rest on section 1401 of Revisal, which allowed an appeal to be taken in such cases within fifteen days after personal notice of the rendition of the judgment, but Associate Justice Allen, in his well considered opinion, is careful to note that, in case of "defective process, or where there is the appearance of service when in fact there was none, the remedy by motion before the justice is properly available."

Both in the Superior and justices' courts the statutory limits as to time within which motion of this character shall be made are cases where the proceedings are in all respects regular, and do not apply in cases when there is defective service of process or an entire absence of it. Massie v. Hainey, 165 N. C. 174, 81 S. E. 135; McKee v. Angel, 90 N. C. 60 supra.

Authority here is also to the effect that where a statute provides for service of summons or notices in the progress of a cause by certain persons or by designated methods, the specified requirements must be complied with or there is no valid service. Martin v. Bufaloe, 128 N. C. 305, 38 S. E. 902, 83 Am. St. Rep. 679; Smith v. Smith, 119 N. C. 314, 25 S. E. 878; Allen v. Strickland, 100 N. C. 225, 6 S. E. 780; McKee v. Angel, supra.

This, then, being proper procedure, and the only service of the original process in this cause having been by means of the telephone. "the sheriff being at Wadesboro and defendant at Morven, 9 miles distant," the question chiefly and directly presented by this appeal is whether, in this jurisdiction, there can be a valid service of original process by means of the telephone. Our statute on the subject (Revisal, sec. 439) provides that the summons "shall be served, in all cases except as hereinafter provided, by the sheriff or other officer reading the same to the party or parties named as defendant, and such reading shall be a legal and sufficient service."

This method of serving process was established by the Legislature of 1876 and 1877. and at the time the telephone as a general system of communication was not in existence. An interesting account of its origin and development will be found in 126 U. S. Reports, the volume being devoted to a report of the telephone cases, from which it appears that the patents were applied for in 1876; that the litigation concerning [19] them was continued for something over eleven years, and it was not until 1887 that decision was made declaring the rights in dispute to be in Professor Bell and his associates, and although the active development of the system was immediately and successfully entered upon, the telephone, as now operated, did not come into very general use and application until about the beginning of the present century, or a short period preceding that date.

At the time, therefore, when this legislation was enacted, the only method of service contemplated or provided for was by reading the summons in the personal presence of the party, and we are of opinion that this is and should continue to be the correct interpretation of the statute as it is now written. This service of original process by which courts of justice acquire jurisdiction over the rights of person and of property of the citizen has always been, and properly, regulated with circumspect care. In the Code of '68 it could only be done by leaving a copy of the summons under the court seal; later, in '76 and '77, the seal was omitted when the process ran to the county of the officer who issued it and, at the same session, a service by reading by the sheriff or some officer was established; both of these changes, it will be noted, being by legislative enactment. And this method of service, by reading in the personal presence of the party, affording as it does to the sheriff a more satisfactory and certain means of identifying the person on whom the service is made and giving assurance to the litigant of the true import of the act by present exhibition of the process, giving him better opportunity, too, to ascertain the position and authority of the officer, and being the method contemplated and described by the statute at the time it was passed, and the only one recognized for twenty years thereafter, should not be altered, if at all, save by express provision of the statute law.

The only valid objection to be made to this position is that it may, at times, make for the inconvenience of the officer; but, even as to him, the proposed change is of doubtful benefit. We know that a sheriff or other officer having a process of this character in charge is properly held to a strict account as to the verity of the service. If he makes a false return, he and his bondsmen may be subjected to serious penalties, and, looked at only from the officer's point of view, there is grave question if in the effort to perform this important duty he should be subjected to the additional uncertainties, sure to arise by recognizing the proposed manner of service.

On authority the question does not seem to have been very much discussed in the courts. The nearest case we have been able to find on the subject is in Ex p. Terrell (Tex.) reported in 95 S. W. 536. That case was an attachment for contempt against a defaulting witness, their statute requiring service of subpoena by "reading [20] same in the hearing of the witness," and it was held that service by telephone was no valid service; and the position derives some support in a New York case of Gilpin v. Savage, 201 N. Y. 167, Ann. Cas. 1912A 861, 94 N. E. 656, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 417, to the effect that presentment of a note and demand for payment must be by actual exhibit of the instrument, and that a demand made by telephone was insufficient.

We are aware that in a number of cases it has been held that, under regulations requiring service of notices to be in writing, service by means of a telegram, written out by the agent and delivered, has been upheld; but these were generally in instances where the parties had voluntarily adopted that method of communication. And where the principle has been approved in reference to court process, the statute did not require that service be made by any particular or designated person, and the party being charged with the duty of having the notice served, the Court has held that such party could make the company his agent to write the notice, within the meaning of the law. Such was the case presented in Western Union Tel. Co. v. Bailey, 115 Ga. 725, 42 S. E. 89, 16 L.R.A. 933, a case to which we were cited.

On service of writs of certiorari the statute required that the applicant should cause written notice of its proper sanction to be served on his opponent, and service by telegram was upheld, on the ground that, as the statute required the party to cause notice to be served and did not designate by whom, the plaintiff could designate the company as his agent, and the notice so written out would be considered a sufficient compliance with the law. Even in that aspect the case seems to have caused the Court much perplexity, and one of the judges dissented.

Again, there are cases in which notices of injunction were served by telegram and the service was sustained, but these decisions were in application of the principle declared by the English chancellors, to the effect that, under certain circumstances, if a party in an injunction proceeding knew of the existence of the order, and intentionally violated it or knowingly or intentionally acted so as to render the same of no effect, he could be held for contempt. Vansandau v. Rose, 2 Jac. & W. (Eng.) 264; Hearn v. Tenant, 14 Ves. Jr. (Eng.) 136; Rulings by Lord Chancellor Eldon, the first referred to in Cape May, etc. R. Co. v. Johnson, 35 N. J. Eq. pp. 422-425, and the second in Davis v. Champion Fiber Co. 150 N. C. 87, 63 S. E. 180, erroneously printed in this last citation as Lord Erskine. But, while this ruling may be upheld in proceedings of that character, the exigency of the case at times requiring the recognition of such a principle, it should not be allowed to prevail in reference to the service of original process where, as in this case, the statute, as heretofore stated, at the time it was enacted contemplated and provided for a service by reading the writ in the personal presence of the party, and involving, too, the necessary exhibition of the process to the litigant.

[21] On the facts in evidence, we are of opinion, and so hold, that there has been no valid service of process shown, and this will be certified, that the judgment of the justice's court be set aside and defendant allowed to answer.

Reversed.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting).—Revisal, 439, provides that the summons shall be served by the officer "reading the same to the defendant, and such reading shall be a legal and sufficient service." All this has been done in this case. Unless the court can legislate by putting into the statute what the Legislature has not yet thought proper to put therein, this is "a legal and sufficient service." The summons, it is found as a fact, was read by the sheriff to this defendant, and indeed there is no question as to that fact or as to his being sheriff or as to the identity of the defendant. What more can be necessary? Whether or not there might be greater or less certainty as to the identity of the defendant, in service by phone, when he is brought to the phone by an agent of the sheriff, or the sheriff recognizes him, is a matter for the Legislature, if that body should find that the law needs amendment.

As to the identity of the sheriff, that is a matter for the court on the service of every process which is authenticated by his signature. As to the identity of the defendant, the officer takes that risk, whether he sees him (for he may not know him personally except by information) or phones him. The sheriff is under the highest obligations to be certain as to the identity of the defendant, for he is acting under the oath of his office and is also liable under a heavy penalty for making a false return.

The law does not require that the sheriff shall "leave a copy" with the defendant. That was long since dispensed with. Nor has it ever required that he should see the defendant. There can be no question that a nearsighted sheriff or deputy could serve process, the identity of the defendant being in all cases a matter of which the officer must assure himself under liability to a penalty. If there is a mistake as to the identity of the defendant, he can avail himself of it equally whether the sheriff is immediately present, or is blind, or speaks over the phone. In the Trojan War Stentor made his summons to surrender to the enemy on the walls of Troy at a good distance, out of the reach of arrows, and the service was sufficient. In fact, in former days the heralds of opposing armies served their summons at a good distance by trumpet.

There is no statute and no decision that requires that the defendant shall see the paper, or read it himself, or that he shall know the identity of the officer. The court knows its own officers, and the defendant takes the risk if he does not recognize the officer's authority. The officer takes the risk under his oath, and under a penalty, if he mistakes the identity [22] of the defendant. Whether the service is on a defendant who was personally present or who is at the end of a phone, these principles apply.

In this day there is an urgent demand that courts shall reduce the time and expense of proceedings. Why should an officer ride all night over bad roads, and in bad weather, at great expense, to read a summons or a subpoena to a party who is needed in court next morning, when he can read the paper as intelligently to the party over the phone and with as much certainty of his identity as if he went to the locality and hunted him up. Indeed, when the service is made by phone the officer will take even greater precautions, because he cannot reach the party in that way unless he is brought to the phone, at his request by some agent of the sheriff, or voluntarily remains at the phone till the reading is completed.

It is suggested that "service by phone is not safe." Millions of dollars in contracts are made every day over the phone, often at a long distance, between parties who do not see each other, but who are satisfied of each other's identity, by taking proper precautions. The great transportation systems of the country find it safe to use the telephone in controlling the movements of trains on which depend the safety of thousands of lives and millions of property daily. Great armies, on whose movements rest the destiny of nations and the lives of thousands of men, are risked, every day, on the use of the telephone. Over the phone doctors give prescriptions on which the lives of patients depend, and lawyers give advice on which rest the disposal or transfer of property. Yet we are asked to say that it is unsafe for this officer to notify this defendant to appear before a magistrate in a small action involving a few dollars when it is found as a fact that this defendant was the proper party, that the officer was duly authorized, and that he fully read this summons to this defendant as required by the statute!

Why should the courts alone be deprived of the advantages of modern improvements, and retain every antiquated method as to service or as to pleadings, on the ground that it was "not thus done under the Saxon Heptarchy?" It is a great saving of useless expense and of time to use this method of summoning jurors and witnesses and parties over the phone, of which bank officials, business men, railroad officers, and everybody else avail themselves. Indeed, there is less risk of imposition as to identity in the service of a summons or subpoena than in any of the other businesses of life, for the reason that the officer being under a penalty for making an erroneous return, will take extra care in that regard. Besides, the party who is served can rarely, if ever, have any motive to assume to be the defendant when he is not. Moreover, he waives any other service, as this defendant did, by remaining at the phone until the entire summons is read to him.

[23] If an officer should read a summons to a man on the other side of a screen, or of a curtain, or in another room, and his identity is certain, as is found in this case, and his hearing it is not denied, this surely would be sufficient. The invention of the phone has merely extended the range of the voice of the officer and of the hearing of the defendant.

The statute does not require that the officer should return that he "saw the defendant and read the summons to him." But it only requires "reading the same to defendant, and such reading shall be a legal and sufficient service." For the Court to add the requirement that the officer "saw the defendant" is legislation by the Court, and will make a very considerable addition of trouble and expense to the officers which the Legislature has not placed upon them.

Whether the officer sees or does not see the defendant, it is a defense that he was not an officer, or that there was a mistake of identity as to the defendant, or that the summons was not read to him. These defenses are in no wise affected by the circumstance that the summons was read over the phone, or at a distance, or to one in another room. The statute does not require the immediate presence of the defendant.

A captive with the Indians who received a letter told the chief its contents and from whom it came. The chieftain took the letter. He looked at it and saw nothing on it to that purport. He put it to his ears and heard nothing. He smelt of it and perceived nothing. He said that his captive was either a liar or a witch, and in either event he ought to be burned, and burned he was. The chief knew no other than oral means of communication.

When the invention of the telescope vastly extended human vision, Galileo, gauging the starry depths, announced that the world revolved around the sun, and not the sun around the world. The ignorant priests condemned him to be burned, and he only escaped by taking it back.

The most ignorant man in North Carolina now knows that by the invention of the telephone the range of the human voice and of human hearing has been lengthened. When this summons was read to the defendant by the officer over the phone (all of which are found as facts), it was the officer's voice and not a substitute—as in the case of a telegram or letter—which the defendant heard, and the officer truly reported, as is found, that he had "read" the summons to him. The statute requires nothing more, and there is no reason that it should. A few years ago it might have been asserted that thus reading a summons to a man 9 miles off was a physical impossibility, and therefore on its face untrue. But modern invention has made it an ordinary occurrence. A conversation over the phone is competent in evidence; why not the "reading" of a summons, when the identity of the party is found as a fact?

[24] This system of serving summonses and subpoenas is a great saving of expense and of time. It has been much resorted to in the courts, and now to hold it illegal may jeopardize the validity of many legal proceedings which have been based upon such service. In a practical age there is no reason why the courts should not avail themselves of the same conveniences which business men and indeed all others customarily use and have found to be safe and reliable as well as convenient. No statute forbids it, and the courts, in actual practice, have recognized and used it.

Allen, J., concurs in dissenting opinion.

NOTE.—The General Assembly being in session, at once passed chapter 48, Laws 1915, authorizing service over the phone of subpoenas for witnesses and in summoning jurors, leaving still without legislation only the service of summons for defendants, which, however, is probably only about one-twentieth of the business, as witnesses and jurors are thus notified in both criminal and civil cases. In General.

It has been held repeatedly that with respect to its admissibility in evidence a conversation by telephone stands on the same footing as an ordinary conversation. See the notes to the following cases: McCarthy v. Peach, 1 Ann. Cas. 801; Gzowski v. Forst, 20 Ann. Cas. 704; Carroll v. Parry, Ann. Cas. 1916E 971. Consequently, the mere fact that a transaction inter partes is had by telephone would not seem to affect its validity. With respect to notices and the like in judicial proceedings, however, the use of the telephone is ordinarily unauthorized. See the cases cited throughout this note.

Service, Notice, Application or Order in Judicial Proceeding.

The rule supported by the weight of authority is that where a notice is required to be served and the manner of service is not provided for, personal service is requisite. See the note to Haj v. American Bottle Co.,

Ann. Cas. 1915A 220. It is also a general rule that wherever notice is required or authorized by law in any judicial proceeding the notice must be in writing, although not in terms required to be written. See the note to McPhail v. Denver, Ann. Cas. 1916E 1143.

Accordingly it is held that process cannot be served by telephone. Sharpless Separator Co. v. Brillhart (Md.) 98 Atl. 484; Ex p. Terrell (Tex.) 95 S. W. 536. And see the reported case. Thus in the case first cited, it was said: "We cannot give our sanction to service of process by reading the writ over a telephone. It is the duty of an officer to whom it is directed to serve it in person, and it would open the door for fraud, confusion, and misunderstandings, if the officers of the law be permitted to so serve process. It may be true that generally a familiar voice can be recognized over the telephone, but an officer in the performance of such duties is often called upon to serve process upon strangers, or those whose voices he is not familiar with. One desiring to escape service might have some one answer for him, and then contend he was not summoned, or he might truthfully say that he did not know the voice of the officer, or did not understand what he said. In Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Gardiner Dairy Co. 107 Md. 556, 571-573, 69 Atl. 405, 411, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 746, we considered the use of telephones in business transactions, and we sanctioned the use of them to the extent therein stated, but we added: 'As it is a character of evidence that might be used improperly, courts should be careful in the application of the rule.' The use of them by an officer for serving process is far more objectionable. The presumption in favor of the truth and correctness of the officer's return would necessarily have to be at least modified, and if the service was questioned, it would oftentimes be difficult for a conscientious officer to sustain his return. Without deeming it necessary to give further reasons for not sanctioning it, we must emphatically register our disapproval of it. In many cases no harm would result, as those summoned would raise no question, but even one mistake might prove to be costly to the officer or very injurious to the public." In Ex p. Terrell (Tex.) 95 S. W. 536, it was held, under a statute providing for the service of a subpoena by reading the same in the hearing of the witness, that service of a subpoena by reading it to the witness over the telephone was insufficient. The court said: "It is urged that service by phone is within the letter and spirit of our statutes on the subject of serving process. If this were clearly true, then the law might be applied to the new invention, or the new invention applied to the law. But we do not think so. In such case service by phone, the party served being without the view, could only be identified by the voice of the party on whom the service should be made, and this could only apply to but few cases, only to such as the officer making the service could know and recognize the voice, and this would be a rather unsatisfactory method of identification at best. The best means of identification would be recognition of the person on whom the service was made; such recognition based on personal view of the witness by the officer. Accordingly, we hold that service by phone is not contemplated or embraced within our statutes on the subject of service of subpoena by an officer on a witness."

Under a statute requiring all notices to be in writing it has been held that orders of court based on applications, notices of which were given by telephone, could not be sustained. Ex p. Apeler, 35 S. C. 417, 14 S. E. 931.

In Friscoville Realty Co. v. Police Jury, 124 La. 589, 50 So. 590, it was held that an application by telephone in the district court for a suspensive appeal could not be made the basis of a mandamus to compel the granting of the appeal, where the proceedings in the district court were required to be in writing.

Under a statute requiring a written order to adjourn a court it has been held that the court was not adjourned by an order sent by telephone. Schofield v. Horse Springs Cattle Co. 65 Fed. 433.

In Murphy v. Jack, 142 N. Y. 215, 36 N. E. 882, 40 Am. St. Rep. 590, an affidavit for attachment by the plaintiff's attorney was verified on the information and belief of the affiant, he stating in his affidavit that his information was based on statements received by telephone from the plaintiff and his attorney in another city. In holding the affidavit to be insufficient the court said: "There would be no objection to the information having been conveyed through the medium of the telephone, if it had been made to appear that the affiant was acquainted with the plaintiff and recognized his voice; or if it had appeared, in some satisfactory way, that he knew it was the plaintiff who was speaking with him. None of these facts, however, were averred. There was absolutely nothing, upon which the judge could pass, to show that it was the plaintiff who was speaking and not some undisclosed person, who, in the plaintiff's name, furnished to the attorney the information made use of. The perfection to which the invention of the telephone has been brought, has immediately facilitated the intercommunication of individuals at distant points, and inasmuch as the voice of the speaker is heard in most, not in all, cases the identification of the speaker should be possible. The very facility of communication and of identification permits and therefore imposes a duty upon the party, who invokes judicial action upon the strength of information so received, to state his knowledge, or his grounds for believing, that it actually came from the party required to furnish it. To authorize an attachment to issue, upon the affidavit furnished here, was in disregard of the rule which requires that the source of information shall be disclosed in such a way as to enable the court to decide upon the probable truth of the statements and the authenticity of the jurisdictional facts. Judicial action upon such a source of information, as was here disclosed, was justified, below, by analogy with telegraphic communication. The analogy is incomplete. If the information comes through the telephone, it is quite possible to identify the speaker. Then, too, there is not, in the case of a telephonic communication, any record, like the message, which, in the case of the use of the telegraph, remains for reference and verification."

In State v. Nelson, 19 R. I. 467, 34 Atl. 990, 61 Am. St. Rep. 780, 33 L.R.A. 599, it was held that a jury in a criminal case was improperly dismissed by the trial judge on information received by an officer in attendance on the court by telephone that a juror was sick and unable to proceed with the trial.

Oath or Affidavit.

An oath cannot be administered by telephone. Carnes v. Carnes, 138 Ga. 1, 74 S. E. 785; Matter of Napolis, 169 App. Div. 469, 155 N. Y. S. 416; Sullivan v. Flatonia First Nat. Bank, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 228, 83 S. W. 421. Thus in Carnes v. Carnes, supra, in holding to be insufficient a verification to a petition for a writ of ne exeat the court said: "The plaintiff and one of her attorneys made oath that she called up the notary over the telephone and told him she was swearing to a petition for alimony against her husband, and that the attorney would bring it to the notary for his signature, and he said, 'All right.' The attorney further made affidavit that he carried the paper to the notary and told him that it was such, and the notary answered: 'Yes, she called me and told me she was swearing to same.' The notary made affidavit that the plaintiff called him up by telephone and said she had just 'signed a paper' in the case of herself against her husband for alimony, ne exeat, etc., and wanted him 'to sign the same as a witness for her,' and that her attorney would bring it to him to sign, and that the attorney brought the paper, and the notary signed it, without ever seeing the plaintiff about the matter. If the evidence of the notary be taken as correct, there was not the slightest effort to administer an oath, but a mere statement over a telephone wire that the plaintiff had signed a paper, and desired the notary to sign as a witness. If the testimony of the plaintiff and her attorney be taken as correct, there was still no legal making of an affidavit. In order to make an affidavit, there must be present the officer and affiant and the paper, and there must be something done which amounts to the administration of an oath. There must be some solemnity, not mere telephone talk. Long distance swearing is not permissible. Telephonic affidavits are unknown to the law. A moment's thought will show a sound reason for this. An officer hears a voice coming through the receiver of a telephone. For identification, he must rely on recognition of the voice (if he knows it) and the statement of the person as to who he or she is. Reference is made to some paper, more or less fully described. Later a third person presents to the notary a paper as being the one sworn to. How does the notary know, except by hearsay, that the paper presented is the identical paper mentioned? If this is an oath, when is it taken—when the telephone message is sent, or when the paper is later presented by the third person? Where is it taken—at the place where the affiant is, or that where the officer is? Suppose they should be in different counties, where would be the jurisdiction of a prosecution for perjury, if the oath were untrue? It will be seen that great confusion might easily arise from such a system." And in Sullivan v. Flatonia First Nat. Bank, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 228, 83 S. W. 421, it was held to be proper for the trial court to refuse to consider an application for a continuance which was sworn to over the telephone. The appellate court said: "Now it may be true that one can be certainly identified by the sound of his voice, but that is not enough for the purpose of the rule in such a case. It may be true that the officer when he takes the affidavit of one well known to him might recognize his voice over the telephone and therefrom be able to testify that he took the oath and made the affidavit in issue. But it must be borne in mind that the law does not require the clerk or notary to be acquainted with one who becomes an affiant before them. A stranger may appear, sign an affidavit, and demand that the officer swear him and affix his jurat. In that case the officer certifies and can swear to no more than that the man who affixed the name to the affidavit swore to its truth. The name he signed may have been fictitious, but the individual swore to it as the clerk or notary certified, and he would be subject under that name or his true one to a prosecution for perjury. Now if the contention of appellant is sound the rule must be laid down broadly, and whoever might demand the official jurat by his personal presence might also demand it over the telephone. Had it not so happened in this case that the clerk was acquainted with Sullivan and identified him by his voice, he could have done no more than certify that a man whom he did not know, but who represented himself to be Sullivan, authorized the name of Sullivan to be signed to the affidavit and swore its contents were true. The clerk could not possibly identify him as the one making the affidavit if the question should afterwards arise. In a prosecution for perjury such testimony on the part of the clerk would not even raise an issue against the unknown affiant. So we hold that not only is the personal presence of the affiant required to the end that by appropriate form and ceremony his conscience may be bound, but that it is required also to the end that the officer may see and know that the man who signs also swears." In Matter of Napolis, 169 App. Div. 469, 155 N. Y. S. 416, an attorney was severely censured for administering an oath by telephone to a person making an affidavit.

For a discussion of the validity of an acknowledgment by telephone, see the note to Wester v. Hurt, Ann. Cas. 1912C 329.

Notice or Demand Other than in Judicial Proceeding.

It has been held that notice by telephone of the dishonor of a note is sufficient under a statute authorizing a verbal or written notice of dishonor. American Nat. Bank v. National Fertilizer Co. 125 Tenn. 328, 143 S. W. 597. Compare Thompson, etc. Co. v. Appleby, 5 Kan. App. 680, 48 Pac. 933, wherein it was held that notice of dishonor by telephone to the indorser of a promissory note was not sufficiently shown where the person giving the notice testified that he telephoned to the office of the indorser and notified the person answering of the dishonor, but was unable to say whether the person answering was the indorser or his bookkeeper. It was however said in that case by way of dictum: "Following comparatively recent decisions of the highest courts in several states, and on principle, we do not hesitate to hold that . . . notices over the telephone are as binding as if the telegraph or mails are used, etc."

It has been held that a demand of payment on the maker of a note by telephone is insufficient to charge an indorser, on the ground that it requires personal attendance at the place of demand with the note, in readiness to exhibit it if required and to receive payment and surrender it if the debtor is willing to pay. Gilpin v. Savage, 201 N. Y. 167, Ann. Cas. 1912A 861, 94 N. E. 656, 34 L.R.A. (N. S.) 417, reversing 132 App. Div. 948, 118 N. Y. S. 1108 which affirmed 60 Misc. 605, 112 N. Y. S. 802.

A demand on a carrier by telephone for the delivery of goods transported by it may be shown. Rock Island, etc. R. Co. v. Potter, 36 Ill. App. 590; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Heidenheimer, 82 Tex. 195, 17 S. W. 608, 27 Am. St. Rep. 861.

In Reed v. Burlington, etc. R. Co. 72 Ia. 166, 33 N. W. 461, 2 Am. St. Rep. 243, in holding that a railroad company was charged with knowledge of a defect in a car which caused an injury to an employee where notice of the defect was communicated by telephone, the court said: "It appears from the evidence of one Montgomery, who was a switchman in the yards at Cedar Rapids, and who had charge of the switch crew in making up trains, and under whose supervision the train in question was made up, that he discovered that there was no follow plate on the back part of the draw-bar, and that the draw-bar would shove back until its rim would strike the deadwood. He further testified that, upon making the discovery, he went to a switch shanty in the yards, in which there was a telephone used for the purpose of communicating with the general office and shops, and he called the general office, and stated to some one who answered his call that the bar was in bad order, and the person answering his call inquired, 'In what way?' and the witness told him that the back plate was gone, and received the reply, 'If she will hold together, send her off.' It is claimed that the testimony as to the communication by telephone should have been excluded, because it was with some unknown person, and ought not to bind the defendant. It appears that the telephone was placed in the yards for the very purpose of communicating with the office. It was the means of communication provided by the defendant; and, in the absence of any showing that some officious intruder had taken up quarters in the office, and assumed to transact the business of the company, it ought to be presumed that the communication was made with one having authority to give directions as to the matter inquired about."

In Second Pool Coal Co. v. People's Coal Co. 188 Fed. 892, 110 C. C. A. 526, affirming 181 Fed. 609, a suit in admiralty was brought against a coal company to recover damages for injuries to the libellant's steamboat alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the libelee in failing to mark a sunken flat which the coal company had cut adrift from a float while in its possession to save the float and other boats. A lock keeper testified that he had called the libellant's office on the telephone and communicated the fact that the flat had been sunk in the channel. It did not appear who was the person that answered the telephone nor did it appear that the communication was delivered to any employee or officer of the libellant. It was held that the evidence was insufficient to show knowledge of the sunken flat.

For a discussion of the necessity for personal service of notice in the absence of an express requirement as to the manner of service, see the note to Haj v. American Bottle Co. Ann. Cas. 1915A 220. And for a treatment of the necessity that a notice required or authorized by law other than in a judicial proceeding shall be in writing, see the note to McPhail v. Denver, Ann. Cas. 1916E 1143.

Waiving a consideration of the effect of a statute requiring certain contracts to be in writing, it is no objection to a contract that it is made by a telephonic conversation. Yolo Bank v. Sperry Flour Co. 141 Cal. 314, 74 Pac. 855, 65 L.R.A. 90 (dictum that contract by telephone is deemed to have been made at place where offer of one party is accepted by other); Tung v. Converse, 180 Mich. 195, 146 N. W. 629; Star Bottling Co. v. Cleveland Faucet Co. 128 Mo. App. 517, 109 S. W. 802; St. Louis Maple, etc. Flooring Co. v. Knost, 148 Mo. App. 563, 128 S. W. 532; Herendeen Mfg. Co. v. Moore, 66 N. J. L. 74, 48 Atl. 525, (holding that the mere fact that the conversation between the plaintiff's agent and the defendant's agent was by means of the telephone did not put on the plaintiff any greater burden of proof than that involved in establishing any oral contract made through an intermediary). See also Cuozzo v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 112 Me. 560, 91 Atl. 1006; Kansas City Star Pub. Co. v. Standard Warehouse Co. 123 Mo. App. 13, 99 S. W. 765. Thus in St. Louis Maple, etc. Flooring Co. v. Knost, supra, it was said: "A large part of our business transactions are, in this century, carried on by telephone. Our courts have long ago held that contracts made by telephone are as effective and binding in law as if made verbally between parties standing face to face and carrying on the conversation which culminates in the contract." And in Tyng v. Converse, 180 Mich. 195, 146 N. W. 629, it was said "an offer may be accepted by telegram or by telephone."

In Cox v. Cline, 147 Ia. 353, 126 N. W. 330, the joint purchasers of a stallion were sued on a note given for the purchase price, the defense to the action being fraud and rescission of the contract therefor. It was held that a rescission of the contract was sufficiently shown by evidence that the agent of the purchasers called up the seller by telephone and notified him of their election to rescind the contract, the seller abruptly putting an end to the conversation by hanging up the receiver before the ground for the rescission was stated.

But in Young v. Seattle Transfer Co. 33 Wash. 225, 74 Pac. 375, 99 Am. St. Rep. 942, 63 L.R.A. 988, an action against a transfer company to recover the value of a trunk alleged to have been stored with the defendant, the testimony relied on to show the receipt of the trunk by the company was that the plaintiff called up the defendant's office by telephone and notified it to send for the trunk and that the trunk was thereafter taken away by an unknown expressman. It also appeared that the plaintiff did not identify the voice of the person answering the telephone call. It was held that the testimony was insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff. In Kimbark v. Illinois Car, etc. Co. 103 Ill. App. 632, wherein the testimony showed that he was unable to identify the principal by his voice, it was held that the authority of an agent to accept the modification of a contract could not be shown by his testimony of a telephone conversation with his principal giving him the authority.

MANGRUM AND OTTER, INCORPORATED,

v.

LAW UNION AND ROCK INSURANCE COMPANY.

California Supreme Court—April 19, 1916.

172 Cal. 497; 157 Pac. 239.

Fire Insurance — Cancellation — Necessity of Return of Unearned Premium.

Under a fire insurance policy in the New York standard form providing that it might be canceled at any time at the request of the insured, or by the insurer, by giving five days' notice of such cancellation, and that if the policy should be canceled as provided the unearned part of the premium actually paid should be returned on surrender of the policy or last renewal, the insurer retaining the customary short rate, except that on a cancellation by it by giving notice it should retain only the pro rata premium, the giving of the five days' notice was sufficient to cancel the policy, and the return of or offer to return the premium is not an essential element of the cancellation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco: PLUMMER, Judge.

Action by Mangrum and Otter, plaintiff, against Law Union and Rock Insurance Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick for appellant.

J. F. Riley for respondent.

[497] MELVIN, J.—Defendant appeals from an adverse judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The suit was upon a policy of fire insurance. On February 19, 1907, defendant issued the policy insuring plaintiff's property for one year in the sum of two thousand dollars. The premium, which was paid, was $120. Shortly after the issuance of the policy defendant, being dissatisfied with the rate charged, demanded an additional payment of $20. This demand was not complied with and on September 26, 1907, defendant sent plaintiff a letter with the statement that if the sum of $20 was not paid as an additional consideration for the policy by noon of October 3d, the contract would be canceled, pursuant to a power conferred by the terms of the instrument itself. The provision in the policy under which [498] the defendant acted was as follows: "This policy shall be canceled at any time at the request of the insured; or by the company by giving five days' notice of such cancellation. If this policy shall be canceled as hereinbefore provided, or become void or cease, the premium having been actually paid, the unearned portion shall be returned on surrender of this policy or last renewal, this company retaining the customary short rate; except that when this policy is canceled by this company by giving notice it shall retain only the pro rata premium."

On October 4, 1907, defendant sent plaintiff a notice that the policy was canceled, null, and void, and that the insurer would admit no further liability under it. With this notice was a check drawn in favor of plaintiff for $31.30 which was tendered as the amount of the unearned premium. Soon thereafter this check was returned by one of plaintiff's officers who stated that the corporation which he represented had not theretofore received any demand for the additional payment of $20 and that $31.30 was not the correct return premium. On October 8th, defendant again sent to plaintiff the check for $31.30 which was again returned by plaintiff's representative with the objection that it was not drawn for the proper amount. The check was again sent to plaintiff but it was not presented for payment and was produced by plaintiff at the trial. Both parties to this suit concede that defendant should have proffered $45.07 instead of $31.30 as return premium. The property covered by the policy was destroyed by fire on December 26, 1907, and the judgment below was for the full amount of two thousand dollars specified in the contract.

Appellant contends that the giving of the five days' notice was sufficient to cancel the policy without the return or offer to return the unearned portion of the money previously paid on the execution of the contract, and we find this the only contention which we need discuss. This is a matter of first impression in California, so far as this court is concerned, but there is abundant record of adjudication in other jurisdictions, some courts holding that the return of the unearned part of the premium is one of the indispensable parts of the cancellation of such a policy, and others that the prescribed notice is all that is required to accomplish that result.

The policy used in the transactions between the plaintiff and the defendant is of the kind known as the "New York [499] standard form," and the New York court of appeals has interpreted it to mean that cancellation of a policy by the insurer may only be accomplished by giving the prescribed notice and by restoring the unearned premium. The opinions of that distinguished court always command great respect, and when they deal with the law of the Empire state and the proper interpretation of a contract drawn under a sanction of that law, such opinions are clothed with peculiar authority; but we find that other courts of great dignity, including the United States circuit court for the southern division of New York, have held a different view of this contract or of policies not essentially differing from it, and that some of the learned judges of the New York court of appeals have dissented from the interpretation of the agreement given by the majority of their associates. Our own examination of the subject has impelled us to accept the doctrine of the courts that hold the return of the premium not an essential element of the annulment of the policy.

And first examining the language of the policy quoted above, without reference to decided cases, we cannot see that the repayment of a part of the premium is made an essential to the cancellation of the contract. The first sentence provides a complete scheme of cancellation by the assured or by the company: "This policy shall be canceled at any time at the request of the insured; or by the company by giving five days' notice of such cancellation." If the paragraph ended there, no question could be raised. But the contract goes further and properly provides for a return of a just proportion of the premium. The very opening words of that part of the policy so providing indicate that cancellation may precede repayment. "If this policy shall be canceled as hereinbefore provided . . . the unearned portion shall be returned on surrender of this policy." If the return of the money is one of the necessary elements of the cancellation the last five words of the quotation are meaningless. Even upon the broad principle which authorizes the interpretation of a contract formulated by the insurer to be most favorable to the insured, we cannot convince ourselves that this plain, and to us unambiguous, language may be disregarded. The last proviso of the paragraph does not contradict the requirement that the return of the policy should be made before repayment of the proportionate share of the premium. It simply [500] provides a regular pro rata compensation for the period of actual assurance when the contract has been terminated by the insurer as contradistinguished from the higher "short rate" which the insured must pay if he chooses to cancel the agreement. The history of this part of the New York standard policy in the courts of New York is interesting. In Nitsch v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 152 N. Y. 635, 46 N. E. 1149, the New York court of appeals without handing down an opinion affirmed a judgment against the defendant insurance company. In Tisdell v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 155 N. Y. 163, 40 L.R.A. 765, 49 N. E. 664, it was determined by a divided court, upon the authority of the Nitsch case, that cancellation of a policy to be effective must be accomplished by a tender of the return premium as well as by the giving of the prescribed notice. The prevailing opinion written by Judge Bartlett contains no argument regarding the basis of the rule. The opinion is founded upon the rule as settled by the previous decision. A vigorous dissenting opinion was delivered by Chief Judge Parker. In it he pointed out the fact that the affirmance in the Nitsch case did not rest alone upon the ground taken by the lower court that a tender of the unearned premium must be made as a part of the process of cancellation, but upon the broader reason that the notice of cancellation sent out by the insurance company was subsequently waived. Discussing the meaning of that portion of the contract which we have quoted, he said, among other things: "The language is unambiguous. It admits of no debate and requires no construction. Words more apt to accomplish the cancellation of a policy by the giving of the five days' notice cannot well be imagined. Having provided for a cancellation of the policy, either by the request of the insured or upon notice given by the company, the next clause of the agreement proceeds to make disposition of the unearned premiums, in the event of the exercise of the option to cancel by either of the parties. . . . The policy having been put an end to by cancellation, at the insistence of one party or the other, then the situation of the parties is such that the company has in its possession certain premiums which it has not earned, and which it does not desire to earn, and the other party has in his possession the policy of insurance, no longer, of course, of use to him, and of no particular value to the company, except that when it finally [501] comes into the company's possession it of itself furnishes evidence that the unearned premiums have been paid to the insured. With this situation, then, the agreement undertakes to deal, and it provides that upon the surrender of the policy the unearned premium, whether at short rate or pro rata premium, depending upon which party brought about the cancellation, shall be returned to the insured. Practically, it says to the insured: You return the policy to the place where you got it from and the company will at once turn over the unearned premium to which you are entitled under this contract. This agreement is so clearly expressed that there does not seem to be opportunity for insisting that the language means something quite different from what is suggested to the mind upon the first reading. And still other readings will not prompt the thought that there is possibly any ambiguity."

Later the court of appeals of New York affirmed the Nitsch and Tisdell cases, but held (Judge Bartlett writing the prevailing opinion from which two of his associates dissented) that where the holder of the policy, in response to the notice of cancellation, surrenders his contract he thereby waives his right to a return of the unearned fraction of the premium as a necessary part of the annulment of the policy. Judge Vann expressing the views of the dissenters said that he could not see how a mere return of the policy by mail, in response to a notice by which the insurer promised a return of the premium "when" the policy should be surrendered to said insurer, could possibly amount to a waiver of payment as a necessary part of the process of annulment. We have found the same difficulty in reconciling the doctrine of that case—Buckley v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 188 N. Y. 399, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 889, 81 N. E. 165—with the two earlier decisions of that court. The United States circuit court for the southern district of New York construing the same form of contract in Schwarzchild & Sulzberger Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 115 Fed. 653-656, said:

"It was unnecessary for the defendant to return or tender the unearned premium to accomplish a cancellation. The condition is carefully expressed to require the return of the premium only upon the surrender of the policy by the insured to the insurer. (Straker v. Phenix Ins. Co. 101 Wis. 413, 77 N. W. 752; Norris v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 55 S. C. 450, 33 S. E. 566, 74 Am. St. Rep. 765.) The decision of the [502] court of appeals of New York holding the contrary in respect to a similar condition is entitled to great consideration (Tisdell v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 155 N. Y. 163, 49 N. E. 664, 40 L.R.A. 765), but is not controlling upon this court; and the view of the minority of the court, expressed in the dissenting opinion, commends itself to me as presenting the better reasoning."

In Vance on Insurance, page 494, after quoting the portion of the New York standard policy which we have been discussing, the learned author uses the following language:

"The cancellation clause of the standard form of policy seems so clearly worded that one is surprised to see that disputes have arisen as to its construction. It is held by the better authority that, after the expiration of the five days' notice required in case the cancellation is by the company, the insurance is deemed to be terminated and inoperative, without further act on the part of the insurer, or any actual cancellation of the policy. . . .

"By the weight of authority, the repayment of the unearned premium is not, under the standard policy, a condition precedent to the termination of the insurance by the insurer. Such repayment becomes due only upon surrender of the policy. The New York Court of Appeals has, however, in a very unsatisfactory opinion, adopted the contrary rule."

Professor Richards, in his work on Insurance Law (section 288 of the third edition) while admitting that "by the current of authority" up to the date of his writing the duty is laid upon the insurer "when seeking cancellation under the standard policy, to accompany the notice of cancellation with payment or actual tender of the return premium in order to make the notice operative," makes this comment: "It is indeed difficult, however, to escape the conclusion of the dissenting judges in the New York Court of Appeals, voiced by the chief justice, that this is by interpretation to substitute a new contract in place of unambiguous terms adopted by the legislature."

We feel impelled, however, to follow that which seems to us the meaning expressed by the unambiguous language of the contract rather than even the "current of authority" which would substitute a judicially manufactured agreement for the one made by the contracting parties. In addition to the authorities which we have noted above in support of the [503] view which we take of the meaning of the quoted portion of the standard policy of New York, we wish to cite, Straker v. Phenix Ins. Co. 101 Wis. 413, 77 N. W. 752-755; Webb v. Granite State F. Ins. Co. 164 Mich. 139-142, 129 N. W. 19; Davidson v. German Ins. Co. 74 N. J. L. 487, 12 Ann. Cas. 1065, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 884, 65 Atl. 996; El Paso Reduction Co. v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 121 Fed. 937; Schwarzschild, etc. Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 124 Fed. 52, 53, 59 C. C. A. 572; Phoenix Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Brecheisen, 50 Ohio St. 542-548, 35 N. E. 53; Parsons v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co. 133 Ia. 532, 110 N. W. 907; Newark F. Ins. Co. v. Sammons, 11 Ill. App. 230-235.

Among the cases which announce the other doctrine—that cancellation does not precede payment—are Peoria Marine, etc. Ins. Co. v. Botto, 47 Ill. 516-519; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. McKenzie, 70 Ill. App. 615-618; Peterson v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 87 Ill. App. 567-572; Kinney v. Rochester German Ins. Co. 141 Ill. App. 543-549; Kinney v. Buffalo German Ins. Co. 148 Ill. App. 260; Kinney v. Caledonia Ins. Co. 148 Ill. App. 256; Continental Ins. Co. v. Daniel (Ky.) 78 S. W. 866; Chrisman, etc. Banking Co. v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 75 Mo. App. 310-315; Taylor v. Insurance Co. of North America, 25 Okla. 92-94, 138 Am. St. Rep. 906, 105 Pac. 354; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Cameron, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 237, 45 S. W. 158; Polemanakos v. Austin F. Ins. Co. (Tex.) 160 S. W. 1134; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Mitchell (Tex.) 164 S. W. 919.

In spite of this array of decisions in opposition to our views, we are convinced that our reading of the policy is the correct one.

Because of our interpretation of the contract of insurance, it is not necessary for us to review the interesting questions discussed in the briefs touching the sufficiency or insufficiency of the tender, made by the insurer, of an amount mistakenly supposed to be the proper return premium.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Henshaw, Shaw, Sloss and Lorigan, JJ., concurred.

Rehearing denied.

NOTE.

Necessity of Return or Tender of Unearned Premium to Effect Cancellation of Fire Insurance Policy by Insurer.

Under New York Standard Policy.

The holding in the reported case, while contrary to the rule laid down in German Union F. Ins. Co. v. Fred G. Clarke Co. 116 Md. 622, Ann. Cas. 1913D 488, and contrary to what seems to be the weight of authority, is, however, in accord with the view maintained in Davidson v. German Ins. Co. 74 N. J. L. 487, 12 Ann. Cas. 1065, that under the cancellation clause of the so-called New York standard fire insurance policy the return or tender of the unearned premium is not a condition precedent to the cancellation of the policy by the insurer. The following recent decisions, either as cases of first impression or following and reaffirming a rule previously laid down in the jurisdictions in which they arose, are in accord with the view taken in the majority of the earlier cases that payment or tender of the unearned premium is a prerequisite to the cancellation of a fire insurance policy under the terms of the cancellation clause of what is known as the New York standard policy. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Stephens (Ariz.) 161 Pac. 684; National Hotel Co. v. Merchants' F. Assur. Corp. 183 Ill. App. 71; C. A. Smith Lumber Co. v. Colonial Assur. Co. 172 App. Div. 149, 158 N. Y. S. 198; Polemanakos v. Austin F. Ins. Co. (Tex.) 160 S. W. 1134; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Mitchell (Tex.) 164 S. W. 919. In Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Stephens, supra, it appeared that the appellee insured property with the appellant for a period of one year and paid the full premium. Some months thereafter the appellee was notified by the appellant as follows: "In accordance with a clause in the insurance policy 'we hereby give you five days' notice of cancellation of this policy.'" Ten days after that notification the insured building was destroyed. The court said: "The dispute or controversy is as to the meaning that should be given to the above-quoted clause of the policy, it being the contention of the appellant that after five days from the date appellee received the notice the policy was canceled, and that it was not necessary for it to do any other thing or act than to give notice in order to effect a cancellation of the policy. Whereas, the appellee contends that the insurer, being the moving party, should not only have given the five days' notice of the cancellation, but should, on or before the expiration of the five days, have returned to the insured the pro rata of the premium then unearned. . . . The policy is what is known as 'The New York Standard Policy,' and this particular clause of the policy, under the same facts that we have here, has many times been before the courts and by them construed. The courts have not agreed as to the meaning of the cancellation clause in the standard form, and it is very difficult to determine upon which side the weight of authority is to be found, although we think more courts of equal eminence and learning have adopted the construction contended for by appellee. . . . This form of policy is prescribed by statute in New York, and the courts of that state are the first courts that passed upon and construed the cancellation clause thereof, which is identical with the cancellation clause that we have, and it was therein held that the return of the unearned premium or a tender thereof was a prerequisite to the cancellation of the policy. Nitsch v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 152 N. Y. 635, 46 N. E. 1149 (affirming without opinion 83 Hun 614, 31 N. Y. S. 1131). There has been considerable criticism of this decision, because it is said that the appellate courts assigned no reason for their judgment, but the opinion which was rendered by Judge Bartlett at the trial does assign reasons, which we here give: 'The equivalent of a requirement to refund or tender the unearned premium, as a condition of an effective cancellation by the insurer, may readily be discovered in the standard policy. The whole paragraph on the subject must be read together; and the last clause must not be overlooked. That clause provides that "when this policy is canceled by this company, by giving notice, it shall retain only the pro rata premium." This language plainly imports that the company cannot make the notice effective and at the same time retain the whole premium. The word "shall," in the last clause of the paragraph, in reference to the cancellation of the policy, is just as mandatory as the word "shall" in the first clause. The policy shall be canceled by the company by giving five days' notice, but, when so canceled (that is, at the time the notice takes effect), the company shall retain only the pro rata premium; the latter requirement is as imperative as the former, and can only be complied with by actually returning the unearned premium or offering to return it to the insured. Reading the entire provision as a whole, I am clearly of the opinion that it makes the actual payment or tender of the unearned premium essential to a cancellation of the policy by the company. This construction involves no hardship to the insurer, while that which the court is asked by the defendant to adopt would involve decided hardship to the insured.'" In Polemanakos v. Austin F. Ins. Co. (Tex.) 160 S. W. 1134, the court said: "The policies in question are what are known as the New York standard policies, and the general rule formulated in the consideration of the provision as to cancellation hereinbefore copied is that, unless waived, the repayment of the proper proportion of the premium is essential to a valid cancellation and notice without such repayment or a tender of the amount is ineffectual. . . . There are some authorities that hold to the contrary view, consisting of three federal court decisions, a New Jersey case, and an Ohio and Illinois case. We prefer that interpretation of the cancellation clause given by New York courts and followed by a great number of the states, not only because it is reasonable, but on the grounds stated in a Pennsylvania case (Gosch v. Firemen's Ins. Co. 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 496) . . . as follows: 'Turning, then, to the language of the agreement, in which the parties have undertaken to state their respective rights and duties, if we find it susceptible of two constructions, one in harmony with, the other in opposition to, those general principles already referred to, a sound discretion would seem to invite us to accept the former and reject the latter just as, in ascertaining the true meaning of a doubtful clause in a will, the courts incline to that construction which would vest the estate rather than leave it contingent, which would give it to the heir rather than to the stranger. Taking up, then, the provision of the policy on this subject, and looking at it as a whole, we may confidently say that it contemplates a complete and effective destruction of the contractual relation at the instance of either party, and that to accomplish this end the party moving must do two distinct and separate things; the object in view undeniably being that, when the cancellation shall have been completed, both parties will have been restored, as far as possible, to the conditions existing before the contractual relation began."

A valid cancellation of a policy may, however, be made without payment or tender of the unearned premium where the insured agrees to waive the provisions of the policy giving him the right to demand such a return or tender. See Polemanakos v. Austin F. Ins. Co. (Tex.) 160 S. W. 1134; Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. McMinn (Tex.) 188 S. W. 25. In the foregoing decisions the existence of such an agreement was held to be a question of fact to be determined by the jury and not a question of law for the court. The material facts in Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. McMinn, supra, were set out by the court as follows: "The witness Davidson testified that he, as local agent, received a telegram from the general agent of the company directing him to make cancellation at once of the two policies, and that he showed the telegram to appellee and advised him that the company desired immediate cancellation of the policies, and that appellee said, 'All right,' and went to the back of the store and got the two policies, and handed them to the witness. The local agent then, as he says, wrote on the policies, 'Canceled January 12, 1915,' and also entered the cancellation on his policy register. The appellee, though, denies this testimony." The court said: "A policy of insurance may be canceled at any time before loss, by agreement between the parties, and there may be cancellation by consent of the parties, independent of the terms of the policy; and in such case an immediate payment of the unearned premium may not be required in order to make valid the agreed cancellation."

To work a cancellation of a policy by a tender of the unearned premium the offer to repay must be made in legal tender, but the insured may waive his right in that regard. Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Mitchell (Tex.) 164 S. W. 919. In that case it appeared that the insured refused to accept from the agent of the insurance company a check for the amount of the unearned premium at the time the agent gave notice of cancellation, but that he did retain an express money order accompanying a subsequent notice of the cancellation for a period of eighteen days, during which time the insured building was destroyed. It was held that there was no waiver of the requirement that the offer to repay should be made in legal tender, the court saying: "Another contention of appellant is that the retention by appellee of the express order, without notifying appellant that he would not accept anything but money in payment of the unearned premium, estopped him from claiming that there was no legal tender of the unearned premium. We do not think the proposition sound. When a check was offered to appellee by the agent at the time the first notice was given, he told the agent that he would not accept any check in payment of the unearned premium, not because the check was not good, but because he wanted the money. No tender of money was made. . . . There is nothing in the case evidencing the waiver of a legal tender, unless it was the retention of the express order until after the fire, and we do not think that was sufficient to show a waiver, when appellee had distinctly informed appellant that he would not accept any check for the unearned premium."

Under Other Forms of Policy.

The view has been taken that payment or tender of the unearned premium is a condition precedent to the cancellation of the policy in recent cases wherein the cancellation clauses of the policies before the court were not the same as that of the New York standard policy. St. Paul F. etc. Ins. Co. v. Peck, 40 Okla. 396, 139 Pac. 117, and Nakata v. Dominion F. Ins. Co. 9 Alberta L. Rep. 47, 31 West. L. Rep. 136, 8 West. W. Rep. 343, 21 Dominion L. Rep. 26. In the case first cited it appeared that the policy issued by the defendant insurance company contained the following provisions: "This entire policy shall be void at the election of the company, . . . if the property or any part thereof be or become encumbered by lien, mortgage or otherwise. . . . This policy may be canceled by either party. If upon request of the company, by returning to insured the pro rata unearned premium, if it has been paid or if not by indorsing the amount thereof on any unpaid premium note and giving written notice thereof to insured." The insured property having been mortgaged before loss occurred, it was contended by the insurer that the policy was void from the date the mortgage was given and that no recovery could be had thereon. The court however took the contrary view, holding that the policy did not become void by the giving of the mortgage unless the company elected to declare it so and that it could not cancel the policy until a tender of the amount of the unearned premium was made to the insured. In Nakata v. Dominion F. Ins. Co. 9 Alberta L. Rep. 47, 31 West. L. Rep. 136, 8 West. W. Rep. 343, 21 Dominion L.

Rep. 26, it appeared that the policy in suit provided as follows: "The insurance may be terminated by the company by giving notice [five days if personal, ten days if by mail] to that effect and, if on the cash plan, by tendering therewith a ratable proportion of the premium for the unexpired term, calculated from the termination of the notice." It was held that under that provision a mere notice of cancellation was insufficient if unaccompanied by a tender of or offer to account for the unearned portion of the premium.

STATE

v.

CATHOLIC.

Oregon Supreme Court—March 23, 1915.

75 Oregon 367; 147 Pac. 372.

Fish and Game — Regulation of Salmon Fishing — Validity.

L. O. L. §§ 5293, 5298, regulating fishing for salmon, sturgeon, or other anadromous fish in the waters of the state, is not class legislation within the prohibition of Const. art. 1, § 20, providing "no law shall be passed granting to any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities, which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens," since the statute protects the right of all persons possessing the requisite qualifications who pursue the salmon fishery under similar circumstances and conditions.

Same.

L. O. L. § 5298, regulating fishing for salmon, etc., in the waters of the state, is not in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14 (9 Fed. St. Ann. 392), providing that no state shall make a law to abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, since a business, to be protected from interference by state legislation under such amendment, must be a calling which any person can pursue anywhere in the United States as of common right, while the qualified ownership of roving fish in navigable waters within the state is in that sovereignty in trust for its citizens alone.

States — Concurrent Jurisdiction of Boundary Waters — Offenses — Identity of Prohibition.

Where defendant was convicted of fishing for salmon in the Columbia river without a license, under L. O. L. § 5298, denouncing such an offense committed in any of the waters of the state, and where the statutory provisions of the state of Washington, on the same point, in the exercise of its concurrent jurisdiction with Oregon over the Columbia river, contain practically the same provisions, the emphasis being upon the fact of fishing without a license, conviction here is proper under the federal rule that, in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, the statutory provisions of the two states must be practically identical to have a conviction in either.

[See note at end of this case.]

Fish and Game — Fishing without License — Employment by Licensed Person.

That the defendant, convicted under L. O. L. § 5298, regulating fishing for salmon, etc., in the waters of the state, of fishing for salmon in the Columbia river without a license, was employed by one properly licensed, is not a defense.

Criminal Law — Harmless Error — Punishment Imposed Appropriate to Valid Portion of Verdict.

Where defendant was convicted, under L. O. L. §§ 5293, 5298, regulating fishing in the waters of the state, of two offenses, first, in having fished without a license, and second, as having fished without being a resident of the state, and where the punishment in each case was the same, although the defendant should have been convicted under the charge of fishing without a license alone, his conviction can be upheld under Const. art. 7, § 3, as amended, providing that if the supreme court shall be of opinion that the judgment of the court appealed from was such as should have been rendered, it shall be affirmed, notwithstanding any error committed during the trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clatsop county: EAKIN, Judge.

Criminal action. Orazio Catholic convicted of fishing illegally in Columbia river, and appeals. AFFIRMED.

[368] Two informations were filed in a justice's court of Clatsop County, Oregon, the charging part of one being as follows:

"Orazio Catholic is accused by this complaint of the crime of fishing for salmon, being a nonresident at said time, committed as follows: The said Orazio Catholic, on the 1st day of July A. D. 1914, in the county of Clatsop and State of Oregon, then and there being, did then and there willfully and unlawfully fish for and take and catch salmon fish, with a gill net, in the waters of the Columbia River, in said Clatsop County, State of Oregon, he, the said defendant, Orazio Catholic, not being or having been a bona fide resident of the State of Oregon, or the States of Washington or Idaho for the period of six months, but he, the said Orazio Catholic, being then and there a citizen and bona fide resident and inhabitant of the State of California, contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided, [369] and against the peace and dignity of the State of Oregon."

The other information, omitting the title of the court and cause, the signature of the prosecuting officer and the verification, reads:

"Orazio Catholic is accused by this complaint of the crime of fishing without a license, committed as follows: The said Orazio Catholic, on the 10th day of July, 1914, in the county of Clatsop and State of Oregon, then and there being, did then and there take and fish for salmon fish and sturgeon in the waters of the Columbia River, in the said County of Clatsop and State of Oregon, with a gill net, without first having obtained a license therefor, contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State of Oregon."

Pleas of not guilty having been interposed, the causes were tried upon agreed statements of facts. The detailed specification thereof as to the charge first hereinbefore set forth is, in substance, as follows: That at all the times stated therein the defendant was and now is a citizen of the United States and a bona fide resident and inhabitant of the State of California, and not a citizen of Oregon, Washington or Idaho; that he was and is by occupation a fisherman, and on May 1, 1914, came to Oregon to embark in that business on the Columbia River; and that on July 1, 1914, he engaged in fishing for salmon in that stream in Clatsop County, Oregon, with a gill net and caught such fish therewith.

In respect to the second charge the stipulation is to the effect that W. E. Tallant is, and all the times stated therein was, a citizen of the United States and of the State of Oregon, and had been a bona fide resident thereof for more than 10 years; that on May 1, 1914, he duly obtained a license authorizing him to operate a [370] gill net and to engage in fishing for salmon in the Columbia River until March 31, 1915; that he was the owner of a gill net and a fishing boat, and had complied with all the requirements of law necessary to enable him by such means to take and catch salmon; that on July 10, 1914, he employed the defendant to operate such boat and net, and the latter then took entire possession thereof, and therewith engaged in catching salmon in the Columbia River within Clatsop County, Oregon, which fish when so taken were delivered to Tallant; that at all the times the defendant had charge of such boat he had no license to operate a gill net on the Columbia River; and that he managed such boat and net as the employee of Tallant.

Based on such agreed statements of facts, the defendant was convicted on both charges, and from the judgments so rendered he appealed to the Circuit Court of the State of Oregon for Clatsop County, where the causes were tried, without a jury, upon the same statements of facts which the court adopted as its findings, and, predicated thereon, the defendant was again adjudged to be guilty as charged in each case. From these latter judgments he appeals to this court.

George C. Fulton for appellant.

C. W. Mullins and Andrew M. Crawford for appellee.

MOORE, C. J. (after stating the facts).—

The printed abstract, referring to the trial in the Circuit Court and to the agreed statements of facts, [371] contains the following recital: "That there was no other testimony or evidence offered or received by either party." A stipulation was filed with our clerk, to the effect that each party might offer in evidence in this court such laws of the State of Washington as might be desired, which enactments should be considered in the same manner as if they had been received in evidence at the trial in the Circuit Court and incorporated in the bill of exceptions. In another stipulation it was agreed that the two causes should be consolidated.

1. Section 5293, L. O. L., enacted to protect food fishes, reads:

"It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to take or fish for salmon fish or sturgeon in any of the waters of this state, or in any of the waters upon which this state has concurrent jurisdiction, by any means whatever, except with hook and line, commonly called angling, without first having obtained a license therefor, as in this act hereinafter provided."

Another clause of the statute is as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to take or fish for salmon, sturgeon, or other anadromous fish in any waters of this state unless such person be a citizen of the United States, or has declared his intention to become such, and has been a bona fide resident of the State of Oregon, or the States of Washington or Idaho, for the period of six months; provided, that a license issued by the State of Washington, such state having concurrent jurisdiction on the Columbia River with this state shall be deemed valid as to gill nets, and as to gill net fishermen, for use on the Columbia River, as though issued by the fish warden of this state. Any person desiring to fish for salmon, sturgeon, or other anadromous fish in any such rivers or waters, may go before any county clerk of any county in this state and furnish satisfactory evidence of his citizenship, or of [372] the fact that he has declared his intention to become such one year prior thereto, and file his own affidavit and the affidavit of two other persons to the effect that he is and has been for six months prior thereto an actual bona fide resident of this state, and thereupon such recorder or clerk shall issue to him a certificate briefly reciting these facts, and thereafter in any prosecution against such person for a violation of the provisions of this act, such certificate or duly authenticated copies of the record in the office of the clerk or recorder relative thereto, shall be prima facie evidence of his citizenship and residence as in this act required. But in all prosecutions under this act the burden of proof shall be on the defendant to establish the facts of his citizenship and residence." Section 5298, L. O. L.

It is maintained that the latter enactment, thus attempting to exclude nonresidents of Oregon from the right to take or fish for salmon in the Columbia River with a gill net, violates section 20 of Article I of the Organic Act of this state, which reads:

"No law shall be passed granting to any citizen or class of citizens, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens."

This clause of the fundamental law was evidently designed to protect the rights of citizens of Oregon only. The section of the statute last quoted guarantees to each resident of Oregon, who is also a citizen of the United States, the right to fish for salmon in the waters of this state upon making the required proof and securing the necessary license, and, this being so, there is no discrimination as to such citizens. The evident object of the enactment was to protect Oregon fishermen from men engaged in that business who came to this state when the season opened, pursued their calling, and [373] when the season closed returned to their homes to ply their occupation in other waters, thereby rapidly depleting the supply of a valuable food product which, if properly cared for, could be reasonably conserved to the advantage of resident fishermen. The statute complained of affects alike all persons, possessing the requisite qualifications, who pursue the same business under similar circumstances and conditions, and for that reason it is not class legislation: In re Oberg, 21 Ore. 406, 28 Pac. 130, 14 L.R.A. 577; State v. Randolph, 23 Ore. 74, 31 Pac. 201, 37 Am. St. Rep. 655, 17 L.R.A. 470; State v. Frazier, 36 Ore. 178, 59 Pac. 5; State v. Thompson, 47 Ore. 492, 84 Pac. 476, 8 Ann. Cas. 646, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480; State v. Muller, 48 Ore. 252, 11 Ann. Cas. 88, 85 Pac. 855, 120 Am. St. Rep. 805; State v. Baker, 50 Ore. 381, 92 Pac. 1076, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1040; Churchill v. Albany, 65 Ore. 442, 133 Pac. 632, Ann. Cas. 1915A 1094.

2. It is insisted that Section 5298, L. O. L., trenches upon a clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States (9 Fed. St. Ann. 392) in that the statute is an attempt upon the part of the State of Oregon to make a law which, if enforced, would abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. Before such privileges can be infringed it must satisfactorily appear that the authority of a person to take and catch salmon in the Columbia River is a right which is guaranteed to, and may be exercised by, every citizen of the United States, though he may be a nonresident of the State of Oregon and Washington. The business which is protected from interference by state legislation must be a calling which any person can pursue in any place in the United States as of common right, subject, however, to such reasonable regulations as the state may impose, in respect to the time, or manner of [374] enjoyment, in order to promote the greatest good to the greatest number of its citizens.

The qualified ownership of roving fish in navigable waters within a state is in that sovereignty in trust for its citizens alone: State v. Hume, 52 Ore. 1, 5, 95 Pac. 808. Therefore, a state in exercising a measure of its police power may, by an enactment, protect such fish by prohibiting for a time their taking, or it may impose upon their catching such reasonable regulations as may be deemed proper, and for that purpose it may wholly exclude persons who are not residents from catching or taking fish in its waters by any means. In Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 32, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 923, 5 S. Ct. 357, 360, Mr. Justice Field, discussing the restriction of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution as to the facts of that case, says:

"Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited, but legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if within the sphere of its operation it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the amendment."

To the same effect, see Jones v. Union County, 63 Ore. 566, 575, 127 Pac. 781, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1035, where will be found a number of cases deciding this question in the same manner. Nonresidents of Oregon who may be citizens of the United States and of another state have no inherent right to take or catch migratory fish in the navigable waters of Oregon after a statute has been enacted by this state prohibiting the exercise of the privilege. Hence Section 5298, L. O. L., does not contravene the amendment of the Federal Constitution invoked to annul it.

3. It is asserted that since the State of Washington has equal jurisdiction with Oregon over the Columbia [375] River, and since the legislature of Washington has not concurred in enacting any statute similar to Section 5298, L. O. L., that provision is void, and an error was committed in not discharging the defendant. In Nielsen v. Oregon, 212 U. S. 315, 29 S. Ct. 383, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 528, the plaintiff in error was found guilty in a justice court of Clatsop County, Oregon, of maintaining a purse net in the Columbia River in violation of a statute of this state, and, the conviction having been ratified by the Circuit Court of Oregon for that county, the latter judgment was affirmed by this court: State v. Nielsen, 51 Ore. 588, 95 Pac. 720, 131 Am. St. Rep. 765, 16 Ann. Cas. 1113. An agreed statement of facts upon which the cause was tried showed that Nielsen was an actual bona fide resident and inhabitant of the State of Washington and a citizen of the United States; that he had duly obtained from the proper authority of that state a license authorizing him to maintain in the Columbia River a purse net; and that he was engaged in operating such net within the limits of the State of Washington at the time he was arrested and prosecuted in the courts of Oregon. The law of this state, which he was charged with violating, was, as far as material, as follows:

"It shall hereafter be unlawful to operate or maintain within any of the rivers of this state or of the Columbia River, . . . any purse net or other like seine for the purpose of catching or taking salmon."

By another section of the act any person convicted of violating any of its provisions was guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a prescribed penalty: Gen. Laws Ore. 1907, p. 154. The law in force in the State of Washington at the time Nielsen was thus convicted, as far as important, reads:

[376] "The use of . . . purse nets . . . for catching salmon is hereby authorized in all the waters of this state . . . subject to the regulation and license hereinafter provided for or otherwise required by law:" Sess. Laws Wash. 1899, p. 194.

The laws of Oregon then in force prohibited the use of such a net. The judgment rendered by this court against Nielsen was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, which held that where two states have concurrent jurisdiction over the same territory, which is partly located in one state and partly in the other, one state cannot prosecute a person for an act malum prohibitum by its own laws, and which was committed within the other state by authority of the latter, and that a person who held a purse-net license from the State of Washington could not be prosecuted for using such net on the Washington side of the Columbia River in the courts of Oregon for violating the statutes of the latter state prohibiting the use of a net of that kind.

In the case of In re Mattson, 69 Fed. 535, the petitioner for a writ of habeas corpus in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon showed that he was imprisoned upon a conviction in the Circuit Court of the State of Oregon for Clatsop County of fishing for salmon in the Columbia River on Sunday, within the territorial limits of the State of Washington, in violation of the laws of the State of Oregon, which enactment established a weekly close season for that river and made the taking of such fish in that stream on the first day of the week a misdemeanor: Section 5237, L. O. L. The laws of the State of Washington in force when Mattson was imprisoned permitted the catching of salmon in the Columbia River upon Sunday. Based upon such statement of facts the petitioner was discharged [377] by Judge Bellinger who, in referring to the concurrent jurisdiction of the States of Oregon and Washington over the Columbia River, the channel of which formed their common boundary, said:

It is clear, therefore, that this right in each state is not subject to control or regulation by the other, unless there is mutual agreement to that end."

In Ex p. Desjeiro, 152 Fed. 1004, each petitioner had been convicted in a Justice's Court for Clatsop County, Oregon, of unlawfully fishing for salmon in the Columbia River without first having been a bona fide resident of the States of Oregon, Washington, or Idaho for a period of six months prior thereto, and in violation of what is now practically Section 5298, L. O. L. The facts disclosed at their trial were that Desjeiro was, at the time, charged in the complaint upon which he was convicted an actual resident and inhabitant of the State of California and a subject of the King of Italy. Furia was an actual resident of the same state and a naturalized citizen of the United States. The laws of the State of Washington, then in force, authorized the issuance of fishing licenses. Another clause of the statute of that state then and now in force, reads:

"No license shall be issued to any person who is not a citizen of the United States, unless such person has declared his intention to become such one year prior thereto, and is and has been for one year immediately prior to the time of the application for license an actual resident of the State of Washington. . . . Provided, licenses issued by the State of Oregon shall be deemed valid as to gill nets for use on the Columbia River as though issued by the fish commissioner of this state:" Laws Wash. 1899, c. 117, § 2; Pierce's Wash. Code, 1912, tit. 191, § 65.

[378] Based on these facts, Judge Wolverton, referred to a clause of B. & C. Comp., which is now incorporated in L. O. L. as Section 5298, says:

"If the act was void as it respects a citizen of the State of Washington, being general, it is void as to every other citizen, whether of the State of Washington or California, or elsewhere. It is the act of concurrence between the two states, in the exercise of legislative authority, that validates the act and gives it the force of law, and unless there is a concurrence or assent by both states to the enactment, it cannot have that force. This is the doctrine of the Mattson case, and it has directed application to the case at bar. Now, Section 4092, as amended, makes it a misdemeanor for any person not a resident of the state for the period of six months preceding to take or fish for salmon fish in any of the waters of the state. This is a specific offense within itself. An examination of the laws of the State of Washington will disclose the fact that there is no such offense established within that state, and hence there is no concurrence in the laws of the two states as to the offense. In each state, however, it is required that parties desiring to fish with gill nets shall take out a license, and in each a violation of any of the provisions touching the occupation of fishing within the waters thereof is made a misdemeanor, so that it may be said, perhaps, that the states have legislated concurrently upon that subject. By the Washington act a person must be a resident of the state for one year next preceding before a license can be issued to him; in Oregon the time is fixed at six months; but this is a matter of minor importance, and it may be said that the laws in that regard are in all material respects concurrent. But it is not the offense of fishing without a license that is complained against. It is the offense of fishing without being a resident of the state; and, the State of Washington not having concurred in this legislation, the act is void as to all persons, whether they be citizens of Washington or California, and is within the doctrine of the Mattson case:" 60 Fed. 535.

[379] The catching of salmon in any of the waters of Oregon by a person who was not a citizen of the United States, or had not declared his intention to become such and had not been an actual resident of the state for six months immediately prior to the time of engaging in that business was first made a misdemeanor by an act approved February 20, 1891: Laws Ore. 1891, p. 129. This statute created a substantive offense and prescribed a penalty for a violation thereof. That act was repealed by another, approved October 18, 1898. Section 12 of the latter act made it unlawful for any person to fish for salmon in any of the waters of Oregon, or in any of the waters upon which this state has concurrent jurisdiction, without first having obtained a license therefor. Section 16 of that enactment stipulated that any person desiring to secure such license should make written application therefor to the fish commissioner, accompanied by his affidavit that he was a citizen of the United States, or had declared his intention to become such, that he was and had been for six months preceding his application a bona fide resident of the State of Oregon, and that by his paying the required fee a license should thereupon be issued to him. Section 36 provided that any person violating any of the provisions of such act was to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction should be punished, etc.: Laws Ore. 1898, p. 37. It will thus be seen that the offense of catching salmon in the Columbia River by a person who was not a bona fide resident of the State of Oregon was expressly repealed and another act was substituted in lieu thereof, making the taking of such fish from that stream by a person without first having obtained a license a misdemeanor.

Sections 12 and 16 of the act last referred to were amended by Sections 31 and 32 of the act of February [380] 28, 1901: Laws Ore. 1901, p. 328. These amended sections were incorporated in B. & C. Comp. as Sections 4092 and 4093, respectively. Section 4089 of that compilation made it unlawful for any person to fish for salmon in any of the waters of this state, or in any of the waters upon which Oregon has concurrent jurisdiction, by any means whatever, except with hook and line, without first having obtained a license therefor. Section 4092 asserted it to be unlawful for any person to fish for salmon in any of the waters of this state unless he was a citizen of the United States or had declared his intention to become such and had been a resident of Oregon for six months. A license issued by the State of Washington was proclaimed to be valid as to gill-net fishermen for use on the Columbia River. Section 4093 provided that any person desiring to obtain such a license should present a written application, accompanied by his affidavit, to the fish warden, showing that he was a citizen of the United States or had declared his intention to become such and had been for six months a resident of Oregon. A corroborative affidavit of three freeholders was also required, upon the presentation of which and the payment of a fee a license was to be issued to the applicant. Section 4113 provided that a violation of any of such provisions constituted a misdemeanor, and any person convicted thereof should be punished, etc.

Construing together Sections 4089, 4092, 4093 and 4113 of B. & C. Comp. shows that the offense of catching salmon by a person who did not possess the requisite qualifications of citizenship and residence was merged into the crime of taking such fish from the waters specified without first having obtained a license therefor.

tion 31; Laws Ore. 1903, page 218; Laws Ore. 1907, Chapter 73, page 128; Laws Ore. 1909, Chapter 234, page 466, Section 2. The last amendment is incorporated in L. O. L. as Section 5298. Section 4093, B. & C. Comp., was amended by Laws Ore. 1903, page 218, Section 2, whereby the previous method of securing a license by the applicant making the requisite proof of citizenship and residence was omitted. That section was again amended by Laws Ore. 1905, page 115, Section 1, but no material change was made in the last preceding enactment, nor was the applicant for a license required to submit an affidavit to substantiate his citizenship or residence. Section 4093, B. & C. Comp. appears to have been omitted from L. O. L., though we have been unable to find an express amendment or repeal thereof. In the table of comparative sections in the later compilations reference is made to the section last noted, and attention is called to Sections 5299 and 5310, L. O. L. The first section thus referred to relates to the application for a license to operate a salmon cannery. The second declares that the word "person" or "persons," where used in the act, shall be deemed to include partnerships and corporations.

In selecting and arranging the parts of L. O. L., the compilers evidently thought the amendment of Section 4092, B. & C. Comp., made February 25, 1909, impliedly repealed the next section, and for that reason they did not include in the later work Section 4093, B. & C. Comp. But however this may be, it is believed that the unlawful fishing for salmon in the waters of Oregon is the gravamen of the offense, and not the fishing in such waters by a person who is not a resident of the state.

[382] A careful examination of the statutes of this state, relating to the taking of salmon, leads to the conclusion that the offense charged in one case of unlawfully taking such fish without being a resident of Oregon is not specific within itself, but that the characteristic crime, denounced by the enactment, is the unlawful catching of salmon without first having secured a license, which authority cannot be granted to a person who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become such and has not been for the requisite period a resident of the State of Oregon.

The law of the State of Washington in force when this action was instituted, as far as essential to a consideration of this cause, reads:

"That no fishing appliances shall be constructed, operated or maintained upon any of the waters of this state or the Columbia River or its tributaries by any person whomsoever, without such person shall have first obtained a license so to do from the fish commissioner of this state, who is hereby authorized to issue said license under the regulations provided by law. . . . No license shall be issued to any person who is not a citizen of the United States, unless such person has declared his intention to become such one year prior thereto, and is and has been for one year immediately prior to the time of the application for license an actual resident of the State of Washington:" Section 2.

"Any person violating any of the provisions of this act, . . . shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall upon conviction therefor for each and every offense, be subject to a fine . . .:" Section 20, Laws Wash. 1899, p. 194.

Although the State of Washington in its sovereign capacity holds the title to salmon swimming in the Columbia River in trust for its own citizens, if no law of that state prohibited the catching of such fish, it is [383] probable that any nonresident, whether or not he was a citizen of the United States, might lawfully engage in that business. Without such legislation, the defendant in this action might well have insisted at his trial, and urged on this appeal that he was fishing in a stream over which the State of Washington had concurrent jurisdiction, and, such being true, the State of Oregon could not legally punish him for pursuing a lawful business, though he was catching salmon without the borders of the latter state. In its legislation the State of Washington has concurred in the enactments of this state, prohibiting the catching of salmon in the Columbia River without a license. There is a mutual agreement to that end. That the laws of the State of Washington demand a longer residence in that state, as a condition precedent to obtaining a license to catch such fish in the Columbia River, than is demanded by the statutes of Oregon in order to secure a similar authority, is unimportant. Each state has concurred with the other in its legislation on this subject.

If, however, the catching of salmon by means of a gill net in the Columbia River by a person who is not a resident of Oregon be regarded as constituting a distinct offense, upon a conviction for which a penalty may legally be imposed, it is believed that the judgments rendered herein can be sustained, though the statute of Washington prohibits the taking of such fish by a person without first having obtained a license, and also makes a residence in that state for one year a condition precedent to securing such authority. With respect to the statutes of these states, assuming that our enactment is as last hereinbefore stated, there would be a diversity as to the essential facts constituting the crime, the time of residence in the respective states, and possibly as to the degree of punishment [384] that might be inflicted. There would be, however, a unity of prohibiting, for the term of six months at least, the catching of salmon in that river. Thus it appears that the act charged is condemned alike by the laws of Oregon and of Washington. There is no grant of authority for it by the latter state. Our sister commonwealth having promulgated a rule on the subject which measurably conforms to our own, the defendant cannot claim immunity through any lack of legislation on either side of the boundary. We conclude, therefore, that the rule announced in Ex p. Desjeiro, 152 Fed. 1004, is not controlling herein.

4. Section 4093, B. & C. Comp. originally read in part:

"Any person desiring to obtain a license to take or catch salmon fish or sturgeon in any of the waters of this state, in any manner whatever, either working upon as employer or employee of any . . . gill net, . . . whether such person is the owner of such application or otherwise, shall present in writing to the fish warden his application."

This section was amended February 24, 1903, and the words, "either working upon as employer or employee," etc., were omitted: Laws Ore. 1903, p. 218. A further amendment of the section was made February 10, 1905, but the words so omitted were not reincorporated: Laws Ore. 1905, p. 115. Notwithstanding the exclusion of the words referred to, we believe the language is reasonably implied in Section 5293, L. O. L., which makes it unlawful for any person to take or fish for salmon without first having obtained a license therefor, and that this provision of the statute applies to the person in charge of a fishing boat and a gill net used for that purpose, though the owner of such appliances may have secured a license authorizing him to [385] pursue such business. We conclude, therefore, that the defendant was guilty as charged of catching salmon without first having obtained a license.

5. It will be kept in mind that he was also convicted of unlawfully taking such fish from the Columbia River, within Clatsop County, Oregon, without being a resident of this state. It is believed that such charge should have been made by an allegation of unlawfully fishing without a license. Since the offenses as averred in the complaints and admitted in the agreed statements of facts were committed on different days, they constitute separate misdemeanors, and as the fines imposed in each instance were identical, the judgment in the case of unlawfully fishing without being a resident of this state can be upheld by invoking Section 3 of Article VII of the Constitution of Oregon.

It follows that the judgment in each case should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case applies the rule laid down in Nielsen v. Oregon, 212 U. S. 315, 29 S. Ct. 383, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 528, that in the exercise of the concurrent jurisdiction of two states over waters forming a state boundary a person cannot be punished in one state for an act committed on the boundary waters but within the territorial jurisdiction of the other state, unless the act is prohibited with substantial uniformity in both states. Reviewing the statutes of Oregon and Washington regulating salmon fishing in the Columbia river the court holds that they are so far similar that a person fishing without a license in that river but within the territorial jurisdiction of the state of Washington may be convicted thereof in Oregon. The cases treating of the concurrent jurisdiction of states over water forming state boundaries are reviewed in the notes to State v. Nielsen, as reported in 16 Ann. Cas. 1113, 131 Am. St. Rep. 765, and State v. Cunningham, Ann. Cas. 1914D 182.

BURKE ET AL.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Washington Supreme Court—June 10, 1915.

86 Wash. 37; 149 Pac. 335.

Judgments — Vacation — Judgment Affecting Infant.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, minors properly represented in an action are bound as fully as persons of full age by a judgment rendered therein. The only grounds for vacating such a judgment are the grounds which are sufficient to vacate a judgment affecting an adult.

[See note at end of this case.]

Infants — Appointment of Guardian Ad Litem — Effect.

Where a guardian ad litem for an infant party to an action has been duly appointed, the infant is properly in court for all purposes.

Judgments — Vacation — Constructive Fraud.

Where a consent judgment was entered in favor of infants in an action in which they were represented by a guardian ad litem, who appeared and was examined by the court as to the benefit of the compromise to the infants, the failure of the guardian to call other witnesses to testify as to the circumstances of their father's death, which were fully known to the guardian ad litem, is not constructive fraud which authorizes the setting aside of the judgment.

Proof of Fraud.

Fraud which will justify the vacating of a judgment or decree must be actual and positive, not merely constructive, and the proof of fraud must be clear and satisfactory.

Infants — Consent Judgment — Presumption.

In the absence of a showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that a judge who entered a consent judgment on the compromise of an infant's claim made the inquiry as to its benefit to the infant which his duty required.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane county: HUNEKE, Judge.

Action by John Burke et al., plaintiffs, against Northern Pacific Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Cannon, Ferris & Swan for appellant.

A. O. Colburn and Luby & Pearson for respondents.

[37] MORRIS, C. J.—This is the same case reported in 80 Wash. 188, 141 Pac. 364, wherein a motion to dismiss the appeal was denied; the appeal being from an order setting aside the first judgment. But little need be added to the statement [38] of facts contained in the first opinion for a proper understanding of the questions upon which this appeal hinges. The lower court found that the amount to be paid having been agreed upon, Mrs. Burke, accompanied by her attorney and the attorney for the railroad company, appeared before the court in the department of Kennan, J., and made a statement to the court touching the controversy. The record shows, in addition to this finding, that Mrs. Burke was called to the stand and interrogated by the court as to her knowledge of the facts upon which the action was based, her attitude towards the proposed settlement, and her judgment as to whether or not it conserved the best interests of the minor children; and the court, upon hearing the statements and evidence of Mrs. Burke, made findings and entered judgment. The proceeding to vacate the judgment so entered was had before Huneke, J., and the finding upon which the conclusion of constructive fraud was made is that,

"The attention of the court was not called to all the facts pertaining to the matter, in that one Frank Weston, who was personally present and conversant with the facts involved in the accident resulting in and causing the death of said Edward Burke, was not produced, nor were such facts otherwise called to the attention of the court, though the knowledge of such witness as to these facts was well known to the said Bertie Burke and her attorney, and though the presence and testimony of said witness could have been readily secured and that the testimony of said witness, had it been produced, would have substantially supported the allegations of the complaint and established prima facie negligence on the part of the defendant contributing to the injury and death of said Edward Burke, and was material to the issue of compromise, and should have been produced." Weston was produced at this hearing and testified to facts within his knowledge. It appears that, at the time of the accident, he was upon the platform of the caboose with a brakeman named Brown. This fact was known to Mrs. Burke at the time of the hearing upon the settlement, and she testified she indicated the fact to her attorney. Weston [39] now testifies that, shortly after the accident, he called upon the attorney for Mrs. Burke and indicated to him the facts concerning the accident within his knowledge. The brakeman, Brown, had also called at the office of Mrs. Burke's attorney, who obtained from him a statement of the facts within his knowledge. This statement is now produced. It does not differ materially from the facts testified to by Weston, so that it is clear, at the time of the settlement, that Mrs. Burke and her attorney knew all of the facts concerning the accident in so far as Brown and Weston could relate them.

Brushing aside a number of technical errors suggested by appellant, such as that the parties in this action are not the same as those in which the judgment was entered, that all the parties in the former action are not made parties in this action, the statute of limitations and other so-called infirmities, we will determine whether or not these facts support the judgment. It may be said, first, that, in the absence of fraud or collusion, minors properly in court are bound as fully as persons of full age, and when properly represented, are bound by the knowledge of those who represent them. The law recognizes no distinction between a decree in favor of or against infants and a decree to which adults only are parties. The same invalidating vice must be found in the one case as in the other. Kromer v. Friday, 10 Wash. 621, 39 Pac. 229, 32 L.R.A. 671; English v. Savage, 5 Ore. 518; Savage v. McCorkle, 17 Ore. 42, 21 Pac. 444; Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 721, 30 S. E. 372, 64 Am. St. Rep. 830, 41 L.R.A. 703; Johnson v. Johnson, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 385, 85 S. W. 1023; 1 Daniel, Chancery Practice, § 164.

Speaking to this point, it is said in Thompson v. Maxwell Land Grant, etc. Co. 168 U. S. 451, 18 S. Ct. 121, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 539:

"It would be strange, indeed, if, when those authorized to represent minors, acting in good faith, make a settlement of claims in their behalf, and such settlement is submitted to the [40] proper tribunal, and after examination by that tribunal is found to be advantageous to the minors and approved by a decree entered of record, such settlement and decree can thereafter be set aside and held for naught on the ground that subsequent disclosures and changed conditions make it obvious that the settlement was not in fact for the interests of the minors, and that it would have been better for them to have retained rather than compromised their claims. If such a rule ever comes to be recognized, it will work injury rather than benefit to the interests of minors, for no one will make any settlement of such claims for fear that it may thereafter be repudiated. The best interests of minors require that things that are done in their behalf, honestly, fairly, upon proper investigation and with the approval of the appropriate tribunal, shall be held as binding upon them as similar actions taken by adults."

No question is raised but that the infants were properly in court in the suit in which this judgment was entered. Our practice provides for the appointment of a guardian ad litem to represent infant parties, and when so appointed, the infant is properly in court for all purposes, and the same procedure is applicable in such cases as in cases where all parties are of full age. State v. Ballinger, 41 Wash. 23, 82 Pac. 1018, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 72.

The lower court has only found constructive fraud based upon the failure of the guardian ad litem to produce the witness Weston. This does not seem to us sufficient to vacate the judgment. Fraud which will justify the setting aside of judgments and decrees must be actual and positive, and not merely constructive, and the proof relied upon must be clear and satisfactory to successfully assail judgments regularly entered. It must be something more than a suspicion. Wilson v. Hubbard, 39 Wash. 671, 82 Pac. 154; Meeker v. Mettler, 50 Wash. 473, 97 Pac. 507; Ross v. Wood, 70 N. Y. 8; Markell v. Hill, 64 App. Div. 191, 69 N. Y. S. 537, 71 N. Y. S. 924; Ward v. Southfield, 102 N. Y. 287, 6 N. E. 660; Lieber, 239 Mo. 1, 143 S. W. [41] 458; Nichols v. Stevens, 123 Mo. 96, 25 S. W. 578, 27 S. W. 613, 45 Am. St. Rep. 514; Ohio, etc. Mortg. etc. Co. v. Carter, 9 Kan. App. 621, 58 Pac. 1040; McDonald v. Pearson, 114 Ala. 630, 21 So. 534; U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 93; Parham v. Burns, 135 App. Div. 884, 120 N. Y. S. 142; McElroy v. Board of Education, 158 App. Div. 219, 142 N. Y. S. 1090; Belle v. Brown, 37 Ore. 588, 61 Pac. 1024; 1 Bigelow, Fraud, pp. 87, 88.

The failure of the guardian ad litem to produce a known witness is not such fraud as will justify vacating a judgment in favor of herself and the minors when it appears, as this record shows, that the judgment was granted upon a hearing, the guardian ad litem sworn and examined by the court, and the court advised of the facts and circumstances before entering judgment. Cases are numerous where compromise settlements in behalf of minors have been set aside where such settlements have been made by parents, next friends, and guardians ad litem. The reasoning generally advanced for such a rule is that the persons assuming to effect the compromise had no power without authority of court to compromise or settle any cause of action in favor of the infant, or some flaw has been found which convinced the court that the infants were not properly represented. No such flaw appears in this case. The guardian ad litem was regularly appointed; a reputable attorney was employed to investigate the accident and wage action against the railway company; the settlement agreed upon was submitted to the court, with the statement of the circumstances giving rise to the controversy; the court made inquiry into the facts, examined witnesses, and after such a hearing, made findings to the effect that the best interests of the minors was conserved by the compromise, and entered a regular judgment. Under such circumstances the better reasoning supports the finality of the judgment. Tripp v. Gifford, 155 Mass. 108, 29 N. E. 208, 31 Am. St. Rep. 530; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Lasca, 79 Kan. 311, 17 Ann. Cas. 605, 99 Pac. 616, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338.

[42] While Judge Kennan, who entered this judgment, had no special recollection of the proceedings before him, he testified fully as to the course always pursued by him in entering judgments of this character, and as to the inquiry made in order to satisfy himself that the proposed settlement was for the best interests of the minors. As is said in Thomson v. Maxwell Land Grant, etc. Co. supra:

"Ordinarily, indeed, a court before entering a consent decree will inquire whether the terms of it are for the interests of the infants. It ought in all such cases to make the inquiry, and because it is its duty so to do it will be presumed in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that it has performed its duty. . . . The consent decree shows fully the terms of the settlement, and it certainly is not straining the presumption in favor of judicial action to assume that the court would not have permitted the entry of this decree providing for a settlement whose terms were thus disclosed, without being satisfied that such settlement was for the interest of the minors who were under its charge."

The judgment is reversed, and remanded with instructions to dismiss the petition.

Holcomb, Mount, Chadwick, and Parker, 4J., concur.

NOTE.

Vacation of Judgment Affecting Infant Duly Represented.

The question considered in this note is whether there is a peculiar infirmity in an infant which exempts him from the obligatory character of a judgment affecting him, in spite of his representation in the action by a guardian. In other words, the question is whether the law in its conception of infancy recognizes some inability or disadvantage incident to the peculiarly inexperienced condition of infancy, even though legally represented, which privileges an infant to vacate a judgment acquired affecting him or permits such judgment to be set aside on slighter grounds than those required to upset a judgment against an adult. In all cases wherein the question has been raised the courts have held uniformly that an infant is as much bound by a judgment rendered in an action wherein he has been duly represented as an adult, and that the only grounds for vacating such a judgment are fraud, collusion, mistake or other grounds which will vacate a judgment affecting a person of full age.

Thus in Ralston v. Lehee, 8 La. 17, 74 Am. Dec. 291, it was said: "An infant defendant is as much bound by a decree in equity against her as a person of full age; therefore, if there be an absolute decree against a defendant who is under age, she will not be permitted to dispute it, unless upon such grounds as an adult might dispute it, as fraud, collusion, or error."

In Cocks v. Simmons, 57 Miss. 183, advertising to the particular facts in that case, the court said: "It has been shown that the plaintiffs were parties to that proceeding, and that they were represented by a guardian ad litem. If in fact they had rights as heirs of their father, which they could have asserted in opposition to the enforcement of the vendor's lien, it should have been asserted in that proceeding. They were as much bound to set up their rights, if they had any, under that deed, as they were to assert payment, or any other affirmative defense. They were before the court, were bound by its decree, which gave them no right under said deed, and they are concluded by it in all collateral proceedings. That they were infants and incapable of making their defense makes no difference in this respect. Beyond the rights, reserved to them by law, of proceeding to have decrees reviewed within one year after they attain their majority, and their exemption from the operation of the statute of limitations, barring writs of error and appeals, they have no further claims to impeach decrees rendered against them than are accorded to adults. If their guardians have not made proper defenses it is their misfortune. Society undertakes, in view of the incapacity of minors to manage their own affairs, to furnish them suitable guardians to protect their interests; but it does not undertake to guarantee in them perfection and infallibility."

In Fiene v. Kirchhoff, 176 Mo. 516, 75 S. W. 608, the court in answer to the objection of infancy raised against the judgment in that case said: "The fact that these plaintiffs were minors and defended by a guardian ad litem, after being personally served with process, is immaterial. Freeman on Judgments (4th ed.) vol. 1, § 151, says: 'The general tendency is to regard the plea of infancy as a personal plea which may be waived. And whether such plea is interposed or not, a judgment or decree against an infant, properly before the court, is as obligatory upon him as though he were an adult, except in cases where he is allowed time, after coming of age, to show cause against a judgment or decree. If an absolute decree is made against an infant, he is as much bound as a person of full age, and will not be permitted to dispute the decree, except upon the same grounds which would be available if he were an adult.'"

In Johnson v. Johnson, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 385, 85 S. W. 1023, the court laid down the same rule, and reviewing the facts said: "The plaintiff in this case pleaded fraud on the part of appellant, by fraudulently misrepresenting the facts to the guardian ad litem and which deceived him, and paid him $25 in order that the evidence and law of the case might be withheld from the court, and thereby procured said judgment. The guardian ad litem testified that he agreed to the compromise after he had made a full investigation of his ward's defense and concluded that he could not recover; that his action was not influenced or controlled by J. K. Johnson, and that his ward consented to the compromise. It seems from the evidence that the guardian ad litem acted in good faith and the only ground for setting aside the former judgment is the bare fact that all the evidence relating to the transaction was not introduced on the trial of that case. A minor can inquire into a judgment rendered against him during minority within a reasonable time after reaching his majority, and can have the same set aside when fraud or collusion is shown in procuring its rendition, or when it is shown that he had a good defense which was not presented. A judgment or compromise by a guardian ad litem is not void; and to set it aside it must be shown that it was inequitable and unfair to the minor. The court's charge in effect states that if said agreement to compromise was made and the guardian ad litem failed to present his defense, said judgment would not be rendered after a 'fair and just investigation' and trial of the title to the land. This is not sufficient to set aside a judgment, but the proof must show that the minor had a good defense which was not presented. The court, before rendering the judgment, heard some evidence, and it is not clear that a different judgment would have been rendered had all the evidence been heard. Again, the terms 'fair and just,' used by the court, may have conveyed to the minds of the jury that fraud or collusion was perpetrated, and further that no judgment would be binding on a minor unless all the evidence practicable should be heard by the court. Such is not the law. Where the court has heard evidence sufficient to support his judgment in such a case, in order to set it aside it must be clear that had he heard all the evidence, a different result should have followed. In other words, in order to set aside a judgment against a minor where service is regularly had on him and he is represented by a guardian ad litem, it must be shown that fraud, collusion, or error was committed in procuring it. The error must be such that, if carried to an appellate court, it would cause a reversal, or show that other facts have been discovered that show the decree to be wrong."

It has been held that a judgment taken against an infant would not be set aside because of the fact that neither the minor nor the next of kin had notice of the application of the guardian ad litem for his appointment. Manayunk Trust Co. v. Platt, 221 Pa. St. 248, 70 Atl. 721.

In Butler v. Winchester Home for Aged Women, 216 Mass. 567, 104 N. E. 451, it was held that an infant was bound by the acts performed in good faith by his solicitor or counsel in the course of proceedings, to the same extent as a person of full age.

In Lieserowitz v. West Chicago St. R. Co. 80 Ill. App. 248, it was held that a judgment consented to by a minor's next friend was not binding on the minor.

IN RE WEDGWOOD.

ALLEN

v.

WEDGWOOD.

England—Court of Appeal—October 29,
1914.

[1915] 1 Ch. 113.

Charities — Gift for Benefit of Animals.

A devise in trust "for the protection and benefit of animals" is a valid charitable trust.
[See note at end of this case.]

[113] Appeal from a decision of Warrington, J.

By her will, dated June 26, 1913, the testatrix Frances Julia Wedgwood appointed the plaintiff and the defendant Cecil Wedgwood to be executors and trustees thereof and, after giving certain pecuniary and other legacies and annuities and making a devise of her freehold house, devised and bequeathed all the residue of her real and personal estate upon trust for conversion and upon further trust (subject to the payment of certain sums therein mentioned and to the setting aside of sums to secure certain annuities) for the defendant Cecil Wedgwood absolutely.

The testatrix died on November 26, 1913, without having revoked or altered her will save by two codicils which are not material to be stated, and the said will and codicils were duly proved by the plaintiff and the defendant Cecil Wedgwood.

Doubts having arisen as to whether the testatrix had not given her residue to the defendant Cecil Wedgwood upon certain secret trusts, which might or might not be validly created, an originating summons was taken out by the plaintiff against the defendant Cecil Wedgwood, Bertram Hensleigh Wedgwood, one of the testatrix's next of kin, and the Attorney-General, for the determination of: the questions (1) whether under the circumstances the gift of the residue to the defendant Cecil Wedgwood was an absolute gift to him beneficially or was subject to any secret trust. (2) If the said gift was subject to any secret trust, whether such trust was a good and valid charitable trust or not, [114] and, if not a good charitable trust, whether such secret trust was validly created or was too vague and uncertain, and had consequently failed for uncertainty.

It appeared from the evidence of the defendant Cecil Wedgwood that he and the testatrix were both interested in the question of the protection of animals, and that in 1908 she had asked him to act as her executor in conjunction with the plaintiff, and also wished him to undertake a further trust, which was to apply the residue of her estate for the protection and benefit of animals. She subsequently told him that her lawyer had suggested that, if she could trust him (the defendant) to use her residue for the purpose she intended, she should leave the residue to him absolutely, and to that proposal he agreed. They discussed the purpose to which the residue should be applied and the witness suggested that he might help forward the movement for the humane slaughtering of animals and also the movement to provide municipal abattoirs where animals could be properly and decently slaughtered; and the testatrix agreed that those were the sort of purposes, among others, which she would like to have forwarded. She wished to leave him an absolutely free hand to use his judgment as cases arose where he thought he could be of use to animals.

Warrington, J., held that the defendant Cecil Wedgwood was entitled to the residue absolutely, and not subject to any secret trust, and declined to consider the question of the validity of the trust on the hypothesis that its existence had been established.

From this decision the defendant B. H. Wedgwood appealed, on the ground that the gift of the residue was subject to a secret trust, and that such trust was not a good or valid charitable trust, but was void for perpetuity and/or uncertainty. There was a cross-appeal by the Attorney-General, who contended that the secret trust was a good and valid trust for charitable purposes.

The appeal came on for hearing on October 14, 1914, when the Court held, reversing the decision of Warrington, J., that the defendant Cecil Wedgwood took the residuary estate, not beneficially but subject to a secret trust for the protection and benefit of animals. The question then arose [115] whether that trust was a good and valid trust for charitable purposes.

[116] LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—It having been decided that Cecil Wedgwood takes the residuary estate not beneficially but upon a secret trust, it remains to consider what is the trust and whether it is charitable. The terms of the trust are "for the protection and benefit of animals." The movement for the humane slaughtering of animals and the [117] provision of municipal abattoirs were mentioned as the sort of purpose the testatrix would like to have forwarded. The word "charity" has a much wider meaning in law than it has in popular speech. The Courts have held that the particular objects mentioned in the Statute of Elizabeth, namely, [1891] A. C. 531, relief of the poor, [1898] 1 Ir. R. 446, religion, 1 De G. & J. 72, education, are not exhaustive. By analogy a large class of other objects have been included. Lord Macnaghten's judgment in Special Income Tax Com'rs v. Pemsel [1891] A. C. 531, is perhaps the leading authority. But I am content to adopt what was said by FitzGibbon, L. J., in In re Cranston [1898] 1 Ir. R. 446: "Any gift which proceeds from a philanthropic or benevolent motive, and which is intended to benefit an appreciably important class of our fellow creatures (including, under decided cases, animals) and which will confer the supposed benefit without contravening law or morals, will be charitable." It may be, and indeed I think it is, true that there has been a tendency to enlarge the meaning of the word charity, and that gifts have within the last fifty years been supported as good charitable gifts which 150 years ago would not have been supported. The authorities are very numerous. I need only refer to a few. In London University v. Yarrow, 1 De G. & J. 72, it was held that a trust for the benefit of animals useful to man was good, and there was a clear intimation of opinion that the limitation to domestic animals was not necessary. In Tatham v. Drummond (1864) 4 De G. J. & S. 484, the establishment of a slaughter-house for horses was held to be charitable, though the gift failed as it involved the purchase of land. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Society for the Abolition of Vivisection, and a Home for lost dogs are instances in which the doctrine has been extended.

In my opinion it is not possible for us to hold that this trust for the protection of animals is not a good charitable purpose. Apart from authorities which are binding upon us, I should be prepared to support the trust on the ground that it tends to promote public morality by checking the innate tendency to cruelty. In the language of Holmes, L.J., in In re Cranston [1898] 1 Ir. R. 457, [118] "gifts the object of which is to prevent cruelty to animals and to ameliorate the position of the brute creation are charitable. . . . If it is beneficial to the community to promote virtue and to discourage vice, it must be beneficial to teach the duty of justice and fair treatment to the brute creation, and to repress one of the most revolting kinds of cruelty." I desire also to mention the judgment of Chatterton, V.-C., in Armstrong v. Reeves, 25 L. R. Ir. 325, especially the passage at p. 341, where he points out that objects of general mercy to animals of all kinds, whether useful to man or not, are charitable.

There must be a declaration that the trust in the terms which I have mentioned is a good charitable trust. The selection of the particular mode of applying the fund, both principal and income, will rest with Mr. Cecil Wedgwood during his life. The costs of all parties of this appeal must be provided for out of residue, as in the Court below.

KENNEDY, L.J.—In this case the Court has already pronounced its decision that the bequest of the residuary real and personal estate of the testatrix to the defendant Cecil Wedgwood constituted not an absolute gift to him beneficially, but was subject to a secret trust. The question reserved for further consideration was whether or not such trust was a good and valid charitable trust.

It is a trust for the protection and benefit of animals. We know from the evidence that two objects which, in the opinion of the testatrix, would come within the purview of her generosity were the more humane slaughtering of animals and the establishment of municipal abattoirs.

It was contended by Mr. Terrell and Mr. Salter on behalf of the next of kin that this is too wide, too vague, and too uncertain. A review of the relevant authorities shows, I think, that during the past century there has been a growing tendency to enlarge the area of purposes which will be treated by Courts of Equity as charitable purposes, whilst still in theory only those objects of general public utility are charitable, in the legal sense of the term, which either are included in, or are analogous to, the [119] objects mentioned in the preamble of the Act 43 Eliz. c. 4: see especially the judgment on this point of Rigby, L.J., in In re Nottage [1895] 2 Ch. 649, 656. In the course of his judgment in Special Income Tax Com'rs v. Pemsel [1891] A. C. 583, Lord Macnaghten took from the argument of Sir Samuel Romilly in Morice v. Durham (1805) 10 Ves. Jr. 522, 532, a classification of the objects, within which all charity to be administered in the Court of Chancery must fall, into four divisions, i. e., trusts for the relief of poverty, trusts for the advancement of education, trusts for the advancement of religion, and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community not falling under any of the preceding heads. Sir Samuel Romilly, as Lord Lindley (the Lindley, L.J.) points out in In re Macduff [1896] 2 Ch. 451, 467, rightly described the fourth division, within which Mr. Austen-Cartmell argues that this trust falls, as the most difficult. "I don't know," said Holmes, L.J., in the Irish case of In re Cranston [1898] 1 Ir. R. 446 452, "a better classification, and yet it is obvious that the fourth head is altogether vague and indeterminate." "The essential attributes of a legal charity," said FitzGibbon, L.J., in the same case, "are in my opinion, that it should be unselfish—that is for the benefit of other persons than the donor—that it shall be public, that is that those to be benefited shall form a class worthy, in numbers or importance, of consideration as a public object of generosity, and that it shall be philanthropic or benevolent, that is dictated by a desire to do good." In Goodman v. Saltash (1882) 7 App. Cas. 633, Earl Cairns, in the course of his speech, speaking of a condition that the free inhabitants of ancient tenements in the borough of Saltash should have a right of dredging for oysters in the estuary, said that such a condition would create that which in the very wide language of our Courts is called a charitable, that is to say, a public, trust or interest for the benefit of the free inhabitants of ancient tenements. "To be a charity," said Chitty, L.J. (then Chitty, J.) in In re Foveaux [1895] 2 Ch. 504, "there must be some public purpose—something tending to the [120] benefit of the community," and he adds a little later in his judgment, "In examining the purposes of any particular trust the Court has taken a liberal rather than a narrow view of the subject." "We have gone much further," said the Master of the Rolls in Ireland in 1898, "than the words of that statute" (the first Irish Poor Law Act of Elizabeth) "and the tendency of late years has been where a testator dedicates part of his property towards an object which is not illegal in itself, to give effect to the intention unless there is some coercive reason to the contrary." In re Cranston [1898] 1 Ir. R. 435. It would be easy to cite cases illustrating this attitude of liberality; but, turning now to the decisions on gifts expressed to be, in one way or another, for the benefit of animals, which are the decisions particularly pertinent to the consideration of the question before us, we find, I think, sufficient authority for maintaining, as I hold that we ought to maintain, the validity of the gift, general as its terms are, in the present case. The earlier cases, of which there are several, are cited in the arguments of counsel and the judgment of Chitty, J., in In re Foveaux [1895] 2 Ch. 501, 507, to which I have already referred, and it is unnecessary to refer to them at length. It is, however, I think, having regard to the argument addressed to us by counsel for the appellant, material and right to note that the validity of the gift as a charitable gift has not been affirmed only in cases in which the animals for whose benefit the gift was bequeathed were domestic animals or animals useful to man. Gifts to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and to the Society for the Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection have been held good charitable gifts, and in neither case are the purposes of the named society limited to useful or domestic animals. In the case of Marsh v. Means, 3 Jur. (N. S.) 790, and in the case of In re Vallance, Seton 5th ed. 1141, both of which are referred to by Chitty, J., the object appears to have been the prevention of cruelty to animals generally. "Cruelty," he adds towards the close of his judgment, "is degrading to man; and a society for the suppression of cruelty to the lower animals, whether domestic or not, has for its object, not merely the protection of the animals themselves, but [121] the advancement of morals and education among men." In the Irish case of Armstrong v. Reeves, 25 L. R. Ir. 341, Chatterton, V. C., in the course of his judgment said in reference to cruelty to animals, "In my opinion, it is for the benefit of the public that such cruelty shall be prevented; and that any society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, whether domestic animals or not, is within the scope of charitable institutions." In In re Cranston [1898] 1 Ir. R. 431, 457, which I have referred to, Holmes, L.J., used very similar language: "There is really no difference amongst thoughtful and civilized men on this subject. If it is beneficial to the community to promote virtue and to discourage vice, it must be beneficial to teach the duty of justice and fair treatment to the brute creation, and to repress one of the most revolting kinds of cruelty."

It was contended in the argument addressed to us against the validity of this particular bequest as a charitable gift that it fails on account of such vagueness and generality of expression as would justify its application by the trustee to the protection and maintenance of noxious animals, and counsel instances, if I remember rightly, lions and tigers. Now it is quite true, as laid down by Lindley, L.J., in In re Macduff [1896] 2 Ch. 463, 464, that when we are dealing with general words we must consider whether there is such an indication of purpose or of trust that the Court, if called upon to execute it, can see what it has to do—can see the limits of its own powers. But, at the same time, I can entertain no doubt that if the Court should now be asked to say whether the trustee under this bequest for the protection and benefit of animals was fulfilling his duty in expending the fund upon the preservation of beasts of prey or mad dogs the Court would not find any difficulty as to the answer which is dictated by reason and common sense. There are, I suppose, very few, if any, charities of a wide character, such as, to take an imaginary case, a charity for the relief of poor mechanics, in regard to which it would not be easy for ingenuity to suggest difficulties of discrimination.

In my opinion, the secret trust contained in the will of Miss Wedgwood is a valid charitable trust.

[122] SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—It has already been decided that Mr. Cecil Wedgwood does not take the residue beneficially, but that it is subject to a secret trust. There remains the question whether it has been validly given upon trust, or whether the next of kin have become entitled. The trust was to apply the residue “for the protection of animals,” or “for the protection and benefit of animals,” the testatrix having assented to the suggestion that the movement for the humane slaughtering of animals and the movement for providing municipal abattoirs in the place of ordinary slaughter-houses were the sort of purposes, among others, which she would like to be supported. The object of the trust being thus ascertained and defined, the question arises, is this a valid charitable trust? In my opinion it is. It is a gift for a general public purpose; beneficial to the community. A gift for the benefit and protection of animals tends to promote and encourage kindness towards them, to discourage cruelty, and to ameliorate the condition of the brute creation, and thus to stimulate humane and generous sentiments in man towards the lower animals, and by these means promote feelings of humanity and morality generally, repress brutality, and thus elevate the human race. That such purposes are eminently charitable, in the accepted legal sense of that term, is amply established by the cases to which the Master of the Rolls has referred. In In re Foveaux [1895] 2 Ch. 501, 507, Chitty, J., decided that certain societies for the suppression and abolition of vivisection were charities within the legal definition of the term charity. He said, “Cruelty is degrading to man; and a society for the suppression of cruelty to the lower animals, whether domestic or not, has for its object, not merely the protection of the animals themselves, but the advancement of morals and education among men. The purpose of these societies, whether they are right or wrong in the opinions they hold, is charitable in the legal sense of the term. The intention is to benefit the community.” Those observations, in which I entirely concur, equally apply to the trust constituted by the testatrix, which in my opinion is a valid charitable trust.

[123] LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—Mr. Austen-Cartmell has been good enough to hand to me the form of order that he proposes, which I will read. “Discharge the order of Mr. Justice Warrington in so far as it declares on the true construction of the testatrix’s will, and in the events that have happened, the gift in the will contained of the real and residuary personal estate to the defendant Cecil Wedgwood was an absolute gift to him beneficially and was not subject to any charitable trust.” That is right of course. Then, “And declare that the said gift was not an absolute gift to the defendant Cecil Wedgwood beneficially, but was subject to the trust for the application thereof as to both capital and income for the protection and benefit of animals in such manner as he shall think fit, and that such trust is a good and valid trust for a public and charitable purpose”—that is right. Then, “And the Attorney-General not at present asking for a scheme or for the administration of the testatrix’s estate, and the defendant Cecil Wedgwood by his counsel undertaking to furnish proper accounts of the testatrix’s estate to the Attorney-General and to render to the Attorney-General an annual account and statement of the application of the trust fund and the income thereof, liberty to the Attorney-General to apply for administration or otherwise.”

NOTE.

The reported case sustains as a valid charitable trust a devise in trust “for the protection and benefit of animals.” The cases discussing the question whether a gift for the benefit of animals is a charity are reviewed in the notes to In re Graves, 17 Ann. Cas. 137; In re Coleman, Ann. Cas. 1915C 682; and Hoeffler v. Clogon, 63 Am. St. Rep. 241, 267.

Bricks — Ordinance Prohibiting Manufacture — Validity.

A municipal ordinance enacted in good faith as a police measure, prohibiting brick-making within a designated area, does not take, without due process of law, the property of an owner of a tract of land within the prohibited district, although such land contains valuable deposits of clay suitable for brickmaking which cannot profitably be removed and manufactured into brick elsewhere, and is far more valuable for brick-making than for any other purpose, and had been acquired by him before it was annexed to the municipality, and had long been used by him as a brickyard.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Prohibiting by municipal ordinance the manufacture of brick within a designated area cannot be said to deny the equal protection of the laws to the owner of a brickyard within the prohibited district, where the record does not show that brickyards in other localities within the municipality where the same conditions exist are not regulated or prohibited, or that other objectionable businesses are permitted within the same district.

Courts — Decision of State Court — Binding Effect on Federal Supreme Court.

The decision of the highest court of a state that a municipal ordinance which is asserted to violate the Federal Constitution is within the city's charter powers, and is not forbidden by the state constitution, is conclusive upon the Federal Supreme Court on writ of error to the state court.

Error to California Supreme Court.

Habeas corpus proceeding. J. C. Hadacheck, petitioner, and C. E. Sebastian, Chief of Police of City of Los Angeles, defendant. Writ discharged. Petitioner brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Emmet H. Wilson and G. C. De Garmo for plaintiff in error.

Albert Lee Stephens, Charles S. Burnell and Warren L. Williams for defendant in error.

[404] McKENNA, J.—Habeas corpus prosecuted in the Supreme Court of the State of California for the discharge of plaintiff in error from the custody of defendant in error, Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles.

Plaintiff in error, to whom we shall refer as petitioner, was convicted of a misdemeanor for the violation of an ordinance of the City of Los Angeles which makes it unlawful for any person to establish or operate a brick yard or brick kiln, or any establishment, factory or place for the manufacture or burning of brick within described limits in the city. Sentence was pronounced against him [405] and he was committed to the custody of defendant in error as Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles.

Being so in custody he filed a petition in the Supreme Court of the State for a writ of habeas corpus. The writ was issued. Subsequently defendant in error made a return thereto supported by affidavits, to which petitioner made sworn reply. The court rendered judgment discharging the writ and remanding petitioner to custody. The Chief Justice of the court then granted this writ of error.

The petition sets forth the reason for resorting to habeas corpus and that petitioner is the owner of a tract of land within the limits described in the ordinance upon which tract of land there is a very valuable bed of clay, of great value for the manufacture of brick of a fine quality, worth to him not less than $100,000 per acre or about $800,000 for the entire tract for brick-making purposes, and not exceeding $60,000 for residential purposes or for any purpose other than the manufacture of brick. That he has made excavations of considerable depth and covering a very large area of the property and that on account thereof the land cannot be utilized for residential purposes or any purpose other than that for which it is now used. That he purchased the land because of such bed of clay and for the purpose of manufacturing brick; that it was at the time of purchase outside of the limits of the city and distant from dwellings and other habitations and that he did not expect or believe, nor did other owners of property in the vicinity expect or believe, that the territory would be annexed to the city. That he has erected expensive machinery for the manufacture of bricks of fine quality which have been and are being used for building purposes in and about the city.

That if the ordinance be declared valid he will be compelled to entirely abandon his business and will be deprived of the use of his property.

[406] That the manufacture of brick must necessarily be carried on where suitable clay is found and the clay cannot be transported to some other location, and, besides, the clay upon his property is particularly fine and clay of as good quality cannot be found in any other place within the city where the same can be utilized for the manufacture of brick. That within the prohibited district there is one other brick yard besides that of plaintiff in error.

That there is no reason for the prohibition of the business; that its maintenance cannot be and is not in the nature of a nuisance as defined in § 3479 of the Civil Code of the State, and cannot be dangerous or detrimental to health or the morals or safety or peace or welfare or convenience of the people in the district or city.

That the business is so conducted as not to be in any way or degree a nuisance; no noises arise therefrom, and no noxious odors, and that by the use of certain means (which are described) provided and the situation of the brick yard an extremely small amount of smoke is emitted from any kiln and what is emitted is so dissipated that it is not a nuisance nor in any manner detrimental to health or comfort. That during the seven years which the brick yard has been conducted no complaint has been made of it, and no attempt has ever been made to regulate it.

That the city embraces 107.62 square miles in area and 75% of it is devoted to residential purposes; that the district described in the ordinance includes only about three square miles, is sparsely settled and contains large tracts of unsubdivided and unoccupied land; and that the boundaries of the district were determined for the sole and specific purpose of prohibiting and suppressing the business of petitioner and that of the other brick yard.

That there are and were at the time of the adoption of the ordinance in other districts of the city thickly built up with residences brick yards maintained more detrimental to the inhabitants of the city. That a petition was filed, [407] signed by several hundred persons, representing such brick yards to be a nuisance and no ordinance or regulation was passed in regard to such petition and the brick yards are operated without hindrance or molestation. That other brick yards are permitted to be maintained without prohibition or regulation.

That no ordinance or regulation of any kind has been passed at any time regulating or attempting to regulate brick yards or inquiry made whether they could be maintained without being a nuisance or detrimental to health.

That the ordinance does not state a public offense and is in violation of the constitution of the state and the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416).

That the business of petitioner is a lawful one, none of the materials used in it are combustible, the machinery is of the most approved pattern and its conduct will not create a nuisance.

There is an allegation that the ordinance if enforced fosters and will foster a monopoly and protects and will protect other persons engaged in the manufacture of brick in the city, and discriminates and will discriminate against petitioner in favor of such other persons who are his competitors, and will prevent him from entering into competition with them.

The petition, after almost every paragraph, charges a deprivation of property, the taking of property without compensation, and that the ordinance is in consequence invalid.

We have given this outline of the petition as it presents petitioner's contentions, with the circumstances (which we deem most material) that give color and emphasis to them.

But there are substantial traverses made by the return to the writ, among others, a denial of the charge that the ordinance was arbitrarily directed against the business of [408] petitioner, and it is alleged that there is another district in which brick yards are prohibited.

There was a denial of the allegations that the brick yard was conducted or could be conducted sanitarily or was not offensive to health. And there were affidavits supporting Ann. Cas. 1917B.—59.

the denials. In these it was alleged that the fumes, gases, smoke, soot, steam and dust arising from petitioner's brick-making plant have from time to time caused sickness and serious discomfort to those living at the vicinity.

There was no specific denial of the value of the property or that it contained deposits of clay or that the latter could not be removed and manufactured into brick elsewhere. There was, however, a general denial that the enforcement of the ordinance would "entirely deprive petitioner of his property and the use thereof."

How the Supreme Court dealt with the allegations, denials and affidavits we can gather from its opinion. The court said, through Mr. Justice Sloss, 165 Cal. 416, 132 Pac. 584, L.R.A.1916B 1248: "The district to which the prohibition was applied contains about three square miles. The petitioner is the owner of a tract of land, containing eight acres, more or less, within the district described in the ordinance. He acquired his land in 1902, before the territory to which the ordinance was directed had been annexed to the city of Los Angeles. His land contains valuable deposits of clay suitable for the manufacture of brick, and he has, during the entire period of his ownership, used the land for brickmaking, and has erected thereon kilns, machinery and buildings necessary for such manufacture. The land, as he alleges, is far more valuable for brickmaking than for any other purpose."

The court considered the business one which could be regulated and that regulation was not precluded by the fact "that the value of investments made in the business prior to any legislative action will be greatly diminished," and that no complaint could be based upon the fact that [409] petitioner had been carrying on the trade in that locality for a long period.

And, considering the allegations of the petition, the denials of the return and the evidence of the affidavits, the court said that the latter tended to show that the district created had become primarily a residential section and that the occupants of the neighboring dwellings are seriously incommoded by the operations of petitioner; and that such evidence, "when taken in connection with the presumptions in favor of the propriety of the legislative determination, overcame the contention that the prohibition of the ordinance was a mere arbitrary invasion of private right, not supported by any tenable belief that the continuance of the business was so detrimental to the interests of others as to require suppression."

The court, on the evidence, rejected the contention that the ordinance was not in good faith enacted as a police measure and that it was intended to discriminate against petitioner or that it was actuated by any motive of injuring him as an individual.

The charge of discrimination between localities was not sustained. The court expressed the view that the determination of prohibition was for the legislature and that the court, without regard to the fact shown in the return that there was another district in which brickmaking was prohibited, could not sustain the claim that the ordinance was not enacted in good faith but was designed to discriminate against petitioner and the other brick yard within the district. "The facts before us," the court finally said, "would certainly not justify the conclusion that the ordinance here in question was designed, in either its adoption or its enforcement, to be anything but what it purported to be, viz., a legitimate regulation, operating alike upon all who came within its terms."

We think the conclusion of the court is justified by the evidence and makes it unnecessary to review the many [410] cases cited by petitioner in which it is decided that the police power of a state cannot be arbitrarily exercised. The principle is familiar, but in any given case it must plainly appear to apply. It is to be remembered that we are dealing with one of the most essential powers of government, one that is the least limitable. It may, indeed, seem harsh in its exercise, usually is on some individual, but the imperative necessity for its existence precludes any limitation upon it when not exerted arbitrarily. A vested interest cannot be asserted against it because of conditions once obtaining. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Tranbarger, 238 U. S. 67, 78, 35 S. Ct. 678, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1204, 1211. To so hold would preclude development and fix a city forever in its primitive conditions. There must be progress, and if in its march private interests are in the way they must yield to the good of the community. The logical result of petitioner's contention would seem to be that a city could not be formed or enlarged against the resistance of an occupant of the ground and that if it grows at all it can only grow as the environment of the occupations that are usually banished to the purlieus.

The police power and to what extent it may be exerted we have recently illustrated in Reinman v. Little Rock, 237 U. S. 171, 35 S. Ct. 511, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 900. The circumstances of the case were very much like those of the case at bar and give reply to the contentions of petitioner, especially that which asserts that a necessary and lawful occupation that is not a nuisance per se cannot be made so by legislative declaration. There was a like investment in property, encouraged by the then conditions; a like reduction of value and deprivation of property was asserted against the validity of the ordinance there considered; a like assertion of an arbitrary exercise of the power of prohibition. Against all of these contentions, and causing the rejection of them all, was adduced the police power. There was a prohibition of a business, lawful in itself, there as here. It was a livery stable there; a brick yard here. They differ in [411] particulars, but they are alike in that which cause and justify prohibition in defined localities—that is, the effect upon the health and comfort of the community.

The ordinance passed upon prohibited the conduct of the business within a certain defined area in Little Rock, Arkansas. This court said of it: Granting that the business was not a nuisance per se, it was clearly within the police power of the state to regulate it, "and to that end to declare that in particular circumstances and in particular localities a livery stable shall be deemed a nuisance in fact and in law." And the only limitation upon the power was stated to be that the power could not be exerted arbitrarily or with unjust discrimination. There was a citation of cases. We think the present case is within the ruling thus declared.

There is a distinction between Reinman v. Little Rock and the case at bar. There a particular business was prohibited which was not affixed to or dependent upon its locality; it could be conducted elsewhere. Here, it is contended, the latter condition does not exist, and it is alleged that the manufacture of brick must necessarily be carried on where suitable clay is found and that the clay on petitioner's property cannot be transported to some other locality. This is not urged as a physical impossibility but only, counsel say, that such transportation and the transportation of the bricks to places where they could be used in construction work would be prohibitive "from a financial standpoint." But upon the evidence the Supreme Court considered the case, as we understand its opinion, from the standpoint of the offensive effects of the operation of a brick yard and not from the deprivation of the deposits of clay, and distinguished In re Kelso, 147 Cal. 609, 82 Pac. 241, 109 Am. St. Rep. 178, 2 L.R.A. (N. S.) 790, wherein the court declared invalid an ordinance absolutely prohibiting the maintenance or operation of a rock or stone quarry within a certain portion of the city and county of San Francisco.

[412] The court there said that the effect of the ordinance was "to absolutely deprive the owners of real property within such limits of a valuable right incident to their ownership,—viz., the right to extract therefrom such rock and stone as they might find it to their advantage to dispose of." The court expressed the view that the removal could be regulated but that "an absolute prohibition of such removal under the circumstances," could not be upheld.

In the present case there is no prohibition of the removal of the brick clay; only a prohibition within the designated locality of its manufacture into bricks. And to this feature of the ordinance our opinion is addressed. Whether other questions would arise if the ordinance were broader, and opinion on such questions, we reserve.

Petitioner invokes the equal protection clauses of the Constitution and charges that it is violated in that the ordinance (1) "prohibits him from manufacturing brick upon his property while his competitors are permitted, without regulation of any kind, to manufacture brick upon property situated in all respects similarly to that of plaintiff in error;" and (2) that it "prohibits the conduct of his business while it permits the maintenance within the same district of any other kind of business, no matter how objectionable the same may be, either in its nature or in the manner in which it is conducted."

If we should grant that the first specification shows a violation of classification, that is, a distinction between businesses which was not within the legislative power, petitioner's contention encounters the objection that it depends upon an inquiry of fact which the record does not enable us to determine. It is alleged in the return to the petition that brickmaking is prohibited in one other district and an ordinance is referred to regulating business in other districts. To this plaintiff in error replied that the ordinance attempts to prohibit the operation of certain [413] businesses having mechanical power and does not prohibit the maintenance of any business or the operation of any machine that is operated by animal power. In other words, petitioner makes his contention depend upon disputable considerations of classification and upon a comparison of conditions of which there is no means of judicial determination and upon which nevertheless we are expected to reverse legislative action exercised upon matters of which the city has control.

To a certain extent the latter comment may be applied to other contentions, and, besides, there is no allegation or proof of other objectionable businesses being permitted within the district, and a speculation of their establishment or conduct at some future time is too remote.

In his petition and argument something is made of the ordinance as fostering a monopoly and suppressing his competition with other brickmakers. The charge and argument are too illusive. It is part of the charge that the ordinance was directed against him. The charge, we have seen, was rejected by the Supreme Court, and we find nothing to justify it.

It may be that brick yards in other localities within the city where the same conditions exist are not regulated or prohibited, but it does not follow that they will not be. That petitioner's business was first in time to be prohibited does not make its prohibition unlawful. And it may be, as said by the Supreme Court of the State, that the conditions justify a distinction. However, the inquiries thus suggested are outside of our province.

There are other and subsidiary contentions which, we think, do not require discussion. They are disposed of by what we have said. It may be that something else than prohibition would have satisfied the conditions. Of this, however, we have no means of determining, and besides we cannot declare invalid the exertion of a power which the city undoubtedly has because of a charge that it does [414] not exactly accommodate the conditions or that some other exercise would have been better or less harsh. We must accord good faith to the city in the absence of a clear showing to the contrary and an honest exercise of judgment upon the circumstances which induced its action.

We do not notice the contention that the ordinance is not within the city's charter powers nor that it is in violation of the estate constitution, such contentions raising only local questions which must be deemed to have been decided adversely to petitioner by the Supreme Court of the State.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

State or Municipal Regulation of Manufacture of Bricks.

The reported case upholds the validity of an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles declaring it to be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to establish or operate, or cause or permit to be established or operated, any brick yard or brick kiln, or any establishment, factory or place for the manufacture or burning of brick, whether established prior or subsequent to the passage of the ordinance, within a described district or portion of the city. It is held that the ordinance in question, passed by the city in the exercise of its police power, does not violate the due process of law provision of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416) because the land of the petitioner, containing valuable deposits of clay and structures for the manufacture of brick, would depreciate greatly in value if brickmaking was prohibited thereon; and it is said that it cannot be held that there is a violation of the equal protection of law clause of the same amendment, because the petitioner's competitors are permitted without regulation to manufacture brick on property similarly situated in all respects and because other kinds of business equally objectionable are permitted to be carried on within the limits of the prescribed district, the determination of those two points depending on an inquiry of fact not within the record.

In Ward v. Washington, 4 Cranch C. C. 232, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,163, it appeared that the corporation of Washington had passed a by-law providing that "any person who shall, without . . . license, erect or use a brick or lime kiln, shall incur a penalty of ten dollars for every week he continues to use the same without license." The court "was of opinion that the corporation had a right to pass such a by-law, under the power to prevent nuisances, and to superintend the health of the city" but reversed the judgment on the ground that the by-law was so imperfect that it would not support a prosecution in any form. Under the terms thereof no officer was authorized to grant a license, thus making it impossible for the defendant who had been convicted thereunder to obtain one. Therefore it was said: "The by-law . . . in effect amounted to a total prohibition of the erection or use of a brick . . . kiln in any part of the world; for it is not, in its terms, limited to the city of Washington. Such an act would be void for want of power in the corporation."

In State v. Withnell, 91 Neb. 101, 135 N. W. 376, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 898, the relator sought by mandamus to compel the issuance by the defendant as building inspector of the city of Omaha of a permit for the construction of a brick kiln, which permit the defendant refused to issue on the ground that in so doing he would violate an ordinance providing as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, firm or corporation to erect or construct within the city of Omaha any kiln or oven to be used in the manufacture of brick." In upholding the defendant's view and in declaring the ordinance to be valid against the relator's contention that the same was "arbitrary, unreasonable, and void, as being an invasion of personal rights and of private property," the court said: "In testing police regulations like the ordinance assailed, the court should inquire 'whether they have some relation to the public health or public welfare, and whether such is, in fact, the end sought to be attained.' . . . Relator was not entitled to a writ commanding defendant to issue a building permit in violation of the ordinance, unless the proofs clearly answer those inquiries in the negative and show that the enactment was an unreasonable and arbitrary invasion of individual rights under the guise of police regulation.

. . . Relator has not yet constructed his kiln, and the testimony adduced to show that it would not become a nuisance is based largely on observations of existing kilns operated according to the modern method described in his plans and evidence. According to the proofs the volume and character of the smoke will be less objectionable under the new process, but the stack will emit smoke of a light color continually. The fair inference from all the evidence is that black smoke in great volume will escape at intervals under ordinary management of the plant. It is undisputed that clay, excavated on the premises, and coal, ashes and brick, in vast quantities, will be handled there. Teams and men will be required for that purpose. The fact that the wind in this climate will carry dust and soot long distances at times cannot be disproved. On one side of the kiln site an addition to the city is rapidly being occupied by valuable residences and there is no factory in the immediate neighborhood. The proofs show that there are thirteen houses within two blocks of relator's land, and a witness for defendant testified that within five blocks there were twenty or twenty-five families.

. . . Near valuable residences relator intends to build a smoke-stack 130 feet high, and to remove clay to a depth not disclosed by his plans or evidence. The value of residence property in the neighborhood might be damaged by relator's enterprise. These were proper matters for the consideration of the city lawmakers. When the entire record is considered, the evidence does not justify a finding that the ordinance in question has no relation to the public health, safety or welfare, or that it is not a bona fide exercise of police power, or that it amounts to an unconstitutional invasion of relator's individual rights, or that it is arbitrary and unreasonable."

In Denver v. Rogers, 46 Colo. 479, 104 Pac. 1042, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 247, there was involved an ordinance of the city of Denver providing as follows: "A brick yard, where bricks are burned within twelve hundred feet of any residence or public school house or park belonging to the city, within the limits of the city of Denver, without permission from the owner or owners of such residence or residences, or the occupants thereof, or without permission from the city, when such brick yard is within twelve hundred feet of a public school house or city park, is hereby defined and declared to be a nuisance." The ordinance was declared to be invalid because of its unreasonableness, and unconstitutional as taking property without due process of law. The court said: "When subjected to the test of reasonableness this ordinance is so manifestly radical, unjust and oppressive, while upon the question of its constitutionality, its effect is so clearly to take and destroy property without due process of law, that we have no hesitancy in declaring it invalid on both grounds. It is difficult to conceive how a more drastic, radical and extreme municipal law, than the one under consideration, could be proposed. Under its provisions one of the most important, useful and necessary industries known to business life, everywhere recognized as lawful and legitimate, confessedly not a nuisance at common law or inherently, in which thousands of dollars are invested and employed, is arbitrarily driven beyond the city limits and thus largely destroyed, by the mere edict of the city council, upon the occurrence of these two things, first, that such business is either within twelve hundred feet of a single residence house, or of a city park or public school house, and second, in case of the residence that its owner or occupant, and in the case of the park or school that the city, has not consented to such location. To accomplish such result it matters not whether such business is in truth detrimental or obnoxious, or whether it is being conducted in a proper, legitimate and innocent way. The mere statement of the facts upon, and the conditions under which, this ordinance is in effect, as above indicated, is in itself alone a complete refutation of the claim that it is a proper and reasonable one or a valid exercise by the city, of its police power."

In State v. St. Louis Board of Health, 16 Mo. App. 8, it appeared that the relator had been prosecuted in police court under an ordinance providing as follows: "Hereafter no brick kiln shall be located within three hundred feet of any dwelling house built and inhabited before such location, without the consent in writing of the owner and occupant of every such house." He had been acquitted on the ground that his kiln was located and operated before the ordinance or the charter specifically authorizing it were adopted. It was held that the acquittal was not conclusive against the city as to the relator's right to operate the kiln and did not therefore authorize the issuance of a writ of prohibition to prevent the city through its board of health and health commissioners from maintaining proceedings to condemn the kiln as a nuisance under the authority given by charter to abate the same, for in the original proceedings the question of nuisance did not properly arise at all.

v.

MITCHELL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—March 3, 1915.

168 N. Car. 312; 84 S. E. 404.

Sales — Parol Evidence of Subsequent Agreement.

Evidence offered by the seller of a mule that after it had been delivered to the buyer, and within half an hour after a written contract of sale had been delivered by the buyer to the seller, and before the seller had handed such paper to a third person who was to keep it for the parties, the buyer agreed that the title to the mule should remain in the seller until payment was made, is admissible if considered as made at the time of the contract as being an agreement to secure payment not inconsistent with the contract, and if made subsequently to the contract the rule excluding parol evidence does not apply.

Chattel Mortgages — Pre-existing Debt.

A pre-existing debt is a sufficient consideration for a parol chattel mortgage.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford county: BOND, Judge.

Action by W. A. Brown, plaintiff, against Wright Mitchell, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. REVERSED.

[312] Action begun before a justice of the peace and heard on appeal, its purpose being to recover a mule from the defendant.

The plaintiff testified that on 22 February, 1913, he sold and delivered to the defendant a mule for $20, and took from defendant a paper-writing in words and figures as follows:

I, Wright Mitchell, promise to pay W. A. Brown the sum of $20 for one bay mule, if said mule should get well and able to work any time in the limited time of twelve months. If said mule does not get well and able to work in this limited time above mentioned, I am not to pay said W. A. Brown anything.

This 22d day of February, 1913.

Wright Mitchell.

Plaintiff delivered the mule to the defendant and took from defendant above paper. It was agreed that plaintiff should deliver said paper to E. J. Geroch, a merchant at Ahoskie, to keep for said parties.

Plaintiff offered to show that after the mule had been delivered to the defendant, and within half an hour after said paper had been delivered by defendant to plaintiff, and before plaintiff had handed it to said Gerock, the defendant agreed that title to said mule should remain in plaintiff until payment was made, if same became enforceable. Defendant objected.

[313] As there was no offer to show that any part of the agreement between the parties had been omitted by mistake, and as said alleged parol agreement, in the opinion of the court, assailed the written part thereof; and, further, that if it was a subsequent promise there was no consideration therefor, the evidence was excluded and plaintiff excepted.

Plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that the mule recovered and was able to work within the time fixed by the written contract.

Verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

W. W. Rogers and Winborne & Winborne for appellant.

George Couper and W. D. Boone for appellee.

ALLEN, J.—The evidence offered by the plaintiff to prove that it was agreed that the title to the mule should remain in the plaintiff until payment was made does not come within the rule excluding parol evidence when there is a written contract.

In the first place, if the agreement had been made contemporaneously with the writing, it would fall within the principle that where a part of the contract is in writing and a part not, that the part in parol may be proven, because there is no inconsistency between a promise to pay and an agreement to secure payment (Evans v. Freeman, 142 N. C. 61, 54 S. E. 847; Wilson v. Scarboro, 163 N. C. 384, 79 S. E. 811), and if made subsequent to the writing, which appears to be the case here, the rule excluding parol evidence would have no application. Freeman v. Bell, 150 N. C. 148, 63 S. E. 682; McKinney v. Matthews, 166 N. C. 580, 82 S. E. 1036.

In the Evans case the Court quotes a section from Clark on Contracts, that "Where a contract does not fall within the statute, the parties may at their option put their agreement in writing, or may contract orally, or put some of the terms in writing and arrange some orally. In the latter case, although that which is written cannot be aided by parol evidence, yet the terms arranged orally may be proved by parol, in which case they supplement the writing, and the whole constitutes one entire contract," and comments on the section as follows: "In such a case there is no violation of the familiar and elementary rule we have before mentioned (against varying or contradicting a written agreement), because in the sense of that rule the written contract is neither contradicted, added to, nor varied; but, leaving it in full force and operation as it has been expressed by the parties in the writing, the other part of the contract is permitted to be shown in order to round it out and present it in its completeness, the same as if all of it had been committed to writing;" and this is approved in the Wilson case.

In Freeman v. Bell, supra, the Court says: "It is well settled that the rule that parol evidence will not be admitted to contradict or modify a [314] written contract does not apply where the modification takes place after the execution of the contract;" and this was approved in the McKinney case.

We are also of opinion that the pre-existing debt is a sufficient consideration to support the agreement. 1 Jones on Ch. Mort. sec. 81; 6 Cyc. 1013; 5 Ruling Case Law, 420; McMurtrie v. Riddell, 9 Colo. 503, 13 Pac. 181; Louthain v. Miller, 85 Ind. 163; Close v. Hodges, 44 Minn. 205, 46 N. W. 335; Paine v. Benton, 32 Wis. 491; Collerd v. Tully, 78 N. J. Eq. 557, Ann. Cas. 1912C 78, 80 Atl. 491; State v. Surles, 117 N. C. 720, 23 So. E. 324.

In the case from Indiana the Court says: "We have no doubt that an antecedent debt is a valuable consideration and that it will support a mortgage or other contract," and in the New Jersey case, after quoting a passage from the opinion of the Vice Chancellor: "This passage from the opinion assumes that in order to make a chattel mortgage good there must be then a present consideration when it is given. It has, however, been held by this Court that a precedent debt is a good consideration for a chattel mortgage;" and further, after citing the case of Knowles Loom Works v. Vacher, 57 N. J. L. 490, 31 Atl. 306, 33 L.R.A. 305: "We not only held that a chattel mortgage given for a pre-existing debt was valid, but also that it was entitled to priority over an antecedent conditional sale not recorded."

The New Jersey case is also reported in 24 Ann. Cas. 78, and the editor in an extended note cites a great number of cases in support of the position that "The authorities unanimously support the holding of the reported cases to the effect that a precedent debt is a good consideration for a chattel mortgage."

In the citation from Ruling Case Law the author says: "There has probably never been any doubt that as between the parties a mortgage given to secure a pre-existing debt is as valid and effective as one given for a debt contemporaneously incurred. Such a mortgage is not without consideration, because the debt affords a sufficient consideration for it."

In the Surles case the defendant was indicted for disposing of mortgaged property, and one of the defenses was that the mortgage was not valid because executed to secure a pre-existing debt, and the Court says of this contention: "In his charge his Honor told the jury that the mortgage rested on a good consideration, whether it was given, as testified by defendant, for a balance due on a former debt, or whether, as testified by the witness Green, for supplies furnished after the date of the mortgage. The defendant excepts, but on what ground it is not clear. His Honor was correct in the ruling."

It was also held in Potts v. Blackwell, 57 N. C. 67, a case which has been frequently cited and approved, that a mortgagee for a pre-existing debt is a purchaser for value.

[315] These authorities fully sustain the position that if a written chattel mortgage has been executed that the pre-existing debt would have been a sufficient consideration to support it, and as a chattel mortgage or conditional sale by parol is recognized as valid in this State (McCoy v. Lassiter, 95 N. C. 88; Odom v. Clark, 146 N. C. 550, 60 S. E. 513), the same effect must be given to it as if it had been in writing.

Being, therefore, of opinion that the evidence offered by the plaintiff was competent, and that there is a sufficient consideration to support the agreement, a new trial is ordered.

New trial.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that evidence is admissible to show a subsequent parol agreement between the parties to the sale of a chattel to the effect that title should remain in the vendor until the price was paid. And the court, apparently regarding the subsequent agreement as a chattel mortgage, holds that the pre-existing debt for the purchase price was a good consideration for the mortgage. The cases on this subject are collated in the note to Collerd v. Tully, Ann. Cas. 1912C 78.

Bridges — Injury by Vessel — Liability.

Where a collision occurs between a steamer and a bridge, the absence of such lights on the bridge as are required by the rules of the lighthouse board, made under authority of act of Congress, throws the burden on the party in default to show that the absence of such lights not only did not but could not have caused the injury.

Bridges — Injury by Vessel — Liability.

In an action by a city for damages to a bridge caused by a steamer running into it, the question whether the absence of lights on the bridge, as required by the lighthouse board was the cause of the injury, is held to be, under the evidence, for the jury, both on a motion for nonsuit and on motion to direct a verdict.

Verdict — When Direction Improper.

If there is any credible evidence which, if undisputed, would entitle the jury to find for the plaintiff, a verdict should not be directed for the defendant.

Same.

In an action for damages to a bridge caused by a steamer running into it, certain negative evidence examined and held to be sufficient to sustain a finding that the whistles required of the steamer to signal for the opening of the bridge were not blown.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marinette county: HASTINGS, Judge.

Action by City of Marinette et al., plaintiffs, against Goodrich Transit Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. AFFIRMED.

[93] The city of Menominee in the state of Michigan, and the City of Marinette in the state of Wisconsin, plaintiffs, maintained the bridge in question across the Menominee river between the said cities. On the morning of July 18, 1907, at about 2:30 a. m., the steamer Carolina, owned by the defendant, collided with the bridge in question, damaging it to the extent of $3,250. There is no dispute as to the amount of the damages, and this action is brought for the recovery thereof.

The negligence charged in the complaint is in substance that the defendant failed to give warning of the approach of the steamer which collided with the bridge so that the bridge might be opened for the steamer to pass through, and that the said steamer was so negligently and carelessly managed as to run into the bridge and cause the damage complained of.

The defendant answered admitting certain allegations of the complaint and denying the material allegation respecting negligence of defendant, and also set up as a separate defense failure on the part of the plaintiffs to comply with the rules of the United States lighthouse board passed in pursuance of an act of Congress relating to lighting bridges over navigable rivers, and providing that all parties owning, occupying, or operating bridges over any navigable river shall [94] maintain at their own expense from sunset to sunrise throughout the year such lights on their bridges as may be required by the lighthouse board for the security of navigation; and in addition thereto all parties owning, occupying, or operating any bridge over any navigable river shall in any event maintain all lights on their bridge that may be necessary for the security of navigation. And the answer further alleged not only failure to comply with the rules of the lighthouse board, but also failure to maintain any proper lights on said bridge.

Motions for nonsuit and directed verdict in favor of the defendant were denied, and the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Were three blasts of the whistle on the Carolina blown in the usual place for signaling its approach to and intent to go through the bridge? A. No.

"(2) Were the red lights on top of the center of the draw, and the two lights at its end on the east side, usually maintained by the plaintiffs, burning at the time the Carolina struck the bridge? A. Yes.

"(3) Was the defendant negligent in so running the Carolina as to permit her to strike the bridge? A. Yes.

"(4) If your answer to the third question should be 'Yes,' then answer this: Was said negligence a proximate cause of the collision with and injury to the bridge? A. Yes

"(5) If your answer to the third and fourth questions should be 'Yes,' then answer this: Did any want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiffs contribute proximately to the collision with and injury to the bridge? A. No."

The usual motions were made after verdict for change of answers in the special verdict and for new trial, which were denied, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, from which this appeal was taken.

Charles E. Kremer and H. L. Frink for appellant.

L. D. Eastman and John O. Miller for respondents.

[95] KERWIN, J.—1. It is first insisted by counsel for appellant that the court below erred in overruling defendant's motion for nonsuit made at the close of the plaintiffs' evidence. This contention is based mainly upon the proposition that it appeared from the plaintiffs' showing that the rules of the lighthouse board respecting lights to be maintained upon the bridge under authority of act of Congress were not complied with. It is contended that the regulations of the lighthouse board have the force of a federal statute and must be recognized by the court as the law. It is conceded that the lights prescribed by the lighthouse board were not maintained upon the bridge. Under repeated decisions of the federal courts in admiralty cases it has been ruled that where such lights have not been maintained, and a collision occurs, it is incumbent upon the party in default to show that the absence of such lights not only did not but could not have caused the injury. Smith v. Shakopee, 103 Fed. 240, 44 C. C. A. 1; The Pennsylvania, 19 Wall. 125, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 148; Belden v. Chase, 150 U. S. 674, 699, 14 S. Ct. 264, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 1218; The Martello, 153 U. S. 64, 14 S. Ct. 723, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 637. These decisions of federal courts arising on questions depending upon acts of Congress are entitled to weight with this court, if not controlling.

The case was tried in the court below upon the law as laid down in the foregoing federal decisions, as appears from the able opinion of the trial judge in the record. As will be seen from the foregoing decisions, the federal courts have quite uniformly held to a strict adherence to the requirements of the law in relation to lights and signals, and that no exception can be made unless, as is said, "the breach of regulations could not have been a contributing cause of the disaster." But if the default in obeying regulations be not a contributing cause, then such default will not defeat recovery. The Fannie, 11 Wall. 238, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 114.

There is evidence on the part of the plaintiffs tending to show that the captain in charge of the Carolina, at the time [96] of the collision and for many years prior thereto, was familiar with the harbor and with the lights used on the draw; that lights were exhibited on the bridge at the time of the collision, as usual, sufficient to give warning that the bridge was not open; that at the time of the collision the night was clear, so the bridge, could have been seen from the Carolina coming up the river at a distance of from 400 to 500 feet so as to observe whether the bridge was being opened; that the whistle of the Carolina was not blown as a signal to open the bridge at the proper place, and was not blown at all until immediately before the steamer struck the bridge and not in time so that the bridge could have been opened in time to avoid the collision; that the Carolina collided with the bridge and caused the injury. We think the evidence was ample to carry the case to the jury, therefore the motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled.

2. It is contended that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict at the close of all the evidence. In addition to the point that the absence of lights required by the lighthouse board was ground for a nonsuit, counsel for appellant further insist that upon all the evidence a verdict should have been directed for defendant, and an attempt is made to support this contention on two grounds, which will be briefly referred to.

First, it is said that several witnesses testified that the government lights were much better than those maintained on the bridge, and that the evidence shows that the absence of government lights contributed to bringing about the collision. Second, it is insisted that the evidence on the part of appellant establishes beyond controversy that the whistle on the Carolina was blown as a signal for the opening of the bridge, and that this fact is established by the positive evidence of twelve witnesses, while the evidence on the part of the respondents is negative, therefore there was not sufficient evidence upon the point to carry the question to the jury, but [97] that as matter of law it was established that the whistle was blown.

The first of these propositions as regards government lights we consider the more serious question, but we are convinced that there is sufficient basis in the evidence to warrant the jury in finding that the absence of such lights did not and could not have contributed to the collision.

True, the evidence shows that the government lights were better than those maintained on the bridge; but the evidence also tends to show that the captain in charge of the steamer discovered that the bridge was not open when 200 feet from it, and that he could stop the vessel when going at the rate of two and one-half miles an hour in a distance of 150 feet, and that the steamer was going at the rate of two and one-half miles an hour when within two or three hundred feet of the bridge; that the lookout reported to the captain when about 500 feet from the bridge that it was not open. The mere fact that the government lights were better and would show more plainly the situation is not the important question, but whether the lights maintained upon the bridge, in connection with the captain's knowledge of the situation and the fact that he knew that the bridge was not open in time to have avoided the collision, were sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the absence of the government lights did not and could not have contributed to the collision. Blanchard v. New Jersey Steamboat Co. 59 N. Y. 292; The Wenona, 19 Wall. 41, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 52; The City of Washington, 92 U. S. 31, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 600.

Under the repeated decisions of this court, if there is any credible evidence which, if undisputed, would entitle the jury to find for the plaintiff, a verdict should not be directed for the defendant.

"The simple question is, whether the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff, had it remained undisputed, and giving it the most favorable construction it will legitimately bear, including all reasonable inferences from it, is sufficient to justify [98] a verdict in favor of the plaintiff." Spensley v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 54 Wis. 433, 11 N. W. 894.

Moreover, we have the decision of the learned trial judge overruling the motion for a directed verdict and passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence. Deference is due to his conclusions involving the sufficiency of the evidence to carry the case to the jury. Nolan v. Kroening, 130 Wis. 79, 109 N. W. 963; Murdock v. Beloit, etc. R. Co. 147 Wis. 100, 132 N. W. 979; McCune v. Badger, 126 Wis. 186, 105 N. W. 667; Slam v. Lake Superior Terminal, etc. R. Co. 152 Wis. 426, 140 N. W. 30.

A very vigorous contention is made by counsel for appellant to the point that upon the showing made the jury could not find that the absence of government lights on the bridge in accordance with the regulations of the lighthouse board did not and could not contribute to the collision. We cannot agree with counsel in this position. Under the well established rule of this court, we think the evidence in favor of the plaintiffs, giving it the most favorable construction it will legitimately bear, including all reasonable inferences from it, is sufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiffs upon this question.

The jury were entitled to find on the evidence that the Carolina ran into the bridge without giving any signal, and that the captain had notice that the bridge was not open in time to have avoided the collision, and in fact had all the notice and knowledge that he would have had had the lights required by the lighthouse board been on the bridge. Under such circumstances it is clear that the motion to direct a verdict for defendant was properly overruled. Wisconsin Farm Land Co. v. Bullard, 119 Wis. 320, 96 N. W. 833; Goldman v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 125 Wis. 390, 104 N. W. 80; Lam Yee v. State, 132 Wis.

527, 112 N. W. 425; Ellison v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 143 Wis. 603, 128 N. W. 428; Kersten v. Weichman, 135 Wis. 1, 114 N. W. 499; Zentner v. Oshkosh Gas Light Co. 126 Wis. 196, 105 N. W. 911.

[99] It is further insisted by counsel for appellant that there is no credible evidence before this court sustaining the proposition that the whistle was not blown. Upon this point we think counsel is in error, and we need not repeat the rule of this court before stated on the question of sufficiency of the evidence to carry the case to the jury. The contention of appellant under this head is that respondents' testimony is negative merely, therefore not sufficient to raise a jury question. True, a large number of witnesses who were in position to know testified positively that the whistle was blown, and there is considerable testimony negative in its character on the part of the respondents to the effect that the whistle did not blow. However, there is some testimony on the part of the respondents that cannot be regarded as negative testimony. Edward Berg, who was bridge tender on the night in question, and whose duty it was to watch boats going up and down the river and listen for the blowing of whistles and attend to the lights on the bridge, testified that he was expecting the Carolina in that night, and saw it in the bay just outside the lighthouse and watched it coming in; that he was watching for the whistle, watching for a signal from the Carolina, and watched it until it came up to the bridge and ran into it, and did not hear the boat blow any whistle. He further testified that he never thought the boat was going through the draw, because no whistle was blown.

"I can't tell how fast he was going, as my mind was on the whistle. I was waiting to hear the whistle. . . . If he had been going fast I don't think it would have made any impression in my mind, as my mind was on the whistle. I did not release the lever and unlock the bridge because he did not blow for it, and I did not know he wanted the bridge open until he hit it."

The testimony of Berg, under the well established doctrine of this court, was sufficient to raise a jury question as to whether or not the whistle was blown. Urbanek v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 47 Wis. 59, 65, 1 N. W. 464; Joannes v. Millerd [100] 90 Wis. 68, 62 N. W. 916. The evidence of Berg on the question referred to, though negative in form, was really affirmative in essence. Joannes v. Millerd, supra; Urbanek v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. supra; Sobey v. Thomas, 39 Wis. 317; Shekey v. Eldredge, 71 Wis. 538, 37 N. W. 820; Steinhofel v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 92 Wis. 123, 65 N. W. 852; Brown v. Milwaukee Electric R. etc. Co. 148 Wis. 98, 133 N. W. 589. The case last cited is especially in point on the question now under consideration. The point was whether a gong on a street car was sounded. The plaintiff testified that he was listening for the gong and did not hear it. The motor-man testified that he sounded the gong. The question arose on the charge to the jury, and the court held that the evidence was not purely negative, it appearing that there was nothing to interfere with plaintiff's hearing, and that he was in a position where he could have heard he gong if sounded.

We are convinced that the jury were entitled to find from the evidence that the whistle was not blown.

The jury answered the fifth question in the negative, thereby finding that there was no want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiffs which contributed proximately to the collision with and injury to the bridge. On this question the court below charged the jury, in effect, that the absence of the lights required by the lighthouse board raised a presumption of negligence, and that the law required the jury to find that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence because they did not have those lights, unless the testimony in the case satisfied the jury that the absence of such lights not only might not but could not in any way have contributed to the collision, and that unless they were satisfied to a reasonable certainty from the evidence that the absence of lights which the law required could not have contributed to the collision, they must answer the fifth question in the affirmative. No objection was made to the form of the verdict and no request made to submit any additional questions, and [101] no exception was taken to the charge. We are satisfied that the answers to the questions submitted in the special verdict are supported by the evidence, and that no error was committed upon the trial.

BY THE COURT.—The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Liability for Injury to Bridge Caused by Vessel.

In General, 938.

Injuries Caused by Vessel in Tow, 940.

Defenses, 940.

In General.

It is apparently well settled that if a public corporation is put to expense by the act of a third person for the repair of a bridge, it may maintain an action against him for the recovery of the amount expended. 4 R. C. L. tit. Bridges, p. 216. It has also been held that where a bridge erected by lawful authority but constituting private property, is injured by the negligent act of another, its owners have a right of action against the person causing the injury. Bucki v. Cone, 25 Fla. 1, 6 So. 160; Cue v. Breeland, 78 Miss. 864, 29 So. 850.

Hence where a bridge is injured by a vessel through the negligent act of those in charge of her an action to recover damages resulting from the injury may be brought by the owners of the bridge. Chico Bridge Co. v. Sacramento Transp. Co. 123 Cal. 178, 55 Pac. 780; Chicago v. The Queen City, 17 Ill. App. 203 (holding that attachment proceeding for injuries to bridge caused by vessel could be maintained against vessel navigating waters of state under statute giving lien on vessels of that class for damages for injuries caused by them, although vessel had its home port in another state); Cumberland County v. Central Wharf Steam Tow-Boat Co. 90 Me. 95, 37 Atl. 867, 60 Am. St. Rep. 246; Highway Com'rs v. Chaffee, 1 Mich. N. P. 147 (holding that commissioners of highways were proper parties to bring suit for injuries to public bridge); Multnomah County v. Willamette Towing Co. 49 Ore. 204, 89 Pac. 389; West v. Martin, 51 Wash. 85, 97 Pac. 1102, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 324, affirmed 222 U. S. 191, 32 S. Ct. 42, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 159, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 592, and overruling on rehearing 47 Wash. 417, 92 Pac. 334; Cataragui Bridge Co. v. Holcomb, 21 U. C. Q. B. 273. And see the reported case. See also Steam Canal Boat Tempest v. Lucas County, 7 Ohio Cir. Dec. 137, 13 Ohio Cir. Ct. 263 (holding that under statute giving right of action against person injuring bridge, boat causing injuries to bridge could be sued by name); Menasha v. The Portage, 26 Wis. 534 (holding that action for injury to bridge within corporate limits of village by vessel was properly brought by town). In Highway Com'rs v. Chaffee, supra, the court, in charging the jury as to the nature of the liability for an injury to a bridge caused by a vessel, said: "The common-law rule is to be here strictly applied, 'whoever, to the injury of another, neglects a duty which he ought to perform by law, becomes liable to compensate the injury or damage.' The test is this: in order to avoid doing a damage to the property of another, a person is bound in law to such care in the use of his own property, as a prudent man would employ, under similar circumstances, if he were himself the owner of the property exposed to damage. . . . The time for a party to exercise care and skill is before he puts himself in the very road of casualty. If he fails to do so, it is of no consequence, in the eye of the law, whether he merely misjudges or is obstinately reckless; his act is not careful, and he is to abide the consequence."

In Cataragui Bridge Co. v. Holcomb, 21 U. C. Q. B. 273, it was held that a case of prima facie negligence against the owners of a steamer was made out by proof that the vessel was discovered one morning to have been driven against a bridge. In Chico Bridge Co. v. Sacramento Transp. Co. 123 Cal. 178, 55 Pac. 780, it appeared that a toll bridge was injured by a collision therewith of the defendant's barge. In an action by the owner of the bridge to recover damages for the injuries, it was held that the evidence of the plaintiff made a prima facie case of negligence and that the finding as to the negligence of the defendant was supported by the evidence as a whole. The court said: "The evidence showed that for several years the river was navigated at all stages of water, passing the bridge once a week, with but a single slight injury to the bridge prior to the one in question, and a few times afterward touching or rubbing it slightly, and in addition there was expert evidence that it could at all times be navigated safely. This, we think, was quite sufficient to justify the court in denying the motion for a nonsuit, and to throw the burden of showing due care upon the defendant. The court found that the injury was caused by defendant's negligence, and appellant contends that said finding is not justified by the evidence. It is true the defendant's agents in charge of the boats, while showing that they had been for many years engaged in navigating the river, and regularly passing the bridge at all stages of water, testified that on the occasion in question they encountered a cross-current that they had never met before or since, and attributed the accident to that current and denied negligence. The credibility to be given these witnesses, and the weight to which their testimony was entitled, it was the province of the trial court to determine; and the finding, as well as the opinion of the court to which we have referred, shows that the court gave it no credence whatever. We cannot, therefore, set aside said finding."

In West v. Martin, 51 Wash. 85, 97 Pac. 1102, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 324, affirmed in 222 U. S. 191, 32 S. Ct. 42, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 159, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 592, and overruling on rehearing 47 Wash. 417, 92 Pac. 334, it was held that the measure of damages recoverable for injuries to a bridge caused by a vessel was the actual cost of repairing together with a reasonable sum for the loss of net profits during the time the bridge could not be used. And in Highway Com'rs v. Chaffee, 1 Mich. N. P. 147, it was held that the measure of damages recoverable for injuries to a bridge by a vessel was the amount required to repair the injury together with such extra expenses as were necessarily incurred in consequence thereof while making the repairs. But it was held that extra expenses incurred because of the plaintiff's delay in repairing the bridge could not be recovered.

For a discussion of the admiralty jurisdiction of an action to recover damages for injuries to a bridge, see the note to Cleveland Terminal, etc. R. Co. v. Cleveland Steamship Co. 13 Ann. Cas. 1215.

Injuries Caused by Vessel in Tow.

It may be stated as a general rule that where a vessel which is in tow and operating under the control of a tug strikes a bridge and injures it by reason of the negligence of those having charge of the tug, the owners of the tug may be required to respond in damages for the injury. See the cases cited throughout this subdivision.

In Cumberland County v. Central Wharf Steam Tow-Boat Co. 90 Me. 95, 37 Atl. 867, 60 Am. St. Rep. 246, it appeared that a schooner while being towed through the draw of a bridge veered to one side and struck and injured the bridge. The sheer of the vessel was caused by a movement of the helm in obedience to the orders of the person in charge of the towing operation. It was held that the owner of the tug was liable for the injury, as it was as to third parties, the active directing agent controlling the movements of the vessel it was undertaking to tow; and that the fact that the persons in charge of the schooner also were at fault and that a suit was pending against them to recover damages for the same injury, did not exempt from liability the owner of the tug.

In Multnomah County v. Willamette Towing Co. 49 Ore. 204, 89 Pac. 389, an action was brought against a towing company, both the captain and the pilot of a tug boat, and the charterer of a steamer to recover damages for injuries to a bridge owned by the plaintiff caused by a collision therewith by the steamer while she was being assisted by the tug. In determining the liability of the different defendants the court said: "The complaint charges, in substance, that it was negligence for the defendants to attempt to move the Almond Branch through the harbor of Portland at the then stage of the water with only one towboat, and that they were negligent in the management of the vessel after the voyage was commenced, and such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff's bridge. If the voyage was negligent, or such as reasonable prudent men, familiar with river navigation, would not have undertaken, and such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, then all persons controlling or participating in such voyage would be jointly and severally liable, and it would be no defense for one joint tortfeasor that another person was also liable. If, however, the voyage was not negligent, and the accident to the bridge was caused by negligence in the navigation after the voyage was begun, the party or parties so negligent would alone be liable. There was no evidence, so far as we can ascertain, connecting the lumber company with any of the negligent acts charged. It was the charterer or hirer of the Almond Branch, but did not have command, possession or control of the vessel, so far as its management or navigation were concerned, except to direct where it should receive its cargo. The vessel was under the sole charge and command of the master employed by and who represented the owners, and not the charterers. By the terms of the charter party, the owners agreed to let, and the lumber company to hire, the vessel 'with a full complement of officers, seamen, engineers and firemen, and in every way fitted for the service to trade' between such ports as the charterer might direct for a period of from three to nine calendar months at the charterer's option; the cargo to be taken or discharged at any dock or wharf the charterer might direct where the vessel could lie safely afloat. The owners agreed to provide and pay for all provisions, the wages of the captain, officers and crew, insurance, engine room stores, and to maintain the vessel in a thoroughly effective state in hull and machinery for service, and that the captain employed by the owner should be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regarded agency and other arrangements, and should prosecute his voyages with the utmost dispatch. The charterer was to provide and pay for fuel, port charges, expenses of loading, and the like, and ten shillings per gross ton register per calendar month. Such a charter party is a mere contract of affreightment, and not a demise of the vessel, and the charterer is not liable for the acts and conduct of the officers and crew in the management of the vessel." It also appeared in the case last cited that the tug was lashed to the steamer for steering purposes only and was under orders from the bridge of the steamer, the steamer proceeding under its own steam, when it struck the bridge belonging to the plaintiff. It was held that the captain and owners of the tug were not liable for the act of the steamer in injuring the bridge.

Defenses.

Negligence of the persons having in charge the care and navigation of a vessel is an indispensable factor in determining the liability for injuries to a bridge caused by the vessel. St. Louis, etc. Packet Co. v. Keokuk, etc.

Bridge Co. 31 Fed. 755; Chico Bridge Co. v. Sacramento Transp. Co. 123 Cal. 178, 55 Pac. 780; New Westminster v. Steamship Maagen, 18 British Columbia 441. In St. Louis, etc. Packet Co. v. Keokuk, etc. Bridge Co. supra, in discussing the degree of care required of a person in charge of a vessel to escape liability for injuries to a bridge caused by the vessel, the court said: "The pilot in charge of the boat was not required to exercise the highest degree of care and skill, or even extraordinary care and skill. All that his duty demanded was that he should use ordinary skill and care; and the jury must determine whether or not, in attempting to pass the draw as he did, heading down the river, he came up to this requirement."

So where the negligence of the persons in charge of the bridge is a contributing factor to the accident, an action to recover damages for injuries to the bridge cannot be maintained. Batchelder v. Hecla Transp. Co. 178 Ill. App. 105; New Westminster v. Steamship Maagen, 18 British Columbia 441. Thus in the case last cited, in discussing the liability arising from injuries to a bridge resulting from a collision therewith by a vessel because of the absence of lights on the bridge, the court said: "Quite apart from any statutory regulations as to lights, those who place obstructions across navigable waters, even although lawfully authorized to do so, cannot complain if in the carrying out of their powers damage is done to their works by the fact that a collision occurs owing to a prudent navigator, proceeding with due care, being unable at a crucial moment, because of the absence of lights, to define his exact position in relation to such obstruction." In Batchelder v. Hecla Transp. Co. supra, it appeared that a steamer approaching a railroad draw bridge gave the proper signal for the bridge to open, and the signal was heard and understood by those in control of the bridge, but nothing occurred to indicate that the bridge would not open in time to permit the steamer to pass, nor was any signal given that the bridge would not open, it not being provided with any means for giving the signal, although similar bridges located nearby were equipped for that purpose. When the master of the steamer saw that the bridge would not open, it was too late to avert a collision with and consequent injury to it. The appellate court in affirming a finding against the owner of the bridge held that the common-law rules of negligence would govern and that the negligence of the plaintiff barred a recovery of damages for the injuries to its bridge.

But the fact that a bridge does not comply with some statutory requirement is no bar to an action by the owners thereof to recover damages for injuries to it caused by a vessel, where the noncompliance with the statute is not a contributing cause of the accident. Cumberland County v. Central Wharf Steam Tow-Boat Co. 90 Me. 95, 37 Atl. 867, 60 Am. St. Rep. 246. And see the reported case. Thus in Cumberland County v. Central Wharf Steam Tow-Boat Co. supra, it was held that the fact that the draw of a bridge was somewhat less than the width required by the statute under the authority of which the bridge was built, was no bar to a recovery for injuries to the bridge caused by the negligence of a vessel, where the failure to comply with the statute did not contribute to the injury.

In Toll Bridge Co. v. Langrell, 47 Conn. 228, it appeared that a vessel struck the pier of a bridge which for twenty-five years had been unprotected by piles and during that time had sustained "a suitable and convenient draw" leaving a "free and easy passage" for vessels, and had neither caused nor received injury. It was held that the failure to have the pier protected by piles could not as a matter of law be declared to be a want of ordinary care so as to require the setting aside of a judgment recovered for injuries to the bridge.

In Toll Bridge Co. v. Betsworth, 30 Conn. 380, a recovery of damages for injuries to a draw bridge caused by a sailing vessel in passing through it, was sought on the ground of the violation of a statute requiring sailing vessels to be drawn through the draw of a bridge without the aid of their sails. Evidence was held to be admissible to show that the owners of the draw bridge by their acts extending over a period of years had given a general license to all navigators to pass their draw with sails, since they could waive the statute in so far as it was intended for their benefit.

NORDLUND ET AL.

DAHLGREN.

Minnesota Supreme Court—July 23, 1915.

130 Minn. 462; 153 N. W. 876.

Homestead — Rights of Surviving Spouse.

The rights of the surviving spouse in the homestead vest and become absolute at the death of the deceased spouse. The statutory provisions for setting it apart to him merely prescribe the procedure for segregating it from the remainder of the estate, and the administrator does not become entitled to possession of the homestead although it has not been so set apart. The homestead of Carrie Walberg, at her death, descended to her husband for the term of his natural life, and his possession thereof was as such tenant for life and not as administrator.

Life Estates — Right of Life Tenant to Recover for Taxes and Improvements.

Where the surviving spouse is tenant for life of the homestead of the deceased spouse and also administrator of her estate, he cannot charge the estate with taxes paid by him upon the homestead nor with the value of improvements placed by him thereon.

[See note at end of this case.]

Homestead — Death of Spouse — Title of Children.

The fee of the homestead vested in the children subject only to the life estate of the surviving husband, and the title of the children to such remainder in fee cannot be waived, impaired or burdened by the surviving husband either as life tenant or as administrator.

Executors and Administrators — Accounting — Claims Not Allowed by Probate Court.

Under chapter 265, Laws of 1899, claims theretofore paid by the administrator without having been allowed by the probate court, may be credited to him in his final account upon proof that such claims were just and existing demands against the estate at the time of payment.

Selection of Personalty on Behalf of Surviving Spouse.

The right of the surviving spouse to select personal property to the value of $500, if not exercised in his lifetime, may be exercised by his administrator.

Accounting — Rents and Profits of Land.

Where the administrator takes possession of the real estate he must account for the rents and profits received therefrom, and if the amount received cannot be otherwise determined, the court may charge him with the rental value of the land.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Marshall county: WATTS, Judge.

Matter of estate of Carrie Walberg, deceased. From judgment adjusting account of Frank E. Dahlgren, representative, Peter Nordlund et al., objectors, appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

E. O. Hagen and A. N. Eckstrom for appellants.

Martin O'Brien, Julius J. Olson and Rasmus Hage for respondent.

[464] TAYLOR, C.—Carrie Walberg died intestate May 8, 1892, possessed of 600 acres of land and a quantity of personal property, and left her surviving, her husband, John O.

Walberg, and six small children. At the time of her death and for several years prior thereto, the family resided upon an 80-acre tract of the land owned by her and known as the "home 80;" and after her death her husband continued to reside thereon until his own death in 1910. On June 29, 1892, John O. Walberg was appointed and duly qualified as administrator of his wife's estate; and an order was made by the probate court limiting the time for filing claims and allowing the administrator 18 months in which to settle the estate. In November 29, 1892, Walberg filed an inventory and an appraisal was duly made. On December 31, 1892, claims were allowed aggregating the sum of $133.32. On January 6, 1893, pursuant to his application therefor, license was granted to Walberg to sell the personal property other than the household goods. In December, 1893, the time in which to settle the estate was extended for a period of 12 months, and in December, 1894, it was again extended for an additional 12 months. No further action was taken by the probate court until after Walberg's death, and he never filed any account, nor made any report of his doings as administrator. On January 6, 1893, Walberg by deed conveyed to the children his interest in all the lands of which Carrie Walberg died seized except the home 80. Notwithstanding this conveyance, he occupied and used all the lands, as if he were the absolute owner thereof, from the death of Carrie Walberg until his own death, a period of nearly 18 years. Much of this land was state school land which had been purchased from the state under contracts giving her a long term of years in which to pay therefor. Walberg made improvements upon the land, paid the taxes thereon, and made the payments to the state required by the contracts. About 18 months after the death of Carrie Walberg, John O. Walberg remarried and with his second wife resided upon the "home 80" until his death on February 4, 1910. There are several children, issue of the second marriage, and Walberg left a will giving all his property to his widow. After his death, the probate court appointed Frank E. [465] Dahlgren as representative of his estate, and Peter Nordlund as administrator de bonis non of the estate of Carrie Walberg. Dahlgren as such representative prepared and filed the final account of John O. Walberg as administrator of the estate of Carrie Walberg. Nordlund as administrator de bonis non of the estate of Carrie Walberg, and the children of Carrie Walberg, filed objections thereto. The probate court modified the account in some particulars and allowed it as modified. The administrator de bonis non and the children of Carrie Walberg appealed to the district court. That court modified the account, as allowed by the probate court, in several particulars, and approved and allowed it as so modified. A further appeal brings the matter before this court.

The buildings upon the homestead during the lifetime of Carrie Walberg were small log structures of little value. At various times after her death, Walberg erected large and substantial buildings. In the final account, the court credited Walberg with the value of the improvements made upon the real estate and with the amount of taxes paid thereon; and included in the amount allowed for improvements the value of the improvements made upon the homestead, and in the amount allowed for taxes, the taxes paid upon the homestead.

Appellants contend that the court erred in allowing Walberg for taxes paid and improvements made upon the homestead; that as tenant for life it was his duty to pay the taxes himself; and that if he chose to make improvements thereon he could not burden either the remaindermen or the estate with the expense thereof.

It is well settled that a tenant for life of real estate must pay the taxes thereon; and that as a general rule he cannot recover for improvements made while holding such life estate. Smalley v. Isaacson, 40 Minn. 450, 42 N. W. 352; Wilson v. Proctor, 28 Minn. 13, 8 N. W. 830; St. Paul Trust Co. v. Mintzer, 65 Minn. 124, 67 N. W. 657, 32 L.R.A. 756, 60 Am. St. Rep. 444; Porter v. Osmun, 3 Ann. Cas. 687, and cases cited in note appended thereto [135 Mich. 361, 97 N. W. 756, 98 N. W. 859]; Missouri Central Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. Eveler, Ann. Cas. 1913A 486, and cases cited in note at page 489 [237 Mo. 679, 141 S. W. 877]; Frederick v. Frederick, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 514, and cases cited in note appended thereto [31 Ky. L. Rep. [466] 583, 102 S. W. 858]. Respondent does not seriously question this rule, but contends that Walberg occupied the homestead as administrator and not as tenant for life. He contends that the estate in the homestead given the surviving spouse by the statute does not vest in such surviving spouse until he has made an application to the probate court to have such homestead set apart to him and the court has made an order setting it apart; and that, as Walberg never made any such application and the court never made any such order, Walberg never possessed a life estate in the homestead. He further contends that the statute authorizing the administrator to take possession of the real estate and to receive the rents and profits thereof until the estate is settled, gives him the right to the possession of the homestead until it has been set apart to the surviving spouse by the probate court. None of these propositions can be sustained. The statute in force at the death of Carrie Walberg (G. S. 1894, § 4470) provided:

"The homestead of the deceased, as such homestead is or may be defined by the statute relating to homestead exemptions, shall descend, free from any testamentary devise or other disposition to which the surviving husband or wife shall not have assented in writing, and free from all debts or claims upon the estate of the deceased as follows: 1. . . . 2. If there be a child or the issue of any deceased child living and a surviving husband or wife, to such husband or wife during the term of his or her natural life, remainder to the child or children and the issue of any deceased child by right of representation."

At the death of Carrie Walberg, a life estate in the homestead vested in her husband by virtue of this statute without any act on his part or on the part of the probate court. Wilson v. Proctor, 28 Minn. 13, 8 N. W. 830; Holbrook v. Wightman, 31 Minn. 168, 17 N. W. 280, McCarthy v. Van Der Mey, 42 Minn. 189, 44 N. W. 53.

Respondent bases his contention that Walberg occupied the land as administrator upon sections 4493-4496, G. S. 1894. So far as these sections relate to the homestead, we think they merely provide a procedure for segregating the homestead from the other property of the [467] estate. See Sammons v. Higbie, 103 Minn. 448, 115 N. W. 265, and Stromberg v. Stromberg, 119 Minn. 325, 138 N. W. 428. The homestead descends "free from all debts or claims upon the estate." Neither the land nor the rents or profits derived from the land can be used for the purpose of satisfying claims against the estate. For administration purposes, it is not a part of the estate. It descends to the surviving spouse for the term of his natural life, and he, not the administrator, is entitled to the possession of it and to the rents and profits derived from it. Eckstein v. Radl, 72 Minn. 95, 75 N. W. 112. But respondent argues in effect that Walberg, by failing to have the homestead set apart to him, waived his right to a life estate therein. On the death of Carrie Walberg, the title in fee to her homestead vested in her children, subject only to the life estate of her surviving husband, and no waiver or other act of his could impair the rights secured to the children by the statute. He could make such disposition of his life term as he saw fit, but he could not convert the homestead into assets of the estate, nor subject the fee which had vested in the children to any burdens whatever. Mintzer v. St. Paul Trust Co. 45 Minn. 323, at the bottom of page 326, 47 N. W. 973. It follows that the court erred in crediting Walberg's account with the amount of taxes paid upon the homestead and with the value of the betterments placed thereon. Of course he was entitled to the rents and profits received.

from the homestead and cannot be charged therewith.

As there must be a new trial for the error above mentioned, we shall make only a brief reference to a few of the other questions which have been raised.

The court credited Walberg's account with certain amounts claimed to have been paid by him to creditors of Carrie Walberg upon claims which had not been presented to, or allowed by, the probate court. Chapter 265, p. 308, Laws of 1899, authorized the court to allow such items upon satisfactory proof that the "claims were just and existing demands against said estate at the time of payment." Although this statute was repealed by the revised laws of 1905, such repeal did not affect payments ratified and validated by the statute (section 5505, R. L. 1905), and the court had authority to make the [468] allowance in question. In view of a new trial, we refrain from discussing the evidence tending to establish such claims, and the payment thereof, further than to say that the trial court does not appear to have exceeded its judicial discretion in receiving in evidence the several vouchers offered by respondent.

The statute gave Walberg, as surviving husband, personal property of his wife to the value of $500 to be selected by him. He made no such selection in his lifetime. His administrator asked to have this amount credited upon his final account and the court allowed the claim. As Mrs. Walberg left sufficient personal property to satisfy this claim, the ruling was correct. Sammons v. Higbie, 103 Minn. 448, 115 N. W. 265; Stromberg v. Stromberg, 119 Minn. 325, 138 N. W. 428.

It is not questioned that Walberg had possession of the land, other than the homestead, as administrator, and he was therefore properly chargeable with the rents and profits received therefrom, subject to an equitable deduction for the betterments placed thereon. He appears to have kept no records or accounts, however, and, for the lack of any other means of determining the profits received from the land, the court took the rental value thereof as the basis for determining the amount to be charged against him. In the absence of evidence to show the actual profits, the method adopted by the court was proper. But the court proceeded upon the erroneous theory that the homestead was a part of the property which Walberg was handling as administrator, and both the amount charged against him for the use of the land, and the amount allowed him as compensation for his services, were probably affected by this error.

As both the amount to be charged against him for use of the land, and the amount to be credited to him as compensation for his services, will be determined anew from the evidence submitted at the second trial, and the value of the use of the homestead will be excluded from one amount, and the value of Walberg's services in managing and operating it from the other, it is not necessary to determine whether the account as it now stands allows him an excessive amount for such services as contended by appellants.

Order reversed.

NOTE.

In the reported case the court adopts the rule that a tenant for life of real estate must pay the taxes thereon and is not entitled to credit for improvements made during the continuance of the estate. The court applies this rule as against a surviving husband who is by statute vested with a life tenancy in the homestead left by his wife and who also acts as administrator of his wife's estate.

The right of a life tenant to compensation for improvements is fully discussed in the notes to Porter v. Osmun, 3 Ann. Cas. 687, and Missouri Cent. Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. Eveler, Ann. Cas. 1913A 486. As to the duty of a tenant for life to pay taxes, see the notes to Cedar Rapids First Congregational Church v. Terry, 114 Am. St. Rep. 443, and Peak v. Peak, 137 Am. St. Rep. 638, 659.

DUNLAP ET AL.

Washington Supreme Court—November 5, 1915.

87 Wash. 648; 152 Pac. 532.

Animals — Wild Animals — "Game."

Animals ferae naturae, such as deer, ducks, pheasants, and swans, are denominated "game."

Game — Title in State.

Title to game belongs to the state in its sovereign capacity, in trust for the use and benefit of its people, which, through its legislature, has the right to control the killing, taking, and use of game, so long as the rights guaranteed either by the state or Federal Constitution are not encroached upon.

[See note at end of this case.]

Wild Animals — Right of Property.

While animals ferae naturae belong to the state, yet, when they are reclaimed by the art and power of man, they are the subject of a qualified right of property, defeasible if they return to their wild state.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Animals ferae naturae, if reclaimed and kept in inclosed grounds, are property, which will pass to the executors and administrators of the one who reclaimed them.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Animals ferae naturae, while they are reclaimed, are the subject of larceny.

[See note at end of this case.]

Statutes — Construction — Retroactive Effect.

A statute will not be given a retroactive effect, unless by its terms it is clearly shown that that was the legislative intent.

Animals — Wild Animals — Right of Property.

Game Code (Laws 1913, c. 120), § 21, providing that no person shall acquire any property in, or subject to his control, any of the game birds or animals mentioned in the act, but that they shall always remain the property of the state, and section 33, providing that no person shall have in possession or under control at any time any deer, fawn, etc., if retroactive in operation as against one who had reclaimed certain deer kept on an inclosed area on his farm, and certain swans cared for as domestic fowls, and wood ducks, pheasants, etc., kept in inclosed runways in his poultry yard, violated Const. Wash. art. 1, § 3, and Const. U. S. Amend. 14 (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416), since he had such a property right in them that it could not be taken away without due process of law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Laws 1897, p. 82, § 1, and Laws 1899, p. 277, § 1, making it unlawful for anyone at a specified season to take or destroy any deer, Laws 1901, p. 279, §§ 1, 2, limiting the number of deer that may be killed, Laws 1903, p. 94, § 1, making it unlawful for any person at a certain season to take or "possess" any deer, Laws 1906, p. 277, providing for licenses, and Laws 1911, p. 396, making it unlawful to take or possess any deer, did not cover the possession of deer which were reclaimed and kept in an inclosure.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Plaintiff, having a property right in the deer which he kept in an inclosure, if necessary in the care and management of the herd, might kill one of them without offending the law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where plaintiff in an action to establish his property rights in certain swans, wood ducks, pheasants, etc., which he had cared for as domestic fowl, or kept in inclosed runways in his poultry yard, as against interference by the game warden and the prosecuting attorney, a decree giving him the ownership and right to dispose of them in such manner as he saw fit was too broad, since thereunder he would have the right to kill and sell them during the closed season, and so interfere with the enforcement of the game laws of the state, and since the state, for the protection of game birds, has the right to prohibit the killing and disposing of reclaimed game during the closed season.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane county: WEBSTER, Judge.

Action by Jay P. Graves, plaintiff, against F. G. Dunlap et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. MODIFIED.

John M. Gleeson for appellants.

Graves, Kizer & Graves for respondent.

[649] MAIN, J.—The purpose of this action was to establish the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of certain game animals and birds, and to restrain the defendants, the game warden, and the prosecuting attorney of Spokane county, from interfering with, or disturbing the plaintiff's ownership and right to the possession of, the animals and birds in question. After the issues were framed, the cause was tried to the court sitting without a jury, and resulted in a judgment sustaining the plaintiff's right to ownership and possession, and restraining the defendants from beginning or prosecuting any criminal action against the plaintiff on account of his possession of the wild animals and birds referred to. From this judgment, the defendants appeal.

The facts are not in dispute, and are, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff, during the year 1901, and prior thereto, and at the present time, owns a farm consisting of several hundred acres of land, a few miles north of the city of Spokane. Upon this farm there has been kept a herd of dairy cattle. During the winter of 1901, a doe with a broken leg [650] came into the herd of cattle upon the farm. This doe, by the respondent, or by the employees upon his farm, was placed in a box stall in the barn and taken care of until she recovered, when she was put into an enclosure. The following season a buck was given to the respondent by one of the men employed by him. To these deer and their increase the respondent occasionally added from outside herds. Because inbreeding causes a herd to deteriorate, on several occasions bucks were exchanged from the herd for bucks in city parks of Spokane and Tacoma.

During the early years of the herd and on two occasions, does from without the state were given to the respondent by friends. The doe and buck first acquired are still living. These, with the increase, and such bucks as have been procured by exchange, and their increase, made up a herd of about twenty deer in the fall of the year 1913. This herd is kept on the respondent's farm in an enclosure containing fifteen or twenty acres, which is surrounded by a high woven wire fence to which entry can only be gained by gates. During the summer there is sufficient feed in the enclosure to sustain the deer, but in the winter it is necessary to feed them. Workmen on the farm look after them all the year round, and give them the attention that is given to cattle and other animals. The deer are not permitted to be without the enclosure.

The respondent also has certain fowls, including swans, wood ducks, pheasants, etc. Eight of the swans are birds obtained in the year 1902, with their increase. Four of the swans were purchased in the state of Massachusetts for breeding purposes, in the year 1913. These swans have their nesting places around the lakes on the farm, and are fed and taken care of as purely domestic fowls. The remainder of the fowls are kept in enclosed or covered runways in the respondent's poultry yards. These were purchased in various parts of the United States and Canada. For one pair of Reeves pheasants, $85 was paid. For one pair of Amherst [651] pheasants, about $100 was paid. The fowls are not used for food nor killed, and none have been sold, though the respondent has given away one or two pairs of pheasants for breeding purposes.

The appellants claim that the respondent has no right to keep the deer and the fowls in the enclosure, and that both the deer and the fowls are subject to the same regulation by the legislature as is the wild game of the state. The respondent claims that he has a property right in the deer and the fowls, and that therefore it cannot be taken away by act of the legislature without due compensation being first made. The question, therefore, is, whether the respondent had acquired a property right in the deer and birds which he was entitled to have protected.

Animals ferae naturae are known by the denomination of game. 1 Cooley, Blackstone (4th ed.), p. 758. The respondent's deer and fowls come within the term game, unless, by the fact of their reclamation and confinement, there has been acquired a property right therein which is not recognized in wild game. Without reviewing the early common law upon the subject of game, it may be said that the recognized doctrine is that the title to game belongs to the state in its sovereign capacity, and that the state holds this title in trust for the use and benefit of the people of the state. The state, through its legislature, has the right to control for the common good the killing, taking and use of game, so long as the rights guaranteed either by the state or Federal constitution are not encroached upon. In Cawsey v. Brickley, 82 Wash. 653, 144 Pac. 938, it was said:

"Under the common law of England all property right in animals ferae naturae was in the sovereign for the use and benefit of the people. The killing, taking and use of game was subject to absolute governmental control for the common good. This absolute power to control and regulate was vested in the colonial governments as a part of the common law. It passed with the title to game to the several states as an incident of their sovereignty and was retained by the [652] states for the use and benefit of the people of the states, subject only to any applicable provisions of the Federal constitution."

See also Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793. Many other decisions to the same effect might be cited; but the multiplication of authorities upon this question is hardly necessary.

While animals ferae naturae belong to the state, as indicated, yet, when they are reclaimed by the art and power of man, they are the subject of property, and a property right thereto may be acquired. In 2 Cooley, Torts (3d ed.), p. 838, the author says:

"There is no property in wild animals until they have been subjected to the control of man. If one secures and tames them, they are his property; if he does not tame them, they are still his so long as they are kept confined and under his control."

In 2 Kent, Commentaries (14th ed.), p. *348, upon the same question, the author observes:

"Animals ferae naturae, so long as they are reclaimed by the art and power of man, are also the subject of a qualified property; but when they are abandoned, or escape, and return to their natural liberty and ferocity, without the animus revertendi, the property in them ceases. While this qualified property continues, it is as much under protection of law as any other property, and every invasion of it is redressed in the same manner."

See also to the same effect 1 Cooley, Blackstone (4th ed.), p. 743.

It will be noticed from the excerpt quoted from Kent that the author uses the term "qualified property." Many of the decisions which discuss the question use the same term. The appellants contend that, since the property right is a qualified one, the state, in the exercise of its police power, can take it away with impunity. But the qualified property referred to is a property right which is defeasible upon a condition subsequent which may or may not happen. This condition [653] is that, if the animals return to their wild state, the property right ceases. That the property right is a defeasible one is recognized by Blackstone. In 1 Cooley, Blackstone (4th ed.), p. 744, referring to this subject it is said:

"In all these creatures, reclaimed from the wilderness of their nature, the property is not absolute but defeasible: a property that may be destroyed if they resume their ancient wildness and are found at large. For if the pheasants escape from the mew, or the fishes from the trunk, and are seen wandering at large in their proper element, they become ferae naturae again; and are free and open to the first occupant that hath ability to seize them. But while they thus continue my qualified or defeasible property, they are as much under the protection of the law, as if they were absolutely and indefeasibly mine; and an action will lie against any man that detains them from me, or unlawfully destroys them."

Animals ferae naturae, if reclaimed and kept in enclosed ground, are property which will pass to the executors and administrators of a deceased person. In Dieterich v. Fargo, 194 N. Y. 359, 87 N. E. 618, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 696, quoting with approval from 1 Halsbury's Laws of England, § 799, it was said:

"Deer, though strictly speaking ferae naturae, if reclaimed and kept in inclosed ground, are the subject of property, pass to the executors and are liable to be taken in distress."

Animals ferae naturae are also, while they are reclaimed, the subject of larceny. In State v. Shaw, 67 Ohio St. 157, 65 N. E. 875, 60 L.R.A. 481, it is said:

"To acquire a property right in animals ferae naturae, the pursuer must bring them into his power and control and so maintain his control as to show that he does not intend to abandon them again to the world at large. When he has confined them within his own private enclosure where he may subject them to his own use at his pleasure, and maintains reasonable precautions to prevent escape, they are so impressed with his proprietorship that a felonious taking of them from his enclosure, whether trap, cage, park, net, or whatever it may be, will be larceny."

[654] It would seem that if wild animals when reclaimed will pass to the executors or administrators of a deceased person, or may be the subject of larceny, that the possessor of such animals would have such a right or title thereto that it could not be taken away without due compensation first made. If such property right can be taken away by the act of the legislature, then it does not have the same protection of the law as any other property, which both Kent and Blackstone say it is entitled to.

The appellant cites the case of Cawsey v. Brickey, 82 Wash. 653, 144 Pac. 938, as sustaining his contention that the respondent had only a qualified property in the deer and fowls, and that such a property right could be destroyed by the legislature at any time. In that case, the court was considering the status of game which had not been reclaimed.

The question whether the legislature had the power to destroy the property right which exists in reclaimed game animals was not before the court and was not considered in the opinion.

At the legislative session for the year 1913, there was passed what is known as the game code, Laws of 1913, ch. 120, p. 356 (3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 5395-1 et seq.). Section 21 (3 Id. § 5395-21) of this code provides, that no person shall at any time or in any manner acquire any property in, or subject to his dominion or control, any of the game birds, game animals or game fish mentioned in the act, but that such game animals, fish and birds shall always and under all circumstances remain the property of the state.

Section 33 provides:

"No person shall, within the state of Washington, hunt, catch, take, kill, ship, convey or cause to be shipped or transported by common or private carrier, to any person, either within or without the state, purchase, expose for sale, have in possession with intent to sell, sell to any person or have in possession or under control at any time, any elk, moose, caribou, deer, fawn, mountain sheep or mountain goat, [655] or any part thereof, including the hides, horns or hoofs except as herein provided." 3 Id. § 5395-33.

It will be noticed that this statute provides that no person shall "have in possession or under control at any time" any of the wild animals therein mentioned. It was under this statute that the appellants claimed that the respondent was unlawfully confining the deer and fowls mentioned. It may well be doubted whether, when all of the provisions of the act are considered, that it was intended by the legislature that it should be retroactive in the sense that it should cover game animals and birds reclaimed prior to its passage, and confined as were those of the respondent. It is a rule of construction that a statute will not be given a retroactive effect unless by its terms it is shown clearly that that was the legislative intent. State v. Whittlesey, 17 Wash. 447, 50 Pac. 119; Rogers v. Trumbull, 32 Wash. 211, 73 Pac. 381; Fowler v. Fairchild, 3 Wash. 747, 29 Pac. 351. But if the statute were to be given a retroactive construction, it is plain that the respondent had acquired such a property right in the deer and fowls that it could not be taken away without due process of law, as provided in article 1, § 3 of the constitution of this state, and the fourteenth amendment to the Federal constitution (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416).

But the appellants contend that, under the statutes of this state as they existed in 1901, and subsequent thereto, the respondent's possession of the deer and fowls has been at all times wrongful, and that therefore he could acquire no property right therein. By the Laws of 1897, p. 82, it was made unlawful for any person at a specified season of the year to "hunt, pursue, take, kill, injure or destroy any deer." By the Laws of 1899, p. 277, the same language is used in the legislative enactment passed at that session. By the Laws of 1901, p. 279, while the number of deer that may be killed is limited, the language of the previous statutes relative to hunting, killing, etc., is not amended. By the Laws of 1903, it was made unlawful for any person within the [656] state of Washington, at any time between the 15th day of December and the 15th day of September of the following year, to "hunt, pursue, take, kill, injure, destroy, or possess any deer" (Laws of 1903, p. 94, ch. 71, § 1). In this statute the term "possess" appears for the first time. By the Laws of 1905, p. 277, ch. 147, provision is made for licenses, but otherwise the language of the previous statute does not seem to be altered. By the Laws of 1911, p. 396, it is made unlawful for any person, within a specified portion of the year, to "hunt, pursue, take, kill, injure, destroy, or possess any deer." In these statutes we find nothing which would make the possession of game, such as that exercised by the respondent, unlawful. It is true that both the Laws of 1903 and 1911 use the term "possess." But reading this term in connection with the context, it is plain that the legislature meant to take possession during the prohibited season. In addition to this, the respondent's herd of deer had its foundation some two years previous to the passage of the law of 1903. There can be no question that in none of the laws passed prior to the year 1913 were the terms used sufficiently broad to cover the possession of deer which were reclaimed and kept in an enclosure.

The appellants also complain of certain provisions of the judgment. This judgment provides that the respondent is not entitled to kill the deer, or any of them, during the closed season, except that should any deer become wounded or crippled and it should become necessary to kill it on that account, that this might be done; or if it should become necessary in the care and management of the herd of domesticated animals to kill one or more of them, this might be done. We do not think the decree went too far in this regard. To kill an animal wounded or crippled in a fight, many times becomes a humane act. And since the respondent has a property right in the animals, if necessary in the care and management of the herd, to kill, he may do so without offending the law.

[657] The portion of the judgment relating to fowls, after providing that the respondent shall have the same ownership and right to possession thereof as he is given to the deer, concludes: "And to dispose of them in such manner as he sees fit." The provision of the decree which gives the right to the respondent to dispose of the fowls in such manner as he sees fit is too broad. Acting thereunder the respondent would have the right to kill and sell such fowls during the closed season. If this may be done it would seriously interfere with the enforcement of the game laws of the state, because of the difficulty of determining whether a fowl killed and possessed during the closed season had been a reclaimed or wild bird. For the protection of the game birds of the state, the state has the power to prohibit the killing and disposing of reclaimed game during the closed season. In New York v. Hesterberg, 211 U. S. 31, 29 S. Ct. 10, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 75, the relator, August Silz, a dealer in imported game, had been arrested and convicted for having in his possession, in the city of New York, one imported golden plover which had been lawfully taken, killed and captured in England during the open season for such game birds there, and thereafter sold and consigned to Silz in the City of New York by a dealer in game in the city of London. He likewise had in his possession the body of one black cock, a member of the grouse family, which was lawfully taken, killed and captured in Russia during the open season for such game there, and thereafter sold and consigned to Silz in New York city by the same dealer in London. Such birds were imported by Silz in accordance with the tariff laws of the United States, during the open season for grouse and plover in New York. At the time Silz was arrested under the statutory law of New York, it was unlawful for him to have in his possession birds or fowl of the kind mentioned. The supreme court of the United States sustained the law and the conviction of Silz thereunder. In the course of the opinion, it was said:

[658] "In order to protect local game during the closed season it has been found expedient to make possession of all such game during that time, whether taken within or without the state, a misdemeanor. In other states of the Union such laws have been deemed essential, and have been sustained by the courts. [Citing authorities.] It has been provided that the possession of certain kinds of game during the closed season shall be prohibited, owing to the possibility that dealers in game may sell birds of the domestic kind under the claim that they were taken in another state or country. The object of such laws is not to effect the legality of the taking of game in other states, but to protect the local game in the interest of the food supply of the people of the state. We cannot say that such purpose, frequently recognized and acted upon is an abuse of the police power of the state and as such to be declared void because contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution."

The respondent claims that, since the plaintiff testified upon the trial that he had never killed any of his birds and never expected to, that the question whether or not he would have a right to kill and dispose of the birds under the decree is simply a moot question. The future rights of the respondent under the decree are measured not by the testimony which he gave upon the trial, but by the language of the judgment. Under the judgment as drawn, he plainly would have the right to kill and dispose of any of his birds at any time. He does not claim that his property rights in either the game animals or the birds is beyond the police power of the state. In the course of his brief upon this question it is said:

"If the lower court had thought it proper to decide the moot question of plaintiff's right to kill his expensive birds, we should not have objected and if your honors think it necessary to decide that question we certainly do not object. Indeed, to be of as much assistance as we may, we expressly concede that plaintiff has no right to kill, sell, or have possession of the carcasses of his birds during the time when the law declares it illegal."

[659] It cannot be successfully contended that the provision of the decree which gives the right, whether it is exercised or not, to kill, sell, or have in possession the carcasses of the birds during the closed season covers a moot question. On the other hand, if the question of the right of the respondent to kill and dispose of his birds was not before the court, a provision in the judgment which gives him this right has no proper place therein.

The cause will be remanded with direction to the superior court to eliminate that clause from the judgment which reads as follows: "And to dispose of them in such manner as he sees fit." In all other respects the judgment is affirmed. Neither party will recover costs in this court.

I. Introductory.

The purpose of this note is to review the authorities discussing the factum and nature of the right of property, state or individual, in wild animals. It confines itself strictly to a consideration of property in live wild animals, excluding the many cases involving the ownership of dead animals. The scope of the treatment is also restricted to the question of the ownership of the animal itself excluding any consideration of the privilege to hunt, kill, or capture as a right of property. Therefore game laws, the right to hunt, the power of the state to regulate hunting, and allied phases of the law of animals, are treated only in so far as they are necessarily incidental to the point of the property right in the animal.

For a comprehensive discussion of the law relating to bees, see the note to Brown v. Eckes, reported post, this volume, at page, 981.

As to the liability for injuries by wild animals, see the notes to Molloy v. Starin, 14 Ann. Cas. 57, and Connor v. The Princess Theatre, Ann. Cas. 1914A 762.

II. State Ownership.

1. IN GENERAL.

The Roman law regarded animals ferae naturae, since they have no owner, as belonging in common to all the citizens of the state. Inst. Just. book 2, part 1, cited in State v. Mallory, 73 Ark. 236, 3 Ann. Cas. 852, 83 S. W. 955, 67 L.R.A. 733. See also Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 522, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793.

By the common law of England, the crown was the owner of wild animals. Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793; Harper v. Galloway, 58 Fla. 255, 19 Ann. Cas. 235, 51 So. 226, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794.

In the United States the ownership of wild animals and fish, not reduced to actual possession by private persons, is in the people of the state in their collective sovereign capacity, or in the state as representing all the people.

Washington.—See the reported case.

In Hawaii it has been held that fish in public waters belong to the public. Murphy v. Hitchcock, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 976.

The state owns the fish in tide waters within its jurisdiction, just as it owns the animals ferae naturae of the land, i. e., the state in this regard represents the people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty. McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 248; Organ v. State, 56 Ark. 267, 19 S. W. 840; Ex p. Bailey, 155 Cal. 472, 101 Pac. 441, 132 Am. St. Rep. 95, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 534. The state's ownership of fish is not confined to those in navigable waters, but extends to those in all waters, the lands underlying which are not in private ownership. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 48 Pac. 374, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183, 39 L.R.A. 581. From other cases it appears that the state owns the fish in all the waters of the state except private ponds privately stocked and not connected with public waters. State v. Snowman, 94 Me. 99, 46 Atl. 815, 80 Am. St. Rep. 380, 50 L.R.A. 544; State v. Peabody, 103 Me. 327, 69 Atl. 273; Ex p. Fritz, 86 Miss. 210, 38 So. 722, 109 Am. St. Rep. 700. In the case last cited, the court said: "Fish are ferae naturae. They are incapable, until actually taken, of absolute ownership, except in artificial lakes or in small ponds that are entirely land locked. In all running streams, large lakes, small lakes with outlets into other waters, the right of the state to regulate the time, the manner, and extent of the taking of fish is unquestioned. It is part of the police powers of the state, which has never been parted with and cannot be surrendered. By reason of the migratory habits of fish, their ownership is in the public, and no individual has any absolute property right in them until they have been subjected to his control." In Matter of Fishway, 131 App. Div. 403, 115 N. Y. S. 745, it was held that by virtue of their ownership of fish, it is the right of the people of the state to have fish inhabit the waters of the state and freely pass to their spawning beds and multiply, wherefore no riparian owner has a right to obstruct the free passage of fish up the stream to the detriment of other riparian owners or of the public.

By the decision of the arbitrators in the Behring Sea seal controversy between the United States and Great Britain the common-law rules of ownership of wild animals by individuals were made a part of international law with respect to the ownership of wild animals by nations. According to that decision no nation can have a property right in any wild animal when found outside its territory and territorial waters. See Behring Sea Arbitrator's Decision, 32 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. 901, wherein the author sets forth the effect of the decision, in this regard, as follows: "In the second place, the decision of the Arbitrators practically adopts the rules of the English common law as to the ownership of wild animals by individuals, and makes them part of international law as regards such ownership by nations. Since no wild animal at all similar to the fur seal ever figured before in an international dispute, it became necessary for our government, in the absence of precedents of this character, to turn to the common law for some principle which would sustain our claim to ownership in the seal herds. Accordingly, it was argued in our behalf that seals in international law were analogous to such animals as bees, or carrier pigeons, at the common law, which as Blackstone said, continued to be the property of their custodian even when flying at a great distance from home, because of their having a fixed intention to return (animus revertendi). On the other hand, it was asserted in behalf of Great Britain by Sir Charles Russell, that this animus revertendi only conferred the right of property in wild animals at the common law when it was induced by artificial means, such as taming them, or offering them food. Hence, he argued, it involved a confusion of ideas to claim that the seals were American property because they migrated at certain periods to a particular place, since they were led to do this, not by artificial but by natural causes. As they resembled in this respect many other wild animals, there was no reason, he contended, why the same rule of law should not apply to them, and according to that rule of law such animals remain the property of their owner only so long as they continue on his domain. The Arbitrators appear to have been convinced by the reasoning, since they have decided that the United States has no right of property in the fur seals when they are found outside of our territorial waters. The rules and distinctions of the common law on this subject have thus been transplanted into the domain of international law, and the decision of the Arbitrators supports the further inference that there is no such thing in international law as a national right of property in a herd or body of wild animals as a whole, apart from the ordinary right of property in each individual animal inherent in its custodian during the time that his possession of it lasts."

2. NATURE OF OWNERSHIP.

The ownership of wild animals seems to have been assumed by the British sovereigns up to and including King John 1, as a personal prerogative of the crown, until Magna Charta and the charter of the forest, by which the assertion and exercise of those rights were distinctly limited. Since then the ownership of wild animals, so far as vested in the sovereign, seems to have been uniformly regarded as a trust for the benefit of the people. State v. Mallory, 73 Ark. 236, 3 Ann. Cas. 852, 83 S. W. 955, 67 L.R.A. 773. The crown at common law had a special personal prerogative in whale and sturgeon, as royal fish, and in swans, as royal fowl, which might be exercised as to any such royal fish or fowl the ownership whereof was not known. Swans' Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435, wherein it was held that all white swans, not marked, which had gained their natural liberty and were swimming in an open and common river, might be seized to the use of the king by his prerogative.

The fundamental principles, on which, at common law, the common property in or the state ownership of wild animals rested, have undergone no change in the United States, but the development of free institutions has led to the recognition of the fact that the power or control lodged in the state is to be exercised, like all other powers of government, as a trust for the benefit of the people, and not as a prerogative for the advantage of the government, as distinct from the people, or for the benefit of private individuals as distinguished from the public good. Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793. It is therefore universally held in the United States that the state holds the proprietary title to wild animals and fish within its jurisdictions in trust for the whole body of the people of the state; that the ownership is not that of a proprietor but that of a trustee. Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793; In re Eberle, 98 Fed. 295; Lewis v. State, 110 Ark. 204, 161 S. W. 154; Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 320; Schulte v. Warren, 218 Ill. 108, 75 N. E. 783, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 745, reversing 120 Ill. App. 10; State v. Shattuck, 96 Minn. 45, 6 Ann. Cas. 934, 104 N. W. 719; State v. Hume, 52 Ore. 1, 95 Pac. 808. Therefore the state's ownership of wild animals is not such a proprietary interest as will authorize a sale thereof, or the granting of special interests or special rights therein, but is solely for the purposes of regulation and preservation for the common use. State v. Mallory, 73 Ark. 236, 3 Ann. Cas. 852, 83 S. W. 955, 67 L.R.A. 773. Compare Garcia v. Gunn, 119 Cal. 315, 51 Pac. 684, wherein it was held that a lease by the Mexican government of the island of Guadalupe, with the right to utilize the wild goats thereon, conferred on the assignee of the lessee the title to such of the wild goats as he selected under the power given by the lease.

But a game statute, declaring the ownership of, and the title to, certain wild animals designed to be protected to be in the state, places the title and ownership in the state as proprietor rather than as trustee. Meul v. People, 198 Ill. 258, 64 N. E. 1106; State v. Ward, reported in full post, this volume, at page, 978.

Since the ownership of the state in animals ferae naturae is in trust for the whole of the people of the state a municipality cannot claim, for the benefit of that portion of the people of the state constituting its inhabitants, any proprietary interest in the wild animals within the limits of the municipality. Ex p. Bailey, 155 Cal. 472, 101 Pac. 441, 132 Am. St. Rep. 95, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 534, wherein it was held that a city could claim no proprietary interest in fish in that part of the ocean included within the limits of the city, and that an ordinance of that city forbidding fishing therein less than 100 feet from any wharf, dock, or pier was void as exceeding the legislative power of the city.

It has been held that the property right in wild goats on the island of Guadalupe, a part of the domain of Mexico, was in the republic of Mexico. Garcia v. Gunn, 119 Cal. 315, 51 Pac. 684.

3. REGULATION OF PRIVATE ACQUISITION.

The prevailing view of the nature of the state's ownership of wild animals is that it is only for the purpose of protection, control and regulation. State v. Mallory, 73 Ark. 236, 3 Ann. Cas. 852, 83 S. W. 955, 67 L.R.A. 773; People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 48 Pac. 374, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183, 39 L.R.A. 581.

From times of earliest tradition the state, by virtue of its proprietary right in wild animals, has claimed and exercised the power to control and regulate their reduction to possession and ownership by individuals. Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 522, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793.

The law of Athens recognized this power of the state. Répertoire, Gen. Journal der Palais, vol. 5, p. 307; Merlin, Répertoire de Jurisprudence, vol. 4, p. 128, cited in Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793.

In the feudal as well as the ancient law of the continent of Europe, in all countries, the right of individuals to acquire animals ferae naturae by possession was recognized as being subject to the governmental authority, and under its power, not only as a matter of regulation, but also of absolute control. Merlin, Répertoire de Jurisprudence, vol. 4, p. 128; Pothier, Traité du Droit de Propriété, Nos. 21, 27-28, 32; Code Napoleon, arts. 714, 715; Saint Joseph Concordance, vol. 1, p. 681 (cited in Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793).

The common law of England, also, basing property in wild animals on the principle of common ownership, treated the acquisition of ownership by individuals as being subject to governmental authority. 2 Bl. Com. 411; Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793; Harper v. Galloway, 58 Fla. 255, 19 Ann. Cas. 235, 51 So. 226, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794.

This attribute of government, to control, by virtue of its proprietary right, the taking of animals ferae naturae, an attribute which was recognized and enforced by the common law of England, was vested in the colonial governments of America, where not denied by their charters, or in conflict with grants of the royal prerogative; and that power which the colonies so possessed passed to the states with the separation from the mother country, and remains in them at the present day, in so far as its exercise may be not incompatible with, or restrained by, the rights conveyed to the federal government by the Constitution. Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793; Harper v. Galloway, 58 Fla. 255, 19 Ann. Cas. 235, 51 So. 226, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794.

In the United States it is held to be within the police power of the state to regulate the taking and acquisition of property in wild animals and fish by individuals, by placing on it such restrictions and conditions as the state may see fit. Ex p. Cencinino (Cal.) 160 Pac. 167; Harper v. Galloway, 58 Fla. 255, 19 Ann. Cas. 235, 51 So. 226, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794; Sherwood v. Stephens, 13 Idaho 399, 90 Pac. 345; People v. Bridges, 142 Ill. 30, 31 N. E. 115, 16 L.R.A. 684; Cummings v. People, 211 Ill. 392, 71 N. E. 1031; State v. Snowman, 94 Me. 99, 46 Atl. 815, 80 Am. St. Rep. 380, 50 L.R.A. 544; State v. Rodman, 58 Minn. 393, 59 N. W. 1098; Ex p. Fritz, 86 Miss. 210, 38 So. 722, 109 Am. St. Rep. 700; State v. Heger, 194 Mo. 707, 93 S. W. 252; People v. Bootman, 180 N. Y. 1, 2 Ann. Cas. 226, 72 N. E. 505; People v. Dextater, 75 Hun 472, 27 N. Y. S. 481, affirmed 147 N. Y. 723, 42 N. E. 724; State v. Sutton, 139 N. C. 574, 51 S. E. 1012; State v. Hume, 52 Ore. 1, 95 Pac. 808; State v. Theriault, 70 Vt. 617, 41 Atl. 1030, 67 Am. St. Rep. 695, 43 L.R.A. 290; State v. Niles, 78 Vt. 266, 62 Atl. 795, 112 Am. St. Rep. 917; State v. Nergaard, 124 Wis. 414, 102 N. W. 899. See also Daniels v. Homer, 139 N. C. 219, 51 S. E. 992, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 997. In Harper v. Galloway, supra, the court said: "The constitution of the state does not forbid the passage of special or local laws upon the subject of game, and it contains no express provision relative to game; therefore the legislature may by a duly enacted law make any provision within its discretion for the preservation and conservation of the game in the state for the use and benefit of the people of the state, by regulating the taking or killing and use of certain or all kinds of game in any part of the state and during any periods, where such laws do not deny to anyone having rights in the premises the due process of law or the equal protection of the laws that are guaranteed to all persons by the state and federal constitutions."

In People v. Bootman, 180 N. Y. 1, 2 Ann. Cas. 226, 72 N. E. 505, it was said: "For time out of mind and in all jurisdictions, laws passed for the protection of fish and game have been regarded as sanctioned by the police power which belongs to every sovereign state. The game and the fish within the boundaries of the state belong to the people in their unorganized capacity and may be taken by any citizen without fee or license at any time during the open season. It is to the interest of the state that neither should be wasted or destroyed and that both should be carefully protected, especially during the breeding season. Without protection the fish and game will soon disappear and the people thus be deprived of an important source of food supply, as well as a delightful recreation which promotes health and prolongs life. The protection of game falls within the legitimate exercise of the police power, because it is directly connected with the public welfare, which is promoted by the preservation and injured by the destruction of so useful an article of food, free at the proper time to all the people of the state. Laws passed for this purpose do not interfere with private property, for there is no property in living wild animals and only as the law permits their capture is there property in wild animals after they are caught or killed."

It has been held to be within the state's power of regulation and control to prohibit absolutely the acquiring by individuals of property in wild animals, if deemed necessary for their protection or preservation or for the public good. Ex p. Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129. See also Ex p. Fritz, 86 Miss. 210, 38 So. 722, 109 Am. St. Rep. 700.

It is clear that the state may make regulations restricting the taking and molestation of wild game animals to certain seasons of the year. Magner v. State, 97 Ill. 320.

It has been held that this right to regulate may be delegated by the state to local authorities. Ex p. Cencinimo (Cal.) 160 Pac. 167.

The state legislature has the right to prevent the taking of fish from the streams of the state, and even from private waters. Matter of Fishway, 131 App. Div. 403, 115 N. Y. S. 745. And the state may prevent a landowner from taking fish on his own land. People v. Duxtater, 75 Hun 472, 27 N. Y. S. 481, affirmed 147 N. Y. 723, 42 N. E. 724.

Since the state holds the title to the wild animals, fish and game in its borders, in trust for its own people, it may deny to nonresidents and to persons not citizens the right to take and acquire property rights therein, and such discrimination is no denial of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, nor is it a denial of the equal protection of the law. McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 248; Com. v. Patstone, 231 Pa. St. 46, 79 Atl. 928; State v. Ashman, 123 Tenn. 654, 135 S. W. 325; State v. Niles, 78 Vt. 266, 62 Atl. 795, 112 Am. St. Rep. 917. In State v. Ashman, supra, a law prohibiting nonresidents of the state from engaging in the business of taking pearl mussels or other shell fish without a license was held to be constitutional. The court said: "The common law vests the title of game and fish, not reduced to possession or under restraint, in the sovereign power—in Great Britain, in the King; in the United States, the several states, in trust for their inhabitants. No one has any absolute property right in game or fish while in a state of nature and at large, and the right to take them may be restricted or prohibited, and, when granted or exercised, it is a privilege. It is a property right, and not one of citizenship. Maney v. State, 6 Lea (Tenn.) 218; Peters v. State, 96 Tenn. 688, 36 S. W. 399, 33 L.R.A. 114; Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 333; 2 Black. Com. 394, 410. The rights, privileges, and immunities which are secured by the Federal Constitution to the inhabitants of the several states do not include any rights in the property of the several states held in trust for their own inhabitants, and laws which prohibit them in whole or in part from participating in the benefits of that property do not deprive them of any constitutional rights. The majority of the states have enacted laws prohibiting or limiting the right of nonresidents to take game or fish within their respective boundaries, and, upon the principles above stated, this legislation has been invariably upheld by all the courts."

Similarly the state may make restrictions which discriminate against nonresidents in favor of residents. Cummings v. People, 211 Ill. 392, 71 N. E. 1031.

Since, however, the beneficial use of the wild animals in the state belongs to all the people of the state a regulation of the acquisition of property in them which unjustly discriminates against any of the people of the state is a denial of the equal protection of the laws to those discriminated against, and is void. Harper v. Galloway, 58 Fla. 255, 19 Ann. Cas. 235, 51 So. 226, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794; State v. Peabody, 103 Me. 327, 69 Atl. 273. In the case last cited, it was held that a municipal ordinance requiring a license to dig for clams and providing that licenses should not be issued to nonresidents of the municipality was unconstitutional and void as a discrimination against part of the people of the state.

III. Private Ownership.

1. IN GENERAL.

As a general rule, there is no individual property in wild animals or fish so long as they remain wild, unconfined and in a state of nature. Fines v. Spencer, 3 Dyer (Eng.) 306b; Mallocke v. Eastly, 3 Lev. (Eng.) 227; Sutton v. Moody, 1 Ld. Raym. (Eng.) 250, 91 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1063; Lonsdale v. Rigg, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 654; Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, 11 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1474, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 76; Gentile v. State, 29 Ind. 409; State v. Lewis, 134 Ind. 250, 33 N. E. 1024, 20 L.R.A. 52; James v. Wood, 82 Me. 173, 19 Atl. 160, 8 L.R.A. 448; Ex p. Fritz, 86 Miss. 210, 38 So. 722, 109 Am. St. Rep. 700; State v. Heger, 194 Mo. 707, 93 S. W. 252; State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 484; People v. Bootman, 180 N. Y. 1, 2 Ann. Cas. 226, 72 N. E. 505, affirming 95 App. Div. 469, 88 N. Y. S. 887; People v. Doxtater, 75 Hun 472, 27 N. Y. S. 481, affirmed 147 N. Y. 723, 42 N. E. 724; Matter of Fishway, 131 App. Div. 403, 115 N. Y. S. 745; Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 55 Atl. 656; Zanetta v. Bolles, 80 Vt. 345, 67 Atl. 818; Murphy v. Hitchcock, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 976. In Zanetta v. Bolles, supra, the court said: "The defendant, an inhabitant of the state, in the close season, shot and killed the plaintiff's duly licensed, registered, and collared dog while, with other dogs, it was worrying and attacking a wild deer on the defendant's inclosed land, and thereby saved the life of the deer. The defendant says that as he was an inhabitant of the state at the time, he had such a qualified property in the deer that he had a right to kill the dog in order to protect it. But that is not so. The wild game in the state belongs to the people of the state in their collective and sovereign capacity, and not in their individual and private capacity, except as far as private ownership may be acquired therein under the constitution, subject to such proper regulations as the legislature may make, the constitution providing that the inhabitants of the state 'shall have liberty in seasonable times to hunt any fowl on the lands they hold, and on other lands not inclosed,' under proper regulations to be thereafter made and provided by the general assembly. It is by virtue of this 'liberty,' and not otherwise, that private ownership is acquired in wild game by an inhabitant of the state on whose inclosed lands it is found; and it is thus acquired because the right to hunt thereon is exclusive in the inhabitant who holds them. . . . But as the defendant had no right to hunt wild deer on his inclosed land in the close season, a proper regulation of his 'liberty,' he had no property in the deer that entitled him to kill the dog to protect it."

But wild animals become property when removed from their natural liberty, and made subjects of man's dominion. Swans' Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435; Davies v. Powell, Willes (Eng.) 46; Bellew v. Langdon, Cro. Eliz. 876, 78 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1100; Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, 11 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1474, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 76; Hadesden v. Gryssel, Cro. Jac. (Eng.) 195, sub nom. Haldesden v. Gresil, Brownl. & G. 208, 123 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 758, Yelv. 104; Churchward v. Studdy, 14 East 249, 104 Eng. Rep. Dec. 264; Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 55 Atl. 656; Liesner v. Wanie, 156 Wis. 16, 145 N. W. 374, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 703. See also People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 48 Pac. 374, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183, 39 L.R.A. 581; Schulte v. Warren, 218 Ill. 108, 75 N. E. 783, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, reversing 120 Ill. App. 10. And see the reported case, wherein it is held that the property right which an individual may have in reclaimed wild animals is a property right which cannot be taken away by the state in violation of the Washington Constitution (Art. 1, § 3), and of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416).

Since wild animals are property of common ownership any person, in the absence of inhibition by the sovereign, may seize them and make them his property. 2 Bl. Com. 14; Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 793; Lewis v. State, 110 Ark. 204, 161 S. W. 154; People v. Bootman, 180 N. Y. 1, 2 Ann. Cas. 256, 72 N. E. 505, affirming 95 App. Div. 469, 88 N. Y. S. 887. In Lewis v. State, supra, the court said: "This right which one individual has in common with every other individual in the community to take and use fish and game ferae naturae is one that has existed from the remotest times, and, although at one time in England after the Norman conquest the right to take fish and game was claimed as a royal prerogative to the exclusion of the people, it was restored to them by the Barons at Runnymede in 1215, and was declared in the great charter which they wrested from King John. 'The rights,' says Green, 'which the barons claimed for themselves they claimed for the nation at large.' Green's History of the English people, vol. 4, pp. 252-4."

However it has been said that individuals may not take animals ferae naturae and acquire property in them as of right, but that it is only a privilege granted by the state and exists only so far as granted, not so far as unrestricted. Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 320; People v. Bridge, 142 Ill. 30, 31 N. E. 115, 16 L.R.A. 684. See also State v. Shattuck, 96 Minn. 45, 6 Ann. Cas. 934, 104 N. W. 719. In Magner v. People, supra, it was said: "Stated in other language, to hunt and kill game is a boon or privilege granted, either expressly or impliedly, by the sovereign authority—not a right inhering in each individual; and, consequently, nothing is taken away from the individual when he is denied the privilege, at stated seasons, of hunting and killing game. It is, perhaps, accurate to say that the ownership of the sovereign authority is in trust for all the people of the state, and hence, by implication, it is the duty of the legislature to enact such laws as will best preserve the subject of the trust and secure its beneficial use, in the future, to the people of the state. But in any view, the question of individual enjoyment is one of public policy, and not of private right." And in State v. Hume, 52 Ore. 1, 95 Pac. 808, it was said that the title to fish taken from navigable streams by individuals is held in favor of the state and that no person has the right to acquire such property in any manner he pleases.

The true theory seems to be that, since the state holds the title to animals ferae naturae in trust for the people, who are the beneficial owners, the individuals making up the state may seize and take private possession and ownership of those animals, but that in doing so they are subject to such conditions and restrictions as the state in the exercise of its police power may place on that taking. State v. Rodman, 58 Minn. 393, 59 N. W. 1098, wherein the court said: "We take it to be the correct doctrine in this country that the ownership of wild animals, so far as they are capable of ownership, is in the state, not as proprietor, but in its sovereign capacity as the representative, and for the benefit, of all its people in common. The preservation of such animals as are adapted to consumption as food, or to any other useful purpose, is a matter of public interest; and it is within the police power of the state, as the representative of the people in their united sovereignty, to enact such laws as will best preserve such game, and secure its beneficial use in the future to the citizens, and to that end it may adopt any reasonable regulations, not only as to time and manner in which such game may be taken and killed, but also imposing limitations upon the right of property in such game after it has been reduced to possession. Such limitations deprive no person of his property, because he who takes or kills game had no previous right of property in it, and, when he acquires such right by reducing it to possession, he does so subject to such conditions and limitations as the legislature has seen fit to impose. It is upon this principle that laws have been sustained which restricted the use of such game to the people of the state in which it was caught or killed, and prohibited its being shipped out of such state as an article of commerce; the reason being that to permit game to become an article of commerce, even during the open season, would stimulate the killing to an extent leading to its total extermination. In short, the object to be attained is the preservation from extinction or undue depletion of game; and the legislature may pass any reasonable laws to effect that end, even to the extent of restricting the use of, or right of property in, the game after it is taken or killed. All so-called game laws proceed upon that principle, and their constitutionality has rarely, if ever, been successfully assailed."

Where a game statute places the title to certain wild animals designed to be protected in the state as proprietor, not as mere trustee for the people, individuals may no longer acquire ownership by capturing, killing or reclaiming those animals, except in so far as permitted to do so by the statute. Meul v. People, 198 Ill. 258, 263, 64 N. E. 1106.

2. NATURE OF PROPERTY RIGHT.

It was a well-settled rule at the common law that, while a private person might acquire property in animals ferae naturae, he could not acquire an absolute property therein, but that it was at most only a qualified property. 2 Bl. Com. 390, 391; Swans' Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435; Brinckerhoff v. Starkins, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 248. See also State v. Sumner, 2 Ind. 377.

This was stated as being still a rule of general application in State v. Niles, 78 Vt. 266, 62 Atl. 795, 112 Am. St. Rep. 917.

In some cases, however, the courts have appeared to overlook this rule, and to consider animals ferae naturae as being the subject of an absolute property. Thus in the cases of State v. Mallory, 73 Ark. 236, 244, 3 Ann. Cas. 852, 83 S. W. 955, 67 L.R.A. 773, and Schulte v. Warren, 218 Ill. 108, 75 N. E. 783, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, reversing 120 Ill. App. 10, it was said that, when killed or captured, wild animals become the absolute property of the killer or captor. The explanation of those statements may perhaps be found in the fact that the courts were really adverting to the question of property in dead animals, which has always been recognized as being absolute, and inadvertently mentioned captured animals in that connection.

The distinction between the character of property in live and in dead wild animals was pointed out in the case of Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, 11 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1474, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 76, wherein it was said: "It is also equally certain that when killed, or reclaimed by the owner of the land on which they are found, or by his authority, they become at once his property, absolutely when they are killed, and in a qualified manner when they are reclaimed."

However, the meaning of the term "qualified property", as used with reference to the ownership of wild animals, is not that the ownership has not all the incidents of property rights generally, but simply that it is subject to be defeated by the escape of the animal from its owner, and its reversion to a state of nature in which it can no longer be the subject of property. See infra, subdivision 4, Loss of Property Right. As is shown by the cases cited in that subdivision, there is a tendency in modern times to relax the rules of the common law as to the loss by escape of property in wild animals. It may be, therefore, that the dicta in State v. Mallory, and in Schulte v. Warren, supra, were influenced by this tendency, and intentionally regarded the law as to the character of property in wild animals as having been changed. In Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 55 Atl. 656, it was stated unequivocally that when a landowner exercises his right to take wild animals on his land, and reduces them to possession, they become absolutely his property.

3. ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY RIGHT.

a. In General.

Blackstone, in his treatment of property in animals ferae naturae, recognized three ways in which they could become the qualified property of man: (1) per industriam hominis, i. e. "by a man's reclaiming and making them tame by art, industry, and education, or by so confining them within his own immediate power, that they cannot escape and use their natural liberty;" (2) ratione impotentiae, on account of their own inability—"As when hawks, herons, or other birds build in my trees, or coney or other creatures make their nests or burrows in my land, and have young ones there; I have a qualified property in those young ones till such time as they can fly or run away, and then my property expires: but, till then, it is in some cases trespass, and in others felony, for a stranger to take them away. For here, as the owner of the land has it in his power to do what he pleases with them, the law therefore vests a property in him of the young ones, in the same manner as it does of the old ones if reclaimed and confined; for these cannot through weakness, any more than the others through restraint, use their natural liberty and forsake him;" and (3) propter privilegium, "That is, he may have the privilege of hunting, taking, and killing them, in exclusion of other persons. Here he has a transient property in these animals, usually called game, so long as they continue within his liberty; and may restrain any stranger from taking them therein: but the instant they depart into another liberty, this qualified property ceases." 2 Blk. Com. 391, 394-395.

In Swans' Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435, mention was made of two ways in which qualified property in animals ferae naturae might be acquired, viz., by industry and ratione impotentiae. The ius privilegii was also mentioned in that case but it was deemed not to be a right of property as it was classed by Blackstone, but merely a right of privilege.

The ownership of animals propter privilegium, that is by reason of the grant by the crown of the privilege to take game, was also recognized in the case of Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 76.

But there is no property in wild animals propter consuetudinem, i. e., by reason of the custom of the animal to come on a person's land. So it has been held that a landowner could not claim a right of property in rooks simply because they had a custom of coming on his land and roosting in his trees, he having gone to no trouble or expense to entice them. Hannam v. Mockett, 2 B. & C. 934, 10 E. C. L. 280, 4 Dowl. & R. 518, 537, 26 Rev. Rep. 591, wherein it was said: "But has it ever been held that a man has a right in the chance of obtaining animals ferae naturae, where he is at no expense in enticing them to his premises, and where it may be at least questionable whether they will be of any service to him, and whether, indeed, they will not be a nuisance to the neighborhood? This is not a claim propter impotentiam because they are young, propter solum because they are on the plaintiff's land, or propter industriam because the plaintiff has brought them to the place or reclaimed them, but propter usum et consuetudinem of the birds. They, of their own choice, and without any expenditure or trouble on his part have a predilection for his trees and are disposed to resort to them. But has he a legal right to insist that they shall be permitted to do so? Allow the right as to these birds, and how can it be denied as to all others? In considering a claim of this kind, the nature and properties of the birds are not immaterial. The law makes a distinction between animals fitted for food and those which are not; between those which are destructive to private property and those which are not; between those which have received protection by common law or by statute and those which have not. It is not alleged in this declaration that these rooks were fit for food; and we know in fact that they are not generally so used. So far from being protected by law, they have been looked upon by the legislature as destructive in their nature, and as nuisances to the neighborhood where they are. That being so, surely a party can have no right to have them resort to his lands, to the injury of his neighbors; and, consequently, no action can be maintainable against a person who prevents their so doing."

While Blackstone's analysis of the ways in which wild animals may become property is ingenious and logical, the cases have made use of it to a very slight extent and it will be more convenient to analyze the methods in which that property may be acquired as being (1) by reclamation (2) ratione soli, and (3) by pursuit, to which may be added the property in the increase of wild animals.

b. By Reclamation.

Such actual possession, or reclaiming, as will convert an animal wild by nature into the personal property of an individual may be effected by taming, domestication or confining. Manning v. Mitcherson, 69 Ga. 447, 47 Am. Rep. 764.

The taming or reclaiming of a wild animal makes it personal property. Mallocke v. Eastly, 3 Lev. (Eng.) 227; Fines v. Spencer, 3 Dyer (Eng.) 306b; Morgan v. Abergavenny, 8 C. B. 768, 65 E. C. L. 768; Ford v. Tynte, 2 Johns. & H. (Eng.) 150; Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 47 Am. Rep. 765 note; James v. Wood, 82 Me. 173, 19 Atl. 160, 8 L.R.A. 448; Dieterich v. Fargo, 194 N. Y. 359, 87 N. E. 518, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 696, 119 App. Div. 315, 104 N. Y. S. 334; State v. House, 65 N. C. 315, 6 Am. Rep. 744. And see the reported case.

Young birds of a wild variety, as pheasants, but hatched and still brooded by a common domestic hen, are, until they revert to a state of nature, the personal property of the owner of the hen. Reg. v. Garnham, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 347.

Wild animals are also made personal property by capture and confinement. Swans' Case, 7 Coke (Eng.) 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435; Churchward v. Studdy, 14 East 249, 104 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 596; Davies v. Powell, Willes (Eng.) 46; Schulte v. Warren, 218 Ill. 108, 75 N. E. 783, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, reversing 120 Ill. App. 10; Bostock-Ferari Amusement Co. v. Brocksmith, 34 Ind.

App. 566, 73 N. E. 281, 107 Am. St. Rep. 260; State v. House, 65 N. C. 315, 6 Am. Rep. 744; State v. Shaw, 67 Ohio St. 157, 65 N. E. 875, 60 L.R.A. 481; Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 55 Atl. 656.

The reclaiming of a wild animal by capture in violation of law, however, vests no property in the captor, even as against a wrongdoer, for the illegal act of capture has not made the animal a subject of property. James v. Wood, 82 Me. 173, 19 Atl. 160, 8 L.R.A. 448, wherein it was held that the plaintiff, who had captured a moose in violation of the game laws of the state, could have no recovery against a state game warden for releasing the moose, even though the game warden had acted without authority or warrant. The court said: "Suppose a hunter has his rifle levelled at game in close time and some one shoves it aside so that the game is missed, shall the hunter have damages? He has only been prevented from continuing a criminal act. Suppose lobsters illegally taken are thrown overboard alive, is he who does it a trespasser? Shall the taker of them have damages for his illegal catch? Or suppose one lands a salmon in violation of law, and a by stander, while it is yet alive, throws it back into the water, shall the fisherman have the value of the salmon that the law forbids his having at all? When game is killed, it absolutely becomes property, but when taken alive, only conditionally so; for, when released, property in it is gone. So long, then, as the possession of live game is illegal, qualified property in it is illegal also; and the releasing of such game interferes with no legal right or title of the person illegally holding it captive. The plaintiff's possession of the moose was prima facie title; but, when it appears that his possession was gained in violation of law, it cannot be that the same law will say that his illegal act gave him a legal title. And if he had no title to the moose, he has suffered no damages from its being set loose. The plaintiff's illegal act prevented the moose from becoming property at all. Not so with the illegal act of a thief who may have stolen a coat, for the coat was already property, and had an owner, who alone could lawfully take it from the thief. The public, whose servant the defendant was, stands in the place of the owner of the coat; care should be taken, therefore, not to confound the doctrine of this case with the well-settled rule of law, that possession of property is a good title against everybody but the true owner."

But the capture must be completely effected, in order to vest property in the captor. Thus, in Young v. Hickens, 6 Q. B. 606, 51 E. C. L. 606, 115 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 228, it was held that partially inclosing fish in a net, the operation having been not completed, however, was not sufficient to vest a property in the fish in the owner of the net, so that he had no action against one who interfered and prevented him from taking the fish.

Every landowner has an exclusive common-law right to kill or capture wild animals on his own land and to make them his property thereby, subject to the limitation that this right must always yield to the state's ownership and title, held for the purposes of regulation and preservation for the common use. State v. Mallory, 73 Ark. 236, 3 Ann. Cas. 852, 83 S. W. 955, 67 L.R.A. 773; Long Point Co. v. Anderson, 19 Ont. 487, reversed for want of jurisdiction in 18 Ont. App. 401. In State v. Mallory, supra, the court said: "By the common law of England the owner of land had no absolute property in animals ferae naturae, while at liberty in the wild state, but had a qualified interest or property in such as were found, so long as they remained on his territory, and when killed or captured thereon they became his absolute property. Blackstone's treatment of this subject is not altogether clear, though he seems to have considered the complete ownership of game, in the strictest proprietary sense, to have been in the crown as a personal prerogative, even since Magna Charta. Yet he recognized the right or privilege of one to take game or fish on his own premises without restraint as a substantial and valuable one. 2 Black. Com. 418, 419. Mr. Christian in his learned notes combats, with the approval of Mr. Justice Coleridge, the doctrine apparently laid down by Blackstone to the effect that the sole right to take game rests primarily with the king, and maintains that at common law every person, ratione soli, had a right to game on his own land. 2 Black. Com. p. 418, note 8."

This rule applies to fish in waters the soil beneath which is the property of the landowner. People v. Bridges, 142 Ill. 30, 31 N. E. 115, 16 L.R.A. 684, wherein the court said: "Fish, in streams or bodies of water, have always been classed by the common law as ferae naturae, in which the riparian proprietor or the owner of the soil covered by the water, even though he may have the sole and exclusive right of fishing in such waters, has at best but a qualified property, which can be rendered absolute only by their actual capture, and which is wholly divested the moment the fish escape to other waters."

This exclusive right to hunt or fish on his own land so far as not restrained by the state has been frequently held, not only to create a property in the privilege, but to give the landowner a qualified property ratione soli in the wild animals themselves, which property lasts so long as the animals remain on the premises. Reg. v. Steer, 6 Mod. (Eng.) 183; Read v. Edwards, 17 C. B. N. S. 245, 112 E. C. L. 245, 144 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 99; Graham v. Ewart, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 326; Lonsdale v. Rigg, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 654; Long Point Co. v. Anderson, 19 Ont. 487, reversed for want of jurisdiction in 18 Ont. App. 401; Schulte v. Warren, 218 Ill. 108, 75 N. E. 783, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, reversing 120 Ill. App. 10; Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 55 Atl. 656.

However, this property ratione soli is not absolute, but is only qualified, being defeasible by the escape of the animal from the land, upon which the property right immediately ceases. Hinsley v. Wilkinson, Cro. Car. (Eng.) 387; Sutton v. Moody, 1 Ld. Raym. 250, 91 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1063; Graham v. Ewart, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 326; Lonsdale v. Rigg, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 654; People v. Bridges, 142 Ill. 30, 31 N. E. 115, 16 L.R.A. 684.

Therefore, although a landowner who maintains rabbits in his wood has a species of property in them ratione soli, this property ceases when they escape and eat on a common, wherefore a commoner cannot maintain an action against the owner of the land from which the rabbits have come, for they are no longer the property of the defendant. Hinsley v. Wilkinson, Cro. Car. 387, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 938.

A riparian landowner does not own absolutely the fish in the stream. His right of property attaches only to those he reduces to actual possession, so that he has no right to kill, or obstruct the free passage of, those not taken by him. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 48 Pac. 374, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183, 39 L.R.A. 581.

It is certain that, as between the owner of the land and a trespasser, the law recognizes that the landowner has a qualified property in wild animals, enforceable as a civil right, and that trespass will lie for the taking of unclaimed animals ferae naturae from the lands of the plaintiff. Coney's Case, Godb. 122, 78 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 75; Child v. Greenhill Cro. Car. 553, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1077; Sutton v. Moody, 1 Ld. Raym. 250, 91 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1063; Schulte v. Warren, 218 Ill. 108, 75 N. E. 783, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, reversing 120 Ill. App. 10. Thus the owner of a several right of piscary has been held to have a privileged property in the fish therein, for the taking of which trespass would lie. Child v. Greenhill, Cro. Car. 553, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1077. So in Read v. Edwards, 17 C. B. N. S. 245, 112 E. C. L. 245, 144 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 99, an action against the owner of a dog for damages caused by its entering the plaintiff's wood and there destroying young pheasants reared under domestic hens, objection was made that the plaintiff had no property in the pheasants because they were game birds. But the court held that even if they were to be deemed ferae naturae (which was not decided) the owner of the land had such a qualified property as would sustain his action. In Coney's Case, Godb. 122, 78 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 75, recovery was granted a landowner, in trespass, for the killing of conies there by the defendant.

This qualified property ratione soli is such as will sustain an injunction at the suit of the landowner to restrain invasions of it. Schulte v. Warren, 218 Ill. 108, 75 N. E. 783, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, wherein it was held that a landowner was entitled to injunctive relief against persons fishing in streams navigable in fact but the soil underneath which was the property of the landowner.

When this right, ratione soli, is exercised by the owner and he reduces to possession animals ferae naturae on his lands, the captured animals belong absolutely to him. Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 55 Atl. 656. See also Schulte v. Warren, 218 Ill. 108, 75 N. E. 783, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 745, reversing 120 Ill. App. 10.

The right ratione soli of a landowner to the animals ferae naturae on his land has received statutory recognition. Kellogg v. King, 114 Cal. 378, 46 Pac. 166, 55 Am. St. Rep. 74; Cummings v. People, 211 Ill. 392, 71 N. E. 1031.

In an important English case however it was held that, strictly speaking, the so-called property ratione soli is not a property in the animals before capture, but simply a privilege to take them. Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, 11 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1474, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 76, wherein it was said: "My Lords, when it is said by writers on the Common Law of England that there is a qualified or special right of property in game, that is in animals ferae naturae which are fit for the food of man, whilst they continue in their wild state, I apprehend that the word 'property' can mean no more than the exclusive right to catch, kill and appropriate such animals which is sometimes called by the law a reduction of them into possession. This right is said in law to exist ratione soli, or ratione privilegii, for I omit the two other heads of property in game which are stated by Lord Coke, namely propter industriam and ratione impotentiae, for these grounds apply to animals which are not in the proper sense ferae naturae. Property ratione soli is the common-law right which every owner of land has to kill and take all such animals ferae naturae as may from time to time be found on his land, and as soon as this right is exercised the animal so killed or caught becomes the absolute property of the owner of the soil. Property ratione privilegii is the right which, by a peculiar franchise anciently granted by the Crown in virtue of its prerogative, one man had of killing and taking animals ferae naturae on the land of another; and in like manner the game, when killed or taken by virtue of the privilege, became the absolute property of the owner of the franchise, just as in the other case it becomes the absolute property of the owner of the soil." It was further held in that case that even if wild animals, while living, are to be considered the property of the landowner, they are more in the nature of real property, an appurtenance to the land, than personal chattels. On this point it was said, per Lord Cranworth: "Wild animals whilst living, though they are, according to Lord Holt, the property of the owner of the soil on which they are living, are not his personal chattels, so as to be the subject of larceny. They partake, while living, of the quality of the soil, and are, as growing fruit was, considered a part of the realty. If a man entered my orchard, and filled a wheelbarrow with apples, which he gathered from my trees, he was not guilty of larceny (see now the Statute 24 and 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 36), though he had certainly possessed himself of my property; and the same principle is applicable to wild animals."

When they become reclaimed and tamed, however, wild animals on a landowner's domain, such as deer in a park, cease to be a part of the inheritance, lose their character as part of the realty, ratione soli, and become personal chattels. Ford v. Tynte, 2 Johns. & H. (Eng.) 150.

d. By Pursuit.

(1) Animals Generally.

It has been said that the opinion of Gaius, that one does not become the proprietor of a wild beast which he has wounded, but which he has not effectually taken, prevailed among the Romans and was followed by the Emperor Justinian. Charlebois v. Raymond, 12 L. C. Jur. 55.

Accordingly it is a general rule of both the Roman and the common law that pursuit alone vests in the sportsman no property in the animal pursued, and even pursuit accompanied by wounding is equally ineffectual for that purpose, unless the animal is actually taken. Justinians Institutes lib. 2, tit. 1, s. 13; Fleta lib. 3, c. 2, s. 175; Bracton lib. 2, c. 1, p. 3, cited in Pierson v. Post, 3 Caines (N. Y.) 175, 2 Am. Dec. 264; Swift v. Gifford, 2 Lowell 110, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,696; Buster v. Newkirk, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 75.

Occupancy of beasts ferae naturae was defined by Puffendorf (lib. 4, c. 6, s. 2 and 10) to be the actual corporal possession of them, and Bynkershoek is cited as coinciding in this definition. Pierson v. Post, 3 Caines (N. Y.) 175, 2 Am. Dec. 264.

Where, therefore, a hunter had started a fox with hounds and dogs, and had him in full cry, this was held to be insufficient to vest in the hunter any property in the fox, and he was allowed no recovery against one who, in his sight, interfered, prevented him from catching the fox, and himself killed and carried it off. Pierson v. Post, 3 Caines (N. Y.) 175, 2 Am. Dec. 264. In that case the court said: "We are the more readily inclined to confine possession or occupancy of beasts ferae naturae, within the limits prescribed by the learned authors above cited, for the sake of certainty, and preserving peace and order in society. If the first seeing, starting, or pursuing such animals, without having so wounded, circumvented or ensnared them, so as to deprive them of their natural liberty, and subject them to the control of their pursuer, should afford the basis of actions against others for intercepting and killing them, it would prove a fertile source of quarrels and litigation. However uncourteous or unkind the conduct of Pierson towards Post, in this instance, may have been, yet his act was productive of no injury or damage for which a legal remedy can be applied."

It has been held that no property right was vested in the hunter by the chasing and wounding of a deer, which, however, ran on six miles or more, the hunter abandoning the pursuit overnight and taking it up again in the morning. Buster v. Newkirk, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 75, wherein it was said: "The principles decided in the case of Pierson v. Post, 3 Caines (N. Y.) 175 are applicable here. The authorities cited in that case, establish the position, that property can be acquired in animals ferae naturae, by occupancy only; and that, in order to constitute such an occupancy, it is sufficient if the animal is deprived of his natural liberty, by wounding, or otherwise, so that he is brought within the power and control of the pursuer. In the present case, the deer, though wounded, ran six miles; and the defendant in error had abandoned the pursuit that day, and the deer was not deprived of his natural liberty, so as to be in the power or under the control of N. He, therefore, cannot be said to have had a property in the animal, so as to maintain the action."

But where a hunted animal has been mortally wounded, and the pursuer has the animal in such a situation that its escape is improbable, if not impossible, this is sufficient reduction to control to vest in the hunter the property right to the animal. Actual manucapture is not essential. Liesner v. Wanie, 156 Wis. 16, 145 N. W. 374, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 703. In that case it appeared that a hunter had mortally wounded a wolf and had so followed up the attack as substantially to have the animal in possession, when the defendant interfered, delivered the shot which ended the wolf's life, and then carried the carcass off. Granting recovery against the defendant, the court said: "It is conceded that if the plaintiffs had substantially permanently deprived the wolf of his liberty,—had him so in their power that escape was highly improbable, if not impossible, before defendant appeared on the scene and with his gun pointed so as to reach within some three feet of the animal delivered a finishing shot, it had become the property of plaintiffs and was wrongfully appropriated by appellant. Such is according to the prevailing rule. The instant a wild animal is brought under the control of a person so that actual possession is practically inevitable, a vested property interest in it accrues which cannot be divested by another's intervening and killing it. Ingham, Law of Animals, 5. Such is the law of the chase by common-law principles, differing from the more ancient civil law which postponed the point of vested interest to that of actual taking. The evidence in this case very strongly tends to establish all the facts requisite to ownership of the wolf by plaintiffs—so strongly that all reasonable doubts in respect to the matter, if any would otherwise have remained, might well have been removed by the superior advantages which the trial court had. In the light of other evidence, all reasonable doubts may well have been removed as to who delivered the shot which so crippled the animal as to cause him to cease trying to escape, thus permitting appellant to substantially reach it with the muzzle of his gun at the instant of delivery of the finishing shot. That, at such instance, the plaintiffs were in vigorous pursuit of the game, the evidence is clear, and that in a few moments, at most, they would have had actual possession, is quite as clear. So we must hold that the verdict was properly directed and the judgment properly rendered thereon." In Churchward v. Studdy, 14 East 249, 104 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 596, it was held that where the plaintiff's dogs hunted and caught, on the lands of the defendant, a hare started on the lands of another, it was held that the property in the hare was in the plaintiff.

The law of France differs, however, in the rule of property by chase, from the law of the Romans, and the common law. According to the French law, as was said by Cujas (book 4), a wild animal is the property of him who has wounded it, so long as he continues to pursue it, and it does not belong to him who captures the animal notwithstanding that pursuit. This rule of the law of France has been applied in a Canadian case, Charlebois v. Raymond, 12 L. C. Jur. 55, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had first started the pursuit of a bear, and having wounded it with his dogs, was continuing the chase without interruption and without losing trace of the beast, up to the moment when it was killed by the defendant who did not commence the pursuit until an hour or two later than the plaintiff. On these facts it was held that the plaintiff's pursuit and wounding of the bear had made it his property, of which the defendant could not deprive him by killing it, and the plaintiff was granted judgment for the value of the bear and for costs.

(2) Whales.

There have been a number of cases, English and American, involving the right of property in whales, but most of them have involved the question of the ownership of a whale after it has been killed, and are not, therefore, included in this note.

As to the question of property by pursuit and attack in a whale before it is actually killed, the general custom of whale fishery in the North Sea is that of the "fast and loose rule," according to which harpooning a whale and retaining hold on it until its capture, makes it the property of the one harpooning it, even though other persons are instrumental in actually killing it. But the person harpooning a whale loses a proprietary right therein, if the whale breaks away and he loses his hold on it. This rule has received judicial recognition. Littledale v. Scaith, York Lent Assizes, 1788, Thursday, March 13, reported in a note to Fennings v. Grenville, 1 Taunt. 243, 127 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 826; Aberdeen Arctic Co. v. Sutter, 4 Macq. H. L. (Scot.) 355, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 92.

The report of Littledale v. Scaith, supra, is as follows: "In an action of trover for a whale, which had been struck first by an harpooner of the plaintiff's ship, and afterwards by an harpooner of the defendant's, the counsel on both sides, and all the parties concerned, agreed the law to be, both by the custom of Greenland, and as settled by former determinations at Guildhall, London, as follows. While the harpoon remains in the fish, and the line continues attached to it, and also continues in the power or management of the striker, the whale is a fast fish: and though during that time struck by a harpooner of another ship, and though she afterwards break from the first harpoon, but continues fast to the second, the second harpoon is called a friendly harpoon, and the fish is the property of the first striker, and of him alone. But if the first harpoon or line breaks, or the line attached to the harpoon is not in the power of the striker, the fish is a loose fish, and will become the property of another." Ann. Cas. 1917B.—61.

erty of any other person who strikes and obtains it." In Aberdeen Arctic Co. v. Sutter, 4 Macq. H. L. (Scot.) 355, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 92, the Lord Chancellor said: "There has prevailed in the northern whale fishery for a considerable period of time, probably ever since the time when these fisheries came into the possession of this country, a rule with regard to the property in whales that are harpooned and captured, which rule has received the technical denomination of 'fast and loose' among the parties engaged in the fishery, and has become the subject of various decisions in English Courts of Justice. The object of the rule was to prevent disputes and quarrels among persons engaged in the capture of whales. The rule is that the person who first harpoons a fish and retains his hold of that fish until it is finally captured, is to be regarded as the proprietor of the fish, although the actual capture and killing of the whale may be accomplished by the assistance of other persons. But the rule also involves this condition, that if the fish, after it has been harpooned, breaks away from the person who first harpoons it, or if the fish is subsequently abandoned, that fish, though dying in consequence of the wound originally inflicted by the harpoon, is a 'loose' fish, and becomes the property of the person who first finds it and takes possession of it." In the case last cited it was contended, however, that a local custom of whalers in Cumberland Inlet modified this rule by allowing "drog fishing," a method of whaling adopted from the manner of hunting seal used by the Esquimaux, which consisted of harpooning the whale, attaching a large float to the line, and letting the fish go to wear itself down dragging the float, when the hunters would come up and take it, the property in the whale not being lost by its escape nor even by its subsequent capture by another. It was held, however, that this local custom had not been established by any general assent and was, therefore, not binding on persons who had not agreed to be bound by it, such persons being subject to the general "fast and loose" rule of northern fishery.

In Fennings v. Grenville, 1 Taunt. (Eng.) 240, it appeared that a custom of the whale fishery among the Gallipagos islands gave to one who struck a whale with a loose harpoon a right to receive half the produce of the whale from him who killed it, though it did not give him the whole property in the whale. The case turned on the technical ground that one tenant in common could not sue another. The question of the custom was discussed, however, by Chambre, J., on the application for a new trial which appeared to have been contended for "upon the ground that either this was not such a custom of a particular trade as to be binding in law, or, if there had ever been such a custom, the verdict was contrary to the evidence of the present practice of the fishery; and the dissent of the captains now frequenting those seas remitted all the parties to their common law right; which was, that possession alone confers property in animals ferae naturae, and that the striking with a missile weapon gives no property in them." He said: "I should have been very unwilling to grant a new trial, if the only question had been on the custom. There must of necessity be a custom in these things to govern the subjects of England as well amongst themselves, as in their intercourse with the subjects of other countries. The usage of Greenland is held to be obligatory not only as between British subjects, but as between them and all other nations. I remember the first case upon that usage, which was tried before Lord Mansfield, who was clear, that every person was bound by it, and said, that were it not for such a custom, there must be a sort of warfare perpetually subsisting between the adventurers; and he held it strongly binding, from the circumstance of its extending to different nations. The same necessity must prevail in the South Seas, although the fishery has not been so long in use, in order to regulate our intercourse with the French, Americans, and others who resort thither. A few persons may by compact among themselves for a particular season, renounce any advantage and subject themselves to any disadvantages that they please, and this would bind all those who assented to it; but Luce [the captain of the plaintiff's vessel] was no party to this compact."

In a decision of the United States district court however, a usage of the whalers of Massachusetts somewhat similar to that claimed in the foregoing English cases was held to be a valid usage and property rights were determined by it, the usage being to the effect that the first person to harpoon a whale does not lose his property thereon, if his harpoon and line remain attached to the whale, even though the whale escapes and is captured by another, provided the first person pursues it and lays claim to it before it is cut. Swift v. Gifford, 2 Lowell 110, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,696, wherein it appeared that the crew of the Rainbow harpooned a whale, which broke away, carrying iron and line with it, and so far outran its pursuers that they were left out of sight, and the crew of another boat, the Hercules, met and captured it without knowing that it had been struck and was being pursued. The Rainbow came up, however, before the whale was cut, and the master of the Rainbow took the prize by showing his iron in the whale. The owners of the Hercules later instituted libel proceedings to establish property in the whale, and it was held that the usage among the Massachusetts whale fishers whereby "the iron holds the whale" was valid. It was said in that case by Lowell, District Judge: "The rule of the common law, borrowed probably from the Roman law, is, that the property in a wild animal is not acquired by wounding him, but that nothing short of actual and complete possession will avail. This is recognized in all the cases concerning whales cited at the bar, as well as in the authorities given under the first point. Whether the modern civil law has introduced the modification that a fresh pursuit with reasonable prospect of success shall give title to the pursuer, does not seem to be wholly free from doubt, though the ancient commentators rejected such a distinction, for the satisfactory reason that it would only introduce uncertainty and confusion into a rule that ought to be clear and unmistakable. See 16 Poth. Pandects, p. 550, lib. 41, tit. 1; Gaius, by Thompson & Lemon, p. 270. I do not follow up this inquiry; because it would be impossible for me to say that the crew represented by the respondent, though continuing the chase, had more than a possibility of success. The decision, therefore, must turn on the validity of the usage, without regard to the chances of success which the respondent's crew had when the others came up. It is not disputed that the whalers of this state, who have for many years past formed, I suppose, a very large proportion of all those who follow this dangerous trade in the Arctic seas, and perhaps all other Americans, have for a very long time recognized a custom by which the iron holds the whale, as they express it. The converse of the proposition is that a whale which is found adrift, though with an iron in it, belongs to the finder, if it can be cut in before demand made. The usage of the English and Scotch whalers in the Northern fishery, as shown by the cases, is, that the iron holds the whale only while the line remains fast to the boat; and the result is, that every loose whale, dead or alive, belongs to the finder or taker, if there be but one such. . . . The rule of law invoked in this case is one of very limited application. The whale fishery is the only branch of industry of any importance in which it is likely to be much used; and if a usage is found to prevail generally in that business, it will not be open to the objection that it is likely to disturb the general understanding of mankind by the interposition of an arbitrary exception. . . . The usage being divisible in its nature, it seems to me, that, so far as it relates to the conduct of the men of different vessels in actual pursuit of a whale and prescribed that he who first strikes it so effectually that the iron remains fast should have the better right, the pursuit still continuing, it is reasonable, though merely conventional, and ought to be upheld."

In 1863 it was held in Hawaii that the common-law rules as to property in animals ferae naturae by pursuit and capture had no application to cases arising on the high seas and that in the absence of any positive rule of maritime law as to the rights in a whale wounded and pursued by one ship and captured by another, a court of admiralty would regard the whale as the joint prize of both ships and would apportion the proceeds of the whale according to equity and natural right. Heppingstone v. Mammen, 2 Hawaii 707. In that case it appeared that boats of the whale-ship Oregon pursued and made fast to a whale; that, after repeatedly harpooning it, they were obliged to cut loose from it, night coming on, to relinquish the pursuit, and to return to the ship; that the next morning a whale was sighted, which later proved to be the same one, and the pursuit was resumed; that the boats of another ship, the Richmond, had already started a pursuit of the whale, and succeeded in killing it, though warned by the officers of the Oregon that it was probably the whale wounded by the Oregon the day before; and that upon finding irons of the Oregon in the whale the men of the Richmond turned it over to the Oregon. The owners of the Richmond instituted libel proceedings to recover a share in the whale, and the court held it to be the joint prize of the ships and decreed that to the libellant should be delivered one-half the proceeds in oil and bone. The court said: "The case is a novel one in this court, and somewhat perplexing. The several masters of whaleships who have testified in the cause, concur in saying that they have never known a case precisely like this. According to the English common-law doctrine, exclusive property in animals ferae naturae, may be acquired by their immediate manucaption, or by taking and killing them; and also by the wounding of them, by one not abandoning his pursuit, in such a way as to prevent their escape and bring them within his certain control, and by encompassing them with nets and toils, or otherwise intercepting them, so as to deprive them of their natural liberty and render escape impossible. But merely starting and pursuing them gives no right of property; and therefore an action cannot be supported against one who intercepts and kills them in the view of the pursuer, while he is continuing the pursuit. . . . It is argued on behalf of the libellant, that, if the present case is to be governed by the doctrine just referred to, the whale belonged to the 'Richmond,' because her men found it loose, attacked and killed it. On the other hand, it is contended that the English common-law rule should not be held applicable to such a case, and even if it were that the whale belonged to the 'Oregon,' whose men first attacked and wounded and afterwards resumed the pursuit of it, before the 'Richmond's' men struck it. If the case were to be decided by the strict rules of the common law, it might be said that the libellant, having voluntarily parted with the possession of the whale to the respondent with a full knowledge of all the facts, had precluded himself from maintaining an action to recover back the proceeds of the whale for himself or the owners. But I am of opinion that the rules of the common law, eo nomine, are not applicable to any branch of the case; and it is admitted, on behalf of the libellant, that the doctrine quoted above has been modified to some extent, by the universal usage prevailing in the whaling business, so as to effect the decision of this case on its merits. Further, although the rule of the common law touching animals ferae naturae may be considered recognized here, so as to govern cases arising within the Kingdom, the court is not bound to apply that rule to cases arising on the high seas, but in the absence of any positive rule of maritime law, is bound to decide according to equity and natural right. The libellant did not claim the entire whale, but said he considered himself fairly entitled to a half of it, and when he relinquished the possession to the respondent, he did so with an intimation that he intended to assert his claim to that extent upon the return of the ships to port. It would be unjust therefore to debar him from doing so, by a technical rule. It is better that, when such cases occur in the remote regions where the whalemens of different nations pursue their prey, the parties should feel that it is not necessary to maintain what they may conceive to be their rights by resorting to force, but may safely leave the adjustment of those rights to a court of admiralty, whose duty it is in general, as a matter of comity, to judge and administer civil justice in maritime concerns, between the citizens or subjects of any friendly nation, exhibiting a cause within its jurisdiction. . . . It seems to me, that, under all the circumstances of the case, the whale may fairly be considered the joint prize of both ships; and I shall accordingly decree that the respondent deliver to the libellant seventy-five barrels of good bowhead oil and one thousand pounds of whalebone, of at least medium size, and that the costs be equally divided."

e. Increase.

The rule of both the Roman and the English law was that the increase of tame or domestic animals belonged to the owner of the dam or mother, according to the doctrine

"partus sequitur ventrem." And it appears that this rule was equally applicable to tamed or reclaimed wild animals. 2 Blk. Com. 390; 1 Hale P. C. 510, 511.

An anomalous rule, however, governed the ownership of the increase of swans, which, contrary to the general rule, was deemed to belong equally to the owners of the male and of the female parent birds, in common. See Swans's Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435, wherein the peculiar rule as to swans was whimsically ascribed to the monogamous habits of that bird. It was said: "And in the same case it is said, that the truth of the matter was, that the Lord Strange had certain swans which were cocks, and Sir John Charleton certain swans which were hens, and they had cignets between them; and for these cignets the owners did join in one action, for in such case by the general custom of the realm, which is the common law in such case, the cignets do belong to both the owners in common equally, sc. to the owner of the cock, and the owner of the hen; and the cignets shall be divided betwixt them. And the law thereof is founded on a reason in nature; for the cock swan is an emblem or representation of an affectionate and true husband to his wife above all other fowls; for the cock swan holdeth himself to one female only, and for this cause nature hath conferred on him a gift beyond all others; that is, to die so joyfully, that he sings sweetly when he dies; upon which the poet saith; Dulcor defecta modulatur carmina lingua, cantator, cygnus, funeris ipse sui, etc."

4. LOSS OF PROPERTY RIGHT.

The qualified property in a reclaimed wild animal was subject, at common law, to be defeated by an escape of the animal and its restoration to its natural, wild, and ferocious state. When this happened it was deemed that the dominion of man over the animal was at an end and that all property therein was extinguished. 4 Blk. Com. 588; Swans' Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435; James v. Wood, 82 Me. 173, 19 Atl. 160, 8 L.R.A. 448.

An exception was recognized in the case of the escape of an animal which at the time of the escape had the animus revertendi. 2 Blk. Com. 392; Brinckerhoff v. Starkins, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 248.

The common-law rule as to the loss of property in a captured wild animal by its escape and reversion to a wild state was enforced in the case of Mullett v. Bradley, 24 Misc. 695, 53 N. Y. S. 781, wherein it was held that the escape into the Atlantic ocean of a sea lion captured in the Pacific ocean, took away from its captor and owner the right of property which he had had in the animal. It appeared that the plaintiff, a dealer in wild animals for exhibition purposes, had a sea lion which had been captured in the Pacific ocean and transported across the continent to New York where it escaped and was later caught by a fisherman in the Atlantic ocean. The plaintiff sued the fisherman to recover the animal, but recovery was not granted. The court said: "It is conceded that sea lions are ferae naturae, and that the law applies which holds that only a qualified right of property can be acquired in them, a right which is wholly lost when, escaping from their captor, without any intention of returning, they resume their former freedom. 2 Blackst. Com. 392; 2 Kent's Com. 348; Gillet v. Mason, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 16; Amory v. Flynn, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 102; Goff v. Kilts, 15 Wend. 550. Blackstone, referring to animals ferae naturae, says that 'these are no longer the property of a man, than while they continue in his keeping or actual possession; but if at any time they regain their natural liberty, his property instantly ceases; unless they have animus revertendi, which is only to be known by their usual custom of returning.' It is said by Chancellor Kent, 'Animals ferae naturae so long as they are reclaimed by the art and power of man, are also the subject of a qualified property; but when they are abandoned, or escape, and return to their natural liberty and ferocity, without the animus revertendi, the property in them ceases. But it is quite unnecessary to multiply citations of authority for a proposition of law so well settled and familiar as this. It is quite apparent that the case under consideration comes directly within it. The sea lion in question was ferae naturae, and the right of property which the plaintiff had undoubtedly acquired in it was, so to speak, defeasible and always contingent upon his maintaining his right by actual control when opposed by a disposition on its part to escape and resume its former freedom of action. The evidence not only fails to show that there was any animus revertendi on its part, but the inference from the facts proven is quite the contrary. Blackstone states, as we have seen, that an intention to return, where such animals depart from the immediate control of the owner 'is only to be known by their usual custom of returning.' Of course, the evidence here shows that there was no such custom, but that, at the earliest opportunity, the animal broke away from restraint, and had traveled over seventy miles from its place of confinement when it was captured, some two weeks afterwards. The necessary inference, from the history of its movements, is that there was decidedly no intention on its part of returning to its place of captivity, or of again submitting itself to the domination of the plaintiff. But it is contended on the part of the plaintiff that there can be no return of such an animal to its natural liberty until it has either reached its native place or, at least, a place where the conditions of existence are normal and suitable to its habits and physical requirements. In support of this claim evidence was given tending to show that sea lions of this character are not found on the Atlantic coast, but only on the Pacific, from the bay of San Francisco to St. Nicholas island, or from latitude 30° north to 36° north, and that, for some reasons not fully explained, the conditions along the Atlantic coast are not favorable to their existence here in a wild state. However that may be, I do not think that the rule is subject to any such sweeping qualification. The natural liberty to which the law refers means that which the animal formerly enjoyed, namely, to provide for itself, in the broadest sense in which the phrase may be used. In short, it may be said to have regained its natural liberty when, by its own volition, it has escaped from all artificial restraint and is free to follow the bent of its natural inclination. Such, it seems to us, was the case here."

However where an animal ferae naturae has been so tamed that its wild nature is lost and that an escape by it will not restore it to its natural liberty and wildness, such an escape does not deprive the owner of his property in the animal. Amory v. Flynn, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 102. In that case it appeared that certain geese of the wild kind, which had, however, been tamed, strayed away and were caught by two men who pledged them to the defendant for liquor furnished them by him. The defendant refused to deliver them up to their owner, the plaintiff, unless he would pay for the liquor. The plaintiff sued in trover and was granted recovery, without the payment of the pledge. The court said: "The geese ought to have been considered as reclaimed, so as to be the subject of property. Their identity was ascertained; they were tame and gentle, and had lost the power, or disposition, to fly away. They had been frightened and chased by the defendant's son, with the knowledge that they belonged to the plaintiff, and the case affords no color for the inference that the geese had regained their natural liberty as wild fowl, and that the property in them had ceased. The defendant did not consider them in that light, for he held them in consequence of the lien, which he supposed he had acquired by the pledge. This claim was not well founded, for he showed no right in the persons who pawned them for the liquor so to pawn them, and he took them at his peril. Here was clearly an invasion of private right. If the person who took the geese, or who had kept them, had been put to necessary expense, in securing them, such expense ought to have been refunded; but no such expense was shown, or pretended, and to sanction such a pawn as this would lead to abuse and fraud."

It seems, moreover, that the rigid common-law rule whereby escape deprived the owner of his property in a reclaimed wild animal is being relaxed to some extent in favor of the proprietary right of that owner. Thus it has been held in America, that the owner of a tamed canary bird has such a property in it, even after it has escaped, as will entitle the owner to recover it by a possessory warrant. Manning v. Mitcherson, 69 Ga. 447, 47 Am. Rep. 764, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had a tamed canary, called "Sweet," which knew its name and would answer to call, and that it escaped one day and came into the possession of the defendant. The court, holding that the plaintiff could recover it, said: "Under this evidence, there does not seem to be any question of sufficient possession and dominion over this bird, to create a property right in the plaintiff. To say that if one has a canary bird, mocking bird, parrot, or any other bird so kept, and it should accidentally escape from its cage to the street, or to a neighboring house, that the first person who caught it would be its owner, is wholly at variance with our views of right and justice. To hold that the traveling organist with his attendant monkey, if it should slip its collar, and go at will out of his immediate possession and control, and be captured by another person, that he would be the true owner and the organist lose all claim to it, is hardly to be expected; or that the wild animals of a menagerie, should they escape from their owner's immediate possession, would belong to the first person who should subject them to his dominion." So, in Ulery v. Jones, 81 Ill. 403, a tamed buffalo bull calf was held to be the subject of such property as would sustain an action of trespass for the killing of it while it had temporarily escaped from its owner's inclosure and was trespassing on the lands of the defendant, and it was held that the action was maintainable without any proof of animus revertendi on the part of the buffalo. In that case the court said: "Appellee insists, this animal, being ferae naturae, was trespassing on his premises, and he had a right to kill him. He contends, the animal was not in such a condition of subjection to its owner as to give him a property in the animal. He cites that passage, in 2 Blackstone's Com. 389, 390, with which all are familiar, and lays great stress upon the fact that it was not proved the animal, when it had strayed away from the owner's inclosure was accustomed to return to it, and, therefore, being found wandering at large, he became game for the hunter, and if actually trespassing on a neighbor's inclosure, such neighbor would have the right to shoot him down. The proof on this point is, that once, certainly, the animal, after an absence of some time, returned voluntarily to his owner, but usually, when neighbors made their complaints of his conduct, appellant would send a man and drive him home. The animal was scarcely old enough to have acquired the habit of coming home, nor do our domestic animals of that kind, at certain seasons of the year, make regular returns to their homes, yet they fail not, even after long absences, to return to their master's crib. An ordinary domestic bull, at the early age of two years, would, quite likely, lack the observance of the custom insisted upon as an unerring evidence of domesticity. This animal may be said to have been, at all times, in the keeping and actual possession of his owner, for he was so tame and gentle, there was no trouble in driving him home to his accustomed pasture—as much in his actual possession and keeping as a domestic breachy animal can be who is absent from his home for weeks or months. Who can say, when this young animal should have matured he would not have returned regularly with the herd to their proper home? But, whether or not, it cannot be denied, under the evidence, the animal was so tame and gentle as to render it no longer of a wild nature. It was completely tamed, and, therefore, a subject of property." And in State v. Crenshaw, 22 Mo. 457, the court, holding that a tamed buffalo was not within the term "cattle" in a statute making it a crime to kill, maim or wound any cattle of another, said: "We do not think that the legislature meant to include buffaloes under the word 'cattle.' Buffaloes are not cattle yet within the meaning of the statute; and the fact that this buffalo bull was tamed, if it be so, does not bring him within the provision of the law, and while his tribe is left out. Though it be admitted that persons may have buffaloes tamed and domesticated, may lawfully acquire property in them, and can maintain suits for injuries done them, or for the destruction of them, yet the courts must look to the general state of things and to the circumstances attendant on any general legislation, and give such instruction to the words of the law as to enable them to embrace the ideas and notions and designs of the law makers. Although it may prove a loss to the owner, and is of itself a serious outrage, maliciously and wilfully to destroy a domesticated buffalo, yet we are inclined to the opinion that the legislature never meant to embrace those animals under the general word 'cattle.' A tame domesticated buffalo bull is not then under the provisions of this statute. He cannot be brought within the provisions while his family is left out."

5. PARTICULAR ANIMALS.

a. Fish and Oysters.

No person can acquire property in fish running at large in the waters of the state except by taking and reducing them to possession. Gentile v. State, 29 Ind. 409; State v. Lewis, 134 Ind. 250, 33 N. E. 1024, 20 L.R.A. 52; State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 484; People v. Duxtater, 75 Hun 472, 27 N. Y. S. 481, affirmed 147 N. Y. 723, 42 N. E. 724; Matter of Fishway, 131 App. Div. 403, 115 N. Y. S. 745.

Even after taken possession of, if fish escape and return to the river and are at large, they are lost to private ownership and become public property again. State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 484. See also Matter of Fishway, 131 App. Div. 403, 115 N. Y. S. 745.

Fish, until actually taken, are incapable of absolute ownership, except in artificial lakes or in small ponds that are entirely landlocked. Ex p. Fritz, 86 Miss. 210, 38 So. 722, 109 Am. St. Rep. 700. See also Pollexfen v. Crispin, 1 Vent. (Eng.) 122.

But fish in such private landlocked ponds are the private property of the owner of the pond. Hudson's Case, 21 E. P. C. 611, 612; Reg. v. Steer, 6 Mod. (Eng.) 183; State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 256, 47 Am. Rep. 199. Murphy v. Hichcock, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 976. In Reg. v. Steer, supra, it was said: "If a man has a close pond in which there are fish, he may call them pisces suos in an indictment, or he may not do it, at his pleasure, and either way is good; because being in a close pond, the property ratione loci in them cannot be lost, because they cannot swim away." In State v. Roberts, supra, the court said: "But while the legislature has power to regulate and limit the time and manner of taking fish in waters which are public breeding-places or passage-ways for fish, it has not assumed to interfere with the privileges of the owners of private ponds having no communication through which fish are accustomed to pass to other waters. Such ponds, whether natural or artificial, are regarded as private property, and the owners may take fish therefrom whenever they choose, without restraint from any legislative enactment, since the exercise of this right in no way interferes with the rights of others. The legislature protects the owners of such ponds in the enjoyment of their privileges (Gen. St. c. 251, s. 5), and they are expressly excepted from the statutory restrictions by the third section of the act upon which the indictment in this case is founded. The defendant is in possession, claiming the ownership of North pond. There is no suggestion that the public have any rights in its waters other than as a breeding-place for the supply of fish to other streams, or a channel for their passage. If, as the defendant claims, the trout are within his control, and there is no communication through which they can pass from the pond to other waters, the indictment cannot be maintained. If, as is claimed in behalf of the state, there is free communication through which trout pass from the pond to the streams leading into it and to the Ammonoosuc river, the indictment can be maintained upon proof of those facts."

But the fact that a pond is entirely enclosed by the lands of a person gives him no property right in the fish therein, if the fish have a passage to and from the pond. State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 484. Where oyster shells are deposited in a river and the germs of oysters floating in the waters attach themselves thereto and form marketable oysters, the oysters are the property of the person depositing the shells, this being no such act of abandonment as will allow another to appropriate them. Grace v. Willets, 50 N. J. L. 414, 14 Atl. 559, wherein it was held that an action would lie for the removal and conversion of oysters formed on shells so deposited.

But in an early New Jersey case it was held that oysters planted in a navigable river, where other oysters grow, are abandoned and that the planter has no such property in them as will sustain trover for their conversion. Shepherd v. Leverson, 2 N. J. L. 369. Compare, however, the later case of State v. Taylor, 27 N. J. L. 117, 72 Am. Dec. 347, cited and quoted from infra, in subdivision IV. Wild Animal as Subject of Larceny, wherein it was held that planted oysters were property and the subject of larceny.

Oysters planted by an individual in a bed clearly marked out and defined in the tide waters of a bay or arm of the sea, which is a common fishery to all the inhabitants of the state where the bay or arm of the sea is situated, and where there are no oysters growing spontaneously at the time, are the property of him who plants them, and the taking them by another person is a trespass, for which an action lies. Fleet v. Hegeman, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 42; Decker v. Fisher, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 592; Lowndes v. Dickerson, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 586. In Fleet v. Hegeman, supra, the court said: "The plaintiff had gathered the oysters when small, some two years before the trial, and planted them in a bed in the bay, about 15 rods from the shore; none grew there at the time, nor have any grown since outside of the bed. That a qualified property in the oysters was acquired by the plaintiff is admitted; but it is contended that the planting them in the bay, where a common right of taking them existed, was an abandonment of them to the public use. If so, it must be by force of law; for the case fully discloses that no such intent in point of fact existed. On the contrary, they were deposited there by the owner, to improve or rather give value to them, and with reference to an ulterior use. As to all inanimate things, an absolute property in possession may be acquired in them—such as goods, plate, money; and if the article in question could be considered as falling within that description, there could be no doubt the defense taken would be untenable, unless there was an abandonment in fact. Oysters have not the power of locomotion any more than inanimate things, and when property has once been acquired in them, no good reason is perceived why it should not be governed, by the rules of law applicable to inanimate things. But, it is contended, they fall within the rules of law applicable to animals denominated ferae naturae, the same as deer in the forest, pigeons in the air, or fish in the public waters or the ocean. A qualified property is acquired in these by reclaiming and taming them; or by so confining them, within the immediate power of the owner, as to prevent their escape, and the use of their natural liberty. Deer in a park, hares or rabbits in a warren, or fish in private ponds or trunks, are instances of this description. These, it is said, are the property of a man no longer than while they continue in his keeping or possession. Manu capture is not necessary to acquire, much less to continue, possession of this property. 3 Caines (N. Y.) 178. If a deer or any wild animal reclaimed hath a collar or other mark put upon him, and goes and returns at pleasure, it is not lawful for anyone else to take him; though if he be long absent, without returning, it is otherwise. In all these cases of wild animals reclaimed, the property is not absolute, but defeasible, by the animals resuming their ancient wildness, and going at large—as if the deer escape from the park, or the fishes from the pond or trunk, and are found at large in their proper element, they become ferae naturae again, and are fees to the first occupant that may seize them. But while they continue the owner's qualified property, they are under the protection of the law, as much so as if they were absolutely and indefeasibly his; and an action will lie for any injury committed. . . . It is clear, from the principles and cases above mentioned that the right to appropriate property of the description in question does not depend exclusively upon the place where they are found, but upon the fact that they are ferae naturae unreclaimed; for though the deer should be found browsing in his own forest, and the pigeon flying in the air, or any of the class reclaimable, at large, if they have been in fact domesticated and possess the animus revertendi, they are not common property, and the occupant who takes them gets no title; and if he takes them, knowing their condition, he becomes a trespasser. This is clear upon well-settled authority. The right of the plaintiff to the oysters is within the reason of these principles. They have been reclaimed, and are as entirely within his possession and control as his swans, or other water fowl, that may float habitually in the bay. They were distinctly designated according to usage; and besides, the defendants had actual information of the ownership, and they can set up no greater right to take them, because found in their native element, than tame pigeons in the air, or a domesticated deer upon the mountain. If the bed interfered with the exercise of the common right of fishing, or if the oysters are undistinguished among others belonging to the public waters, the interest of the owners in them would undoubtedly be subservient to the enjoyment of the public use. But the exercise of that right in this case was a mere pretense. No oysters of the natural growth of the bay, fit for use, had been found there for years. The bed interfered with no other sort of fishing, for either profit or pleasure. The case presents a deliberate and wanton violation of property acquired by the industry and care of another, under the pretext of exercising a right in common which the defendants knew to be fruitless." In Decker v. Fisher, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 592, the court said: "It is not against the common privilege [of piscary] to say that while any one may fully exercise it, that does not give him the right to take property which another has reclaimed from its native wild state, and confined within his immediate power, so as to prevent its escape. If oysters had previously existed in their native state on this ground, the plaintiffs could not have deprived others of the right to take them by depositing others in the same place. But if there had been none there before, the privilege had been created by the plaintiffs, and had never belonged to the public. The defendant's could not impair the plaintiff's title to the oysters by depositing a few others in the same place, knowing that the plaintiffs had at the time similar property there, and with an intent so to mingle the two together that neither could be identified, and thus enable them to appropriate the property of others to their own use."

However oysters planted in navigable waters, opposite the lands of one other than the planter, the oyster bed not being clearly marked out by stakes or otherwise, do not remain the property of the planter, and he cannot maintain trespass against another for their taking. Brinckerhoff v. Starkins, 11

Barb. (N. Y.) 248, wherein the court, distinguishing the case of Fleet v. Hegeman, 14 Wend. 42, cited supra said: "But, adopting the case of Fleet v. Hegeman as an authority binding upon us, which we think we are bound to do, still we do not think that the claim of the defendant in error can be sustained. What were the facts upon which that case was decided? In the first place, it was shown that the oysters had been planted but about two years before the trial; next the bed was distinctly defined, and inclosed by stakes; and lastly, the bed was opposite the plaintiff's land, and must be supposed to have been within his view, and capable of being watched and protected by him. In the case before us, on the contrary, there was no evidence as to the quantity of oysters which had been planted by the defendant in error; they had been planted about five years before the alleged trespass was committed; there had been no stakes, or inclosure, defining the extent of the bed. It is true, that buoys had been placed there at two different times, but they had been carried away, and from the year 1843 to a period shortly before the trial, in 1847, there had been neither buoys nor any other evidence of an assertion of ownership; and, in addition to all this, the oysters were in front of the land of the plaintiff in error. If, upon this state of facts, the plaintiff below was entitled to a verdict, I cannot see why a person, who places oysters in any of the navigable waters of this state, does not acquire the exclusive property in them, and in all oysters which shall be found in the same place, provided he can show that there were none there before, and that he has, at some time, held out some evidence of an assertion of ownership, either to assist in guiding him to the place, or to warn others not to interfere with it. The important evidence of property arising from an inclosure by stakes, or otherwise, was wanting in this case. If such was the character of the bay, that it did not admit of such an inclosure, the conclusion must be, not that, for that reason, such evidence of ownership was unnecessary, but that it is a place where the right of property, asserted in this case, cannot be established."

b. Other Animals.

Property, as a civil right, has been recognized by the courts as existing in the following animals:

—bear, Charlebois v. Raymond, 12 L. C. Jur. 55; Bostock Ferari Amusement Co. v. Brocksmith, 34 Ind. App. 566, 73 N. E. 281, 107 Am. St. Rep. 260.

—buffalo, Ulery v. Jones, 81 Ill. 403; State v. Crenshaw, 22 Mo. 457.

—canary bird, Manning v. Mitcherson, 69 Ga. 447, 47 Am. Rep. 764.

—deer, Davies v. Powell, Willes (Eng.) 46; Mallocke v. Eastly, 3 Lev. (Eng.) 227; Morgan v. Abergavenny, 8 C. B. 768, 65 E. C. L. 768; Ford v. Tynte, 2 Johns. & H. 150, 70 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1008; Brady v. Warren [1900] 2 Ir. R. 632; Dieterich v. Fargo, 194 N. Y. 359, 87 N. E. 518, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 696, reversing judgment 119 App. Div. 315, 104 N. Y. S. 334. And see the reported case.

—dove and pigeon, Rex v. Brooks, 4 C. & P. 131, 19 E. C. L. 308; Reg. v. Cheafor, 5 Cox C. C. 367, 8 Eng. L. & Eq. 598; Rex v. Howell, 2 Den. C. C. 363 note; Com. v. Chace, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 15, 19 Am. Dec. 348.

—fox, Pierson v. Post, 3 Caines (N. Y.) 175, 2 Am. Dec. 264.

—grouse, Lonsdale v. Rigg, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 654.

—hawk, Fines v. Spencer, 3 Dyer (Eng.) 306b.

—mocking bird, Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 47 Am. Rep. 765 note.

—monkey, Grymes v. Shack, Cro. Jac. 262, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 226.

—moose, James v. Wood, 82 Me. 173, 19 Atl. 160, 8 L.R.A. 448.

—musk cat, Grymes v. Shack, Cro. Jac. 262, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 226.

—otter, State v. House, 65 N. C. 315, 6 Am. Rep. 744.

—parrot, Grymes v. Shack, Cro. Jac. 262, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 226.

—pheasant, Reg. v. Garnham, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 347; Read v. Edwards, 17 C. B. N. S. 245, 112 E. C. L. 245, 144 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 99.

—rabbit, Bellew v. Langdon, Cro. Eliz. (Eng.) 876; Hadesden v. Gryssel, Cro. Jac. 195, sub nom. Holdensden v. Gresil, 1 Brownl. & Goldes, 208, 123 Eng. Rep. —sea lion, Mullett v. Bradley, 24 Misc. 695, 53 N. Y. S. 781.

—swan, Swans' Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435.

—wild cattle, Davis v. Green, 2 Hawaii 367.

—wild goose, Amory v. Flynn, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 102, 6 Am. Dec. 316.

—whale, see supra, subdivision (2) Whales.

—wolf, Liesner v. Wanie, 156 Wis. 18, 145 N. W. 376, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 703.

Since deer in an inclosed park are property they may be distrained as chattels of the owner. Davies v. Powell, Willes (Eng.) 46, wherein it was said: "I do admit that it is generally laid down as a rule in the old books that deer, conies, etc., are ferae naturae, and that they are not distrainable; and a man can only have a property in them ratione loci. And therefore in the case of Swans, 7 Coke 15b, 16b, 17b, 18b, and in several other books there cited, it is laid down as a rule that where a man brings an action for chasing and taking away deer, hares, rabbits, etc., he shall not say suos, because he has them only for his game and pleasure ratione privilegii whilst they are in his park, warren, etc. But there are writs in the Register, fo. 102, a book of the greatest authority, and several other places in that book which show that this rule is not always adhered to. The writ in fo. 102, is 'quare clausum ipsius A. fregit et intravit, & cuniculos suos cepit.' The reason given for this opinion in the books why they are not distrainable is that a man can have no valuable property in them. But the rule is plainly too general; for the rule in Co. Lit. is extended to dogs; yet it is clear now that a man may have a valuable property in a dog. Trover has been several times brought for a dog, and great damages have been recovered. Besides the nature of things is now very much altered, and the reason which is given for the rule fails. Deer were formerly kept only in forests or chases, or such parks as were parks either by grant or prescription, and were considered rather as things of pleasure than of profit: but now they are frequently kept in inclosed grounds which are not properly parks, and are kept principally for the sake of profit, and therefore must be considered as other cattle." In Mallocke v. Eastly, 3 Lev. (Eng.) 227, it was held that there is no property in deer in a park unless they are tamed and reclaimed. But in Morgan v. Abergavenny, 8 C. B. 768, 65 E. C. L. 768, it was held that deer in a park, though it was an ancient and legal park, might be so tame and reclaimed as to be personal property, which would pass to the executors. The same ruling was made, on the authority of Morgan v. Abergavenny, 8 C. B. 768, 65 E. C. L. 768, in Ford v. Tynte, 2 Johns. & H. (Eng.) 150, 70 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1008, wherein the court said, per Vice Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood: "I do not think it is possible to get over the case of Morgan v. Abergavenny, which is precisely in point; indeed, if anything, it was rather a stronger case than this. The area of the park was much more considerable than in the present case, and the evidence of the reclamation of the deer was to this effect: The deer, ordinarily, had the range of the old park, and were attended by keepers and fed in the winter. The deer were watched in the falling season, and the fawns marked. At times certain of the deer were selected from the herd and caught, with the assistance of muzzled dogs, and turned into an inclosure or into pens to fatten. The ordinary mode of killing was by shooting; and some of the deer are described as being very tame, coming close to the keepers when called at feeding times. Witnesses were also called to prove that, of late years, deer had been commonly bought and sold for profit, like sheep and other animals. Here the deer seem, if anything, tamer still; for the keeper is apparently able to take such as he intends to lock up, without using any special means. It was suggested, as a distinction between the two cases, that, in Morgan v. Abergavenny, the deer were bought and sold for profit; but I do not think that is the meaning of the evidence as reported. All that it goes to show is that the purchase and sale of deer for profit was a common practice, not that it was the practice on that estate. In its facts, therefore, the authority is on all-fours with this; and I find Chief Justice Wilde asking what would be a reclaiming of deer in a park, except what was done there; and, in delivering the judgment of the court, Mr. Justice Maule, after stating the substance of the evidence and the finding of the jury that the deer were reclaimed, said not only that the question was rightly left to the jury, but that there were no sufficient grounds for saying that they had come to a wrong conclusion. I must therefore hold that these deer have been reclaimed, and are no longer ferae naturae." In Brady v. Warren [1901] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 632, the evidence was held to support the jury's finding that certain deer were the property of the defendant, it appearing that the deer, which at one time had been confined in a walled deer park in his demesne, broke loose in 1893 through a temporary breach in the wall and only a portion were recaptured, that the remainder had since been wandering about the demesne, breeding, trespassing on the lands of the plaintiff, but always returning to the defendant's demesne, that the defendant shot and allowed others to shoot the deer occasionally for sport, and that he kept a wood ranger, whose duty it was to look after the deer, and whose predecessor had occasionally fed the deer in the winter with hay, laurel, and oats. In Dietrick v. Fargo, 194 N. Y. 359, 87 N. E. 518, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 696, reversing 119 App. Div. 315, 104 N. Y. S. 334, it was held that domesticated deer, kept in an inclosed ground, were the subject of property, and that a statutory inhibition against the shipping of venison did not apply to venison killed from a private stock of domesticated deer.

In trover for a hawk, the declaration must allege that it was a reclaimed hawk, otherwise no property can be claimed in it. Fines v. Spencer, 3 Dyer (Eng.) 306b.

There is no absolute property in grouse, they being ferae naturae. Lonsdale v. Rigg, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 654.

In Bellew v. Langdon, Cro. Eliz. 876, 78 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1100, it seems to have been held that rabbits (conies) kept by a landowner, were property, for it was said therein: "Trespass for breaking his close, and killing there two hundred conies. The defendant justifies, for that he there had common appurtenant to such an house by prescription; and because the conies were there damage feasant, he killed them. And it was thereupon demurred. . . . But all the court, Popham absente, resolved, that the plea was not good, for the cony is a beast of warren, and profitable as deer are, and are not to be compared to vermin; and therefore the keeping of them by the owner of the soil is lawful, and the killing them unlawful, and not justifiable. And it was adjudged for the plaintiff." And in Hadesden v. Gryssel, Cro. Jac. 195, sub nom. Haldesden v. Gresil, 1 Brownl. & G. 208, 123 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 758, Yelv. 104, it was also held that the lord of the soil might make burrows in a common and stock them with rabbits, and that a commoner could not justify chasing them there as being damage feasant.

In Grymes v. Shack, Cr. Jac. 262, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 226, it was held that trover would lie for musk cats, monkeys, and parrots.

In Reg. v. Garnham, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 347, it was held that young pheasants, hatched and brooded by a domestic hen, were the property of the owner of the hen, and hence were not "game" within the meaning of a statute against poaching.

At common law, even in the case of swans, which were a royal fowl, there might be an individual property in such as were had within the private waters of an individual, and he might have his suit on writ of trespass for a wrongful taking thereof. Swans's Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435.

It has been held that cattle, descended from domestic cattle carried to Hawaii in 1793 and 1794, but which had for years roamed the mountains and forests of the islands in a state of nature, could not, although in an actual state of wildness, be regarded as animals ferae naturae, and were, therefore, property susceptible of grant. Davis v. Green, 2 Hawaii 367, 375. In that case it was held that the grantee of unbranded wild mountain cattle had no right to enter the lands of private persons for the purpose of capturing cattle, or to convert the cattle of private owners because found unbranded on lands leased by him, and that the owners of private lands had no right to convert unbranded wild cattle of the King and government found on their lands. The court said: "In our opinion these mountain cattle cannot be legally regarded as animals ferae naturae. They do not belong to a species of animals which are ever classed as wild animals by nature, either by writers on law, or on natural history. Nor is their state like that of animals originally ferae naturae, which have for a time been brought under the immediate control and dominion of man, but have escaped and gone back to their naturally wild state. These cattle are the progeny of the tame cattle landed by Vancouver, which, in the course of time, have become more wild in their habits and appearance than the cattle which range on the lower lands, from the fact that they have been allowed to range at large, and to propagate their race free from the restraints and the management used in the care of the private herds, many of which, however, can only be reduced to manual possession by the same means that thousands of the mountain cattle have been captured, namely, with a fleet horse and a lasso. The difference between the mountain cattle and the cattle of private owners is not a difference of species or of nature, but merely a difference as to the degree of wildness in habit and appearance, superinduced by various causes, and they can no more be regarded as animals ferae naturae on that account than the cattle of the plaintiff could be so regarded, if he should see fit to let them breed and range on Waikoloa for several generations without bestowing upon them the customary care and management. In that case the plaintiff's cattle, however wild they might become, would still be his property, and could not be captured and converted by neighboring proprietors as wild animals, even when found upon their own lands."

IV. Wild Animal as Subject of Larceny.

1. IN GENERAL.

The general rule at common law was that there could be no larceny of untamed, unreclaimed wild animals wherein no property, either absolute or qualified, existed. 1 Hale P. C. 510, 511; 4 Bl. Com. 235; 2 East P. C. 41; Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, 11 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1474, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 76; Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 47 Am. Rep. 765 note; State v. Turner, 66 N. C. 618; State v. Krider, 78 N. C. 481. And there could be no larceny of unreclaimed wild animals on the land of another, wherein the landowner had no property other than the mere qualified ratione soli, because, even though they were to be regarded as the property of a landowner, they were not chattels but were in the nature of real property. Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, 11 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1474, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 76. And, even as to wild animals in which a property right had been acquired by reclamation, capture, or otherwise, there could be no larceny if they were of a base nature. 3 Coke Inst. 109; 1 Hawk. P. C. 143; Rex v. Searing, R. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 351; Warren v. State, 1 G. Greene (Ia.) 106; Aldrich v. Wright, 53 N. H. 398, 16 Am. Rep. 339. This distinction was probably made in favorem vitae, at a time when larceny was a capital offense, for Sergeant Hawkins (1 Hawk P. C. 143) says, of the subject of larceny: "They ought not to be things of a base nature, as dogs, cats, bears, foxes, monkeys, ferrets, and the like, which, howsoever they may be valued by the owner shall never be so highly regarded by the law, that for their sakes a man shall die."

However, there might be larceny of wild animals which had become property, if they were of value and not of a base nature. 2 East P. C. 607; 1 Hale P. C. 511. But it seems that, even then, it was necessary to prove that the person accused knew that the animal had been reclaimed and was, therefore, property, in order to convict him of the larceny thereof. 1 Hawkins P. C. 144, 1 Hale P. C. 511.

The common-law test of value was, strictly, the fitness of the animal for food. It was the subject of larceny if fit for food, otherwise not. 3 Coke Inst. 110; 1 Hale P. C. 511; 2 East P. C. 607; 4 Blk. Com. 235; Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 47 Am. Rep. 765 note; State v. Turner, 66 N. C. 618; State v. Krider, 78 N. C. 481. To the general rule that reclaimed wild animals, to be the subject of larceny, must be fit for food, the English courts made, however, an exception in the case of the tamed hawk which was held to be the subject of larceny though unfit for food, because it served to amuse the English gentlemen in their fowling sports. 3 Coke Inst. 109; 1 Hale P. C. 512; 1 Hawk P. C. 143; Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 47 Am. Rep. 765, note.

It seems that in the absence of statutory modification the rules of the common law as to the larceny of wild animals are still in force. They have been applied in the following cases: Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 47 Am. Rep. 765, note; Warren v. State, 1 Greene (Ia.) 106; Com. v. Chace, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 15, 19 Am. Dec. 348; Norton v. Ladd, 5 N. H. 203, 20 Am. Dec. 573; Rex v. Manu, 4 Hawaii 409.

But it has been held that the common-law distinctions between animals ferae naturae, based on their base or generous natures, are inapplicable to American society, and that the test in the United States as to whether a reclaimed animal is the subject of larceny, is not whether it is of a generous nature or even the question of its fitness for food, but is whether it is of value in any way, as food, for its fur, or otherwise. State v. House, 65 N. C. 315, 6 Am. Rep. 744, wherein the court said: "An otter belongs to the class of animals known as ferae naturae, and therefore it was necessary to allege in the indictment that it had been reclaimed or confined or that it was dead. This is done in the indictment under consideration. It was not suggested that animals ferae naturae are not the subject of larceny, provided they are fit for the food of man and are dead or confined, but we apprehend that his honor acted upon another distinction laid down in the English authorities, to wit: that there is a class of animals which, though they may be reclaimed, are not such of which larceny can be committed, by reason of the baseness of their nature. All of the distinctions as to animals ferae naturae and as to their generous or base natures, which we find in the English books, will not hold good in this country. The English system of game laws seems to have been established more for princely diversion than for use or profit, and is not at all suited to the wants of our enterprising trappers. We take the true criterion to be, the value of the animal, whether for the food of man, for its fur, or otherwise. We know that the otter is an animal very valuable for its fur, and we know also that the fur trade is an important one in America, and even in some parts of North Carolina. If we are to be bound absolutely by the English authorities, without regard to their adaptation to this country, we should be obliged to hold that most of the animals so valuable for their fur, are not the subject of larceny, on account of the baseness of their nature, while at the same time we should be bound to hold that hawks and falcons, when reclaimed, are the subject of larceny in respect of their generous nature and courage."

Birds of a wild variety, but hatched and brooded under a common domestic hen, are, until they are weaned and revert to a state of nature, sufficiently within the dominion of the owner of the hen to be his personal property, and the subject of larceny. Reg. v. Corey 10 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 23; Reg. v. Shickle, L. R. 1 C. C. (Eng.) 158; Reg. v. Head, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 350. In Reg. v. Corey, supra, it was said: "As a matter of law, I have no difficulty whatever in telling you that these pheasants, having been hatched by hens, and reared in a coop, were tame pheasants at the time they were taken, whatever might have been their destiny afterwards. Being thus, the prosecutor had such a property in them that they would become the subject of larceny, and the inquiry for stealing them would be of precisely the same nature as if the birds had been common fowls or any other poultry, the character of the birds in no way affecting the law of the case, but only the question of identity." In Reg. v. Shickle, supra, the court sustained a conviction for larceny in the taking of young partridges hatched and reared by a domestic hen, and brooding under her wings at night. The court said: "I am of opinion that, upon the facts stated, the question asked of us must be answered in the affirmative, and that the conviction is right. The case states that 'from their inability to escape, they were practically in the power and dominion of the prosecutor.' That is sufficient to decide the point. In Reg. v. Cory, 10 Cox C. C. 23, the law on the subject is very clearly laid down by my Brother Channell. He there says, speaking of pheasants hatched under circumstances similar to those here: 'These pheasants, having been hatched by hens, and reared in a coop, were tame pheasants at the time they were taken, whatever might be their destiny afterwards. Being thus, the prosecutor had such a property in them that they would become the subject of larceny, and the injury for stealing them would be of precisely the same nature as if the birds had been common fowls or any other poultry, the character of the birds in no way affecting the law of the case but only the question of identity.' In that statement of the law we all concur. The question here is, were these birds the subject of property? They were so when first hatched, and they remained so at the time they were taken by the prisoner, though it might be that at a later period they would become wild and cease to have an owner." In Rex v. Head, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 350, it was held that the stealing of young pheasants, hatched and brooded under a common hen was larceny.

2. PARTICULAR ANIMALS.

Coke enumerates as animals, which, though tamed and property, are not the subject of larceny because of the baseness of their nature, bears, foxes, apes, monkeys, polecats, ferrets, and the like. 3 Coke 109.

Among animals ferae naturae which are valuable for food and, therefore, subject of larceny when tamed or confined, the text writers enumerate the following: "Deer, wild bore, conies, cranes, pheasant, partridge, and the like" (3 Coke Inst. 110); "deer, hares, or conies, in a forest, chase, or warren, or old pigeons being out of the house . . . wild pigeons in a dove-house shut up, or hares or deer in a house, or even in a park, inclosed in such a manner that the owner may take them whenever he pleases without the least danger of their escaping, in which case they are as much in his power as fish in a pond, or young pigeons, or hawks in a nest, etc., in taking of which for the like reason, it seems to be agreed, that felony may be committed," (1 Hawk P. C. 144). And East says: "But if they are dead, reclaimed, and known to be so, or confined and may serve for food, it is otherwise even at common law. For of deer so inclosed in a park, which may be taken at pleasure; fish in a trunk or net, or as it should seem in any other inclosed place which is private property, and where they may be taken at the pleasure of the owner at any time; pheasants or partridges in a mew; young pigeons, or old ones when shut up; young hawks in a nest, and even old ones, or falcons reclaimed and known by the party to be so; larceny may be committed. The same as to peacocks: so of swans marked and pinioned, or swans unmarked, if tame, kept in a mote, pond, or private river: but if they range out of the royalty, it is no felony to take them though marked, because it cannot be known that they belong to any person." 2 East P. C. 607.

Ferrets, although tame and recognized as being valuable and saleable, have been held, on the authority of 2 East P. C. 614, to be not the subject of larceny. "The jury found the prisoner guilty; but on the authority of 2 East P. C. 614, where it is said that ferrets (among other things) are considered of so base a nature that no larceny can be committed of them, the learned judge respited the judgment until the opinion of the judges could be taken thereon. It appeared in evidence that ferrets are valuable animals, and those in question were sold by the prisoner for nine shillings. In Easter term, 1818, the judges met and considered this case; they were of opinion that ferrets (though tame and saleable) could not be the subject of larceny, and that judgment ought to be arrested." Rex v. Searing, R. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 351.

Young partridges hatched by a barnyard hen and still with her, brooding under her wings at night, are the subject of larceny. Reg. v. Shickle, L. R. C. C. (Eng.) 168.

Similarly, young pheasants hatched by a hen and under her care in a coop, are the subjects of larceny. Reg. v. Corey, 10 Cox C. C. 23; Reg. v. Head, 1 F. & F. 350.

While it seems that of old swans were not the subject of larceny, the stealing of them did subject the thief to a forfeiture to the owner to be measured by the amount of wheat necessary to cover the swan, hanging by the beak. Swans's Case, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435, wherein it was said: "And it hath been said of old time, that he who steals a swan in an open and common river, lawfully marked, the same swan (if it may be) or another swan, should be hung in a house by the beak, and he who stole it shall in recompense thereof be obliged to give the owner so much wheat that may cover all of the swan, by putting and turning the wheat on the head of the swan, until the head of the swan be covered with the wheat."

It has been held that a raccoon, being of a base nature, was not the subject of larceny. Warren v. State, 1 G. Greene (Ia.) 106, wherein it was said: "The fifth error assigned is, that part of the property averred to have been stolen, a raccoon, is not the subject of larceny. The principle is well settled, that, taking from another's possession an animal ferae naturae, or of a base nature, in contemplation of law, will not render a person liable for larceny; though the right of the owner would be protected by a civil action. As this principle applies, by common law, to monkeys, bears, foxes, etc., it will evidently apply to coons." That ruling was criticised, however, in Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 483, 47 Am. Rep. 765, note, wherein the court said: "Iowa is credited with the decision (Warren v. State, 1 G. Greene (Ia.) 106), that coons are unfit for food, and therefore by the common law, not the subject of larceny, when reclaimed. Among the colored people of the South the coon when fat in the fall and winter, is regarded as a luxury, and the Iowa decision would not be regarded by them as sound law or good taste." It may be noticed, however, that the Iowa decision did not purport to turn on the question of fitness for food.

Doves are ferae naturae and as such, are not subjects of larceny, except when in the care and custody of the owner. Com. v. Chace, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 15, 19 Am. Dec. 348, wherein the court said: "It is held in all the authorities, that doves are ferae naturae, and as such are not subjects of larceny, except when in the care and custody of the owner; as when in a dovecot or pigeon-house, or when in the nest before they are able to fly. If, when thus under the care of the owner, they are taken furtively, it is larceny. The reason of this principle is, that it is difficult to distinguish them from other fowl of the same species. They often take a flight and mix in large flocks with the doves of other persons, and are free tenants of the air, except when, impelled by hunger or habit, or the production or preservation of their young, they seek the shelter prepared for them by the owner. Perhaps when feeding on the grounds of the proprietor, or resting on his bar on other buildings, if killed by a stranger, the owner may have trespass, and if the purpose be to consume them as food, and they are killed or caught or carried away from the inclosure of the owner, the act would be larceny. But in this case there is no evidence of the situation they were in when killed, whether on the flight, a mile from the grounds of the owner, or mingled with the doves of other persons, enjoying their natural liberty. Without such evidence the act of killing them, though for the purpose of using them as food, is not felonious."

Tamed pigeons are more like domestic fowl than like wild animals, and are the subject of larceny even though they are not confined but are allowed the liberty of going about in the air as they please. Rex v. Howell, 2 Den. C. C. (Eng.) 363 note; Reg. v. Cheafor, 5 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 367, 8 Eng. L. & Eq. 598; Rex v. Brooks, 4 C. & P. 131, 19 E. C. L. 308.

In the case last cited it was said: "If these pigeons were so far tame that they came home every night to roost in these boxes, after they had been out to feed, I shall hold them to be reclaimed, so as to be the subject of larceny. I know that pigeons being accustomed to pitch on a man's field, would not be sufficient."

A sable caught in a trap in the woods cannot, while it remains in the trap, be the subject of larceny; and therefore it is no slander to charge one with having stolen a sable out of a trap. Norton v. Ladd, 5 N. H. 203, 20 Am. Dec. 573.

Turkeys, whose remote parents were brought to Hawaii and which have now reverted to a wild state and are not in the custody or control of any person, although not strictly ferae naturae, because not of a wild species, are not the property of the landowner and are not subjects of larceny. Rex v. Manu, 4 Hawaii 409, wherein it was said: "On the mountain range of this island, back of Waialua, called the Waiannae Mountains, are numbers of turkeys. These birds were brought to this country so long ago that there is no remembrance existing as to the exact time when or by whom they were imported. These birds are now in a wild state, afraid of man, breeding in the unfrequented parts of the mountains and bush country and have been hunted down and caught by devices, precisely as if they were ferae naturae. They are not penned or fed, marked by the landowner, nor does he exercise any actual control over them except as he may be able to catch them and reduce them to his possession. It is well known that the domestic turkey is descended from the wild turkey, first found in America, modified by breeding and the care of man, and this perhaps accounts for the tendency to revert to the wild state which is so strongly manifested in them. These turkeys, although 'wild,' are not properly speaking 'wild animals.' Where the phrase 'wild animals' is used, the word 'wild' is used as a generic term to indicate that they are of a species not usually domesticated, and does not refer to their comparative docility or familiarity with man. We consider that these turkeys are not properly speaking animals ferae naturae, though partaking of their habits. . . . Are turkeys in the condition and situation of these turkeys the property of the owner of the land on which they range? . . . Now, to say that these turkeys are A's solely because they are on A's land, would lead to the absurdity that they would become B's when they went on B's land. Suppose on a certain night A goes into the woods on his own land and ensnares part of a flock of the so-called 'wild turkeys,' and the rest of the flock, being disturbed, cross over the boundary to the land of B, and the next night

A ensnares them on B's land. On the theory advanced that the place of capture determines the ownership, the latter taking would be larceny. In this case before us, if the owner of the land where the alleged taking of the turkeys took place was able to trace them, as the undisputed descendants of birds owned by him or his grantors, he would thus show title to them. So far from this being the evidence in this case, it is more than probable that these turkeys are not the descendants of a parent stock introduced on this land by one person, but that these birds have received accessions at different times from the tame turkeys of many different individuals. In the absence, therefore, of proof of ownership of these turkeys, by the prosecuting witness, aside from the fact that they were caught on his land, and it being proved that they cannot be distinguished from any other turkeys on contiguous lands, they are not the subjects of larceny."

Oysters planted in public waters by a private person, remain the property of the planter, if planted in a place where oysters do not naturally grow, and if the place is so designated by stakes or other marks that the oysters can be readily distinguished from others in the same waters, and such oysters are the subject of larceny. State v. Taylor, 27 N. J. L. 117, 72 Am. Dec. 347, wherein the court said: "It is objected that oysters being animals ferae naturae, there can be no property in them, unless they be dead or reclaimed, or tamed, or in the actual power or possession of the claimant; and that the want of such averment is a fatal defect in the indictment. . . . The principle, as applied to animals ferae naturae, is not questioned. But oysters, though usually included in that description of animals, do not come within the reason or operation of the rule. The owner of oysters has the same absolute property in them that he has in inanimate things or in domestic animals. Like domestic animals, they continue perpetually in his occupation, and will not stray from his house or person. Unlike animals ferae naturae, they do not require to be reclaimed and made tame by art, industry, or education; nor to be confined, in order to be within the immediate power of the owner. If at liberty, they have neither the inclination nor the power to escape. For the purposes of the present inquiry, they are obviously more nearly assimilated to tame animals than to wild ones, and perhaps, more nearly to inanimate objects than to animals of either description. The indictment could not aver that the oysters were dead, for they would then be of no value; nor that they were reclaimed or tamed, for in this sense they were never wild, and were not capable of domestication; nor that they were confined, for that would be absurd. . . . The oysters in question had once been the property of Hil-dreth. The only question is, whether the planting of these oysters in a public sound, where all the inhabitants have a common right of fishery, was necessarily an abandonment, or a return of the property to the common stock. There was clearly no intention on the part of the owner to abandon his property; on the contrary, they were gathered and planted expressly for the benefit of the owner. If an abandonment is to be presumed, it will be a legal intentment directly against the truth of the case. The casting of property into the sea, with the intention of reclaiming it, is not an abandonment. . . . It was earnestly urged, as an objection to sustaining the conviction in the present case, that the principle recognized by the court will, in effect, authorize the exclusive appropriation of public navigable waters to private purposes, and that it will virtually confer upon every individual who stakes off and plants an oyster bed a right of several fishery in the land thus appropriated, to the exclusion of the public. . . . But does any such consequence necessarily result from the instruction given to the jury? They were expressly told that, if these oysters were planted where oysters naturally grew, or if they could not be readily distinguished from the natural product of the waters by persons engaged in fishing, the defendant could not be convicted. If, then, the oysters interfered in any way with the defendant's right of fishing, or with the right of navigation, or any other right of the public in the waters, it is not claimed that the defendant had not a right to remove or destroy them. Clearly the legislature may, at their pleasure, prohibit the planting of oysters by individuals in navigable waters, or cause them to be removed when planted, whenever they become injurious to the public interest or are regarded as an encroachment upon the public rights. But admitting, as may be done, that the planting of the oysters in the public waters was a clear case of nuisance and encroachment upon the public right, it could give the defendant no right to steal them or appropriate them to his own use. The deposit of wood in the public highway is an encroachment on the right of way, and may and does necessarily prevent any other individual from availing himself of the same privilege upon the same spot. The wood may be removed as a nuisance, but a third party would not be justified in stealing it because it was a nuisance. It is not pretended, in the present case, that the defendant's right of fishing was in the least impaired, or that the oysters were taken in the fair exercise of his lawful right. The case presented is that of a wilful and wanton appropriation of his neighbor's property, with intent to steal."

It seems that the same rule applies to clams. People v. Morrison, 194 N. Y. 175, 86

N. E. 1120, 128 Am. St. Rep. 552, reversing judgment 124 App. Div. 10, 108 N. Y. S. 262, rehearing denied 195 N. Y. 116, 16 Ann. Cas. 871, 88 N. E. 21, 133 Am. St. Rep. 780, wherein the court said: "When clams or oysters are reclaimed from nature and transplanted to a bed where none grew naturally, and the bed is so marked out by stakes as to show that they are in the possession of a private owner, they are personal property and may become the subject of larceny. Although in the nature of ferae naturae, to which a qualified title may be acquired by possession, when reclaimed and transplanted they need not be confined, for as they cannot move about they cannot get away, even when placed in the water, as they must be in order to live. They and their produce thus cease to be common property and belong exclusively to the one who transplanted them, and whoever takes them from the plat without his permission is a trespasser and it may be a thief." In that case, however, the conviction was not sustained because of lack of evidence to the effect that the bed of clams was properly staked.

Oysters in the water lands belonging to the state are ferae naturae and, in the absence of statutory inhibition may be taken by any person. And a statute making certain state tide-water lands oyster reserve lands, does not make them the subject of larceny. State v. Johnson, 80 Wash. 522, 141 Pac. 1040.

Fish are the subject of larceny under the same conditions as other animals, and if they are confined in such a way that they may be taken at the pleasure of him who has so appropriated and confined them, they are the subject of larceny. State v. Krider, 78 N. C. 481, wherein an indictment charging the defendant with having stolen "five fish," without alleging any of the conditions which would render the fish the subject of larceny, was held to be fatally defective. In State v. Shaw, 67 Ohio St. 157, 65 N. E. 875, 60 L.R.A. 481, it was held that fish confined in nets in such a way that, although there was a possibility, there was very little probability, of their escape, were sufficiently reduced to possession to make them property and the subject of larceny. The court said: "In the present case the fish were not at large in Lake Erie. They were confined in nets, from which it was not absolutely impossible for them to escape, yet it was practically so impossible; for it seems that under ordinary circumstances few, if any, of the fish escape. The fish that were taken had not escaped, and it does not appear that they would have escaped, or even that they probably would have escaped. They were so safely secured that the owners of the nets could have taken them out of the water at will as readily as the defendants did. The possession of the owners of the nets was so complete and certain that the defendants went to the nets and raised them with assurance that they could get the fish that were in them. We think, therefore, that the owners of the nets, having captured and confined the fish, had acquired such a property in them that the taking of them was larceny."

An otter, reclaimed, confined, or dead, has been held to be the subject of larceny because of the value of its fur. State v. House, 65 N. C. 315, 6 Am. Rep. 746.

3. UNDER STATUTE.

By virtue of a statute in Arkansas (Gantt's Digest, sec. 1355; Kirby's Digest, sec. 1825) larceny is the taking and removing of any goods or personal chattels of any kind whatever, with intent to steal the same. Under that statute it has been held that a reclaimed and tamed mocking bird was the subject of larceny, since it was personal property. Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, 47 Am. Rep. 765 note, wherein the court said: "The reclaimed mocking bird in question was no doubt personal property. The owner could have brought trespass against the thief, who invaded her portico at night, and deprived her of the possession of her songster, which she prized above price; and she could have maintained replevin against the person to whom he sold it, had he refused to surrender it to her. The market value of the bird was, perhaps, more than ten times greater than that of the cage, which was the subject of petit larceny. To hold that larceny might be committed of the cage, but not of the bird, would be neither good law or common sense."

MURPHY

v.

HITCHCOCK ET AL.

Hawaii Supreme Court—July 19, 1915.

22 Hawaii 665.

Animals — Wild Animals — Right of Property in Fish.

Where one catches fish in public waters and confines them in a private pond having no outlet to public waters, he becomes the owner of such fish and may recover their value from another wrongfully taking them from his possession.

[See note at end of this case.]

Executions — Sale of Leasehold Interest in Pond — Effect as Passing Title to Fish.

Fish in a private pond, unconnected with public waters, do not pass by sale of a lease-hold interest in the pond made under execution, the levy and notice of sale being silent as to the fish, and the execution defendant being admitted to be the owner of the fish at the time of the levy and sale.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court of Molokai.

Action by Eugene Murphy, plaintiff, against H. R. Hitchcock et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

E. Murphy for appellant.

D. H. Case and E. Vincent for appellees.

[666] QUARLES, J.—The plaintiff commenced an action in the district court of Molokai to recover from the defendants $165, the alleged value of certain fish alleged to have been taken by the defendants from a fish pond called "Kupeke" in December, 1914, alleged to be the property of the plaintiff. The cause was submitted on an agreed statement of facts in writing, wherein it is agreed as follows:

"1. That on the 4th day of November A. D. 1914 judgment was rendered in favor of one Otomatsu Kanayama and against one Akutagawa for the sum of $876.82.

"2. That at the time of the rendition of the judgment the defendant Akutagawa was the holder of a lease on a pond known as 'Fish Pond of Kupeke.'

"3. That the said pond of Kupeke is a pond enclosed from the sea and into and from which fish cannot enter nor leave, and is used for the purpose of raising pond mullet for the market.

"4. That the Sheriff of the County of Maui in furtherance of the judgment mentioned in paragraph '1' levied on, among other property the leasehold for the said 'Fish Pond of Kupeke.'

"5. That the said leasehold in which the said 'Fish Pond of Kupeke' is situated was sold at public auction on the 12th day of December A. D. 1914 to Otomatsu Kanayama, and that the defendants claim under that sale and claim that the sale of the leasehold conveyed all the fish in the 'Fish Pond of Kupeke.'

"6. That on the 12th day of December A. D. 1914, and shortly after the sale of the leasehold by the sheriff the plaintiff herein purchased all the fish in the said 'Fish Pond of Kupeke' from Akutagawa, who was acknowledged to be the owner thereof, except for the levy and sale of the leasehold.

"7. That the defendants herein knew that the plaintiff herein claimed to be the owner of the fish in the said 'Fish Pond of Kupeke' and were present when plaintiff purchased and paid for the same to Akutagawa.

"8. That the defendants herein claiming to have acquired all the fish under the sale of the said leasehold of the said 'Fish Pond of Kupeke' removed therefrom fish of the value of $75.00.

"That as a part of this submission of facts, the original lease [667] from Mrs. Buchanan to Akutagawa, and papers in the case, of Omoatsu Kanayama vs Akutagawa as follows:

"1. Sheriffs notice of sale.

"2. Sheriffs bill of sale.

"3. Bill of sale from Akutagawa to Eugene Murphy, purporting to convey the fish in the 'Fish Pond of Kupeke.'"

The district magistrate decided in favor of the defendants and from the judgment the plaintiff has appealed directly to this court upon points of law set forth in his appeal as follows:

"1. That the court erred in rendering judgment for the defendants herein.

"2. That the court erred in holding that the fish in the pond passed to the purchaser of the leasehold at the sale thereof by the sheriff.

"3. That the court erred in holding that the purchase of the fish in the fish pond from the owner thereof did not pass title to said purchaser.

"4. That the court erred in holding that the sheriff could pass title in the fish pond herein involved without selling or levying on the same and giving notice that he offered said fish in the fish pond for sale."

The lease of the pond under which plaintiff's vendor held was made a part of the agreed statement of facts. Said lease runs for a term of five years, but says nothing about fish in the pond and contains no condition as to the growing or removal of fish in or from the pond. The levy and sale under execution was upon the leasehold estate of Akutagawa only. No levy upon the fish in the pond, or sale thereof, as personal property or otherwise is shown to have been made by the sheriff under the execution. The only question before us for determination is, did the levy and sale of the the leasehold carry with it the ownership or title to the fish in the pond? If it did, the judgment of the district magistrate is correct. If it did not, the judgment is erroneous, and under the stipulated facts judgment should have been entered in favor of the plaintiff for $75 and costs.

[668] Fish in public waters, like animals ferae naturae, belong to the public, in which individuals, as such, have no property interests so long as such fish are in public waters. However, when one captures fish in the public waters and confines them in a private pond, disconnected from the public waters, he acquires an absolute property in them, subject to be divested only by their escape, and another taking them from his possession is liable to him for their value. It is true that fish in a pond, although confined and subjected to the dominion of the one exercising dominion over the pond, are in their natural element. Fish are incapable of existing out of water. This, however, does not make them appurtenant to the pond or place wherein they may be confined, as they may be removed from such pond or other waters without injury to the pond where first confined. And so of animals, wild by nature, confined in a park or close where they find grass and other vegetation upon which to feed, but which they may find elsewhere when removed. The leasehold in question is analogous to a leasehold of a house for mercantile purposes, in which the lessee conducts a store. His stock of merchandise does not become appurtenant to the house or lands upon which situated nor is it appurtenant to his leasehold interest in the realty, and consequently does not pass with such leasehold under an execution sale of the leasehold. In such case the merchant leases the building for certain uses, that is, a place to keep his goods for sale. In case of a levy of an execution upon his leasehold interest, and sale thereof, nothing being said about his stock of merchandise in the building leased, it could not well be contended that such levy and sale carries with it, ipso facto, the stock of goods in the building, or that the execution defendant might not within a reasonable time after such sale remove his goods. In the case at bar the pond was leased for certain uses, "the raising of pond mullet for the market." One of the agreed facts is that the lessee who sold the fish to plaintiff "was acknowledged to be the owner thereof, except for the levy and sale." This stipulation negatives the idea that the [669] fish were in the pond at the time of the execution of the lease, as otherwise the lessor would have been the owner of the fish, subject only to the right of the lessee to take the same under his lease (19 Cyc. 989, 990). The natural inference from the agreed facts is that plaintiff's vendor caught the fish and placed them in the pond for the purpose of growing them for market. It is well established that no personal property passes under an execution sale unless it was seized in levying an execution, actually or constructively, under a levy of such execution, and without such seizure a sale under execution does not pass title to the property attempted to be sold under the execution (Ferry v. Hakalau Plantation Co. 21 Hawaii 745). At the common law a leasehold interest was regarded as a chattel, and a levy of an execution upon the leasehold was required to be made as upon other chattels with the exception that the officer making the levy need not take actual possession of the property leased (Freeman on Executions, 3rd ed. § 119; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2nd ed.) p. 653, note and authorities cited; 17 Cyc. 953, and authorities cited in note 50; 8 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 550).

In the case at bar the levy was upon the leasehold and no mention whatever was made of the fish in the levy, notice of sale, or sheriff's bill of sale, all of which merely described the lease of the fish pond. We are of opinion that the execution sale did not pass the title to the fish any more than an execution sale of a peddler's cart would pass the title to goods and wares in the cart not mentioned in the levy, notice and certificate of sale. We think the conclusion inevitable that the fish in the pond did not pass with the execution sale of the leasehold. The fact that mullet in ponds having no outlet to the sea will not propagate is so well known that the court takes judicial notice of such fact. Such ponds are used for the purpose of growing mullet which are taken in the sea while young. The fish are thus reclaimed and become private property, and as such the owner thereof is protected in his usufruct. It is not a privilege of fishing or taking fish from a pond that was granted by the [670] lease in question, but an estate for years in the realty, and in this particular the case at bar is unlike those cases where a right of fishery is an appurtenant or an easement to an estate in land, absolute or limited, and, as such, necessarily passes with the dominant estate. A grant or license to take fish from private owners is not uncommon, and, by custom, rights of fishery may be appurtenant to an estate in lands. A case that has frequently occurred is where a riparian owner leases lands through which a non-navigable stream runs, the lease carrying with it the exclusive right of fishery belonging to the riparian owner unless there is in the lease a reservation of such right to the lessor. The reported cases involving the question whether the right to take fish passes with the lease of lands apply to cases where the fish propagate in the waters upon said lands and not to a case like the one at bar where the pond is used for the purpose of growing fish caught in the sea.

We are of opinion that under the agreed statement of facts that the fish in the pond leased to the vendor of plaintiff did not pass by the execution sale and that the judgment should have been in favor of the plaintiff for $75, the agreed value of the fish appropriated by the defendants.

In arriving at this conclusion we do not desire to be understood as holding that plaintiff was not under the duty of removing the fish from the pond within a reasonable time—with reasonable promptness—after the execution sale, or as holding that he could burden the purchaser at such sale with the keeping of the fish in the pond. Under the agreed facts the defendants took the said fish from the pond within a period of from one to nineteen days, and we are unable to say that the plaintiff abandoned the fish and thereby lost title.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded to the district court of Molokai with instructions to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $75 and costs.

NOTE.

The opinion in the reported case discusses the right of private property in fish, and holds that where a person catches fish in public waters and confines them in a private pond whence they have no outlet to public waters, he becomes the owner of them, and may recover their value of one wrongfully taking them from his possession. For a full consideration and review of the right of property in wild animals, including fish, see the note to Graves v. Dunlap, reported ante, this volume, at page 944.

WARD.

Iowa Supreme Court—May 8, 1915.

170 Iowa 185; 152 N. W. 501.

Animals — Wild Animals — Right to Kill Deer — Justification.

One charged with killing deer in violation of Code Supp. 1913, §§ 2551a, 2551b, making it unlawful for any person other than the owner or person authorized by the owner to kill any deer, except when distrained as provided by law, may show in justification that the deer, when killed, was on his premises, destroying his property.

[See note at end of this case.]

Wild Game — Title in State — Construction of Statute.

The purpose of Acts 34th Gen. Assem. c. 118, as amended by Acts 35th Gen. Assem. c. 206, declaring that the ownership of and title to all wild game shall be in the state, and that no wild game shall be killed unless the person so doing shall consent that the title shall remain in the state, etc., is to establish title in the state to all wild game, dead or alive.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from District Court, Pottawattamie county: WOODRUFF, Judge.

Criminal action. L. C. Ward convicted of unlawfully killing deer and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Turner & Cullison for appellant.

George Cosson and Wiley S. Rankin for appellee.

[186] EVANS, J.—The record herein strongly suggests a purely moot case. As is usual in such a case, the arguments are more formal than zealous. There is much in the record to indicate that the alleged criminal act was committed for the very purpose of presenting a case and taking judicial opinion thereon. Needless to say, the courts are not friendly to moot cases. They are kept sufficiently busy with bona fide controversies. In view of the fact, however, that the defendant is under statutory punishment, we do not feel justified in wholly forsaking him at this stage of his experiment.

In the judgment of the district court was included the following finding:

"It appears that this case was brought as a test case to determine whether this defendant has a right to kill deer that are injuring and destroying his corn. It appears from the evidence that in the neighborhood of defendant's farm there are from 150 to 200 deer which range up and down the country adjacent to defendant's premises, and that for years they have eaten up and trampled down more or less of the defendant's standing grain and his corn after it has been cut and shocked, even when piled up in his barn lots; that defendant [187] has many times driven them away, but they have come back and have destroyed his crops to the amount of hundreds of dollars, and at last he shot one, not for the purposes of food or out of wantonness, but to have the question determined by the highest judicial tribunal of this state whether he is obliged to submit to the continuation of such damage. It appears from his own testimony that he has never asked the game warden of this state to kill or capture any of such deer as provided in Chapter 206 of the Laws of the Thirty-fifth General Assembly. It is the opinion of the court that the defendant had no right to kill the deer in question before he had asked protection from the game warden as seems to be afforded by such statute. Therefore and also for the purpose of having the matter determined the defendant is found guilty."

The defendant was prosecuted under Secs. 2551-a and 2551-b of the Code Supplement. Such sections are as follows:

"2551-a. That it shall be unlawful for any person other than the owner, or person authorized by the owner, to kill, maim, trap, or in any way injure or capture any deer, elk, or goat except when distrained as provided by law.

"2551-b. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for a period not exceeding thirty days or by a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

It will be noted that the prohibition of this statute is absolute and unqualified in its terms. The one question in the case is whether a person who kills a deer, elk, or goat is necessarily guilty of violating the statute regardless of the reasons for such killing. To put it in another way: Is it open to the defendant to justify an admitted killing by showing a reasonable necessity in defense of person or property?

The following, from the brief of counsel for the state, is [188] a sufficient indication of the circumstances of the killing complained of:

"This action is brought as a test case on stipulation as to facts in justice court. Defendant pleaded not guilty but admitted that he killed the deer. He alleged that the killing was done of necessity for the protection of his property.

"These deer, which are the property of the state, have selected the southwestern part of Iowa, particularly Pottawattamie County and vicinity, for their herding and living purposes for a number of years. There seems to be anywhere from 150 to 200 or more of them and they roam about at will. No ordinary lawful fence, such as the owners of property put up for their protection and the enclosure of their animals, is sufficient to keep this magnificent herd of deer off their farms. There is no question but that they go where they please and eat of such crops as they like. They will go up to an ordinary fence, and without any noticeable effort whatever, lift themselves gently and gracefully, and apparently glide over the highest fence and wander off into a field as if there had been no impediment whatever.

"Defendant, it seems, had driven off these animals several times but they came back into his yard and began eating fodder which had been stacked up near his place. The record shows conclusively that the deer which was killed by defendant attempted to harm no person; that it was simply eating of the fodder which is conceded to have been the property of defendant. Defendant claims that he was acting in his own right to protect his property and to keep the deer from injuring and destroying it."

It will be noted that the deer was killed not only while upon the defendant's premises but while he was actually engaged in the destruction of the defendant's property. Giving the testimony the fullest credence, the deer was one of great voracity. He was capable of doing and was threatening to do great injury to defendant's property.

[189] By way of analogy, we may note that the plea of reasonable self-defense may always be interposed in justification of the killing of a human being. We see no fair reason for holding that the same plea may not be interposed in justification of the killing of a goat or a deer. The right of defense of person and property is a constitutional right (Art. 1, Sec. 1, Constitution of Iowa), and is recognized in the construction of all statutes. If in this case it was reasonably necessary for the defendant to kill the deer in question in order to prevent substantial injury to his property, such fact, we have no doubt, would afford justification for the killing. Aldrich v. Wright, 53 N. H. 398, 16 Am. Rep. 339.

We do not presume to pass upon the weight of the evidence tending to prove the fact of reasonable necessity. It is sufficient to say that the evidence would have sustained such a finding if made by the trial court. The case was tried below on the theory that such defense was not available.

It will be noted that the act of killing, as contended by defendant, was wholly defensive and preventive. Whether a deer may be lawfully killed today by way of retaliation for the damage wrought by it yesterday, or whether it may be so killed by way of reprisal for damage wrought or threatened by other deer, are questions not involved herein, and we do not purport to pass on them.

II. The conclusion of the trial court was based in part upon the provisions of Chapter 206, 35 G. A. If there was in fact any violation of such statute by the defendant, it was not charged in the information. Furthermore, we see nothing in such statute which interposes any obstacle in the way of defendant's justification. Such statute is amendatory to Chapter 118, 34 G. A. Such Chapter 118, 34 G. A., as amended by Chapter 206, 35 G. A., is as follows:

"Sec. 1. The ownership and title of all wild game, animals, and birds, found in the state of Iowa, except deer in [190] parks and public and private preserves the ownership of which has been acquired prior to taking effect of this act and all fish in any of the public waters of the state, including all ponds, sloughs, bayous or other waters adjacent to any public waters, which ponds, sloughs, bayous, and other waters are stocked with fish by overflow of public waters, is hereby declared to be in the state, and no wild game, animals, birds, or fish shall be taken, killed, or caught in any manner at any time or had in possession, except the person so catching, taking, killing or having in possession, shall consent that the title to said wild game, animals, birds, or fish, shall be and remain in the state of Iowa for the purpose of regulating and controlling the use and disposition of the same after such catching, taking, or killing.

"Sec. 2. The catching, taking, killing, or having in possession, wild game, animals, birds, or fish at any time, or in any manner, or by any person, except as provided in section one hereof shall be deemed a consent of said person that the title of the state shall be and remain in the state for said purpose of regulating the use and disposition of the same and said possession shall be consent to such title in the state.

"Sec. 3. When it shall become necessary in the opinion of the state game warden or his deputies to kill or capture any deer now running at large within this state, it shall be done under the authority and direction of the state fish and game warden, who shall distribute such deer so killed or captured within this state and the expense of said killing or capture and distribution shall be paid by the person receiving such deer."

The purpose of the foregoing was to establish title in the state to all wild game whether dead or alive. This title was fully recognized by the defendant at every step. No attempt was made by him to appropriate or conceal the carcass of the slain deer. On the contrary, he immediately notified the public authorities and tendered the carcass to the appropriate officer.

[191] We think, therefore, that the defendant was entitled to make an issue of fact on the question of justification as already indicated. The judgment of conviction must therefore be Reversed.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that a statute vesting the title to wild animals and game in the state, and declaring that the killing thereof shall be under the authority and direction of the state fish and game warden, does not prevent a property owner from killing deer in the defense of his property against their trespass, if he recognizes the property right of the state in the carcasses. For an extended review of the authorities discussing the ownership of wild animals, and the power of the state to regulate and control the acquisition by individuals of property therein, see the note to Graves v. Dunlap, reported ante, this volume, at page 944.

v.

ECKES ET AL.

New York—City Court of Yonkers—July 10, 1916.

160 N. Y. Supp. 489.

Animals — Bees.

Bees are "ferae naturae."

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where a swarm of bees leaves the owner's premises, his title to them is not destroyed by their alighting on another's land.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

If the act of reducing to possession wild animals, such as bees, is done by a trespasser, he gets no title, which vests in the owner of the soil, and the wrongdoer is liable to the owner for the trespass and for conversion.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The qualified property of an owner of a swarm of bees, which flies from the hive, continues so long as he in person or by agent can keep them in sight and possesses the power to pursue them.

[See note at end of this case.]

Matter of arbitration of Kenneth W. Brown, plaintiff, against Fred Eckes et al., defendants. The facts are stated in the opinion. JUDGMENT FOR PLAINTIFF.

Clarence Alexander for plaintiff.

William A. Walsh for defendants.

[490] BEALL, J.—This is a common-law arbitration, had before this court, wherein the parties stipulate to abide by its decision as to the title of and right of possession to a hive of bees. It appears from the evidence that the complainant, Brown, hived certain bees on Hamilton avenue in this city; that one of the hives swarmed and left Brown's place; that the defendant Eckes was doing some work on the house of a man named Deane, and, seeing a swarm of bees in the air, pounded upon tin and brought them down upon the Deane property, where they located upon a grapevine; that Mr. Deane did not wish any bees, and required Eckes to remove them; that Eckes upon that evening met the defendant Stevens, who claimed that he had lost a swarm of bees; and that Eckes delivered the bees to Stevens.

It has come to the hand of this court to decide all sorts of questions about all sorts of animals, reptiles, and insects. Cases of men, women, and children are constant; cases of those who have wronged others and of those who unjustly contest matters. Horses and their condition, habits, and relationship to their owners and strangers are perpetually with us. We are seldom lonely for the want of a dog case, and have expounded that law at great length, while matters of cats, goats, wild deer, pigeons, birds, including the usefulness of the highhold, otherwise known as the flicker, and as to whether he is a song-bird, and of hens and roosters and robins, and as to which of them chiefly annoys the tired man at dawn, are things with which the court is thoroughly familiar. But this is the first time it has had to dive into the interesting question of the law of bees. It is to be presumed that ultimately we shall have to deal with ants and flies and other varieties of insects. The law of snakes we know.

It is not the intention of the court to review the history of bees, of their origin in Asia, and of how they have followed man in the development of civilization, and have been tamed and used by him, and have contributed to his comfort and welfare, although it is an interesting study and one to be recommended. We shall pass without comment the fact that the claimant to these bees is a lawyer, and that no lawyer needs bees to assist him in stinging. The thing really turns on the question of identity, and at the preliminary hearing, when the courtroom was nearly filled with lawyers, I offered to appoint any one of them a referee to make personal examination of these bees for marks of identification, which offer they unanimously rejected, the [491] first time in my experience with the law that a lawyer has refused to accept a reference.

The original proceeding was to determine whether or not the defendants here were guilty of larceny under that section of the Code which required a man to advertise lost property, and it was even contended that it was the duty of the finder to return this property to the owner—as one should keep a rattlesnake for a pet and allow it to stroll upon another's property, and that other be guilty of larceny unless he returned it; as one should house a tiger which might escape on another's domain, and hold that other guilty of larceny unless he returned it. The court refused to entertain the charge of larceny, and the parties hereto were generous enough to submit the question of ownership to the court as arbitrator.

The custom in London with respect to the trial of men charged with cruelty to animals is this: They are brought to a court, where there is a large yard, and a special judge examines the animals to determine their condition. I have followed the same custom, and nearly always examine the horses where men are brought before me for cruelty to them. The rule of this court for many years has been, in cases involving the ownership of dogs, to take the claimants into my big office, station them at opposite ends of the room, and allow the dog to choose his master. The ownership of pigeons and of chickens we have determined by releasing them at the roosting time and permitting them to decide upon their homes. But in this case I decline to deal personally with the subject-matter of this action, and, together with the lawyers, refuse to make any personal or private inspection of them.

Extensive research has been made into this question of bees by both counsel for the contendants and by the court, and I admit that the subject of the law of the busy bee is a fascinating one. It is admitted by both sides that bees are ferae naturae, and as to the law of them Blackstone classifies them with wild animals; but Blackstone's law was taken from the Greeks and from the Romans, and, curiously enough, there has been practically no change in that law since the days of Plato, and an uninterrupted line of decisions through Greek, Roman, English, French, the Netherlands, and the English common law, down to late decisions in Iowa, are practically to the same effect—the probable reason for this set policy being the danger of touching the subject. For instance, it has been pointed out to me that Gaius, whose Commentaries are supposed to have been written 160 A. D., states it thus:

"In those wild animals whose nature or custom it is to go away and return—as pigeons, bees, and deer, which habitually go into the forest and return—our rule is laid down that only the determination of the intent of returning marks the end of the property in them, and the property in them is acquired by the next one who take (or occupies) them; it is said that when their habit of returning ceases, their intent (or instinct) of returning also ceases."

And in Justinian's Corpus Juris Civilis it is put as follows:

"Bees are wild by nature; and so, if a swarm alight on your tree, it is not to be considered yours, until you have hived it, any more than the birds [492] which build their nests there; and hence, if it be hived by another, it becomes his property. . . . A swarm which has flown from your hive is considered yours as long as it is in your sight, and not difficult to be pursued; otherwise, it belongs to the next person who takes it."

While Domat said:

"As we may possess living creatures, which it is not always possible to have in our power and custody, so we retain possession of them whilst we shut them up, whilst we have them under the care of a keeper, or if, being made tame, they return home without a keeper, as bees to their hives, and pigeons to their dove houses." Civil Law, I, bk. 3, pt. 1, subd. 7, § 2133.

Puffendorf, in his Law of Nature, expresses it thus:

"Yet bees are no doubt wild by nature, since their custom of returning to their hive doth not proceed from their familiarity with mankind, but from their own secret instinct; they being in all respects utterly unteachable. It is nevertheless one of Plato's laws—who-soever shall pursue the swarms which belong to others and by striking upon the brass shall draw them with the delightful sound to fix near himself, let him make restitution for the damage. Where he seems to presuppose that the owner of the bees did not follow them when they left his hives, Pliny will have the bees to be neither wild nor tame; others divide them into both kinds. But that, so long as they return to our hives, they are properly our own and cannot be hurt without our loss or damage, is very laboriously proved in that declamation of Quintilian, entitled 'The Poor Man's Bees.'" Volume 4, c. 6, § 5.

Of course, if the bees were Brown's, his title to them was not destroyed by the fact that they alighted on Deane's land, and there are pointed out to me many authorities in favor of this. Thibaut (Syst. des Pandekten Rechts) accepts it as the general law of the civilized world. The Code Napoléon (section 564) makes it the law of France and of Algiers. Louisiana, adopting the French Code, adopts it. Section 519, La. Code Civile. Bracton (liber 2, c. 1) recognizes man's qualified property in them both by the natural law as well as the civil law. See also Preuss, Allgemein Landrecht, I, 9, § 118 f. Oesterr.; Gesetzbuch, § 384; Duranton, Cours de Droit, IV. No. 56; Ortolan, Explic. des Inst. No. 357; Toullier, Cours de Droit, 4, No. 50; Pand. 33, 7, 12, § 13; also Fr. Lois Usuelles, 4 Anvril, 1889, § 2, subd. 9:

"The proprietor of a swarm has the right to reclaim and repossess them so far as he can see them and follow them; otherwise, the swarm belongs to the owner of the land upon which they affix themselves."

See 3 Kent Comm. 348; Wallis v. Mease, 3 Bin. (Pa.) 546; Bl. Comm. IV, 236, note 18; Merrills v. Goodwin, 1 Root (Conn.) 209; State v. Repp, 104 Ia. 305, 73 N. W. 829, 40 L.R.A. 687, 65 Am. St. Rep. 463; Case of Swans, 7 Coke 15b, 77 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 435.

The act of reducing to possession wild animals must not be wrongful, and if it is done by one who is a trespasser he gets no title, which vests in the owner of the soil, and the wrongdoer is liable to the owner for the trespass and for conversion. Harper v. Gallo-way, 58 Fla. 255, 51 So. 226, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794, 19 Ann. Cas. 235; Com. v. Chace, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 15, 19 Am. Dec. 348; Lonsdale v.

Rigg, 11 Exch. (Eng.) 654; Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, 34 L. J. C. Pl. 286, 11 Jur. N. S. 701, 12 L. T. N. S. 615, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 76.

"A mere temporary escape of the bees does not divest the title of the owner per industriam. They remain his property. A stranger cannot acquire [493] title if they intend to return, or the owner promptly pursues or reclaims or can identify them, although they may flee to and alight upon the land of another, where the owner cannot get them without becoming a trespasser himself." Merrills v. Goodwin, supra; Case of Swans, 7 Coke (Eng.) 15b; Goff v. Kilts, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 550.

In a larceny case it was held:

"To acquire a right in an animal so that it may become a subject of larceny, the pursuer must bring it into his ownership and control, so that he may subject it to his own use at his pleasure, and must so maintain his possession and control as to indicate that he does not intend to abandon them again to the world at large; but in cases where larceny is charged, the law does not require absolute security against the possibility of escape."

And one who asserts a legal title to them once they have swarmed must have kept them in sight until they settled.

"If a swarm [bees] fly from a hive of another, his qualified property continues so long as he can keep them in sight, and possess the power to pursue them. Under these circumstances, no one else is entitled to take them." 2 Bl. Comm. 393; 2 Kent Com. 394.

We moderns may wonder at the completeness of the law of bees, and at the attention and time that has been expended upon what we regard as a trivial subject. Nothing is trivial that involves human rights. Besides, it may be remembered that, in the days of those whom we term the ancients, the bee occupied a much more important place in the economy of the state than it does now. In Greece, in Egypt, in Judea, and to a somewhat less extent in the Roman provinces, honey was a most important article of commerce.

Upon the whole, I take it that the case turns upon the question of identity, and of whether the owner, and I shall take the liberty of enlarging the doctrine to include an employee of the owner, kept the bees in sight during the swarm until they alighted; this being really part of the question of identification. I determine that Brown has established the ownership of these bees, and is entitled to recover them, passing without comment the fact that this queen bee occasioned all of us a great deal of trouble by organizing the swarm. I make acknowledgment to counsel in the case, William A. Walsh on the one hand and Clarence Alexander on the other, for the ability and thoroughness with which they have briefed the case and helped me to this decision.

Introductory.

The purpose of this note is to consider in its various aspects the law relating to bees and, incidentally, to the honey and wax produced by them. For a comprehensive discussion of the right of property in wild animals other than bees, see the note to Graves v. Dunlap, reported ante, this volume, at page 944.

Bees as Property.

Blackstone, in his commentaries (2 Blk. Com. 392), gives the following comprehensive though brief discussion of the law of property in bees, enunciating principles generally followed in the cases: "Bees also are ferae naturae; but when hived and reclaimed, a man may have a qualified property in them, by the law of nature, as well as by the civil law. Puff. l. 4, c. 6, sec. 5. And to the same purpose, not to say in the same words, with the civil law, speaks Bracton: l. 2, c. 1, sec. 3, occupation, that is, hiving or including them, gives the property in bees; for though a swarm light upon my tree, I have no more property in them till I have hived them, than I have in the birds which make their nests thereon, and therefore if another hives them, he shall be their proprietor: but a swarm, which fly from and out of my hive, are mine so long as I can keep them in sight, and have power to pursue them; and in these circumstances no one else is entitled to take them. But it hath also been said, Bro. Abr. tit. propertie, 37, cites 43 Edw. III, 24, that with us the only ownership in bees is ratione soli; and the charter of the forest, 9 Hen. III, c. 13 which allows every freeman to be entitled to the honey found within his own woods, affords great countenance to this doctrine, that a qualified property may be had in bees, in consideration of the property of the soil whereon they are found."

Bees are ferae naturae, 2 Blk. Com. 392, 38; State v. Murphy, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 498. And see the reported case.

But it has been said that bees, while generally classed as ferae naturae, are so useful and common as to be all but domesticated. Parsons v. Manser, 119 Ia. 88, 93 N. W. 86, 97 Am. St. Rep. 283, 62 L.R.A. 132. And in another case it was said that although it may be proper still to class the bee among animals ferae naturae, it must nevertheless be regarded as coming very near the dividing line. Earl v. Van Alstine, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 630.

A qualified property may be acquired in wild bees by reclaiming them, hiving and inclosing them. 32 Bl. Com. 392; Goff v. Kilts, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 550. See also Idol v. Jones, 13 N. C. 162.

This qualified property in wild bees can be acquired only by reducing them to possession, and where two persons have an equal right to take certain bees into possession, they become the property of the one who first reduces them to possession. Gillet v. Mason, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 16; Ferguson v. Miller, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 243, 13 Am. Dec. 519; Adams v. Burton, 43 Vt. 36. In Gillet v. Mason, supra, the facts appeared as follows: "Mason proved, that previous to bringing this suit, he had found a tree, containing a swarm of bees, standing on the land of Timothy Gillet, lately deceased, father of the defendant; that he marked the tree with the initials of his name, A. M.; that the defendant had cut down the tree, and taken and carried away the bees and honey; and that the tree contained a large swarm of bees, and a large quantity of honey, of the value of ten dollars. It was admitted by the plaintiff, that the land where the tree stood, belonged to Timothy Gillet; but it was denied that the defendant was his heir, or had any possession of the land. It was admitted that the defendant was a son of Timothy Gillet. The justice, in charging the jury, put the cause on the point, which of the parties first reclaimed the bees from a wild state; and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff below, for nine dollars." Holding that the plaintiff had acquired no property in the bees, the court said: "Bees are considered . . . as ferae naturae but when hived and reclaimed a qualified property may be acquired in them. Occupation of them, according to Bracton, that is, hiving or inclosing them, gives the property in bees. In the present case, it appears the bees were not hived before they were discovered by the defendant in error, and the only act he did was to mark the tree. The land was not his, nor was it in his possession. Marking the tree did not reclaim the bees, nor vest an exclusive right of property in the finder, especially in this case, against the plaintiff in error, who, as one of the children of Timothy Gillet, (who does not appear to have made a will), must be considered as one of the heirs, and, as such, a tenant in common in the land. Blackstone (vol. 2, p. 393) inclines to the opinion, that under the charter of the forest, allowing every free man to be entitled to the honey found within his woods, a qualified property may be had in bees, in consideration of the soil whereon they are found, or an ownership, ratione soli. According to the civil law (Just. Inst. lib. 2, tit. 1, s. 14) bees which swarm upon a tree are not private property, until actually hived; and he who first incloses them in a hive becomes their proprietor." In Ferguson v. Miller, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 243, 13 Am. Dec. 519, it appeared that Miller had discovered a bee tree on the land of Jenkins, had marked it, and had, as he claimed, obtained a license from Jenkins to cut the tree, though Jenkins did not remember this at the trial. It further appeared that Ferguson had traced the same bees to the same tree, had removed the initials of Miller and marked the tree with his own initials, and, paying the landowner 50 cents for a license so to do, had cut the limb containing the bees. Miller thereupon brought an action of trespass against Ferguson for cutting the bee tree. Holding that Miller had acquired no property in the bees, the court said: "Admit the fact that Jenkins gave Miller liberty to cut the tree and take the bees—that did not give him a title to the bees till he had taken possession of them. The license was without consideration, and liable to be revoked at pleasure. Suppose Jenkins, himself, had cut the tree and taken the bees: can it be pretended that the plaintiff could have maintained an action against him? The plaintiff had neither the ownership nor the possession. The utmost extent of his right, was, that he had it in his power to become the owner, by taking possession. The defendant had the same, and, perhaps, a greater right; as the license to him may have been a revocation of the former license. But suppose it was not, then the two parties stood on an equal footing; and he who first reduced them to possession became the owner." In Adams v. Burton, 43 Vt. 36, it appeared that both the plaintiff and the defendant found a bee tree on the land of Ira Burton and that they both obtained of him permission to cut it, but that the plaintiff went to the tree and began to cut it first, and that the defendant and others drove him off and took possession. Sustaining judgment for the plaintiff in his action of trespass and case, the court said: "In this case, the plaintiff first found the bee tree; he thus acquired all the rights that appertain to the person who first discovered the home of the bees, whatever those rights may be. He proceeded to take possession of the tree, for the purpose of removing the honey, and when the defendants interfered with him, he was in the act of cutting the tree; he literally had his hand upon the hive; he was as much in possession as he would have been if he had cut the tree down, and had been in the act of removing the honey from its place of deposit, and the honey as certainly secured; the honey is all that is sought in such cases, and all that is of value, as the bees cannot be secured; the operator would much prefer to have them leave, as they always make a vigorous defense of the homestead, and those who thus rob the bees of their treasure generally have other stings to endure than those of conscience. In this case the defendants not only robbed the bees, the penalty for which they doubtless paid at the time, but they also robbed the plaintiff of his rights. They drove him from the actual possession of the property, and seized and appropriated it to their own use, they having no superior right to the plaintiff, thereby making themselves liable to him for the damage."

Until bees are reduced to possession, reclaimed and hived, the only property in them is ratione soli. 2 Bl. Com. 392; Rexroth v. Coon, 15 R. I. 35, 37, 23 Atl. 37, 2 Am. St. Rep. 863.

Owing to the peculiarity of their habits, a peculiar rule of property ratione soli applies to bees, whereby the owner of land on which wild bees swarm owns them by reason of his ownership of the land. 2 Blk. Com. 392; State v. Repp, 104 Ia. 305, 73 N. W. 829, 65 Am. St. Rep. 463, 40 L.R.A. 687. In Idol v. Jones, 13 N. C. 162, it was said, obiter: "It has been said, that in England, the only ownership of bees is ratione soli; and the charter of the forest, which allows every man to be entitled to the honey found within his own woods, sanctions the doctrine that a qualified property may be also had in bees, in consideration of the property of the soil, whereon they are found. (2 Bl. Com. 392.) The same rights of ownership in bees and honey, by reason of the ownership of the soil whereon they are found, are supposed to obtain in this country."

Therefore the finding of bees in a tree standing on another man's land gives the finder no right to the bees, for the property of the landowner ratione soli, although qualified and of a precarious nature, cannot be changed or terminated by the act of a mere trespasser. Merrills v. Goodwin, 1 Root (Conn.) 209; State v. Repp, 104 Ia. 305, 73 N. W. 829, 65 Am. St. Rep. 463, 40 L.R.A. 687; Rexroth v. Coon, 15 R. I. 35, 23 Atl. 37, 2 Am. St. Rep. 863. And see the reported case. In Rexroth v. Coon, supra, the following facts appeared: "In May, 1881, the plaintiff placed a small pine box, called a beehive, in the crotch of a tree in the woods on land of Samuel Green, in the town of Hopkinton. It remained in this position until about the first of September 1883, when the defendant went upon the premises and took and carried away the hive, together with a swarm of bees that was then in it, also the honey and honey-comb, and appropriated the same to his own use. The plaintiff had visited the hive about twice a year while it remained in its position, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any bees were in it or had been. He had found none. The plaintiff never had any express permission or license from the owner of the land to place or keep his hive in said tree. The defendant never had any express permission or license from the owner of the land to come upon it, and take and carry away said property." The plaintiff sued in trover for the conversion of the bees. Holding that the plaintiff had no property in the bees on which to base an action of trover, the court said: "Bees are ferae naturae, and the only ownership in them until reclaimed and hived is ratione soli. This qualified ownership, however, although exceedingly precarious and of uncertain tenure, cannot be changed or terminated by the act of a mere trespasser. That is to say, the act of reducing a thing ferae naturae into possession, where title is thereby created, must not be wrongful. And if such an act is effected by one who is at the moment a trespasser, no title to the property is created. . . . In the case at bar the plaintiff was a trespasser upon the land of Green from the beginning. He had no right to place the box or hive in the tree; and by placing it there he acquired no title to the bees which subsequently occupied it, or to the honey which they produced. Neither is it material to the issue for us to inquire whether the defendant, by taking the bees and honey away without previous permission from the owner of the land, was also a trespasser; for even admitting that he was, does not in any way aid the plaintiff in this suit. The fact that A. commits a trespass upon land of B., and carries away some of his personal property, would hardly be considered a cause of action in favor of C." In State v. Repp, 104 Ia. 305, 73 N. W. 829, 65 Am. St. Rep. 463, 40 L.R.A. 687, the following facts were stated by the court: "In July, 1895, Stevens found a bee tree on the land of Cody, and, without the latter's permission, chopped it down, and put the bees in a gum obtained from Mosely. These were left near the fallen tree, on Cody's land. The gum was cut from a tree on defendant's land, without his knowledge or consent; and finding it, with the bees, where left by Stevens, he [the defendant] removed them, at dusk of day, to the orchard of his mother, and inclosed them in a telescope gum, about thirty-three inches square, nailed to that procured from Mosely. This was unknown to the mother, whose residence was about one mile from the bee tree, while that of the defendant was three miles further away. It does not appear that the defendant knew who hived the bees, or that Stevens was aware that Mosely was not owner of the gum. When Stevens discovered the bees, after several days' search, the defendant refused to do more than return them, and after some parley this prosecution was begun." Holding that Stevens acquired no property in the bees by hiving them, as a trespasser, on the land of Cody, the court said: "Title to a thing ferae naturae cannot be created by the act of one who at the moment is a trespasser, and Stevens obtained no interest in the bees by the mere wrongful transfer from the tree to the gum. He neither owned the land on which he left them, nor the gum in which they were hived. Having neither title nor possession, he had no interest therein."

Similarly a landowner is the owner ratione soli of honey made by bees in a tree on his land, and no property therein may be claimed by another by reason of seeing the bees hive in the tree or finding the honey. Fisher v. Steward, Smith (N. H.) 60, wherein it was said: "The doctrine contended for by plaintiffs is injurious to the rights of property. Till the bees occupied the tree in question it is not pretended that plaintiffs had any right in it. What gave them a right? Having seen a swarm of bees, in which they had no property, occupying it? This circumstance, whether the effect of accident, or the result of labor and skill, cannot lessen the rights of the owner of the soil. Will it be pretended that plaintiffs thereby acquired a right to the tree? If they acquired a title to the honey, they must necessarily have a right to take it away, to cut down the tree, to pass over the defendant's land for the purpose, etc. Admitting that plaintiffs could acquire property in a swarm of bees, or in the honey, by finding, in some cases, they could not do so in the present case, because such right or property interferes with the rights and property clearly vested in defendant; it is inconsistent with it; it lessens its value at least. It is much more consonant to our ideas of property to say, that the bees and honey in the defendant's trees belong to him in the same manner and for the same reason as all mines and minerals belong to the owner of the soil."

But the rule that a landowner owns ratione soli bees which swarm on his land applies fully only to wild, unreclaimed bees, and when reclaimed bees fly from the hive of their owner and swarm on the land of another, the landowner does not acquire property in them, and their former owner does not lose his property in them, if he is able to pursue them, keep them in sight, and identify them,

Goff v. Kilts, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 550, wherein the court said: "It is said the owner of the soil is entitled to the tree and all within it. This may be true, so far as respects an unreclaimed swarm. While it remains there in that condition, it may, like birds or other game (game laws out of the question), belong to the owner or occupant of the forest, ratione soli. According to the law of nature, where prior occupancy alone gave right, the individual who first hived the swarm would be entitled to the property in it; but since the institution of civil society, and the regulation of the right of property by its positive laws, the forest as well as the cultivated field, belong exclusively to the owner, who has acquired a title to it under those laws . . . but if animals ferae naturae that have been reclaimed and a qualified property obtained in them, escape into the private grounds of another in a way that does not restore them to their natural condition, a different rule obviously applies. They are then not exposed to become the property of the first occupant. The right of the owner continues, and though he cannot pursue and take them without being liable for a trespass, still this difficulty should not operate as an abandonment of the animals to their former liberty. The rights of both parties should be regarded and reconciled as far as is consistent with a reasonable protection of each." And see the reported case.

Although bees are ferae naturae and the property in reclaimed bees is qualified, subject to be divested by their escaping and reverting to a wild state, a diversity is to be seen in the law of bees from the general rule as to the escape of animals ferae naturae, in that, when a reclaimed swarm of bees escapes from the hive of its owner, his qualified ownership of the bees continues so long as he can pursue them and keep them in sight, or so long as he can distinguish and identify them, even though he may not be able to assert his ownership and recover possession of the bees without being guilty of trespass. 2 Blk. Com. 392; Merrills v. Goodwin, 1 Root (Conn.) 209; Goff v. Kilts, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 550. And see the reported case. In Goff v. Kilts, supra, Kilts sued Goff in trespass for taking and destroying a swarm of bees and the honey made by them. It appeared that the swarm left Kilt's hive, flew off and went into a tree on the lands of the Lenox Iron Co.; that Kilts pursued them, kept them in sight, and marked the tree; and that two months afterwards the tree was found and cut down, the bees were killed, and the honey was taken by Goff. Holding that Kilts had not lost his property in the bees, the court said: "The question here is not between the owner of the soil upon which the tree stood that included the swarm, and the owner of the bees; as to him, the owner of the bees would not be able to regain his property, or the fruits of it without being guilty of trespass. But it by no means follows, from this predicament, that the right of the enjoyment of the property is lost; that the bees therefore become again ferae naturae, and belong to the first occupant. If a domestic or tame animal of one person should stray to the inclosure of another, the owner could not follow and retake it, without being liable for a trespass. The absolute right of property, notwithstanding, would still continue in him. Of this there can be no doubt. So in respect to the qualified property in the bees. If it continued in the owner after they hived themselves, and abode in the hollow tree, as this qualified interest is under the same protection of law as if absolute, the like remedy existed in case of an invasion of it. It cannot, I think be doubted, that if the property in the swarm continues while within sight of the owner—in other words, while he can distinguish and identify it in the air—that it equally belongs to him if it settles upon a branch or in the trunk of a tree, and remains there under his observation and charge. If a stranger has no right to take the swarm in the former case, and of which there seems no question, he ought not to be permitted to take it in the latter, when it is more confined and within the control of the occupant."

The Roman law was to the same effect as the rule just stated. 2 Justinian's Inst. lib. 2, s. 14, cited in 2 Kent Com. 350. But it has been held in a Scotch case that reclaimed bees, escaping from the land of their owner, remain the property only so long as he is pursuing them where he has a right to go, and that, if they come on another's land, that person may prevent pursuit on his land and becomes the owner of the bees if he hives them. Harris v. Elder, 57 J. P. (Eng.) 553, cited in Ingham on Animals, p. 20.

Bees are the subject of bargain and sale, and an action will lie for the recovery of the purchase price of bees sold. Simpson v. Parks, 23 Ont. W. Rep. 837, wherein the plaintiff recovered in an action for the balance of the purchase price of 54 hives or skeps of bees, but, aside from the mere allowing of the recovery, the court gave no peculiar consideration to the law of bees.

Bees as Subject of Larceny.

When in the wild state, unreclaimed, and not reduced to property, bees are not the subject of larceny. Cock v. Weatherby, 5 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 333, wherein it was held that proof of a charge of stealing a bee tree would not support an action of slander, for larceny could not be committed of wild, unreclaimed bees such as would be imported by the word bee tree. The court said: "The term bee tree relates to the wild, and not to the reclaimed, insect—the insect ferae naturae, and not yet reduced to property, and the term tree is applicable to standing timber only—'arbor dum crescit, lignum dum crescere nescit.' Neither of these articles are subjects of larceny." In Idol v. Jones, 13 N. C. 162, it was also held that an action of slander could not be predicated on a charge that the plaintiff had stolen a bee tree, although the court in that case treated the charge as being a charge of stealing a tree rather than bees.

Although ferae naturae, bees in the possession of any person are the subject of larceny. 2 East P. C. 16, § 41; Tibbs v. Smith, 2 Ld. Raym. (Eng.) 33; State v. Murphy, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 498; Harvey v. Com. 23 Grat. (Va.) 941. See also Hannam v. Mockett, 2 B. & C. 934, 944, 9 E. C. L. 280, 107 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 629. For, although not fit for food themselves, their honey is, and for that reason they are deemed to be within the common-law rule that animals ferae naturae, when reclaimed or confined, are the subject of larceny if fit for food. Harvey v. Com. 23 Grat. (Va.) 941.

In Tibbs v. Smith, 2 Ld. Raym. 33, 83 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 18, it was held that the words "thou hast stolen our bees . . . and thou art a thief" were actionable because the charge of thievery imparted that the bees were such as would be the subject of larceny, although without the addition "thou are a thief" they would not be actionable because simply a charge of having stolen bees would not impart that the bees were of a kind whereof larceny might be committed.

Beehives and honey, the property of a person, are the subject of larceny. Harvey v. Com. 23 Grat. (Va.) 941.

But confining wild bees in a skep in the top of a tree in which they have swarmed is not such a reduction of them to possession as to make them the subject of larceny. Wallis v. Mease, 3 Bin. (Pa.) 546, which was an action of slander for calling the plaintiff "a damned thief," in which the defendant sought to justify by proving that the plaintiff had been connected with the taking of a swarm of bees which the defendant had confined in a tree top. The court, holding the justification not to be good, because the taking of such bees would not constitute larceny, said per Tilghman, C. J.: "The taking of wild bees has been considered by the people of the country as a species of hunting. Bees are of a wild nature; and without deciding what the law might be, if they were removed from the tree, and secured in a hive, I am of opinion that, while they remain in the tree, they are not the subject of a felony. This wild nature remains unchanged, nor are they completely, and for any valuable purpose, reduced to possession." And further holding that by the common law the taking of honey animo furandi from a tree on the land of another would not constitute larceny, the court, per Brackenridge, J., made the following statement as to the larceny of bees and honey: "The question then will be, whether the taking honey from a tree on the land of another, with an intention of concealment, will amount to a felony. This must depend on the honey being the property of the owner of the land. If the bees are his property, the honey is; for it is the manufacture of his hive. It is the production of what may be called his flock. But this requires proof in the first instance, that the bees are his property. The treeing on his land may form some presumption of it; but this is not sufficient in a criminal case, when it is notorious in natural history, that there are wild bees, or bees ferae naturae as in the learned phrase. Bees not reclaimed from their wild nature and domesticated, are not the subject of property, any more than wild fowl or wild beasts. It cannot necessarily be inferred therefore, that the honey made in a tree on another's land, is made by the bees of the owner of the land. But it may be made out of the vesture of his land, and therefore his property. 'The bee sits on the bloom extracting liquid sweet;' and if the flowers are his, the honey is his property. For though it is changed by constipation, 'purissima mella stipant,' yet it is but the liquid condensed or thickened by working into honey; and the taking away butter is not the less a theft, because the taker had churned it from the milk of another. Here, however, a difficulty occurs; it may not have been the herbagium terrae, the herbage of the owner of this land, from whence the liquid was extracted that was made into honey. Bees do not confine themselves to the fruits or flowers growing near, but move to a distance: 'Floriferis ut apes in saltibus omnia libant.' It cannot therefore be made out to a certainty that the honey has been made out of the grass or vegetables of the owner of the land on which the tree is. This may seem an investigation to a minuteness partaking of the ridiculous. But it has not seemed to me possible to treat it otherwise. For though in tenui labor, yet the subtilty becomes necessary in order to discriminate. I have no idea that the understanding of the country could make it more or less a felony to take honey from the alveare, or to use the Anglo Saxon word, the skep of a bee tree on another man's land; yet it does not follow, that it cannot be considered but a felony; and this I take it is the objection to the charge of the judge, that it did not depend upon the understanding of the country whether it was felony or otherwise, but upon the common law, by which it did not necessarily follow that it was felony."

In an indictment for the larceny of bees the words "one swarm of bees of the value of five dollars, of the personal goods of Moses S. Chapman and James Chapman, then and there being found in the possession of the said Moses S. Chapman and James Chapman" had been held to constitute a sufficient allegation of possession to show that the bees were the subject of larceny. State v. Murphy, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 498.

Injuries by Bees.

It is a general rule that no recovery may be had against the owner of bees for injuries inflicted by them except on grounds of negligence, since he does not keep them at his peril. Petey Mfg. Co. v. Dryden, 5 Pcn. (Del.) 166, 62 Atl. 1056; Parsons v. Manser, 119 Ia. 88, 93 N. W. 86, 97 Am. St. Rep. 283, 62 L.R.A. 132. In Petey Mfg. Co. v. Dryden, supra, it was held that, in an action to recover damages for the loss of two mules, alleged to have died as the result of bites and stings inflicted by the defendant's bees, since recovery must be predicated on the owner's negligence, case and not trespass was the appropriate remedy. In Parsons v. Manser, supra, it was held that since bees are more like domesticated animals than wild animals the rule of absolute liability for injuries by wild animals ought not to be extended to them. The court said: "They [bees] are very useful, the aviary [apiary] often furnishing a livelihood, and generally proving a source of profit; and the books seem to look with more favor upon the keeping of animals useful to man than those which are worthless save as curiosities. For this reason the rule of absolute liability for the consequences of injuries received from wild beasts kept in confinement, declared in the earlier decisions, even if regarded as sound, ought not to be extended to creatures so nearly domesticated. . . . Bees, while generally classed as ferae naturae are so useful and common as to be all but domesticated. Keepers of the aviary [apiary] have carefully studied their habits and instincts, and control them almost as certainly as domestic animals. Serious injuries from them are very rare, and, unless some want of care in their management is shown, the owner ought not to be held responsible for damages occasioned by them." In Earl v. Van Alstine, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 630, it was said: "It is insisted by the plaintiff that while the proprietor of animals of a tame or domestic nature domitae naturae, is liable for injuries done by them (aside from trespasses upon the soil), only after notice of some vicious habit or propensity of such animal; that one who keeps animals ferae naturae is responsible at all events for any injuries they may do, and that as bees belong to the latter class it follows of course that the defendant is liable. In order to determine this question, upon which no direct or controlling authority exists, that I have been able to find, it becomes necessary to look into the principles upon which one who owns or keeps animals is held liable for their vicious acts. It will be found, on examination of the authorities upon the subject, that this classification of animals by the common law into animals ferae naturae and domitae naturae has reference mainly if not exclusively, to the rights of property which may be acquired in them; those of the latter class being the subjects of absolute and permanent ownership, while in regard to the former only a qualified property can exist, and the distinction is based upon the extent to which they can be domesticated or brought under the control and dominion of man, and not at all upon the ferocity of their disposition, or their proneness to mischief. For instance, the dog, some species of which are extremely savage and ferocious, is uniformly classed among animals domitae naturae, while the hare, the rabbit and the dove are termed ferae naturae, although comparatively harmless. It would not be rational to suppose that a classification adopted with exclusive reference to one quality of animals, could be safely used to define and regulate responsibilities growing out of other and different qualities; nor would it accord with that just analysis and logical accuracy which distinguish the common law, that it should be resorted to for that purpose. And although some dicta may be found in the books which might seem to countenance the idea, the decided cases do not lead to any such conclusion. . . . Having shown then, as I think, clearly, that the liability does not depend upon the classification of the animal doing the injury, but upon its propensity to do mischief, it remains to be considered whether bees are animals of so ferocious a disposition, that every one who keeps them, under any circumstances, does so at his peril. If it is necessary for the plaintiff to aver and prove the mischievous nature of the animal, nothing of the kind was done in this case; but if courts are to take judicial notice of the nature of things so familiar to man as bees, which I suppose they would be justified in doing, then I would observe that however it may have been anciently, in modern days the bee has become almost as completely domesticated as the ox or the cow. Its habits and its instincts have been studied, and through the knowledge thus acquired it can be controlled and managed with nearly as much certainty as any of the domestic animals; and although it may be proper still to class it among those ferae naturae, it must nevertheless be regarded as coming very near the dividing line, and in regard to its propensity to mischief, I apprehend that such a thing as a serious injury to persons or property from its attacks is very rare, not occurring in a ratio more frequent certainly than injuries arising from the kick of a horse, or the bite of a dog."

In the foregoing case, Earl v. Van Alstine, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 630, it was further held not to be negligence to keep bees in a yard adjoining a public highway where they had been kept for eight or nine years without causing damage, and that one so keeping them was not liable for injuries inflicted by them on horses passing on the highway. The court said: "The question is still left whether the keeping of these bees so near the highway subjects the defendant to a responsibility which would not otherwise rest upon him. I consider this question as substantially disposed of by the evidence in the case. It appears that bees had been kept in the same situation for some eight or nine years, and no proof was offered of the slightest injury ever having been done by them. On the contrary, some of the witnesses testify that they had lived in the neighborhood and had been in the habit of passing and repassing frequently, with teams and otherwise, without ever having been molested. This rebuts the idea of any notice to the defendant, either from the nature of bees or otherwise, that it would be dangerous to keep them in that situation; and of course, upon the principles already settled, he could not be held liable."

But the owner of bees is liable for injuries by them which result from his negligence. O'Gorman v. O'Gorman [1903] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 573; Parsons v. Manser, 119 Ia. 88, 93 N. W. 86, 97 Am. St. Rep. 283, 62 L.R.A. 132; Tellier v. Pelland, 5 Rev. Leg. 61. See also Earl v. Van Alstine, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 630. In O'Gorman v. O'Gorman, supra, it was held to be actionable negligence for the defendant to keep bees on his premises in such unreasonable numbers as to prove dangerous to those in the immediate neighborhood, the owner knowing them to be thus dangerous. It appeared that the defendant kept large numbers of beehives close to the boundary fence between his and the plaintiff's yards; that on the occasion in question the defendant smoked his bees out to obtain their honey; that the bees, irritated by the smoke, swarmed on the plaintiff and his horse in a nearby field; and that the horse, stung by the bees, dragged the plaintiff and threw him violently against a wall, causing him severe injuries. On these facts a verdict of £200 against the defendant was sustained. In Parsons v. Manser, 119 Ia. 88, 93 N. W. 86, 97 Am. St. Rep. 283, 62 L.R.A. 132, the plaintiff sued to recover damages for the stinging to death of his horses by the defendant's bees, the facts of the stinging being stated by the court as follows:

"The plaintiff is a peddler of medicines. As such he called at the house of a defendant to sell goods on the 7th day of July, 1900. He had hitched his team to a post a little west of the gate leading to the house, in the highway south of it, and about five feet from the fence. There were two bee gums about twenty-five feet north of the post in defendant's yard, and three more ten or twelve feet farther on. Trees stood close together west and north of this yard, and shrubbery and bushes to the east. The only unobstructed passage was to the south and southeast. Shortly after entering the house, he heard a crash, and upon running out found that the horses had pushed through or over the fence, and their heads were within a few feet of the hives. The hind wheels of the wagon were still on the fence, and one horse was lying down. Bees covered them. He immediately unhooked the traces, while defendant's daughter cut the lines, but both were soon compelled to flee for their own safety. Two gums were afterwards overturned by the horses. She went after help, while he did what he could by throwing water on the horses and trying to remove them." Holding that the jury properly found negligence from the foregoing facts, the court said: "The defendant naturally expected people to visit his home, and that teams would in all probability be hitched to the post. It was put there and maintained for that purpose, and this in itself was an assurance that it was a safe place to leave horses. But that was the course the bees were likely to fly in going to and from their hives, and there was evidence to the effect that they were prone to attack horses when perspiring, if near them. Moreover, the defendant was advised of this, as his daughter had cautioned a music teacher in his presence of the danger from them in tying her horse to this very post but a few days before. In this respect the case differs from Earl v. Van Alstine, supra, where the bees had been in the same place eight years without knowledge of their molesting anyone. Because of their situation and the notice of their inclination to interfere with horses when hitched where plaintiff left his team, the question of defendant's negligence was for the jury, as was also that of contributory negligence."

It has however been held in a Canadian case that the keeping on one's premises of such an unreasonably large number of bees as constituted an unusual danger to neighboring property owners, made the person keeping them liable for injuries inflicted by them entirely aside from any question of his negligence in allowing them to escape. In other words, it was held that such a large number of bees was kept at one's peril. Lucas v. Pettit, 12 Ont. L. Rep. 448, wherein the following facts appeared: "The defendant was the owner of 160 or 170 hives of bees, which he placed in a small yard situate within about 20 feet of the highway running east and west. At the southerly end of this yard was a small building with a frontage of about 24 feet on the highway, and being about 18 feet in depth and 17 feet in height. From north to south, the yard occupied by the hives was about 124 feet in length. Immediately opposite this yard on the south side of the road was the plaintiff's property, consisting of a field of about 8 acres, which was in oats, and beyond it another field in buckwheat. The highway is about 56 feet in width. On the 10th August, 1905, the plaintiff proceeded to the oat field with a pair of horses and a binder for the purpose of cutting the oats, when the horses were attacked by a large number of bees. The horses ran away from the plaintiff, dragging the binder with them to the south end of the field, and there stopped at the fence. The plaintiff followed them and endeavored to unhitch and take them away, but was unable to make them move. He himself was being similarly attacked, and made his escape by immersing himself in a neighboring pool of water and covering the exposed portions of his body with mud. One of the horses died almost at once in the field from the effect of the stings, and the other succumbed within two or three days. The plaintiff himself suffered severely, and was under medical treatment." Holding that the defendant was liable, the court said: "It was estimated that the strength of a hive was between 15,000 and 50,000 bees, and the plaintiff speaks of them as attacking the horses and himself in clouds. He estimated that there were more than four bushels of bees on the horses and in the air. This, of course, is a mere estimate, but it is clear that the number of the defendant's bees was very great. For the defense it was contended that the defendant was guilty of negligence, and that there was no evidence that the bees were of a vicious nature, and that the defendant was not aware of any viciousness or propensity on the part of the bees to attack mankind or animals. The doctrine of scienter or 'notice of mischievous propensities' of the bees has, I think, no application to this case, nor could the absence of negligence, in the sense pressed upon us, relieve the defendant of liability. . . . The right of a person to enjoy and deal with his own property as he chooses is controlled by his duty to so use it as not to affect injuriously the rights of others, and in this case it is a pure question of fact whether the defendant collected on his land such an unreasonably large number of bees or placed them in such position thereon as to interfere with the reasonable enjoyment of the plaintiff's land. I think the reasonable deduction from the answer of the jury to question 5 is that the bees, because of their numbers and position on the defendant's land, were dangerous to the plaintiff, and also that the defendant had reason so to believe. In my view it is immaterial whether or not the defendant, under these circumstances, regarded the bees as dangerous. If he was making an unreasonable use of his premises, and injury resulted therefrom to the plaintiff, he is liable. It was the defendant's right to have on his premises a reasonable number of bees, or bees so placed as not to unfairly interfere with the rights of his neighbor, but if the number was unreasonable, or if they were so placed as to interfere with his neighbor in the fair enjoyment of his rights, then what would otherwise have been lawful, becomes an unlawful act. In this case the jury found as a matter of fact that the bees, because of their number and situation, were dangerous to the plaintiff. The defendant was acting unlawfully, and he is liable for the injury flowing directly from such unlawful act."

Keeping Bees as Nuisance.

The keeping of bees in such a manner as seriously to interfere with the rights of neighbors in the use of their property may constitute a nuisance to remedy which injunction will lie. Olmstead v. Rich, 53 Hun 638 mem. 3 Silv. Sup. 447, 6 N. Y. S. 826, 25 N. Y. St. Rep. 271. In that case it appeared that the defendant kept about 90 swarms of bees on a lot within 60 feet of the plaintiff's premises and about 50 swarms on another lot within 100 feet; that during the spring and summer months these bees were a great annoyance to the plaintiff, stinging him, his guests, and servants, and soiling articles of clothing exposed on the premises, etc. The appellate court, affirming the action of the lower court in granting an injunction against the defendant, said: "Upon the merits the main questions are whether the verdict of the jury that the bees as then kept were a nuisance is sustainable, and whether the injunction was proper. Assuming the first question is reviewable here, about which there may be some doubt, . . . it was peculiarly a matter for the jury. The evidence was somewhat conflicting, and diverse inferences were sought to be drawn. The matter upon either side was fully presented. The identity of the bees was a matter for the jury. The issue was not as to the motives of defendants, . . . nor whether they had knowledge of any vicious propensities of the bees; but whether, under the conditions of things as then and before existing, there was a nuisance. No fault is found with the law applicable to such cases as charged by the court. We find no good reason for disturbing the verdict on the facts. Was it a proper case for an injunction? An injunction does not necessarily follow, but there must be such an injury as from its nature is not susceptible of being adequately compensated by damages at law, or such as from its continuance or permanent mischief must occasion a constantly recurring grievance, which cannot be otherwise prevented but by an injunction. . . . No case is cited exactly like the present. A large quantity of bees were kept upon a small village lot next to plaintiff's lot and dwelling. At certain seasons the plaintiff in the use of his lot and dwelling was, according to the evidence on the part of the plaintiff, very seriously discommoded, and the comfortable enjoyment of the property greatly impaired. It was apparently a case calling for some permanent relief, and very different from the cases of trespass cited by defendants. But it is said that the damages of the plaintiff, as indicated by the verdict, are trifling, and that a lawful and useful business is interfered with. The struggle was not over the amount of damages; in fact the jury were told by the court that they would probably be satisfied with rendering a verdict for a very small amount. The real contest was as to whether the condition of things as then existing constituted a nuisance. The jury and the court both so found. Apparently the bees can be removed, without material injury, to a locality where neighbors will not be affected, and the defendant Stephen W. Rich is in fact carrying on a similar business elsewhere upon farms. Having in view the peculiar situation, and the inadequacy of any other remedy, we are inclined to the opinion that an injunction was properly awarded."

A city ordinance undertaking to make it unlawful, and punishable as a nuisance, to own, keep, or raise bees in the city is invalid. Arkadelphia v. Clark, 52 Ark. 23, 11 S. W. 957, 20 Am. St. Rep. 154; wherein it was said, per curiam: "Neither the keeping, owning, or raising of bees is, in itself, a nuisance. Bees may become a nuisance in a city, but whether they are so or not is a question to be judicially determined in each case. The ordinance under consideration undertakes to make each of the acts named a nuisance without regard to the fact whether it is so or not, or whether bees in general have become a nuisance in the city. It is, therefore, too broad, and is invalid."

Tithes of Bees.

It was held in England in early times that honey and wax of bees were tithable, i. e., subject to the tithe, or tenth-part, tax. Barfoot v. Norton, Cro. Car. 559. But it was also held that tithes in the bees themselves might be discharged in consideration of the fact that the owner of the bees paid tithes in the honey and wax and was put to the expense of hiving and keeping the bees. Rolle Abr. 651, 15; Anonymous, Cro. Car. 404, 79 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 951. In the case last cited it was said: "And upon a surmise made that he was sued for tithes of bees, that in consideration he had paid honey and wax, and was at the charge for hives and maintenance of them in winter, he should be discharged of the tithes of the bees themselves.—And upon these surmises a prohibition was granted."

v.

RICHMOND CEDAR WORKS ET AL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—March 3, 1915.

168 N. Car. 344; 84 S. E. 523.

Adverse Possession — Extent — Constructive Possession — Separate Tracts.

Generally, where title is claimed by adverse possession as to two separate pieces of land against the same claimant, an adverse holding of each must be made out by circumstances relating to possession of each respectively, and possession of one will not extend constructively to the other.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915C 148.]

Adverse Nature of Holding — Purchase of Outstanding Title — Effect.

One in possession of land under color of title may purchase an outstanding title without thereby breaking the adverse nature of his holding under the first title, though the period for perfecting title under the first holding has not expired.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where plaintiff has held adversely for six and one-half years under color of title constituted by a deed from a stranger, he does not abandon or relinquish such holding or the right to complete title thereunder by the purchase of an outstanding interest which was contended to be the interest of a tenant in common of defendants, where there is no intention by plaintiff to abandon the color of title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden county: WHEDBEE, Judge.

[345] Action to recover damages for a trespass on the plaintiff's land, known as the lots numbered 2 and 3 in the New Lebanon Division, which was made in the year 1819. The trespass consisted in cutting roads on the land for the purpose of carting over it, the defendant justifying under a clause contained in the partition decree, reciting that it would be convenient in carting to the Cross Canal for one proprietor to have the free privilege of using the share of other proprietors for that purpose. Plaintiff asked for a restraining order to stop the trespass, which was at first granted, but afterwards vacated, and plaintiff appealed to this Court, when the order was reversed and the injunction directed to be continued to the hearing. 158 N. C. 161. Defendant at first admitted the title of plaintiff to Lots 2 and 3, and set up the right to cross them; afterwards, by amendment, admitted plaintiff's title to Lot No. 2 and formally denied the title to Lot No. 3, and finally, by amendment, denied plaintiff's title to both lots, which defendant alleges was due to the unexpected decision of this Court in Weston v. John L. Roper Lumber Co., involving the title to Lots 1 and 4 in said division, as to the estoppel of a judicial partition between tenants in common. 162 N. C. 165, Ann. Cas. 1915A 931, 77 S. E. 430. The other litigation between them concerned the title to Lot 12 of said division, which was finally decided by this Court in favor of the plaintiff, so that plaintiff has recovered Lots 1 and 4, which bound the land in controversy on the east and west; Lot 12, which bounds it on the north, the Cross Canal being its southern boundary. The jury, in this case, returned the following verdict:

1. Is the plaintiff, John L. Roper Lumber Company, the owner and entitled to the possession of the land described in the complaint, as alleged? Answer: "Yes; the whole thereof."

[346] 2. If so, have defendants entered and trespassed thereon, as alleged? Answer: "Yes."

3. If so, what damage has plaintiff sustained thereby? Answer: "$75."

The decision of this matter turns chiefly on the plaintiff's adverse possession of Lots 2 and 3. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and defendant appealed.

Ward & Thompson and Winston & Biggs for appellant.

Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, and J. Kenyon Wilson for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts).—The defendant contends, as to both tracts, that plaintiff has had no such adverse possession as ripened his title under color, as the two tracts, designated as Lots 2 and 3 in the New Lebanon Division, were held by plaintiff and claimed by two separate deeds, and were, in fact and in law, to be taken and considered as two separate and distinct tracts of land, which would, therefore, require an adverse possession of each tract during the full period of limitation. It may be admitted, generally, that where the bar of the statute is pleaded, or the benefit thereof is relied on in any way, as to two separate pieces of land against the same claimant, an adverse holding of each must be made out for the requisite time by circumstances relating to the possession of each piece respectively, and mere possession of the one will not be extended so as constructively to include the other. A discussion of the question is not called for, as we are satisfied that there was an actual adverse possession of each tract under color for a sufficient length of time to ripen the title into a perfect one. The defendant's objection was not to the character of the possession, as not being adverse, but to the application of the doctrine of constructive possession to a case where there are two or more separate tracts of land, when it should be restricted to cases where there is only one tract involved. 1 Cyc. 1128. There was no error, therefore, as to Lot No. 2.

The other question presented, as to Lot No. 3, is whether the plaintiff waived or abandoned all right to claim any benefit from its adverse possession of six and a half years under the deed of Harrison E. Weston to it, dated 1 June, 1878, as color of title, by afterwards, 19 December, 1884, taking a deed from H. E. Weston, John R. White, and others. Defendants contend that at the time the last deed was made they were tenants in common with H. E. Weston and the other persons named therein, but it may well be doubted if they have offered evidence sufficient in law to establish the fact under the rule laid down in Byrd v. Southern Exp. Co. 139 N. C. 273, 51 S. E. 851, or whether they have connected themselves with the title of Samuel Weston, the first. As tested by the clear weight of authority [347] and the rule of reason, the general doctrine is that a person in adverse possession of land under color may purchase an outstanding title to the same land without thereby preventing his possession from being longer adverse or breaking its continuity; and this is so, although the period fixed by the statute for perfecting his title, under color, had not then expired. The subject is so fully and lucidly treated by Circuit Judge William H. Taft in Elder v. McClaskey, 70 Fed. 529, 37 U. S. App. 199, 17 C. C. A. 251, especially at p. 547, that we could not do better than to reproduce what has there been said, and especially as the facts of that case are so clearly analogous to those now under consideration, the outstanding title being that of a tenant in common: "There remains to consider the contention of claimants, sustained by the court below, that, whether the possession of defendants was at any time adverse to the claimants, the disseizin was subsequently purged by recognition and acquiescence of defendants in claimants' title, so that an avowed cotenancy ensued before the statute had run. This contention is chiefly rested on the purchase and acceptance by the defendants of deeds conveying to them outstanding interests of certain of the heirs of the brothers and sisters of William Barr, Sr., whose title was of the same character as that of claimants. It is well settled by binding authority that a vendee is not estopped to deny the title of his vendor. Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 614, 615, 3 S. Ct. 407 [27 U. S. (L. ed.) 1049]; Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25, 54 [10 U. S. (L. ed.) 873]; Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 43 [7 U. S. (L. ed.) 596]; Blight v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535 [5 U. S. (L. ed.) 516]. And the necessary conclusion from this is drawn, in the last named case, that the person in possession of property under a claim of complete ownership has the right to fortify his title by the purchase of any real or pretended titles, without thereby holding possession in subordination to them. This is further supported by the decisions of many other courts to the same effect. Warren v. Bowdran, 156 Mass. 280; Gardner v. Greene, 5 R. I. 104; Chapin v. Hunt, 40 Mich. 595; Mather v. Walsh, 107 Mo. 121, 131; Giles v. Pratt, 2 Hill L. (S. C.), 439, 442; Osterhout v. Shoemaker, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 513, 518; Tobey v. Secor, 60 Wis. 310, 312. The following are cases where the possessor and defendant purchased outstanding titles of tenants in common with the plaintiffs in ejectment, and yet was held not to have thereby acknowledged the validity of the plaintiff's title. Fox v. Widgery, 4 Greenl. (Me.) 214; Jackson v. Smith, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 406, 413; Northrop v. Wright, 7 Hill (N. Y.) 477, 489, 496; Bryan v. Atwater, 5 Day (Conn.) 181; Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 539; Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 183; Cook v. Clinton, 64 Mich. 309, 313. And the same rule prevails in Ohio." We need not assent to all that is said in that case as to the relation of vendor and vendee with respect to any estoppel of the latter to deny or dispute the title of the former, and we cite the case only for the purpose of showing that the vendee's adverse [348] possession is not affected by his purchase, and not as binding us to an approval of all the reasons advanced in support of the conclusion, as that is not necessary to a decision of this matter or to the value of the case as an authority.

Mr. Freeman, in his work on Cotenancy and Partition, sec. 106, says: "A person in possession of land may protect himself from litigation by purchasing any outstanding claim against his property. By so purchasing he does not necessarily admit the superiority of the title bought, nor change his possession, which was before adverse, into a possession subordinate to the newly acquired title. Therefore, one who is in possession of real estate does not become a tenant in common thereof by merely accepting a deed therefor from the owner of an undivided interest therein."

The party who accepts a deed in fee from a grantor having no title or a less estate than he conveys performs no act expressly designed to influence, and which influences, the conduct of the latter to his injury, nor does he make any admission which in good conscience and honest dealing he should be forbidden to gainsay. The grantee is the one exposed to injury, and when necessary for his protection, he may show the truth and dispute the title of his grantor, as a party is only concluded against showing the truth or asserting a legal right when the result would be a wrong, through his means, to some third person. There is no such relation ordinarily existing between the grantee in fee and his grantor as will raise even an implied obligation, on the part of the former, against a denial of the title and estate of the latter. Although a tenant cannot question the right of his landlord, a grantee in fee, as he stands on a different footing in the law, may hold adversely to the grantor, and there can be no good reason why he should not be at liberty to deny that the grantor had any title. There is no estoppel where the occupant is not under an obligation, express or implied, that he will at some time or in some event surrender the possession, but the grantee in fee is under no such duty. He does not receive the possession under any contract, express or implied, that he will ever give it up, but takes the land to hold for himself and to dispose of at his pleasure. He owes no faith or allegiance to his grantor, and he does him no wrong when he treats him as an utter stranger to the title; and, finally, it results from these considerations, and perhaps others of equal cogency, that his possession is really adverse to his grantor, as has often been held by the courts. The above principles are supported by the following cases: Sparrow v. Kingman, 1 N. Y. 242; Osterhout v. Shoemaker, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 518. The disseizin, therefore, was not purged by taking the deed, nothing else appearing. A disseizor in possession has an interest in the land which he may transfer with the possession to a third person or which on his [349] death will pass to his heir, and the mere taking of a deed from another, against whom he is holding adversely, does not, of itself, constitute a relinquishment of this right. St.

Paul v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 45 Minn. 387, 48 N. W. 17.

In Coakley v. Perry, 3 Ohio St. 344, one Nathan Perry had purchased the land, received a conveyance, and was in possession. Subsequently he took a deed, with covenant of warranty, from Job Doan, to whom one-fourth interest in a tax title had descended from his father, and with reference to these facts the Court said: "It would be the grossest absurdity to conclude that Nathan Perry, by taking the conveyance from Job Doan, for a trifling consideration, contemplated, instead of continuing seized of the whole premises, as he claimed to have been before, that he became seized of only an undivided part in common with the other heirs of Job Doan's ancestor. It would seem to be just and reasonable that a person in the bona fide possession of land under a claim of title should be allowed to buy in any title, real or pretended, with a view to quiet the enjoyment of his possessions, and that the purchase of an adversary title, if it does not strengthen, should certainly not have the effect to impair, the title of the owner. It is not the policy of the law to deter persons from buying their peace and compel them to submit to the expense and vexation of lawsuits, for fear of having their titles tainted by defects which they would gladly remedy by purchase, where it can be done with safety." Judge Taft further says in Elder v. McClaskey, supra, at p. 548: "Whether the acceptance of a deed of an outstanding interest by one in possession shall affect his adverse possession depends on all the circumstances surrounding it. Generally, if his possession began under a claim of title in fee, the purchase of another title is not to be regarded as a change in his attitude. His purchase may strengthen his title, but it is usually not permitted to impair it. Cases may perhaps be conceived where the acceptance of a deed for an interest in property by one in possession would be equivalent to an express avowal of subordination to the title of others in privity with the grantors, but it would be exceptional. The cases relied upon by the court below to establish a different doctrine do not seem to us to do so." He then proceeds to distinguish the cases which it was contended held to the contrary, and demonstrates that they were based upon exceptional circumstances which showed that the grantee in the deed intended to abandon his prior possession and to claim under his newly acquired title, which, of course, would take them out of the rule. It is said in 1 Cyc. p. 1016: "With the exception of at least one decision in which it has been broadly ruled that the purchase of an outstanding title or interest by the adverse claimant interrupts the continuity of his possession, it seems to be very generally conceded that an adverse occupant may purchase an outstanding [350] title without thereby interrupting the continuity of his possession. A party, it is said, may very well deny the validity of an adverse claim of title, and yet choose to buy his peace at a smaller price than he at great expense and annoyance in litigating it." It may be admitted that, under some special circumstances, the purchase of an outstanding interest will have the effect of divesting the possession of its hostile character, but no such circumstances are to be found in this case. A party is not bound to admit, and does not necessarily admit, title in another because he prefers to get rid of that other's claim by purchasing it. He has a right to quiet his possession and protect himself from litigation in any lawful mode that appears to him most advantageous or desirable. To hold otherwise would compel him to litigate adverse claims, or, by buying one, forego any right to claim the benefit of the statute of limitations as to all others. The acts and declarations of the possessor may, doubtless, be given in evidence with a view of showing the character of his claim, but whether the possession is adverse or not is a question for the jury to determine upon all the evidence. Cannon v. Stockman, 36 Cal. 539, 95 Am. Dec. 205. If a party is in possession continuously for seven years, all the time claiming ownership exclusive of any other right, and under color, he is entitled to the benefit of the statute of limitations, no matter how many outstanding adverse claims he may purchase to secure his peace and remove any cloud or suspicion from his title, unless he has in some way estopped or precluded himself from relying on that statute, and the question for the jury to determine on such claim is, whether upon all the evidence he appears to have been continuously in possession during the time prescribed, claiming title adversely and exclusive of any other right. Cannon v. Stockman, supra. This is not the case of a grantee of one tenant in common who is in possession under a deed for the whole and not for the particular tenant's interest, which requires a holding for twenty years to bar the cotenant, the making of the deed and the possession by the grantee claiming thereunder not being sufficient, under our ruling, to constitute such a disseizin of the cotenant as to bar his right if the possession is continued for seven years. Page v. Branch, 97 N. C. 97, 1 S. E. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 281; Breden v. McLaurin, 98 N. C. 307, 4 S. E. 136; Ferguson v. Wright, 113 N. C. 537, 18 S. E. 691; Roscoe v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. 124 N. C. 42, 32 S. E. 389; Bullin v. Hancock, 138 N. C. 198, 50 S. E. 621; Whitaker v. Jenkins, 138 N. C. 476, 51 S. E. 104; Dobbins v. Dobbins, 141 N. C. 210, 53 S. E.

870, 115 Am. St. Rep. 682, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 185. And these cases show, as also does Caldwell v. Neely, 81 N. C. 114, that twenty years of possession is essential to bar cotenants, and the fact of holding and claiming under a deed for the whole from one of them will make no difference. Boggan v. Somers, 152 N. C. 390, 67 S. E. 965. And the same doctrine was stated very recently in a case between the same parties as those arrayed against each other in this record (John L. Roper Lumber Co. v. Richmond Cedar Works, 165 N. C. 83, 80 S. E. 982), where we said: "We are [351] aware that this Court has held that a deed by one tenant of the entire estate held in common is not sufficient to sever the unity of possession by which they are bound together, and does not constitute color of title, as the grantee of one tenant takes only his share and 'steps into his shoes.' In such case, twenty years of adverse possession, under a claim of sole ownership, is required to bar the entry of the other tenants, under the presumption of an ouster from the beginning raised thereby. Cloud v. Webb, 14 N. C. 317; Hicks v. Bullock, 96 N. C. 164; Breden v. McLaurin, 98 N. C. 307; Bullin v. Hancock, 138 N. C. 198, and Dobbins v. Dobbins, 141 N. C. 210, where the other cases are collected. We are not inadvertent to the fact that this State stands alone in the recognition of this principle, the others holding the contrary, that such a deed is good color of title (1 Cyc. 1078, and notes); but it has too long been the settled doctrine of this Court to be disturbed at this late day, as it might seriously impair vested rights to do so. It should not, though, be carried beyond the necessities of the particular class of cases to which it has been applied, but confined strictly within its proper limits; otherwise, we may destroy titles by a too close attention to technical considerations growing out of this particular relation of tenants in common, and more so, we think, than is required to preserve their rights. This view has, within recent years, been thoroughly sanctioned by the Court." Judge Gaston said, in Cloud v. Webb, 15 N. C. 290, 25 Am. Dec. 711 (second appeal): "A sole possession by the bargainee of a part under a deed in severalty for that part might and probably would amount to a demonstration plain that such possession was a several holding under that deed, was tantamount to an ouster of that part, and therefore adverse to Mrs. Cloud's claim of a right to the possession thereof." It will be seen by these references within what narrow limits the doctrine as to the effect of a possession held under the deed of one of the cotenants is confined, and as to whether such a deed, followed by possession taken by the grantee, will constitute a disseizin of the other tenants. But here the plaintiff held under a deed made by a stranger, and adversely to all others, for six and one-half years, and we find no evidence that he intended to relinquish the advantage he had gained by such holding and substitute for it a one-half undivided interest in the land of doubtful validity, but the contrary appears to have been the motive and purpose, as the subsequent purchase was clearly intended merely to clear up the title, or to get rid of adverse claims to it, however unfounded they may have been, so that it would be exempt from future attack. It was not supposed by any of the parties to the transaction that plaintiff was buying an interest in common with defendants, but all the circumstances tend to show that it continued to rely upon the adverse possession to ripen its title under the color. The case is, therefore, not like that of [352] one when an outsider receives a deed from one of the tenants for the entire and undivided estate in the land held in common, and has no other source of title. Plaintiff holds the deed of a stranger to a several interest, and not one held in common, and has the right to perfect his title under it, although he may have purchased another claim and taken a conveyance from those asserting it, to safeguard the title, which was maturing by his continued possession under color.

The prayers of the defendants required the court to instruct the jury, as matter of law, that the taking of the second deed prevented plaintiff from claiming any benefit by its adverse possession under the Harrison E. Weston deed of 1878, and there was no error in refusing them. The court properly left the question of adverse possession to the jury, with appropriate instructions. The reference to plaintiff's possession in 1871 and 1872 was harmless, being merely the statement of a contention. The court immediately afterwards correctly instructed the jury as to adverse possession under color, and the jury could not have been misled. The issues were sufficient to prevent all controverted matters and were properly submitted by the court, instead of those tendered by the defendant. Albert v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 122 N. C. 92, 30 S. E. 327, 65 Am. St. Rep. 693; Ratliff v. Ratliff, 131 N. C. 425, 42 S. E. 887, 63 L.R.A. 963; Hatcher v. Dabbs, 133 N. C. 239, 45 S. E. 582; Zollicoffer v. Zollicoffer, 133 N. C. 326, 84 S. E. 349. The other exceptions are without any merit.

After a careful review of the record and a studious consideration of the arguments of counsel, we have not been able to find any error committed by the court at the trial.

No error.

NOTE.

Where a person is in adverse possession of land under color of title, it is held in the reported case that he does not affect the adverse character of his possession by purchasing an outstanding claim of title to the same land. This question is thoroughly discussed in the note to Ripley v. Miller, Ann. Cas. 1912C 952.

THE BRAND.

THE E. STARR JONES.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Third Circuit—June 28, 1915.

224 Fed. 391.

Collision — Sailing Vessel in Fault — Side Lights in Improper Position.

A schooner is held to have been solely in fault for a collision with a crossing steamship at night in Delaware bay for carrying her side lights in such position that the one on the side next the steamship was obscured by the sails and could not be seen from the steamship until too late to avoid the collision.

Damages for Collision — Loss of Use of Injured Vessel.

Loss through delay while making repairs is an element of the damages recoverable for collision, and where the injured vessel was under a time charter the rate of charter hire may be accepted as prima facie fixing the measure of damages.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from United States District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania: BUFFINGTON, Judge.

Suit in admiralty by Herbert L. Heyliger, master of schooner E. Starr Jones, plaintiff, against steamship Brand, defendant, and cross-suit by Edward Ballestad, master of The Brand, against the schooner. Judgment for cross-libelant. Libelant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Howard M. Long for appellant.

Henry R. Edmunds for appellee.

Sitting: *McPHEE*SON and WOOLLEY, Circuit Judges, and THOMSON District Judge.

[392] THOMSON, J.—On October 13, 1912 about 4:30 o'clock a. m. a collision occurred in the Delaware Bay, between the American schooner E. Starr Jones, and the Norwegian steamer Brand, in which both vessels sustained considerable injury. Cross-libels were filed to recover damages, which resulted after trial in a decree sustaining the libel of the Brand and dismissing that of the E. Starr Jones. After decrees entered, the cases were consolidated and combined into one action for the purpose of appeal.

The E. Starr Jones is a four-masted sailing vessel, 185 feet long and 38 feet beam, and was on a voyage from Philadelphia to Porto Rico with a cargo of coal and carrying a crew of seven men. The Brand is a steamer 280 feet long and 37 feet beam, and bound from Nova Scotia to Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river, with a cargo of plaster. The schooner was under tow by a steam tug until about 3:30 a. m., when the tug was cast loose and the schooner proceeded under her own sails down the bay in a southeasterly course. For a period of about two hours prior to the collision the schooner's sails were being set. The master and some of the witnesses for the schooner say that the sails were all set before the collision, while the mate testifies that they were just finishing that work, pulling the main topsail at the time of the collision. The weather was clear, with wind from the north. There was no mist or haze. The stars were shining, and, although dark, it was a good night for lights to be seen. The approaching vessels were on a wide part of the Delaware Bay. No other vessels were in the immediate vicinity, and each had ample sea room in which to maneuver. It is clear, therefore, that the collision was not the result of inevitable accident, but of fault on the part of one of the vessels.

The learned trial judge exonerated the steamer, holding the schooner to be wholly at fault, and in this conclusion we concur. The finding of the learned judge fixes the cause of the collision to be in so placing the schooner's green light on the starboard side that it was screened or obscured by the sails, and was thus not visible from the approaching steamer. This finding seems to be in harmony with the facts as shown by the testimony. While the law does not regulate just where the side lights on a sailing vessel shall be placed, it does require that the starboard light shall be so located as to show from a point straight ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard side, and the port light shall show a similar arc of the circle on the port side. The testimony indicates with considerable certainty that the schooner's side lights were placed in the fore-rigging high above the deck—some witnesses say 14 feet above the rail, or about 18 feet above the deck and over 4 feet inside the rail. It appears that the forestay-sail boom measured 29 feet forward, while the distance from the center of the mast, where the boom is, was about 13 feet. The course of the schooner being southeast, with the wind from the north or northwest, [393] she would have the wind on her port quarter, her booms and sails would all be well off to the starboard side, and it is claimed with much force that her green light would thus almost necessarily be obscured. This inference which could fairly be drawn from the location of the light and the position of the sails, due to the course of the vessel and the point of the wind, is borne out by the witnesses on the Brand. Assuming that these witnesses are credible, and were ordinarily careful and efficient seamen, their testimony is very convincing.

About 4:15 a. m. the steamer took on board a licensed pilot, said to be one of the most experienced on the Delaware river and Bay. Her lights were properly set and burning. On the lookout bridge was a competent seaman, while the licensed pilot, the captain, second mate, and helmsman were on the main bridge. She was running north by west at about eight knots per hour. It is not controverted that the lights on the Brand were seen and reported from the schooner. The lookouts on each vessel saw and reported the lights on a tug with barges, which was going up the bay. The officers of the schooner, relying on her lights being seen by the approaching steamer, held to her course until a collision was imminent, when her helmsman, in the exigency of the case, put her wheel hard astarboard, changing her course sharply to port. The lookout on the Brand was on the lookout bridge, which extended from side to side of the steamer. The substance of his testimony is that the first thing he saw of the schooner was her fore and top sails when she was about 150 feet away on the port side; that this was the first knowledge he had of her presence; that he had been looking, but saw no light; that, very soon after he saw her sails, he saw her green light for the first time; that she was then close to them, and that her booms were far on the starboard side. The licensed pilot says, in substance, that the first he knew of the schooner's presence was when he saw her sails about four points on the steamer's port bow; that he could see no lights; that as soon as he saw her sails he ordered the helm of the steamer to be put hard aport, which threw her head to starboard about three points, and that he saw her green light just before the collision; that her sails must have obscured her lights, or he would have seen them.

This testimony is corroborated by the second mate and the master, who were on the upper bridge with the pilot. The second mate, a seaman of 20 years' experience, was on watch at the time of the collision. He says the first he saw of the schooner was her sails when she was about 25 or 30 fathoms away; that he looked for lights, but could see none; that right after he saw her sails he made out her green light, and that it must have been obscured by her sails. The master says he first saw the schooner's sails 30 or 35 fathoms away on the steamer's port bow; that he then looked for lights, but could not see any; that as soon as they saw the sails the pilot gave orders to hard aport the helm of the steamer, and that he then went and helped the man at the wheel; that just before the collision he saw for the first time the schooner's green light, and expresses the opinion that the only way he could have missed seeing her lights was by their being obscured by the schooner's sails.

[394] We have, then, three concurring facts, or groups of facts, which sustain the conclusion of the learned trial judge as to the cause of the collision: First, the reasonable probability of the light being screened from its location in the rigging and the position of the boom and sails, due to the course of the vessel and the direction of the wind; second, the fact that competent officers, whose position on the steamer and the conditions of navigation surrounding their vessel required the exercise of special care and vigilance, saw the sails of the near approaching schooner, but at that time saw no lights upon it; third, the fact that very shortly thereafter the green light appeared, and was seen by all of them, in connection with the admitted fact that about that time the schooner's head was swung to port, which would naturally bring her green light into range.

We therefore concur in the findings of the learned trial judge that the schooner was solely at fault, and that the cause of the collision was the screening of her light by the sails, so that it was not visible to the lookout on the Brand until too late to avoid the collision. The evidence also supports the learned judge's view that neither vessel was at fault in the steps which they severally took to avoid a collision when the same became imminent. Viewed with deliberation after the accident, the course adopted might not be approved as the best; but in emergencies men must act quickly, and the law looks with much leniency on an error of judgment committed in an honest attempt to avoid a threatened danger.

A number of assignments allege error in awarding to the steamer Brand the sum of $1,212.39 as damages for detention of the vessel during 9 days and 16 hours while undergoing repairs. It is entirely clear that one of the elements of damage to which the appellee was entitled was the loss of the use of the vessel while being repaired, whatever that loss might be. It is said in The Potomac, 105 U. S. 630, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 1194:

"The rules of law governing this question are well settled, and the only difficulty is in applying them to the peculiar facts of the case. In order to make full compensation and indemnity for what has been lost by the collision, restitutio in integrum, the owners of the injured vessel are entitled to recover for the loss of her use while laid up for repairs. When there is a market price for such use, that price is the test of the sum to be recovered. When there is no market price, evidence of the profits that she would have earned, if not disabled, is competent; but from the gross freight must be deducted so much as would in ordinary cases be disbursed on account of her expenses in earning it. In no event can more than the net profits be recovered by way of damages."

What was the loss of the use of the vessel? The vessel at the time of the collision was under charter to the Keystone Plaster Company. The charter hire for 9 days and 16 hours, under the monthly rate stipulated in the charter, was $1,212.39, which amount the charterers deducted in the settlement with the owners. No other evidence was offered by either side on the question of damages. Conceding that, when there is a market price for the use of the vessel, that price is the test in the first instance of the sum to be recovered, is not the stipulated rate of damage in the vessel's charter at least prima facie evidence of the [395] loss occasioned by the detention? It was so held by the Circuit Court in Orhanovich v. The Steam-Tug America, 4 Fed. 337. In the case of The Columbia, 109 Fed. 661, 48 C. C. A. 596, the court said:

"Taking the facts of this case into consideration, we are of opinion that the evidence as to the provisions of the charter party was competent to be admitted. Conceding that it may not be conclusive in all cases, it nevertheless makes out a prima facie case, which, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, justifies the rendition of a decree in accordance therewith. The court did not err in allowing the damages."

In the Governor Ames, 187 Fed. 40, 109 C. C. A. 94, the appellate court held that where a vessel was injured in a collision for which the other vessel was in fault, and her detention was not such as to require the discharge of her crew, or prevent her from completing her voyage, the rule is settled that the agreed damage under her charter may properly be accepted as fixing prima facie the amount of her damages for the detention. This case quotes approvingly from the opinion of Judge Butler in the case of The Rebecca v. The America, 8 W. N. C. (Pa.) 328, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,619a, on the question of damages, where that judge said:

"This rule has been pronounced, by those having the largest experience and the highest intelligence on the subject, the safest thing under general circumstances that can be pursued."

Other authorities might be cited to the same effect.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the decree is affirmed.

Generally.

It being a general rule in admiralty that the measure of damages in collision cases is restitutio in integrum (The Cayuga, 14 Wall. [U. S.] 270) it follows that in case of a collision not resulting in a total loss the owner of the vessel which is not at fault is entitled to recover as part of his damages for the loss of the use of his vessel during the time reasonably required for the making of repairs made necessary by the collision.

Ohio.—H. M. Loud, etc. Lumber Co. v. Peter, 11 Ohio Cir. Dec. 155, 20 Ohio Cir. Ct. 73.

And see the cases cited throughout this note.

Thus in the case of The Narragansett, 1 Blatchf. 211, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,017, the court said: "The item for the loss of the services of the vessel while undergoing necessary repairs seems to be a proper allowance, according to the maritime law, which is less stringent in this respect than the common law." And in Swift v. Brownell, Holmes 467, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,695, it was said: "In the estimate of damage to the Helen Mar by the collision, the commissioner allowed demurrage on the Helen Mar while under repair at San Francisco. The rule allowing demurrage, under such circumstances, is too well settled to be questioned." So in the case of The Baltic, 10 Ben. 631, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 825, it appeared that the bark Plutaroh was injured in a collision with the steamer Baltic. A libel was instituted against the steamer to recover demurrage for the loss of use, and expenses incident to her detention pending the completion of repairs, which under an agreement were made by the owners of the steamer. The court saying that the burden was on the owners to prove that the repair of the bark was the extent of their liability under the agreement, held that the libellant was entitled to a decree for sixteen days' demurrage and costs, with a reference to compute the amount, unless it was agreed on. Likewise in The Santee, 6 Blatchf. 1, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,329, it was held that damages could be recovered by an owner for the use of his vessel while repairs were made although the repairs made the vessel worth more than she was before the collision. See to the same effect H. H. Loud, etc. Lumber Co. v. Peter, 11 Ohio Cir. Dec. 155, 20 Ohio Cir. Ct. 73. In the case of The Astrakhan [1910] P. (Eng.) 172, 79 L. J. P. 78, 102 L. T. N. S. 539, 11 Asp. M. C. 390, 26 Times L. Rep. 329, it appeared that a Danish warship was injured in a collision through the fault of a British steamship. The court allowing damages for the loss of the use of the warship reviewed the facts as follows. "It is said that she would, in any event, have been laid up; but the unforeseen might have happened, and I think in this class of case you should look to see what is the potential use which the Danish government had for this vessel. Their potential use was to have her under their control to use if they wanted her; they might have wanted her for royal purposes, to conduct Royalty about from some place to another, or to receive Royalty, or for fighting purposes, or for any unforeseen purpose which you may imagine. The government were not able to make use of her, if these things happened."

On the other hand in the case of La Champagne, 53 Fed. 398, it was held that if the owners of a vessel injured in a collision elect to have her sold in her damaged condition, they cannot recover damages in the nature of demurrage. And in the case of The Bodlewell [1907] P. (Eng.) 286, 76 L. J. P. 61, 96 L. T. N. S. 854, 10 Asp. M. C. 479, 23 Times L.

Rep. 356, the court said that where there was no loss from a deprivation of the use of a vessel as the result of a collision there could be no recovery from the owner of the ship at fault. See to the same effect Charlton v. The Colorado, 3 Can. Exch. 63. So in the case of The Saginaw, 95 Fed. 703, it was held that the owners of a vessel were not entitled to demurrage where they suffered no loss from time taken in repairing the vessel. The court said: "The practice in this district has been not to admit claims for the vessel's time while making repairs, if it occasioned no loss of her regular trips, or other expense. In the present case, as the proofs show that there was no actual loss by detention, except the sum of $209.29, that amount may be substituted in place of the demurrage allowed in the report." Likewise in the case of The Loch Trool, 150 Fed. 429, it appeared that after a collision in the month of March the Drumcraig was laid up unrepaired. She was chartered on August 3, 1904, for a voyage from San Francisco to Australia, and the contract for repairing her was not let until October 17, 1904. The vessel was detained for 24 days while those repairs were being made. There was also evidence tending to show that at the time of the collision two other vessels engaged in the same trade as that of the Drumcraig, under the same management and in seaworthy condition, were lying in Oakland creek, and there remained unchartered—one until August 10, 1904, and the other until August 24, 1904. At the time of the collision the Drumcraig had just completed a voyage between San Francisco and Sydney, via Puget Sound, and return, and there was evidence tending to show that the net profits of such a voyage, at the rates of freight which then prevailed would have been about $8,000, and that such voyage could have been performed in eight months. There was also some slight evidence to the effect that the same rates of freight continued for about two months after the collision. But no witness testified directly that the Drumcraig could have received a charter at such rates at any time after the collision and prior to August 3, 1904, or that there was any demand for vessels of her class in that trade or any other. The court upheld the commissioner in his rejection of the libellant's claim for loss of use of the vessel. In the case of The North Sea, 151 Fed. 168, 80 C. C. A. 536, it was held that demurrage could not be recovered for the loss of a vessel damaged in a collision where it appeared that the vessel was one of a fleet employed on the Great Lakes and belonging to the libellant, and cargoes for the other vessels had been refused at such time owing to the lateness of the season.

In the case of The Transit, 4 Ben. 138, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,138, it was held that the damages allowed a pilot boat must be for the detention of the vessel alone; that the allowance could include only the value of the use of the pilot boat as a vessel. The court said: "The $60 allowed would seem, on the evidence, not to have included anything for the worth of the time of the pilots during the determination of the vessel, though it is impossible to tell, from the report, what it includes, as the report simply calls it 'demurrage.' It ought to include only the value of the use of the boat as a vessel—what, without pilots, or crew, or stores being furnished with her, she could have been chartered for to others, to use as a pilot boat. On the evidence and the report, I do not think the $60 a day is too much. . . . The question is, what their pilot boat was worth, for her time. In the absence of a market for the chartering of pilot boats, the only other resort proper to be had, is to the judgment of persons acquainted with the piloting business, as to the value of the time of the vessel based upon the employment she was in, its character and constancy, and its then recent results in the way of earnings." See to the same effect The Emilie, 4 Ben. 235, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,451. And in the case of The Stromless, 1 Lowell 163, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,540, the court said: "The rule is to give demurrage if the vessel has lost employment; and it seems a fair matter of inference that a coasting vessel of this character would obtain freights during the busy season of the year. We have no fixed measure of so much a ton for each day's delay, and I must rely on the evidence in every case, which in this points to forty dollars a day for this schooner." In the case of The Rhode Island, Abb. Adm. 100, 6 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 103, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,740a, the court holding that the owner of a vessel injured as the result of a collision could recover damages for the loss of the use of the vessel while detained for repairs stated the rule as to the measure of damages as follows: "As it is fitting in admiralty courts that some rule of general application should be observed in awarding discretionary damages, I am induced to think, in the absence of direct evidence of loss, that the value of the vessel should be regarded, and that a reasonable percentage upon that value may be properly taken as a fair measure of loss. The maintenance and wages of the crew being provided for, and no wear or tear that is appreciable being shown, it seems to me that the positive damage sustained by the party consists in being kept out of the use of his capital, the value of the vessel, during her repairs; and a proper percentage on that capital would afford an admissible mode of compensation. In this case I adopt six per cent., the usual rate of interest awarded by this court, and the legal rate in Connecticut, where the vessel is owned, as a reasonable allowance in that respect." And in the case of The Mary Steele, 2 Lowell, 370, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,226, it was held that a fishing boat losing a trip as the result of injury to a seine caused by a collision could recover the probable profits of the trip. In a review of the facts the court said: "It is proved that the Hattie N. Reed was a market boat, accustomed to make trips which averaged about a week in length, bringing to Boston fresh fish for immediate sale, netting from $700 to $1,000 for a trip. She was fitted with ice and various other appliances, and, among others, with this seine, and with hooks and lines. At this time the fish would not bite freely, and must be caught in the net, or not at all. Without the seine the trip was certain to fail, and when it was damaged, the master thought best to carry it to Boston to be repaired. There was some conflict in the evidence as to whether the seine could have been mended at Boothbay. Upon the whole evidence, I think the preponderance is that the work could not be done there to any better advantage, in point of time, than at Boston. Under these circumstances, is the Mary Steele bound to pay for a broken voyage, or only for the immediate injury to the seine? It seems a hardship that a damage of $45 to a net should involve some hundreds of dollars by way of loss of the use of the net. Supposing a boat had been stove, would that carry like consequences, on the ground that the seine could not be set without a boat? And suppose a thole-pin in the boat were broken, is the voyage to be paid for? The answer is, that the injury or destruction of any thing which cannot be replaced, and which entails the loss of the voyage, however insignificant the thing itself may be, will often carry with it damages for the loss which is its necessary consequence. A comparatively small injury might sometimes oblige a considerable deviation and delay, such, for example, as the loss of all the nautical instruments. The damages would not be the mere value of these instruments on shore, if the consequence is a further loss occasioned by the necessity of supplying them."

Effect of Substitution of Another Vessel.

The fact that the owner of the injured vessel substitutes another vessel belonging to him in the service in which the injured vessel was engaged while the latter is being repaired does not affect the right to recover damages for the loss of the use of the injured vessel. The steamship Mediana [1900] A. C. (Eng.) 113, 9 Asp. M. C. 41, 69 L. J. P. 35, 82 L. T. N. S. 95, 48 W. R. 398; The Steamboat Cayuga, 2 Ben. 125, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,535, 7 Blatchf. 385, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,537, 14 Wall.

270, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 828; The Favorita, 18 Wall. 598, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 856, affirming 8 Blatchf. 539, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,695; The Emma Kate Ross, 50 Fed. 845, 3 U. S. App. 171, 2 C. C. A. 55, modifying 46 Fed. 872; Coffin v. The Osceola, 34 Fed. 921; New Haven Steam-Boat Co. v. New York, 36 Fed. 716; The State of California, 54 Fed. 404, 4 C. C. A. 393, 7 U. S. App. 652; The Providence, 98 Fed. 133, 38 C. C. A. 670. Compare The City of Peking, 15 App. Cas. (Eng.) 438, 59 L. J. P. C. 88, 63 L. T. N. S. 722, 39 W. R. 177, 6 Asp. M. C. 572. Compare The Wm. M. Hoag, 101 Fed. 846. Thus in the case of The Favorita, supra, the court said that a ferry company could recover demurrage for the loss of the use of a boat during repairs after a collision although the ferry company had suffered nothing by such loss of use as her place had been supplied by a spare boat kept for emergencies which would otherwise have been idle. And in the case of The State of California, 54 Fed. 404, 7 U. S. App. 652, 4 C. C. A. 393, the court said: "The fact that another vessel belonging to the same owner was used as a substitute for the disabled steamer during the time of her detention should not militate against the right to compensation, nor afford just cause for awarding less than would be allowed if the owner from lack of enterprise of inability failed to have an available substitute for use in such an emergency." But in the case of The Wm. M. Hoag, 101 Fed. 846, it was held that damages could not be recovered for loss of use where a vessel was being repaired at her dock when injured and another vessel of the owners had taken her place. The court reviewed the facts as follows: "The damages claimed by the Lurline amount to $1,058.78. This includes $325 demurrage. But demurrage cannot be allowed. The steamer Undine had taken the place of the Lurline upon the latter's route prior to the accident, and while the Lurline was undergoing repairs. The only effect of the accident, so far as the question of demurrage is concerned, was to continue the Undine where she was until the repairs upon the Lurline were completed; it being the intention, upon the return of the Lurline to her route, to place the Undine upon the dock for repairs. So that there was no interruption of the business of the Vancouver Transportation Company, and no appreciable loss from this cause, so far as appears."

Unnecessary Delay in Making Repairs.

The owner of a vessel damaged in a collision can recover compensation for her loss of use for such a period of time only as is necessary to complete the repairs and not for an unnecessary or unusual delay. The Sunnyside, 1 Brown Adm. 415, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,

621; The Thomas Kiley, 3 Ben. 228, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,924; The Joseph Nixon v. The Steam-Tug George Lysle, 2 Fed. 259; The Fannie Tuthill, 17 Fed. 87; The Mina A. Read, 30 Fed. 287; The John H. May, 53 Fed. 604; The Sovereign of the Seas, 139 Fed. 812; Brady v. The New Philadelphia, 19 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 315, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,797. Compare H. M. S. London [1914] P. (Eng.) 72, 83 L. J. P. 74, 12 Asp. M. Cas. 405, 109 L. T. N. S. 960, 30 Times L. Rep. 196. Thus in Brady v. The New Philadelphia, supra, it was held that a deduction should be made from the award for fifteen days after the injured barge had been raised during which the owner had notice of the fact and did not begin the work of discharging her cargo preparatory to repairs. So in the case of The Thomas Kiley, 3 Ben. 228, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,924, the court said: "As to the question of demurrage, I am of the opinion that the libelants are not entitled to recover demurrage for the period of detention caused by the fact that the boat was frozen in at Elizabethport, where she went to repair. The collision occurred in the port of New York, where as the evidence shows the repairs could have been effected promptly, and without any risk of freezing up. It is not shown that the repairs could have been done more cheaply at Elizabethport than in New York, nor does it appear that that was the home port of the vessel, nor is any reason whatever suggested by the evidence for taking the boat to Elizabethport. The taking of the boat, without any sufficient reason, to a port where she was in danger of being frozen up, and where she was, in fact, frozen up immediately upon her arrival, was an error on the part of the master of the canal boat, for the consequences of which he alone is responsible. He cannot charge the respondents with a loss which the exercise of ordinary prudence on his part would have avoided."

But in the case of The H. M. S. London [1914] P. (Eng.) 72, 83 L. J. P. 74, 12 Asp. M. Cas. 405, 109 L. T. N. S. 960, 30 Times L. Rep. 196, the question was whether the plaintiffs were entitled, as part of their damages resulting from a collision at sea, to a sum for the detention or loss of the use of their vessel during the portion of the time she was in a dry dock undergoing repairs, when the actual work of repair was suspended by reason of a strike. Holding that damages for loss of the use of the vessel during the period of the strike were properly allowed the court said: "It seems clear that the negligent act of the defendants, which brought about the collision and damaged the plaintiffs' vessel, necessitating her being taken to dry dock to be repaired, was the primary and substantial cause of the damage sustained by the plaintiffs through the loss of her use during the whole time she lay there, unavailable as a trading vessel. Many illustrations occur to the mind of things which might happen to prolong the period of repair, and of consequent nonuse of an innocent vessel damaged in a collision at sea, where it would appear to be quite wrong to exonerate the wrongdoer and impose a pecuniary loss upon the owner of the innocent ship. Suppose, for example, that a great liner were injured in a collision in the Atlantic Ocean, and that no dock was available for her repair before she reached Southampton. She properly, and reasonably, and perhaps inevitably, makes for Southampton. Before she arrives there a strike takes place, and it is impossible for her to be docked; and there is no reasonable probability of the strike coming to an early end. There might be no other dock in this country to accommodate her. She then proceeds, say, to Hamburg, properly and reasonably in the circumstances, in order to be dry-docked there. Before she arrives, difficulties occur there, either through strikes or other causes, which render it impossible for her to enter a dry dock large enough to receive her. She then, properly and reasonably in the circumstances, returns towards Southampton in the expectation of the strike terminating at an early date, and, after, say, some days' delay, is able to enter a dry dock and to be put in train to be repaired. Could it be said that the loss of the use of the vessel in the interval by reason of the stated difficulties should fall upon the innocent owner, and that the wrongdoer responsible for the collision should escape free from all liability for such loss? . . . In my judgment it would be just upon general principles, and also in accordance with the true principle deducible from the authorities, to hold, in cases where a vessel is injured in a collision at sea by the negligence of another vessel, that where it is reasonable to take the damaged vessel to a dock to be repaired, and where the owner of the innocent vessel acts in a reasonable and business-like way in all matters connected with the docking and repairing of the vessel up to the time of the vessel being delivered to him in a state of repair, the owner of the vessel at fault—i. e., the wrongdoer who commits the tort—is liable at law to make good any loss which the owner of the injured ship can show he suffered by being deprived of the use of his ship during the whole period when she was unavailable for use through being under repair."

Computation of Value of Use.

Where a vessel which is injured in a collision is at the time thereof under charter the terms of the charter are usually taken as fixing the value of her use during the time when she is detained by the necessity for repairs. The Morning Star, 4 Biss. 62, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,817; The Potomac, 105 U. S. 630, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 1194; Orhanovich v. The Steam-Tug America, 4 Fed. 337, affirming 8 W. N. C. Where the owner of a vessel damaged in a collision hires another vessel to take her place during the period of detention for repairs he may recover as compensation for the loss of her use the amount expended in hiring a substitute. The St. John, 7 Blatchf. 220, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,224; The Emma Kate Ross, 50 Fed. 845, 2 C. C. A. 55, 3 U. S. App. 171, modifying 46 Fed. 872. See also The Yorkshireman, 2 Hag. Adm. (Eng.) 30 note. Compare The Clarence, 3 W. Rob. (Eng.) 283; Brown v. Beatty, 35 U. C. Q. B. 328.

Where no more direct method of ascertaining the value of the use of a vessel is available the amount of damages recoverable by the owner for the loss of her use is often based on her average or probable net earnings for the period of her detention.

Illinois.—Chicago v. Hawgood, etc. Transit Co. 110 Ill. App. 34.

In the case of The Cayuga, 59 Fed. 483, 16 U. S. App. 577, 8 C. C. A. 188, the court said: "The actual loss of the use of the barge to the owners was the value to them of the gross earnings she would have made from her voyage if it had not been interrupted, less the expense which they would have incurred in the accomplishment of it; and, as the means existed for a definite estimate, we think there was no error in not resorting to a mere arbitrary standard, and the assignment of error thereon is not sustained." So in the case of H. M. S. Inflexible, Swabey (Eng.) 200, it was said: "The last head is indemnity for the loss of time during the detention, and this must be estimated upon the principle, as near as may be, of what would certainly or most probably have been obtained if there had been no collision; and as to the time for which such compensation must be made, it ought to be reckoned from the period when the vessel, in the ordinary course, would have been ready for sea if there had been no collision, up to the period when with due diligence the repairs ought to have been completed." In The State of California 54 Fed. 404, 7 U. S. App. 652, 4 C. C. A. 393, the court said that the average daily earnings of the vessel for a period extending from six months prior to the end of six months subsequent to the date of the collision, from which the court could as well determine the capacity of the ship and the condition of the trade in which she was then engaged, and make a fair estimate of the value of her use during the time of her detention, as from expert evidence, was a proper basis for computing damages to the vessel for her detention for repairs. See to the same effect The Bulgaria, 83 Fed. 312. And in the case of The Potomac, 105 U. S. 630, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 1194, the court said: "In order to make full compensation and indemnity for what has been lost by the collision, restitutio in integrum, the owners of the injured vessel are entitled to recover for the loss of her use, while laid up for repairs. When there is a market price for such use, that price is the test of the sum to be recovered. When there is no market price, evidence of the profits that she would have earned if not disabled is competent; but from the gross freight must be deducted so much as would in ordinary cases be disbursed on account of her expenses in earning it; in no event can more than the net profits be recovered by way of damages and the burden is upon the libellant to prove the extent of the damages actually sustained by him." So in the case of The Europe, 190 Fed. 475, 111 C. C. A. 307, it was said: "There was no better method of estimating the loss to her owner by detention for the particular days during which the damages caused by the collision were being repaired than the calculation which the court made, based on proof of daily expenses and estimated average daily earnings for the preceding five years."

In other cases wherein the value of the use of the particular vessel was not fixed definitely by a charter or by the hiring of a substitute vessel, the value of the use has been arrived at by taking evidence of the market value of the use of such a vessel at the time and place in question.

In Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. 101, 14 U. S. (L. ed.) 68, the court said: "The market price, . . . of the hire of the vessel applied as a test of the value of the service will be, if not as certain as in the case where she is under a charter party, at least, so certain that, for all practical purposes in the administration of justice, no substantial distinction can be made. It can be ascertained as readily, and with as much precision, as the price of any given commodity in the market; and affords as clear a rule for estimating the damage sustained on account of the loss of her service, as exists in the case of damage to any other description of personal property, of which the party has been deprived." See to the same effect The Hermann, 4 Blatchf. 441, 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,408. So in The Marpessa [1907] A. C. 241, 76 L. J. P. 128, 97 L. T. N. S. 1, 10 Asp. M. C. 464, 51 Sol. J. 530, 23 Times L. C. 232, wherein it appeared that a sand pump dredger had been run down and disabled for nine days, the court said: "It seems to me that the loss sustained in the present case under the claim of demurrage is the value of the work which would have been done by the dredger during those days had she not been disabled. So many tons of sand would have been removed, which it is the duty and the interest of the plaintiffs to remove, and which by reason of the defendant's negligence were not removed. If the plaintiffs had hired another vessel to do this work they could have recovered the cost of doing it. They have not done so, no other vessel being available at so short a notice, and perhaps, not being available at all; for the construction is peculiar. Failing that evidence, the plaintiffs were entitled to put their case in another way. They might say: The cost to us of maintaining and working this dredger, while it is working, amounts to so much more per day, and its depreciation daily amounts to so much more. We take the total daily sum which it costs us as a fair measure of the value of its daily services to us. Those services are at least worth what we are habitually paying for them year after year, including what we sacrifice in depreciation." See to the same effect No. 7 Steam Sand Pump Dredger v. The Steamship Greta Holme [1897] A. C. (Eng.) 696. And in Harris v. The Prometheus, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,127, the court said that the rule in such cases was that the libellant could recover for the use of his vessel during the time necessary to make the repairs; and by the use of the vessel was meant what she would produce for chartering in the business in which she had been usually employed. But in the case of The W. H. Clark, 5 Biss. 295, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,482, the court said: "The libellant claimed a per diem allowance for the time the boat was undergoing repairs. That seems to have been settled in Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. 101 [14 U. S. (L. ed.) 68], as a proper item of damages in case of collision. But I hardly think it proper to allow the same compensation as when in use, as the wear and tear when used is something, as well as the ordinary risk of navigation."

In the case of The Walter W. Pharo, 1 Lowell 437, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,124, it was held that the owner of a yacht could recover damages for loss of use while undergoing repairs at the rate at which he could have hired her out to pleasure parties. The court said: "Here the yacht was not kept for profit and was never let to hire. Still I am of opinion with the libellant that he may have compensation for the loss of her use at the market rate of such craft, because it is no concern of the respondents what use the libellant chooses to put his vessel to. He had a right to change his mind at any moment. It is different from the case of a vessel kept for hire whom no one wishes to hire. Damages must be assessed by market value when that is possible. The evidence tends to show that such boats would let for about eight dollars a day, and I suppose I may assume that this would be only on week days and when the weather is good. How many such days there were during the twenty days of the repairs I cannot tell. I allow eighty dollars for this damage." See to the same effect the Lagonda, 44 Fed. 367. Compare Fisk v. City of New York, 119 Fed. 256.

v.

AETNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Oregon Supreme Court—February 16, 1915.

75 Oregon 47; 146 Pac. 151.

Accident Insurance — "Loss" of Hand
— What Constitutes.

An accident policy, which binds insurer to pay a specified sum on insured suffering accidental injuries resulting in the "loss of a hand" by removal at or above the wrist, makes insurer liable where insured was accidentally shot in the hand, necessitating amputation of the hand, except a part apparently worthless; the amputation beginning at the wrist.

[See note at end of this case.]

Construction of Policy — Interpretation Favoring Insured.

A policy reasonably susceptible of two interpretations will be construed most favorably for insured.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah county: CLETON, Judge.

Action by George C. Moore, plaintiff, against Aetna Life Insurance Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Snow & McCamant and MacCormac Snow for appellant.

Charles A. Hart and C. E. McCulloch for respondent.

[48] MOBRIDE, J.—This is an action to recover upon an accident insurance policy. That portion thereof which is material to this case stipulates that the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover $1,000 if he should suffer accidental injuries resulting in the "loss of a hand by removal at or above the wrist." The plaintiff was accidentally shot in the hand, necessitating the removal of all the bones of the hand at the wrist except the metacarpal bone of the thumb. From the medical testimony, which is meager, and photographs taken about the time of the trial, it appears that the amputation began at the inner side of the left wrist, removing probably a small portion of the unciform bone, and including in the operation all the metacarpal bones of the four fingers at their articulation with the unciform, os magnum, [49] and trapezoid, respectively. The os magnum trapezoid and trapezium are clearly left intact, and the bones of the thumb, while possibly injured by the shot, retain their continuity. The thumb itself was not removed, although the ball of that member was partially destroyed and the ligaments so injured that it is stiff and entirely useless. The medical witness stated that in his opinion it would have been better to have removed what remained of the thumb, so that plaintiff could have had an artificial hand. There was enough of the flesh on the hand to cover the bones of the wrist forming what the medical witness termed "a bunch of hardened callous" at the end of the wrist, probably no more than good surgery would require for the protection of the bones of the wrist. The cause was tried without the intervention of a jury, and the court found that the plaintiff had suffered the loss of his hand at the wrist, and rendered judgment in his favor, from which defendant appeals.

1. Defendant's contention is that the loss of a hand by removal at or above the wrist means that the entire hand must be physically separated from the body at or above the wrist; and the logical sequence of this argument is that if any fragment useful or useless is not so removed, the plaintiff has not brought himself within the terms of his policy and cannot recover. The question is one of extreme nicety, and there is a dearth of decisions covering the exact point here involved;

there being no case cited by counsel or discovered by us involving the construction of a policy exactly identical in its terms with the one upon which this action is predicated. Thus in Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 618, 46 N. W. 799, 20 Am. St. Rep. 151, 9 L.R.A. 685, where a policy was issued against [50] the loss of a hand or foot, it was held that the insured, who was shot in the back, the injury completely paralyzing the lower limbs so that both his feet were rendered useless, could recover although there was no physical severance of either foot; the court holding that the phrases covering the loss of a foot should be construed to include the loss of the use of it. There are a number of decisions to the same effect, but in none of these do the words "by removal," which are used in the policy here considered, appear.

We will now consider the cases cited by counsel for defendant where the words "by removal," or their equivalent "by severance," are contained in the policy. The first of these is Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. L. etc. Assoc. 122 Mich. 548, 81 N. W. 326, 80 Am. St. Rep. 598, 48 L.R.A. 86, where the policy was issued against "injuries which alone shall cause the amputation of a limb (whole hand or foot)." The plaintiff in that case suffered an injury which resulted in an amputation of about one third of the foot, leaving all of the heel, substantially all of the hollow of the foot, and possibly part of the ball of the foot; the policy having been conditioned upon the amputation of "the whole of the foot." The court held that he could not recover even though he claimed in his testimony that the remaining portion of the foot was useless. The opinion contains an interesting résumé of the cases bearing upon this subject, and distinguishes between the case then in hand and Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun 94, 34 N. Y. S. 545, hereafter to be noticed. Another of the cases is Chevaliers v. Shearer, 27 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 509, in which the plaintiff was insured against loss of the hand by amputation. He received an injury whereby he lost the complete use of his hand; but no part of it was amputated, and it was [51] held that the injury was not within the terms of the policy. In Mady v. Switchmen's Union of North America, 116 Minn. 147, 133 N. W. 472, the plaintiff was insured against injury occasioned by physical separation of four fingers at or above the third joint. The proof showed that he had lost three fingers by amputation at the third joint, and that the fourth finger was injured so as to impair its usefulness 50 per cent. It was held that this injury was not within the terms of the policy. In Stoner v. Yeomen of America, 160 Ill. App. 432, plaintiff was insured against injury by loss of a hand at or above the wrist. The evidence showed that he had at least half of the hand left. The court held he could not recover, saying:

"He [plaintiff] testified he could use the hand to drive nails, but that he did not have much strength in it; that he had worked at the carpenter's trade earning $2 a day since the injury. It is clear that plaintiff's hand was badly injured, but he has the use of more than half the hand, so that he has not lost a hand at or above the wrist."

How different from the case at bar, where substantially nothing remains of plaintiff's hand but a worse than useless fragment!

Another case is Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Walsh, 89 Ohio St. 15, 103 N. E. 759, where plaintiff in the court below was insured against suffering the "amputation of the entire hand at or above the wrist." One finger was amputated, leaving the rest of the hand, as he claimed, useless. It was held that he could not recover. In this case, like the case of Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. L. etc. Assoc. 122 Mich. 548, 81 N. W. 326, 80 Am. St. Rep. 598, 48 L.R.A. 86, the court distinguishes the case in hand from Sneck v. Travelers' [52] Ins. Co. 88 Hun 94, 34 N. Y. S. 545, much relied on by respondent here, saying:

"The Circuit Court, in its opinion, refers to the case of Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun 94, 34 N. Y. S. 545, and holds that the law announced there is applicable. In that case, the policy of insurance provided against loss, by severance, of one entire hand. The insured lost only a portion of his hand; but it appeared that the part remaining was useless, and it was held that plaintiff had lost his 'entire hand,' within the meaning of the policy providing for such loss. In the regulation under consideration here, the word 'loss' is eliminated, and the association limited its liability to cases where an entire hand is actually amputated or severed. If, under the regulation in question, defendant in error is entitled to recover for the loss of the use of his entire hand, which has been severed in part only, then the words 'at or above the wrist joint' would serve no purpose."

The foregoing are the leading cases cited to support defendant's contention. They may be divided into three classes: (a) Where no part of the hand or foot has been severed, but where it has become useless by reason of an injury to some other part of the body, as in the case of the man who was paralyzed by being shot in the back; (b) where some portion of the injured member has been severed, but some useful portion still remains, as in the case of Mady v. Switchmen's Union of North America, 116 Minn. 147, 133 N. W. 472, or the case of Stoner v. Yeomen of America, 160 Ill. App. 432, where there was a partial amputation, but enough of the injured member left to enable the injured person to use it imperfectly in his ordinary business; or (c) where there was an injury requiring the amputation of a comparatively small part of the injured member, the larger portion remaining but practically useless. In our opinion the case at bar does not come within any [53] of these classifications, either in letter or spirit, and the plaintiff must be held to be within the true meaning and spirit of the policy.

2. It is a thoroughly settled rule in the construction of a policy of insurance, which is reasonably susceptible of two interpretations, that that meaning will be given to it which is more favorable to the insured: Hoffman v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 413, 88 Am. Dec. 337; Darrow v. Family Fund Soc. 116 N. Y. 537, 22 N. E. 1093, 15 Am. St. Rep. 430, 6 L.R.A. 495; American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 133, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 977, 18 S. Ct. 552; Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun 94, 34 N. Y. S. 545. This is but giving effect to the maxim of Lord Bacon quoted in the case of Hoffman v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 413, 88 Am. Dec. 337, namely:

"All words, . . . whether they be in deeds, or statutes, or otherwise, if they be general, and not express and precise, shall be restrained unto the fitness of the matter and the person."

And it is also observed in the same opinion:

"It is a rule of law, as well as of ethics, that where the language of a promisor may be understood in more senses than one, it is to be interpreted in the sense in which he had reason to suppose it was understood by the promisee . . . It is also a familiar rule of law that, if it be left in doubt, in view of the general tenor of the instrument and the relations of the contracting parties, whether the given words were used in an enlarged or a restricted sense, other things being equal, that construction should be adopted which is most beneficial to the promisee."

Now, in view of these salutary maxims of the jurists, let us consider the relations of the parties and the object which plaintiff had in view when he took out this policy. He had a good hand against losing the [54] use of which he desired to insure. If he had been told the intent and meaning of the policy was such that if in case of a necessary amputation the surgeon should leave some useless shred of his hand to be a source of annoyance and inconvenience, and thereby his policy would be practically worthless, does any sane person believe for a moment he would have taken out the policy? The substance of what he sought was insurance against the possible loss of his hand as a useful member of his body. Substantially he has lost his hand by removal at the wrist. In view of all the decisions, it is apparent that the words "by removal at or above the wrist" were introduced as a safeguard against possible fraud and to prevent a recovery in cases where there had been no substantial removal of the injured member; but here the hand, as a hand, is gone. Practically the plaintiff has no hand. What occasioned this practical loss of his hand? The answer must be the gunshot wound, and the consequent removal at the wrist of all that made the member useful. An insurer should not be allowed by the use of obscure phrases and exceptions to defeat the very purpose for which the policy was procured. This rule finds support in Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun 94, 34 N. Y. S. 545, which is in many respects similar to the case at bar. The plaintiff was insured against "loss by severance of one entire hand." It appeared from the testimony that 13 of the 27 bones of the hand were gone; that nearly one half of the hand, anatomically speaking, remained, but was useless. The court held that he was entitled to recover, and used this language:

"To require the insured to submit to a strictly literal interpretation of the contract prepared for him by the insurer, without regard to the purpose of the [55] contract or the understanding thereof by the parties, would be to hold that only in case of the severance of the entire hand in a most accurately anatomical or technical sense could the insured recover under this clause of the policy. We do not believe that such a conclusion is required in the present case. The term 'entire hand' is to be taken in its general acceptance and ordinary meaning. In construing this contract the law does not require an injury which comes within a strictly accurate and technical definition of the words employed, but one which reasonably, fairly and practically comes within the meaning of the terms employed in their general and usual meaning and acceptance. In a contract of insurance providing for indemnity for the loss of a limb, the compensation to be paid is not merely for the physical pain of its amputation, but principally for the deprivation of its use as a member of the body. It would seem to be an extremely narrow and technical construction of this contract to say that only a physical removal of every particle of that portion of the human anatomy known as the hand would entitle the insured to recover under the clause of the policy now under consideration. Is it not more reasonable and logical to conclude that, in the use of the language above referred to, the 'entire hand' as a part of the human structure is considered in connection with the use to which it is adapted, and the injury which the loss of such use would entail? Is it not also fair to assume that this was regarded by the parties as the sense in which the contract was to be understood, and was one of the considerations, which influenced the insured to enter into the contract."

This case was afterward affirmed by the court of appeals in a memorandum opinion which does not further discuss the legal points involved. A further case having some features in common with the case at bar is Garcelon v. Commercial Travelers' Eastern Acc. Assoc. 184 Mass. 8, 67 N. E. 868, 100 Am. St. Rep. 540. Plaintiff was insured against the loss of an arm and suffered [56] an accident necessitating the amputation of his arm below the elbow. There, as here, the defendant contended that the loss of a portion of an arm was not the "loss of an arm" within the meaning of the policy; but the court overruled its contention. In Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. L. etc. Assoc. 122 Mich. 548, 81 N. W. 326, 48 L.R.A. 86, 80 Am. St. Rep. 598, the court, after citing authorities, remarks:

"The cases establish the proposition that where an insurance policy insures against the loss of a member, or a loss of an entire member, the word 'loss' should be construed to mean the destruction of the usefulness of the member, or the entire member, for the purposes to which, in its normal condition, it was susceptible of application. In all of these policies the word 'loss' is used, and it is the loss of the member that is in terms insured against. As indicated in the last authority cited, the attempts of the insurance companies to avoid this construction by so changing the policy that it reads, 'loss by severance of feet or hand,' has failed; the courts holding, as before, that it is the loss of the use of the member which was the object of the contract."

1 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2 ed.) page 301, sums up the authorities as follows:

"It has been contended on behalf of the insurance companies that the provisions in regard to the 'loss' of the hands and feet must be understood to imply an actual amputation or physical severance of these members from the body. But this view has not met with favor from the courts; it being held that, to entitle the insured to recover, physical severance is unnecessary, but it is sufficient if he has been deprived entirely of the use of his feet and hands as members of the body. And there can scarcely be any doubt as to the soundness of this view, for if the feet and hands cannot be used for the purpose of moving about or walking, or for holding and handling things, they are in fact lost [57] as much as though actually severed from the body. Many of the companies have altered their policies so as to read, 'the loss of feet or hands by severance' thereof; but this provision has been held to be intended to refer to the manner rather than to the exact physical extent of the injury."

We do not cite these excerpts as being precisely in point in the present case, but rather to indicate the tendency of the courts to adhere to the spirit rather than the strict letter of these contracts; and, construing this policy in accordance with its spirit and substance, we hold that the plaintiff has suffered the loss of his hand by removal at the wrist, and therefore affirm the judgment.

NOTE.

What Constitutes Loss or Severance of Limb or Member within Meaning of Accident Insurance Policy.

Introductory, 1008.

"Loss" of Limb or Member, 1008.

"Severance" of Limb or Member, 1011.

Introductory.

Provision is usually made in an accident insurance policy for the payment of certain specified amounts to the insured for the "loss" of an arm, leg, hand, or other member of the body, as the result of accident. Under such a provision the question naturally arises whether a complete dismemberment is required to authorize a recovery of the prescribed indemnity or whether an injury rendering the member wholly useless is within the terms of the policy. Probably because of the decisions taking the latter view, many more recent policies have substituted for "loss" the term "severance," or "loss by severance," or a similar expression. The present discussion is addressed to the question what injuries to a limb or member fall within any one of these phrases.

"Loss" of Limb or Member.

The "loss" of a limb or member within the meaning of an accident insurance policy may consist in an inability of the injured part to perform its functions as a result of injury, though there is no physical severance. Supreme Ct. of Honor v. Assoc. 150 Pa. St. 132, 24 Atl. 662, 16 L.R.A. 446. Thus in Gahagan v. Morrissey, supra, it appeared that an injury had deprived the plaintiff of the use of his left arm. In his contract of insurance was contained the following provision: "Any member in good standing suffering the loss of a hand at or above the wrist joint, or the loss of a foot at or above the ankle joint, or the loss of the sight of both eyes, shall be considered totally disabled, and shall receive the full amount of his benefit policy." His arm was totally disabled beyond all question but nevertheless he was employed in yard service. The court held that the loss of the use of the hand was covered by the policy and allowed a recovery. In Supreme Ct. of Honor v. Turner, 99 Ill. App. 310, it appeared that the appellee, accidentally shot himself through the palm of his left hand most seriously crippling it. The section of the by-law of the insurer applicable to the case read as follows: "If a member loses a hand or foot by accident, he shall receive one-fourth of the amount of his certificate of membership in cash and the other three-fourths at his death." He brought suit and recovered judgment for $500 by virtue of such section. The appellant contended that the judgment should be reversed because the evidence did not show a total and complete loss of the hand and it was insisted that to entitle a member to recover, the loss of use of the hand must be as complete as it would be if the hand had been amputated. Holding that within the meaning of the policy the hand was lost the court said: "We cannot adopt a construction so narrow. To constitute the loss of a hand within the meaning of the certificate of insurance, it is not necessary that the hand be severed from the arm. It is lost if it be so badly injured that it cannot perform the functions intended for it. The testimony shows that a gun load of shot passed through the palm of appellee's hand, coming out at the back of the hand; that the muscles of the thumb were torn away; that the abductor muscles were injured; that the nerves were badly torn; that three fingers were paralyzed and the appellee has no practical use of the hand for laboring purposes." So in Sisson v. Supreme Ct. of Honor, 104 Mo. App. 54, 78 S. W. 297, wherein it appeared that under a policy providing for indemnity in case of the loss of hands or feet it was held that where evidence was produced that a hand was so crushed as to be practically useless although the whole hand was not amputated the question whether a recovery could be had under the policy for the loss of the hand was for the jury. The court said: "We are of the opinion that the phrase, 'should lose a hand,' used in section 1, article 12, of the constitution of the defendant association, in force when plaintiff received his certificate of insurance, was used in its ordinary and popular sense and does not mean that there should be a total destruction of the hand, anatomically speaking, but that the loss of the use of it for the purposes to which a hand is adapted would be a loss of it, within the meaning of section 1, supra, of the laws of the society. The physician who operated on his hand and treated it afterwards testified that it was lost in the sense that it was of no practical use. The evidence of the plaintiff is such as to show that the hand is more a source of inconvenience and annoyance than of utility, and that for the purposes to which a hand is adapted it is practically useless. In the light of this character of evidence, we think the question of whether or not there was a loss of the hand was properly submitted to the jury." In Lord v. American Mut. Acc. Assoc. 89 Wis. 19, 61 N. W. 293, 46 Am. St. Rep. 815, 26 L.R.A. 741, the question was whether the tearing off of three fingers and a part of the fourth, cutting the hand, and destroying the joint of the thumb, was the loss of one hand, "causing immediate, continuous, and total disability" of the same, within the meaning of a contract of insurance. The court said: "After careful consideration we are constrained to hold that it was a question of fact for the jury; and the jury have found that such loss of the hand was entire. On the part of the defendant it is contended that there is no such thing as the loss of the hand unless the injury is such as to require the amputation of the hand above the wrist. That would be too much of a refinement upon language for practical purposes. The hand was for use; and, if it was injured so as to become useless as a hand, then the defendant became liable for its loss under the contract." In Theorell v. Supreme Ct. of Honor, 115 Ill. App. 313, it appeared that the insured fell and injured himself in such a way that his lower limbs were paralyzed. He brought suit claiming the right to recover $1,000 under a provision of a benefit certificate issued to him by the defendant which provided for indemnity in case of the loss of hands or feet. Reversing an order directing a verdict for the defendant, the court said that while it did not express any opinion as to whether the evidence was sufficient to sustain a verdict, still, in view of the testimony in the case and the interpretation put on the defendant's by-law previously (Supreme Ct. of Honor v. Turner, 99 Ill. App. 310), that to constitute the loss of a limb it was not necessary that it be severed, the question was for the jury. In Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 618, 46 N. W. 799, 20 Am. St. Rep. 151, 9 L.R.A. 685, it appeared that the plaintiff was shot in the back, and the ball penetrated his spine, producing an immediate and total paralysis of the lower part of his body and entirely destroying the use of both feet. It was held that the company was liable under a policy in which was a provision insuring the plaintiff against the loss of two entire feet. The court said: "To our minds the loss of the hands and feet embraced in the policy is an actual and entire loss of their use as members of the body; and if their use is actually destroyed, so that they will perform no function whatever, then they are lost as hands and feet. In ordinary and popular parlance, when a person is deprived of the use of a limb, we say he has lost it. This is the ordinary sense attached to the word when used in such a connection. Now, if the feet and hands cannot be used for the purpose of moving about or walking, or for holding and handling things, they are in fact lost as much as though actually severed from the body. The expression 'loss of feet' would generally be understood to mean a loss of the use of these members; and if the lower portions of the plaintiff's body and his feet are completely paralyzed, and he is permanently and forever deprived of their use, he has suffered 'a loss of two entire feet,' within the meaning of the policy. This is the proper construction of the words of the contract. It is a forced and unnatural construction of the language, as here used, to hold that it means an actual amputation of these limbs, and does not embrace and include an entire deprivation of their use as members of the body." So in Modern Order of Praetorians v. Taylor, 60 Tex. Civ. App. 217, 127 S. W. 260, wherein a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed for the reason that the evidence tended to show that the plaintiff might recover, at least in part, the use of his foot, the court said: "What is the meaning of the language of the constitution of the order 'that, if a member should lose a foot or hand by accident while said certificate is in force, he should receive one-fourth of the amount of his benefit in cash?' Does this language mean that a recovery can be had for a temporary loss of a hand or foot, or must loss of the member be permanent? We do not think that this language means that there must be a severance of the foot or hand from the body to entitle one to recover. The language 'loss of a foot' in common parlance means the loss of the use of that member. It does not mean a temporary loss, but a permanent loss. In our opinion this language of the constitution means a permanent loss of a foot."

But in Stevens v. People's Mut. Acc. Ins. Assoc. 150 Pa. St. 132, 24 Atl. 662, 16 L.R.A. 446, it appeared that the insured while driving rapidly over a rough place in a public road, received a wrench or concussion of the spine, which resulted in a few days in the loss of the use of his left leg. This condition continued until he was encased in a plaster jacket which was applied around his body in such a manner as to cause the weight of the body to rest on the hips and thereby relieve the affected parts, the pressure on the spinal column, and consequent soreness and pain. Soon after commencing the use of this contrivance the condition of the plaintiff improved so that he was finally enabled to resume the practice of his profession and to go about visiting his patients riding in his wagon, or on the cars, or walking to some extent. It was held that the defendant company was not liable inasmuch as the insured had the use of his foot by means of the plaster jacket. The court said: "It is only when he removes the mechanical appliance called a plaster jacket that he becomes disabled. In such circumstances we do not see how he can be considered to have suffered the loss of a foot. He has neither lost a foot nor the use of it. He has it and he constantly uses it, and therefore it cannot be said that, because he is deprived of its use, he is entitled to be considered as having lost the foot itself."

In Stoner v. Yeomen of America, 160 Ill. App. 432, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was insured in the defendant benefit society, sustained an injury consisting in the loss of the third and little fingers and the forcing into the palm of the hand of the knuckle joint of the middle finger, leaving the thumb uninjured and the first finger stiffened slightly so that it would close only about two-thirds. Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff it was held that the injury was not the loss of a hand at or about the wrist within the provisions of the policy. The court said: "Appellee by his own showing has at least half the hand left. He was asked by his counsel whether or not he could perform the work necessary in his vocation, and his answer was, 'Well, it interferes with anything I want to do.' He testified he could use the hand to drive nails but that he did not have much strength in it; that he had worked at the carpenter's trade earning two dollars a day since the injury. It is clear that plaintiff's hand was badly injured, but he has the use of more than half the hand, so that he has not lost a hand at or above the wrist." Compare Beher v. Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, 75 Neb. 183, 106 N. W. 168, 121 Am. St. Rep. 782.

In Gentry v. Standard L. etc. Ins. Co. 6 Ohio Dec. 114, the policy under consideration provided that there must be a loss of "one entire hand and one entire foot, or two entire hands or two entire feet." It was held that, the defendant not being liable unless the insured lost two entire limbs, the plaintiff could not recover for the loss of one hand. The court said: "It may not be morally creditable to so write the policy without a corresponding fixed total loss for a single hand or foot, or eye, but the legal right exists to this contract; and such I find was the contract, and that therefore by the exhibit the plaintiff cannot recover $3,000 for one hand."

There can be no recovery for the severance of a part of the limb or member, or for the complete loss of its use as the result of injury, under an accident insurance policy providing for indemnity only in case of actual "severance." Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. L. etc. Assoc. 122 Mich. 548, 81 N. W. 326, 80 Am. St. Rep. 598, 48 L.R.A. 86; Mady v. Switchmen's Union of North America, 116 Minn. 147, 133 N. W. 472; Wiest v. U. S. Health, etc. Co. 186 Mo. App. 22, 171 S. W. 570; Newman v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co. 192 Mo. App. 159, 177 S. W. 803; Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Walsh, 89 Ohio St. 15, 103 N. E. 759; Chevaliers v. Shearer, 27 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 509. Compare Beber v. Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, 75 Neb. 183, 106 N. W. 168, 121 Am. St. Rep. 782. Thus in Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. L. etc. Assoc. supra, the policy in question provided that an accidental injury must "cause amputation of a limb (whole hand or foot)." The insured lost about one-third of the foot from the toe. The heel, substantially all of the hollow, and part of the ball of the foot, was left. It was held that the company was not liable. The court said: "In the present case the word 'loss' is eliminated, and the insurance is against 'an injury that shall cause the amputation of a limb (whole hand or foot)', or total and permanent loss of eyesight." This language is not ambiguous, and, if the insurance company intended to limit its liability to cases where the entire member was actually amputated, it could not well have chosen more apt and certain language to indicate it, without supplementing it with a negative statement that should exclude recovery for the amputation of less than the entire foot or hand; and it is doubtful if that would not be open to the same construction as the language actually used." In Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Walsh, 89 Ohio St. 15, 103 N. E. 759, it appeared that the insured had his entire hand so crushed that it became useless, but only the thumb was amputated.

The policy provided that the insurance would become effective when the insured should "suffer the amputation or severance of an entire hand at or above the wrist joint." It was held that there was no cause of action under the provision. The court said: "According to the averments of the amended petition, defendant in error had his right hand caught between the bumpers of the cars, and it was thereby so crushed, mangled and broken that it became necessary to amputate the thumb thereof, and the hand from above the wrist joint was then so crushed, mangled, broken and severed that during the rest of his life he is permanently disabled from using the hand to perform any manual service whatever. The word 'severed' is used, but it is wholly inconsistent with what follows, for it is stated that during the rest of his life he is permanently disabled from using the hand—the only inference being that the hand is still there, but useless. The association did not insure him against the injury which is described in the amended petition. There is no authority on the part of the court to make a new contract for the parties. It must deal with the contract as it finds it." So in Wiest v. U. S. Health, etc. Co. 186 Mo. App. 22, 171 S. W. 570, the policy in question provided that the loss of a hand should mean loss by severance at or above the wrist joint. The insured as a result of an amputation necessitated by an injury lost the thumb and first three fingers of his left hand, together with a large portion of the palm, leaving only the little finger and a part of the palm supporting it, which however were found to be paralyzed permanently and of no use or service to the insured. The court, affirming a nonsuit, held that the defendant had chosen apt language to indicate that it did not agree to indemnify the assured for the loss of a hand, unless that loss should consist in the actual physical severance of the hand at or above the wrist joint. Likewise in Chevaliers v. Shearer, 27 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 509, it appeared that the policy in suit provided indemnity in case the insured should "by accident lose one hand by amputation at or above the wrist." As a result of injuries the right arm of the insured was permanently disabled, the full use and service thereof being destroyed, but neither the arm nor the hand was amputated. It was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to a recovery. In Newman v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co. 192 Mo. App. 159, 177 S. W. 803, it appeared that the plaintiff was accidentally shot in his left hand, so that it became necessary to amputate the thumb and the next, or index, finger. The policy contained the following provision: "For the loss of thumb and index finger of either hand by severance at or above metacarpophalangeal joints, one-third of the principal sum." Whether the severance, or amputation, by the surgeon was at the joints named, or below them, was the question in dispute. The facts as to the amputation were stated as follows: "The actual cutting, or severance, was through the bone of the thumb and finger two-eighths and three-eighths of an inch, respectively, below the articulation, or in other words below the point where the ends of the bones in the body of the hand and in the thumb and finger come together. It was far enough below to leave two stubs of the thumb and finger bones plainly to be seen in the X-ray picture taken of his hand, and plainly showing two ends or heads of the bones jointed together, the articulation not disturbed in either the thumb or finger. The evidence also showed that plaintiff could move, or work, these joints. But it was shown by plaintiff that there are structures which enter into the formation of a joint; these being bone, cartilage, ligament, fibro cartilage, and synovial membrane. Some of these extend considerably above and below the point of articulation or contact of the ends of the two thumb bones and the two finger bones; and some of these are at the ends and some compose the covering of these ends of the bones." Reversing a judgment for the plaintiff the court said: "It seems to us that plaintiff confounds the 'structures' below the point of articulation which are necessary to sustain a joint, with the joint itself. This is shown by the first expert witness in his behalf, who stated that: 'A joint consists of the head of the bones entering into that joint, its cartilage, its ligaments, and its synovial membrane.' If the ends of two boards are joined, there is a joint. The boards may be held in place, that is, the joint may be sustained by nailing a board on either side, extending each side of the point of junction, say, for three feet. These side pieces hold the boards together and thereby sustain the joint, but no one would think of calling them the joint itself; and, if a carpenter was ordered to take his knife or saw and sever the boards at the joint, it would not occur to him that he was complying with the order by cutting through the board at a point away from the junction and leaving the end of each board undisturbed. In severing the side boards (and one of the main boards), he would be severing the structure which held the ends of the two main boards in apposition, but he would not disturb the joint. The contract, in using the word 'joint,' fixed a place, a point, of severance; it had no reference to the structures which must exist in order that a joint may be made. We do not mean to hold that for the severance to be 'at the joint,' within the meaning of the policy, it must follow and coincide with the line of articulation, but only that it must be such as destroys the joint as a joint; that is, as an anatomical mechanism. That is to say, the joint must be dismembered." So in Mady v. Switchmen's Union of North America, 116 Minn. 147, 133 N. W. 472, it appeared that the policy of the defendant company contracted to insure the plaintiff against total disability, which was defined as "suffering by means of a physical separation of the loss of four fingers of one hand at or above the third joint, . . . provided the above amputations occur." The plaintiff lost three fingers by amputation, and the fourth finger, though not amputated, was so badly injured that the loss of its usefulness approximated fifty per cent. Affirming a verdict for the defendant the court said that as the fourth finger was not physically separated, remaining intact as part of the hand, the injury did not come within the language of the provision.

On the other hand in Beber v. Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, 75 Neb. 183, 106 N. W. 168, 121 Am. St. Rep. 782, it appeared that the pertinent provision of the constitution of the insurer was as follows: "Any member in good standing, suffering, by means of physical separation, either the loss of a hand at or above the wrist joint, or suffering the loss of a foot at or above the ankle joint, or suffering the loss of the sight of both eyes, shall be considered totally and permanently disabled and shall receive the full amount of his beneficiary certificate, but not otherwise." The plaintiff received a personal injury by cutting his left hand, and as a result of this injury lost his second, third and fourth fingers and about half of the second, third and fourth metacarpal bones, which removed nearly half of the palm of his hand, damaged the first and second joints of the index finger, and caused a running sore on the thumb between the second and third joints, which stiffened and impaired the motion of the thumb and practically destroyed its usefulness. The plaintiff's testimony tended to show that this injury had totally destroyed the usefulness of the hand, as such, while the evidence offered by the defendant tended to show that the remaining thumb and finger on the hand and the partially stiffened wrist joint were of some utility to the plaintiff. The trial court, being of the opinion that, under the quoted provision of the defendant's constitution, the plaintiff was entitled to recover only on proving that the entire hand was severed at or above the wrist joint, directed a verdict for the defendant. The appellate court reversed that judgment and held that the question whether there was a total loss of the use of the plaintiff's hand, at or above the wrist joint, under the evidence contained in the bill of exceptions, was one of fact for the jury. Compare Stoner v. Yeomen of America, 160 Ill. App. 432.

In Sneek v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun 94, 34 N. Y. S. 545, affirmed 156 N. Y. 669, 50 N. E. 1122, reversing 81 Hun 331, 30 N. Y.

S. 881, it appeared that the policy in suit provided indemnity for injuries in case of "loss by severance of one entire hand." About one-half of the hand of the insured was cut off by a planer and testimony was offered to show that the rest of the hand was useless. The court said: "In a contract of insurance providing for indemnity for the loss of a limb, the compensation to be paid is not merely for the physical pain of its amputation, but principally for the deprivation of its use as a member of the body. It would seem to be an extremely narrow and technical construction of this contract to say that only a physical removal of every particle of that portion of the human anatomy known as the hand would entitle the insured to recover under the clause of the policy now under consideration. Is it not more reasonable and logical to conclude that in the use of the language above referred to the 'entire hand,' as a part of the human structure, is considered in connection with the use to which it is adapted and the injury which the loss of such use would entail? Is it not also fair to assume that this was regarded by the parties as the sense in which the contract was to be understood, and was one of the considerations which influenced the insured to enter into the contract?"

In Garcelon v. Commercial Travelers' Eastern Acc. Assoc. 184 Mass. 8, 67 N. E. 868, 100 Am. St. Rep. 540, it appeared that the plaintiff, the holder of a benefit certificate issued by the defendant association entitling him to indemnity, instituted an action to recover for the loss of an arm by amputation four inches below the elbow, as the result of an injury, the word "loss" having been agreed to mean actual amputation. The court said: "We consider the amputation of an arm a little below the elbow to be the loss of an arm in the common acceptance of those words and within their meaning as used in the policy, which specifies merely the 'loss of an arm' without mentioning whether the loss is by amputation below or above the elbow joint."

v.

CRAFT ET AL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—December 16, 1914.

168 N. Car. 208; 83 S. E. 772.

Monopolies — Combination to Raise Prices — Criminality.

A combination by dealers in a necessary of life to raise, by agreement, the price thereof is indictable at common law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where a conspiracy to raise the prices of necessities of life is shown, it is no defense that a person, not one of the conspirators, sold the same commodity at as high a price as the conspirators had agreed on, or that one might think that the price agreed on was reasonable, or that the commodity could not be produced profitably at less than the price agreed on, in view of the conditions under which the conspirators carried on the business. [See note at end of this case.]

Conspiracy — Evidence — Declaration of Cocomspirator.

On a trial for a conspiracy by milk dealers to raise the price, the testimony of a witness that he had heard defendants say, after the agreement to raise the price was signed, that they sold milk thereafter at the higher price agreed on is admissible.

Indictment — Variance Immaterial.

The variance between an indictment alleging that defendants wrongfully agreed to raise the price of milk to 13 cents and the proof that after the agreement they sold milk at 12½ cents is immaterial, for the gist of the offense was the unlawful combination to raise the price, sustained by proof of agreement so to do, and that in consequence thereof defendants did raise the price.

Conclusion of Indictment — Indictment at Common Law Concluding against Statute.

Under Revisal 1905, § 3254, making an indictment sufficient in form where it expresses the charge against defendant in a plain, intelligent, and explicit manner, an indictment otherwise sufficiently good as charging a common-law offense is not invalid because it concludes "against the form of the statute."

Criminal Law — Intent — When Essential.

Under the rule that, when an act forbidden by law is intentionally done, the intent to do the act is the criminal intent which makes the offense, the intent of milk dealers entering into an unlawful combination to raise the price is immaterial in determining their guilt of a common-law conspiracy to raise the price.

Trial — Instruction — Directing Conviction — What Constitutes.

Where the undisputed evidence showed that defendants signed an agreement to raise the price of milk, that they controlled 60 per cent of the output necessary in a city, and it was admitted by defendants that, in consequence of the agreement, they raised the price, a charge that on the agreement and the evidence defendants were guilty, and directing the jury to take the case and return a verdict, is not objectionable as directing a verdict, but merely informs the jury that the agreement and the admission made defendants guilty.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916A 1252.]

Harmless Error — Statutory Offense Tried as Common-law Crime.

That the trial judge and solicitor considered that an indictment charged a common-law conspiracy is not prejudicial to defendants merely because of the failure of the judge and solicitor to consider Laws 1913, c. 41, punishing combinations in restraint of trade.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover county: ALLEN, Judge.

Criminal action. Ed. C. Craft et al., convicted of conspiracy and appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Woodus Kellum and Herbert McClammy for appellants.

Attorney-General Bickett and Assistant Attorney-General Calvert for appellee.

[209] CLARK, C. J.—The indictment charges that Ed. C. Craft and others (naming them), "being dealers and distributors of milk and carrying on and conducting such business severally and independently each from the other, but controlling and handling in the aggregate a large supply of the fresh milk sold for human consumption and used within the city of Wilmington and county of New Hanover, did, on or about 20 October, 1913, within the State and county aforesaid, knowingly, wickedly, and unlawfully conspire, contract, and agree among themselves, and with each other, not to sell fresh milk to consumers at retail for less than a certain price, to wit, the sum of 13 cents per quart, with a view to raise the price of such article of necessity, and by such conspiracy and agreement to unfairly stimulate the market price of such article in which they were dealing, and with a view to lessen and destroy full and free competition in the sale thereof, . . . and in pursuance of the aforesaid conspiracy, understanding, and agreement, did subsequently, to wit, on [210] or about 1 November, 1913 severally increase the price of their milk sold at retail to consumers within the city and county aforesaid from 10 cents per quart to 13 cents per quart."

A verdict of not guilty was entered against one of the defendants, George W. Branch, who then testified for the State that he and the other defendants signed the following paper, which afterwards appeared in the Morning Star. The paper which was put in evidence is as follows:

"To the Public: We, the undersigned dairymen of New Hanover County, desire to notify our customers and patrons and the public generally that on and after 1 November, 1913, it will be impossible to furnish milk to our customers for less than 12½ cents per quart for bottle milk at retail, and milk in cans at 40 cents a gallon. We deplore the issuance of this notice more than our customers do to receive it, but on account of the high cost of labor and of the enormous prices of hay and grain making it impossible to sell milk at the present price. We deplore the fact that conditions compel us to pursue this course, but we are compelled to issue this notice or get out of business, as we are losing money each day we continue in the same. We desire, however, to state that as soon as labor becomes cheaper and the price of grain and hay is decreased, we will lower the price of milk in proportion. Thanking our customers for past favors and assuring them of our high appreciation of the same, wishing to continue to serve them in the future, we beg to remain, Respectfully."

(Here follow the signatures of Edward C. Craft and the other defendants.)

Branch further testified that prior to that time he had charged 10 cents per quart for milk and afterwards he charged 12½ cents, and that he heard the other defendants say after the paper was signed that they sold milk at 12½ cents.

The defendants are not indicted for raising the price of milk, which each of them had the right to do, if done without agreement and combination with others; nor are they indicted for agreeing to create a monopoly and crush competitors; but they are charged with conspiring and agreeing to raise the price of milk.

Such a combination was indictable at common law. The subject is one of vital interest at the present time, and has thus been discussed by Chief Justice White in Standard Oil Co. v. U. S. 221 U. S. 58, Ann. Cas. 1912D 734, 31 S. Ct. 502, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 834, where he says for the Court: "Without going into detail, and but very briefly surveying the whole field, it may be with accuracy said that the dread of enhancement of prices and of other wrongs which it was thought would flow from the undue limitation on competitive conditions caused by contracts, or other acts of individuals or corporations, led as [211] a matter of public policy to the prohibition, or treating as illegal, all contracts or acts which were unreasonably restrictive of competitive conditions, either from the nature or character of the contract or act or where the surrounding circumstances were such as to justify the conclusion that they had not been entered into or performed with the legitimate purpose of reasonably forwarding personal interest and developing trade, but, on the contrary, were of such character as to give rise to the inference or presumption that they had been entered into or done with the intent to do wrong to the general public and to limit the right of individuals, thus restraining the free flow of commerce and tending to bring about the evils, such as enhancement of prices, which were considered to be against public policy." To the same effect is the opinion in U. S. v. American Tobacco Co. 221 U. S. 179, 31 S. Ct. 632, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 691.

The authorities are thus summed up, 27 Cyc. 891: "From the earliest times it was considered a serious matter if several combined to control trade or enhance prices." It is also said, 8 Cyc. 634, citing authorities: "It is an indictable conspiracy at common law for persons dealing in a commodity which is one of the necessities of life to bind themselves under a penalty not to sell such commodity at less than a designated price." To same purport, Spelling on Trusts, sec. 52.

Exception 2 was to the exclusion of the question whether a milk dealer, McEachern, not one of the defendants, sold his milk from 12 cents to 15 cents. Exception 3 was to the exclusion of the question how many milk dealers the witness knew in New Hanover County. Exception 4 was to the exclusion of the question whether the witness was capable of forming an opinion satisfactory to himself whether 12½ cents was a reasonable price. Exceptions 5 and 6 are to the exclusion of the inquiry whether there was a dairyman engaged in the business in that county who had land sufficient to make enough food for his cattle to eat.

A conspiracy to raise the prices of the necessities of life being a crime at common law, it could be no defense to show that another person than one of the conspirators sold the same commodity at as high a price as these defendants had agreed upon, or that the witness might think the price agreed on a reasonable one, or that the article could not be produced profitably at less than the price agreed on, in view of the conditions under which the defendants were carrying on their business. The indictment is not for raising the price, but for the combination and agreement to do so.

Exceptions 7 and 8 are to permitting the witness to say that he had heard the defendants say after the agreement was signed that they sold milk thereafter at 12½ cents. This was competent. Besides, the judge [212] states in the case on appeal: "The defendants admitted that in consequence of the said agreement, they raised the price of milk from 10 cents to 12½ cents a quart."

The exception for an alleged variance between the indictment and proof, in that the allegation was that the defendants agreed to raise the price of milk to 13 cents and that the proof showed that they sold at 12½ cents, cannot be sustained. The gist of the charge is the unlawful agreement and combination to raise the price, and the proof is that the defendants did so agree, and in consequence of such agreement did raise the price. Whether the agreement and raise was to 13 cents or to 12½ cents is immaterial. "A variance will not result where the allegations and proof, although variant, are of the same legal signification." 22 Cyc. 456, citing among others State v. Brown, 82 N. C. 585. An immaterial variance in an indictment is not fatal. State v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 149 N. C. 508, 62 S. E. 1088; State v. Ridge, 125 N. C. 655, 34 S. E. 439.

The exception to the conclusion of the indictment, "against the form of the statute," cannot be sustained. In fact, the indictment concludes both "against the form of the statute and also against the peace and dignity of the State." But we have long outgrown such matters as that, and it is held that the conclusion is a mere matter of form and surplusage. State v. Kirkman, 104 N. C. 911, 10 S. E. 312. Especially is this so (as is said in State v. Kirkman, supra) since the statute, now Revisal, 3254, which makes the bill "sufficient in form, for all intents and purposes, if it expresses the charge against the defendant in a plain, intelligible, and explicit manner," and, if that is done, forbids that the bill should either be "quashed or judgment arrested by reason of any informality or refinement." State v. Kirkman has been repeatedly cited since with approval, State v. Harris, 106 N. C. 688, 11 S. E. 377; State v. Arnold, 107 N. C. 863, 11 S. E. 990; State v. Peters, 107 N. C. 882, 12 S. E. 74; State v. Peeples, 108 N. C. 768, 13 S. E. 8; State v. Call, 121 N. C. 649, 28 S. E. 517; State v. Hester, 122 N. C. 1052, 29 S. E. 380.

The evidence was that about 60 per cent of the output of milk for retailing in Wilmington was controlled by the defendants. The court properly refused the motion to nonsuit. The defendants also asked the court to hold that the jury could not convict unless they were satisfied that it was the intention of the defendant to violate the law; but the court held that it was not a question of intent, and that it was not for the jury to consider the question of intent; that the only question to be considered was whether or not the defendants signed the agreement and in consequence of the agreement raised the price of milk. In this there was no error. It has been repeatedly held that when an act forbidden by law is intentionally done, the intent to do the act is the criminal intent which makes the offense. State v. McLean, 121 N. C. 589, 28 S. E. 140; State v. Smith, 93 N. C. 516; State v. Heaton, 77 N. C. 505; State v. Presnell, 34 N. C. 103.

[213] The court charged the jury: "I have not the making of the law. I can only enforce it. My interpretation of the law is this: The defendants are indicted under the common law—we have no statute that covers it—and at common law a combination of this kind between parties and individuals which has been read to you, and it being admitted in consequence of that agreement the price of milk was advanced from 10 cents to 12½ cents, I tell you upon the agreement and the admission that the defendants are guilty. You can take the case and return your verdict." The jury retired and afterwards returned a verdict of guilty against each of the defendants. The court imposed a fine of $10 on each.

The evidence was uncontradicted that the defendants signed the agreement to raise the price of milk; that together they controlled 60 per cent of the output of that necessary article in Wilmington, and it was admitted by them that in consequence of the said agreement they raised the price of milk from 10 cents to 12½ cents per quart. The court did not "direct a verdict" to be entered, but told the jury that such agreement and admission of the defendants would make the defendants guilty. The jury took the case and later returned their verdict in accordance with the opinion of the court upon these facts, which were not controverted. This the court could do (State v. Riley, 113 N. C. 648, 18 S. E. 168, where the distinction is pointed out).

In Swift v. U. S. 196 U. S. 375, 25 S. Ct. 276, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 518, which was an action to enjoin violations of the Federal antitrust act with respect to sales of fresh meat, the Court said: "The defendants cannot be ordered to compete, but they properly can be forbidden to give directions, or make agreements, not to compete."

"A combination between independent dealers to prevent competition between themselves in the sale of an article of prime necessity is in the contemplation of law an act inimical to trade or commerce, without regard to what may be done under and in pursuance of it, and although the object of such combination was merely the due protection of the parties against ruinous rivalry, and no attempt was made to charge undue or excessive prices, whereby it appears that the parties acted under such agreement, an indictment for conspiracy is sustainable." People v. Sheldon, 139 N. Y. 251, 34 N. E. 785, 36 Am. St. Rep. 690, 23 L.R.A. 221. That was an indictment against retail coal dealers for entering into an agreement to organize a coal exchange and fix prices, below which no member was permitted to sell.

In Chicago, etc. Coal Co. v. People, 214 Ill. 421, 73 N. E. 770, it was held: "A combination between independent producers of coal to prevent competition in its sale and to regulate and fix the price at which coal should be sold in the State of Illinois is inimical to trade and commerce, detrimental to the public, and unlawful, and amounts to a common-law conspiracy, regardless of what may be done in furtherance of the conspiracy."

(N.S.) 458, the Court held the same principle as above, but ruled that insurance not being an article of merchandise, or manufacture, nor one of the necessities of life, nor of prime necessity within the letter or spirit of the law against engrossing, an indictment for a conspiracy to raise insurance rates could not be maintained in the absence of a statute making it a criminal offense. The decision, however, fully recognizes the rule that a combination in restraint of trade in the necessities of life is a conspiracy for an unlawful purpose at common law and punishable as such.

In Sanford v. People, 121 Ill. App. 619, it was held that a combination to enable members thereof to dictate prices in a necessary article (in that case the sale of coal to consumers) was in violation of the common law and of the State statute against trusts.

In State v. Dreany, 65 Kan. 292, 69 Pac. 182, though the indictment was dismissed on the ground that there was no evidence to show that the defendants had entered into an unlawful agreement to fix prices to be paid for grain in a certain town, it was recognized that this was an offense at common law.

This whole subject has been so fully discussed in the Standard Oil and American Tobacco Company cases, both in 221 U. S. and above cited, and in other cases before the United States Supreme Court, that it would be useless repetition to go further.

The solicitor stated that he was proceeding at common law, and the judge also told the jury that this was an offense only at common law, and that we have no statute on the subject. Their attention probably was not called to chapter 41, Laws 1913. Section 1 of that chapter provides: "Every contract, combination in the form of trusts or otherwise, or conspiracy in the restraint of trade or commerce in the State of North Carolina is hereby declared to be illegal." This section further makes it indictable. Section 2 provides: "Any act, contract, combination in the form of trusts, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce which violates the principles of the common law is hereby declared to be in violation of section 1 of this act." Section 3 makes all such contracts, combinations, and conspiracies unreasonable and illegal.

The defendants, however, cannot take advantage of the fact that the judge and solicitor considered the action of the defendants illegal only from the standpoint of the common law.

Upon consideration of the whole case we find

No error.

NOTE.

The reported case applies the common-law rule whereby a combination in restraint of trade in the necessities of life is an indictable offense. In case of an agreement to raise the price of an article, the fact that the article could not be profitably produced at less than the price agreed on is held to be no defense, inasmuch as the indictment is not for raising the price, but for the combination so to do. And it is pointed out that an intention to violate the law is not essential to the offense, for when an act forbidden by law is intentionally done, the intent to do the act is the criminal intent which makes the offense. Further, the court in the reported case calls attention to the North Carolina statute making conspiracies in restraint of trade illegal but holds that the defendant cannot take advantage of the fact that he was tried only under the common law.

Unlawful combinations in restraint of trade are considered from the viewpoint of the common law in the note to Atty.-Gen. v. Adelaide Steamship Co. Ann. Cas. 1914A 417. The question of a combination in restraint of trade as a criminal conspiracy is discussed in the note to Harris v. Com. Ann. Cas. 1913E 597. And the question of the survival of a right of action for a conspiracy to restrain trade is treated in the note to Frohlich v. Deacon, Ann. Cas. 1916C 722.

IN RE BOWMAN.
SECULAR SOCIETY, LIMITED

v.

BOWMAN.

England—Court of Appeal—July 30, 1915.

[1915] 2 Ch. 447.

Wills — Validity — Gift Subversive of Religion.

A testamentary gift to an incorporated society whose purposes are to promote the principle that human conduct should be guided by natural rather than revealed religion and to secure the elimination of sectarian and ecclesiastical influences in the law is valid.

[See note at end of this case.]

[447] ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Charles Bowman by his will, dated September 14, 1905, after appointing his widow and George Warren to be executors and trustees thereof, devised and bequeathed all his real and [448] personal estate not therein otherwise disposed of to his trustees upon trust after the death of his wife for sale and conversion and then subject to the payment of certain legacies to his grandchildren and the provision for certain annuities out of the proceeds of such sale and conversion "upon trust for the Secular Society, Limited, of 2, Newcastle Street, Farringdon Street, London;" and he directed that the receipt of two of the directors of the said society countersigned by the secretary for the time being should be a sufficient discharge to his trustees. By a codicil dated February 28, 1908, he revoked the appointment of George Warren as executor and trustee and appointed C. J. Bowman and A. G. Stanzick to be executors and trustees of his will in the place of the said Warren.

The testator died on April 21, 1908, and his will and codicil were proved on May 19, 1908.

The testator's widow died on October 18, 1914.

The testator's grandchildren having given notice that they intended to dispute the validity of the gift to the Secular Society, Limited, the plaintiff took out an originating summons for the determination of the question whether the said gift was good and valid or not.

The Secular Society, Limited, was a company registered under the Companies Acts, limited by guarantee. Its objects as stated in the memorandum of association were as follows:

"(a) To promote in such ways as may from time to time be determined the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. (b) To promote the utmost freedom of inquiry and the publication of its discoveries. (c) To promote the secularisation of the State so that religious tests and observances may be banished from the Legislature, the Executive and the Judiciary. (d) To promote the abolition of all support, patronage or favour by the State of any particular form or forms of religion. (e) To promote universal secular education without any religious teaching in public schools maintained in any way by municipal rates or imperial taxation. (f) To promote an alteration in this laws concerning religion so that all forms of opinion may have the [449] same legal right of propaganda and endowment. (g) To promote the recognition by the State of marriage as a purely civil contract, leaving its religious sanctions to the judgment and determination of individual citizens. (h) To promote the recognition of Sunday by the State as a purely civil institution for the benefit of the people and the repeal of all Sabbatarian laws devised and operating in the interest of religious sects, religious observances or religious ideas. (j) To employ lecturers, writers, organisers or other servants for the same end. (k) To publish books, pamphlets or periodicals. (l) To assist by votes of money or otherwise other societies or associated persons or individuals who are specially promoting any of the above objects. (m) To have, hold, receive and retain any sums of money paid, given, devised or bequeathed by any person and to employ the same for any of the purposes of the society. (n) To co-operate or communicate with any kindred society in any part of the world. (o) To do all such other lawful things as are conducive or incidental to the attainment of all or any of the above objects."

The articles of association provided (inter alia) as follows:—

"Article 54. All monies received on account of entrance fees, subscriptions, donations, bequests, or otherwise shall be applied solely in carrying out the objects of the society, and in payment of just debts and expenses of management.

"55. No portion of the income of the society, from whatever source derived, shall be paid, or transferred directly or indirectly by way of dividend or bonus or otherwise howsoever by way of profit, to the persons who at any time are, or have been, members of the society, or to any of them, provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the payment of remuneration to any officers or servants of the society, or other person in return for any services actually rendered to the society.

"56. The society shall not be wound up or dissolved except with the consent of at least nine tenths of its members, to be expressed by a resolution at a general meeting specially called for that purpose.

"57. If upon the winding up or dissolution of the society there remains, after the satisfaction of all its debts and liabilities, any property, the same shall not be paid to or distributed amongst [450] the members, but shall be given or transferred to or between such other kindred society or societies, or to or between such other non-sectarian charity as may be designated by the resolution for winding up, or, in the absence of such designation, as the liquidators may select."

Certain documents issued by the officers of the society were tendered in evidence on behalf of the defendants to show that the limited company was a mere screen for the National Secular Society, against the leaders of which numerous prosecutions for blasphemy had in the past been undertaken by the Government of the day. A book issued by the society in which the Bible was held up to ridicule was also tendered. This evidence was, however, rejected by the learned judge.

The adjourned summons was heard by Joyce J. on April 15, 1915.

JOYCE, J.—It will hardly be necessary to say so, but personally I have not the smallest sympathy with the objects of the society which Mr. Tomlin represents on this occasion, still less with the manner in which they have proceeded; but still, this is a case to be decided according to law and according to law only. The testator has given a legacy to a company which is governed by a memorandum and articles of association. In the memorandum and articles it is in effect prescribed how the moneys given to the company are to be expended, and they can be expended for nothing else. It practically comes to this; it is a legacy to the society to be expended upon trust in carrying out the objects if the society according to its prescribed rules. Notwithstanding the argument addressed to me by Mr. Cave, I do not find in this memorandum or in the articles anything subversive of morality or contrary to law or contravening the provisions of any statute. I may be wrong, but that is my opinion.

If that be so, then this legacy is a perfectly good legacy unless [451] it can be made out that having regard to the constitution of this society the rule against perpetuities is infringed by the bequest of this legacy. If the memorandum or articles had prescribed that money received in this way should be invested and kept as capital and only the income applied to the purposes of this society, then one would have been compelled, I think, to have considered the question whether the objects were charitable, because if they were not charitable then a perpetuity would be created by the trust, and that trust would have been bad unless charitable; but I do not find in these articles anything creating a perpetuity with regard to the money coming to the society by legacies or gifts or anything of the kind. The mere fact that on a winding-up the money is not to be divided among the members, if that article be valid, does not create a perpetuity. If it did I am not sure that that article would not have been void, but I do not think it does.

It appears to me that there is nothing to invalidate or take away or destroy the validity of this gift to the society, and I think the gift is good.

From this decision the next of kin and heir-at-law of the testator appealed. The appeal came on for hearing on July 13 1915.

Cave, K. C. and J. Arthur Price for appellants.

Tomlin, K. C. and Hon. M. M. Macnaghten for respondents.

Solicitors: Calder Woods & Pettrick; Harper, Battcock & Goode.

[451] LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—Mr. Charles Bowman by his will left his residuary estate upon trust for the Secular Society, Limited. Joyce J. has declared that this gift of the residuary estate is valid. From this decision the heir-at-law and next of kin appeal.

These are two points which may at once be got rid of. This is not claimed to be a charity. The plaintiffs assert their right to the residuary estate as their own property. In the next place no question of perpetuity arises, because the plaintiff is a limited company, and, in the view of the law, a person competent to dispose of what is given. But it is argued on behalf of the appellants that the plaintiffs' society is illegal inasmuch as its objects are antagonistic to all religion, and therefore no Court ought to aid it in recovering the legacy. A limited company is bound by its memorandum of association. It cannot go outside its limits. I decline to look at anything but the memorandum, and in particular I have no right to consider whether the chairman or any of the directors of the company may have been guilty of what the law would undoubtedly regard as the publication of blasphemous libels. When I turn to the memorandum I see that it is one of those companies permitted by law, the objects of which are not pecuniary gain. No dividend or income can be received by any member of the company. It is a company limited by guarantee. When I look at the objects for which the company is formed I find that the principle object is: "(a) To promote in such ways as may from time to time be determined the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge and not upon supernatural belief and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action." [The Master of the Rolls then referred to the other objects stated in the company's memorandum of association, and continued:] I am not satisfied that any one of these objects is unlawful. Many of these objects are supported by a large section of the [462] community, and I think it would be a retrograde step if we were to hold that there is necessarily any illegality in the company. I say "necessarily" because in my view it is not sufficient to say that the society acting by its directors may use the funds which they receive under this will for a blasphemous purpose, in which case the parties concerned may justly be exposed to an indictment. It is sufficient that they can so apply the money as to be free from any taint of illegality. If, however, any one of the objects in the memorandum were necessarily unlawful, for example for an immoral purpose, I do not think that the addition of other innocent objects would entitle the company to obtain the money, but in my view the facts do not bring the case within that principle. It has, however, been strenuously argued that blasphemy at common law is unlawful, even though it may not be a criminal offense, and there is no doubt a large body of ancient authority, and some modern authority, in support of this view. In my opinion the better view, and the one which ought to be followed, is that which was expressed by Lord Coleridge in Reg. v. Ramsay, 15 Cox C. C. 231, and not that which was expressed by Stephen, J. In substance the view of Lord Coleridge was that publications intended in good faith to propagate opinions on religious subjects which the persons who publish them regard as true are not blasphemy if it is done in a decent way and with regard to the feelings of others. Phillimore J. in a subsequent case has distinctly adopted this view, and I think it ought to be adopted in this Court. This is one of those subjects in which there have undoubtedly been great changes of opinion within the last 100 years, and I think within the last half-century. It is really a question of public policy, which varies from time to time. It is to my mind almost shocking to hold in the twentieth century that the publications of Positivists, and other schools of philosophers, who do not admit, and probably even deny, the existence of a God, are necessarily blasphemous. I think the older view must now be regarded as obsolete, and any decision to that effect ought no longer to be followed. I do not propose to go through the later authorities, which are numerous. I think the law is accurately [463] stated by Erskine J. in advising the House of Lords in Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & F. 524, 525, where he says, after referring to various Toleration Acts, "It is indeed still blasphemy, punishable at common law, scoffingly or irreverently to ridicule or impugn the doctrines of the Christian faith, and no one would be allowed to give or to claim any pecuniary encouragement for such purpose; yet any man may, without subjecting himself to any penal consequences, soberly and reverently examine and question the truth of those doctrines which have been assumed as essential to it. And I am not aware of any impediment to the application of any charitable fund for the encouragement of such inquiries." I think it is impossible to contend that the main object of the plaintiffs' society, as described in clause (a), cannot be given effect to without incurring liability to indictment for blasphemy at common law. It is, however, contended that this relaxation of old principles is limited to criminal blasphemy, and that it is sufficient for the present appellants to say that the object, though not illegal, either by statute or common law, is yet unlawful in the sense that the Court will not aid the plaintiffs to get the legacy. It seems to me that the undoubted relaxation of the views as to common-law blasphemy must extend to matters outside the criminal law.

Thus far I have dealt with the case without referring to some comparatively modern authorities which undoubtedly present difficulties. Briggs v. Hartley, 14 Jur. 683, 19 L. J. Ch. 416, decided by Shadwell V.-C. in 1850, was simply this: A legacy for the best essay on Natural Theology treated as a science and sufficient when so treated and taught to constitute a true, perfect, and philosophical system of universal religion; the Vice-Chancellor said: "I cannot conceive that the bequest in the testator's will is at all consistent with Christianity, and, therefore, it must fail." In my view that is a decision which ought not to be followed.

Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R. 2 Ex ch. 230, is a case which I feel great difficulty in following. The defendant had agreed to let rooms to the plaintiff, who was secretary to the Liverpool Secular Society. The defendant discovered that the rooms were to be used for the [464] purpose of having lectures delivered there in advance of the views of the society. The titles of the proposed lectures were published. The most material ones were: "The Character and Teachings of Christ: the former defective, the latter misleading." "The Bible shown to be no more inspired than any other book." "Catholicism, Protestantism and Secularism: which contains more truth and which is best calculated to benefit humanity." The defendants refused to carry out their contract, and it was held that the plaintiff could not recover on the ground that the lectures announced were blasphemous and illegal. Kelly C. B. based his judgment on the ground that Christianity is part and parcel of the common law of the land, and that therefore to support and maintain propositions indicated in the titles of the proposed lectures was a violation of the first principles of law and could not be done without blasphemy. Bramwell B. said that an act may be illegal in the sense that the law will not aid it, and yet that the law will not immediately punish it. It will be observed that there was nothing to indicate that the proposed lectures would not be delivered in decent and inoffensive language. So far as I am aware this case, which was decided in 1867, has never been followed, and, notwithstanding my profound respect for the learned judges who decided it, I am bound to say that I think it ought not to be followed. If Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R. 2 Ex ch. 230, is still good law, the plaintiffs cannot claim the legacy, but as I do not consider it is good law, I think Joyce J. was right in the view which he took and that the appeal must be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J.—The testator in this case left his estate, after providing for certain annuities and legacies, in trust for the Secular Society, Limited, and the question is whether that bequest is valid. Two objections were taken to its validity: (1.) that it is a bequest for purposes which are illegal, or if not illegal in the sense that they are criminal, at any rate contrary to public policy; and (2.) that it tends to a perpetuity.

The Secular Society, Limited, is a company registered under the Companies Acts, limited by guarantee. Its objects are stated in the memorandum of association. That memorandum has [465] already been read, and I do not think it necessary to read it again. The articles contain the following provisions as to application of funds, and dissolution or winding up, in articles 54 to 57. [The Lord Justice read them and continued:] The first question whether this is a bequest for purposes illegal or contrary to public policy depends, in my opinion, upon the question whether the objects of the society as expressed in the memorandum are illegal or contrary to public policy. It was contended on behalf of the heir-at-law and next of kin that the Court ought to look behind the purposes stated in the memorandum, and that in that case it would be found that the society was formed for the purpose of enabling an unregistered body called the Secular Society and its members to hold money bequeathed for their purposes, which it would be difficult for them to hold if bequeathed directly to them. It was also contended that if the actions and the writings of the members of that society were examined it would be found that their purposes included that of subverting the Christian religion, and of doing so by means which are illegal within any interpretation that has been put upon the law of blasphemy. I do not think we are at liberty to go behind the purposes stated in the memorandum. This is a bequest to the limited company and not to its members, and if the objects of the company are legal I do not think a bequest to it is invalid because its members apply the money to an illegal purpose, though they may by doing so subject themselves to punishments. It is therefore necessary only to consider the objects of the company and in substance only (a). I do not see anything illegal or contrary to public policy in the other objects, except so far as some of them may be ancillary to (a). If (a) be not illegal or contrary to public policy, then there is no legal objection to any of the objects. It is contended that a part of the object (a) is the denial and subversion of the Christian religion, and that to pursue that object is illegal in the strict sense of being a punishable offense. I do not think the pursuit of that object by a limited company is within the words of the statute 9 Will. 3, c. 35, which applies only to a certain class of persons, and therefore, if illegal, it must be so at common law.

[466] The law as to blasphemy has changed very much in the course of time, and much religious controversy is now considered perfectly unobjectionable which would have been punishable by the law in former years. I adopt the law as laid down by Lord Coleridge, C.J. in Reg. v. Bradlaugh, 15 Cox C. C. 217, and Reg. v. Ramsey, 15 Cox C.C. 231, and followed by Phillimore J. in Rex v. Boulter, 72 J. P. 188; and adopting that interpretation of the law, I consider there is nothing in the objects stated in (a) that is punishable by the law.

A much more difficult question is whether this object, though not illegal in the sense of being punishable, is illegal in the sense that the law will not recognize it as being the foundation of legal right and will do nothing to aid it. The denial of religion is not in terms the object of the company as set out in (a), but I think that it is involved in it, and that it is not possible to promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge and that human welfare is the proper end of all thought and action without at any rate inferentially denying the Divine government of the world and the principles of religion. I think there is no doubt that in former times such an object would have been held to be contrary to public policy, but the question is whether it is right to hold so now. I think that the doctrine of public policy cannot be considered as being always the same and that many things would be, and have been, held contrary to public policy which are not so held now. I agree with what was said by Lord Coleridge in Reg. v. Ramsay, 15 Cox C. C. 235. It is true that he was speaking only of criminal law in that passage, but I think his words are equally applicable to civil rights. It must not be assumed that the objects of the company will be promoted by what has been called licentious and contumelious abuse applied to sacred things; they may be promoted by discussion of a perfectly orderly and decent character, and that being so, the object does not necessarily involve anything more than such discussion. I think that at the present day such discussion, though it does involve a denial of religion, ought not to be held contrary to public policy, and [467] that the doctrine should be confined to denials of religion of the nature described by Lord Coleridge.

I do not propose to discuss the authorities cited to us at any length, as they are fully dealt with by the other members of the Court, but it is perhaps necessary to mention two of them, i.e., Briggs v. Hartley, 14 Jur. 683, 19 L. J. Ch. 416, and Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R. 2 Exch. 230. In the former Shadwell V.-C. held a bequest for the best essay on Natural Theology treated as a science and sufficient when so treated and taught to constitute a true, perfect, and philosophical system of universal religion invalid because inconsistent with Christianity; and in the latter the Court of Exchequer, Kelly, C. B., Martin, B., and Brawwell, B., held a contract for the letting of rooms for lectures contrary to the Christian religion not binding. The nature of the lectures is only to be gathered from the titles, and the title most referred to is: "The Character and Teachings of Christ: the former defective, the latter misleading." Whatever may have been the doctrine as to public policy prevailing in 1850, when the former case was decided, I do not think that it ought now to be followed. If the latter decision means that no consideration will support a contract which involves any questioning of the truth of religion, I also think that should not be followed, but the Court may have inferred from the title to which I referred that the lectures attacked religion in a reviling and contumelious manner, and if that were the case, the decision was, I think, right.

For these reasons I do not think that the objects of the company were illegal in either of the senses in which that word was used.

On the question of perpetuities I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has been said by the Master of the Rolls.

WARRINGTON, L. J.—Charles Bowman, the testator, by his will, directed that after the death of his wife his trustees should convert into money the whole of his estate, and, after making certain payments out of the proceeds, should stand possessed of the ultimate residue thereof in trust for the Secular Society, [468] Limited. The testator died in 1908 and his wife in 1914. The question was then raised whether or no the gift of the residue was in law capable of taking effect. An originating summons was issued for the purpose of determining this question. Joyce J. has decided in favour of the gift. The heir-at-law and the next of kin of the testator appeal, contending that the gift of the ultimate residue is for an unlawful purpose and therefore void, and that there is consequently an intestacy.

The Secular Society is a company incorporated under the Companies Acts. The memorandum of association states that the objects for which the company is formed are "(a) To promote in such ways as may from time to time be determined the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action;" and to promote a number of other ends, political and otherwise, and to do a number of other things, which it is unnecessary to specify. The appellants contend that the principle above set forth involves the rejection of all religious sanctions for human conduct and of all religious belief and that to promote such a principle is to promote atheism and ir-religion and is unlawful. They contend further that a gift to or a trust for a company incorporated with such an unlawful object, whether that object be merely one of many or, as they say it is in this case, the main and governing object of the company, the others being merely ancillary thereto, is a gift or a trust for an unlawful purpose and is therefore void. On the construction of this memorandum I think the "objects clause" divides itself into two parts, one being clauses (a) to (h) inclusive, the other being contained in clauses (i) to (o). The real and substantial objects with which the company is incorporated are those expressed in the first part, the matters mentioned in the second part are incidental or ancillary only. The object expressed in clause (a) is one at all events of the real and substantial objects with which the company is formed, and I think we are driven to conclude that money given to the company is given to be used in furtherance of that object which thus becomes the purpose of the gift. So far I agree with the appellants that if the promotion of the [469] principles described in clause (a) is illegal the gift in question is given for an illegal purpose. Further, I think the principle as described in the memorandum does involve the negation of any religious sanction for human action and to this extent may be said to tend to the subversion of a religion as an active force in human life. It is moreover impossible to reconcile such a principle with a belief in the Divine government of the world or in revelation, and it must therefore be taken to involve a denial of the truth of such a belief, and to promote it would be to promote atheism. The question, therefore, comes to this: Is the mere promotion of a principle involving the characteristics above mentioned an illegal act? It would, of course, be illegal if it amounted to an offence of blasphemy at common law. In Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. ix. p. 531, this offence is said to consist in (1.) scoffingly or irreverently ridiculing or impugning the doctrines of the Christian faith, or (2.) uttering or publishing contumelious reproaches of Jesus Christ, or (3.) profane scoffing at the Holy Scriptures or exposing any part thereof to contempt or ridicule; but it is not blasphemy with due gravity and propriety to contend that the Christian religion or any part of its doctrine or the whole or any part of the Holy Scriptures is untrue. The accuracy of this definition has been disputed, and it has been said that any denial of the truth of Christianity in general or of the existence of God, however decent may be the terms of such denial, is by the common law punishable as blasphemy (see Stephen's Digest of Criminal Law, 5th ed. p. 125, and Kelly, C.B. in Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R. 2 Exch. 230, as to which case I have something to say presently on another point). But in my opinion the weight of authority is strongly in favour of the accuracy of the definition (see per Lord Coleridge in Reg. v. Ramsay, 15 Cox C. C. 231, and per Phillimore J. in Rex v. Boulter, 72 J. P. 188). On this point I desire particularly to refer to the opinion of Erskine, J., advising the House of Lords, in Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & F. 355, 524. He says this: "It is indeed still blasphemy, punishable at common law, scoffingly or irreverently to ridicule or impugn the doctrines of the Christian faith, and no one would [470] be allowed to give or to claim any pecuniary encouragement for such purpose; yet any man may, without subjecting himself to any penal consequences, soberly and reverently examine and question the truth of those doctrines which have been assumed as essential to it." In my opinion, therefore, the promotion of the principle in question, provided it be done with due gravity and propriety, would not be illegal in the sense of being an offence at common law.

The next question is whether it is made illegal by the statute of 9 Will. 3, c. 35. Under the terms of that statute any person having been educated in or at any time made profession of the Christian religion who by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking asserts or maintains that there are more Gods than one, or denies the Christian religion to be true or the Holy Scriptures to be of Divine authority, is guilty of an offence under the Act. That is to say, this statute renders the conduct described an offence only in the case of persons answering a particular description. In my opinion it would not be right to assume that the agents of the company who carry out its objects will be persons answering that description. Unless that assumption is made the object we are considering is not rendered illegal by the statute. I am aware that wherever this statute has been referred to the words limiting its application to a particular class have been ignored, but on the other hand the words are there, and when the statute is relied upon as creating an offence they cannot, in my opinion, be left out. So far as can be now ascertained there has never been a prosecution under it, and its effect has therefore not been directly tested. I think I may safely say that nowadays it would be strictly construed. Next the purpose of the gift is said to be illegal because by the express terms of the statute 29 Car. 2, c. 9, by which the writ de haeretico comburendo was abolished, the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in cases of atheism, blasphemy, heresy or schism, and other damnable doctrines and opinions is preserved, and those Courts may punish the same by ecclesiastical punishment and censure. In my opinion a gift cannot properly be held invalid on the ground that it is given for a purpose which may be contrary to ecclesiastical law but is not otherwise illegal. Lastly it [471] is said that the purpose of the gift is against public policy and therefore illegal. The doctrine that contracts ought not to be enforced or legal sanction ought not to be given to legacies or trusts otherwise valid and effectual on the ground of public policy ought to be applied with the utmost caution. As to this Lord Bramwell made some pertinent remarks in the case of Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor [1892] A. C. 25, 45, he says: "Public policy," said Mr. Justice Burrough (I believe quoting Chief Justice Hobart), "is an unruly horse, and dangerous to ride." I quote also another distinguished judge, more modern, Mr. Justice Cave: "Certain kinds of contracts have been held void at common law on the ground of public policy; a branch of the law, however, which certainly should not be extended, as judges are more to be trusted as interpreters of the law than as expounders of what is called public policy." I think the present case is an illustration of the wisdom of these remarks. I venture to make another. No evidence is given in these public policy cases. The tribunal is to say, as matter of law, that the thing is against public policy, and void. How can the judge do that without any evidence as to its effect and consequences?" In respect of such a matter as the discussion of questions affecting religion the views of men as to what is or is not contrary to public policy vary with the times. It is not so very long ago that the promulgation of the views of Charles Darwin on the "Origin of Species" or those of Robertson Smith on the incorrectness of the attribution of certain books of Scripture to the traditional authors was regarded by many as tending to subvert the foundations of revealed religion, but at the present time most people of education, at all events judging from the experience of the past, would regard temperate and instructed discussion of such subjects as tending rather to strengthen than to weaken the real foundations and at all events would not for a moment think that to allow such discussion is against the public interest. In my opinion, therefore, we ought not to hold the gift in the present case to be invalid on the ground now under consideration, unless we are bound so to do by authority of such a kind that to refuse to follow it would be to alter the law.

[472] The cases as to charities do not seem to me to be in point. It may well be that a trust which could not be supported as a charity because it could not be brought within the spirit and intentment of the Statute of Elizabeth might yet be not illegal if expressed in such a way as not to infringe the rule against perpetuities. In De Costa v. De Paz, 2 Swanst. 487, note, a gift for encouraging the preaching of the Jewish religion was held to be bad, the reason given being that to preach a religion contrary to the Christian religion could not be a good charity. On the other hand, where a gift was capable of being supported as one for the relief of the poor it was held good, though the form of relief given was the supply of the materials necessary for the due performance of the Jewish rites (see Straus v. Goldsmid, 8 Sim. 614).

As to the suggested non-existence of copyright in books impugning the veracity of the Scriptures there seems to be no actual decision. In some cases injunctions protecting the copyright have been refused on the ground that until the plaintiff had brought an action and established his copyright the Court of Chancery would not interfere, but in none has there been any detailed examination of the impugned book or any consideration of the mode in which the author's views are presented. It is true that in Lawrence v. Smith, Jac. 471, 474, Lord Eldon said that the law does not give protection to those who contradict the Scriptures, but this was a mere dictum, the learned Lord Chancellor refusing the injunction on the ground mentioned above. The appellants in this part of their case relied chiefly on Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R. 2 Exch. 230. The question there was whether a man who had let certain rooms for the purpose of lectures and afterwards discovered that the lectures to be delivered were of a blasphemous nature was bound by his contract. The subject of the proposed lectures could only be guessed by their titles. One of them was: "The Character and Teachings of Christ: the former defective, the latter misleading." The Court there held that the proposed lectures, judging from their titles, were blasphemous and the purpose of the letting was unlawful and the contract could not be enforced. I think Kelly, C.B., thought that the [473] delivery of the lectures would amount to the common law offence of blasphemy. He mentions in particular the lecture the title of which is set out above, and he may well have thought that to impugn the character of Christ must necessarily involve that offence even according to the narrow definition: I infer, however, from the words he has used, that he would have hardly accepted that as correct. Bramwell B. founds his statement that the purpose was unlawful on the Act of William III., and also refers particularly to the same lecture. Neither of the judges really dealt with the question whether the lectures, if not infringing a positive ordinance of law, would have rendered the contract incapable of being enforced. It is quite true that Bramwell B. laid it down that a thing may be unlawful in the sense that the law will not aid it, and yet that the law will not immediately punish it, but accepting this as correct, as I think it clearly is, it still remains to consider whether the particular thing in question is unlawful in the wider sense or not.

In my opinion there is no authority binding us to hold that the promotion in a proper manner of the objects of the company is contrary to public policy, and we ought not to hold it to be so.

I have already said that it is, in my opinion, not unlawful on the other grounds suggested, and the appeal therefore fails.

NOTE.

Validity of Testamentary Disposition Subversive of Religion.

In discussing the validity of a testamentary disposition for a purpose which is deemed to be subversive of religion, this note does not touch on the validity of such a testamentary gift as being to a charitable use. To constitute such a use the gift must fall affirmatively within one of the classes originating in the enumeration in the statute of Elizabeth, and the decision that a gift cannot be so classified in no manner involves the validity of a gift not requiring the aid of the doctrine of charitable uses. See generally 5 R. C. L. tit. Charities, p. 322, et seq. See also the notes to the following cases: Biscoe v. Thweatt, 4 Ann. Cas. 1136; Sears v. Atty.-Gen. 9 Ann. Cas. 1200; In re Douglass, Ann. Cas. 1914D 447. In the foregoing notes, in the course of a discussion of the question whether a gift to a church is a valid charity, cases passing on gifts in support of Christian Science, Swedenborgianism and the like are reviewed.

According to the early English cases, any attempt to bring into controversy the truth of any of the doctrines of Christianity constituted the crime of blasphemy. See the note to Morrison v. State, Ann. Cas. 1914A 811. As an inevitable result of that holding, any testamentary disposition of property designed to promote a discussion of the truth of those doctrines was in furtherance of a crime, and was void. Briggs v. Hartley, 14 Jur. (Eng.) 683, 19 L. J. Ch. 416; Thornton v. Howe, 31 Beav. (Eng.) 14. So in De Costa v. De Paz, 2 Swanst. (Eng.) 487 note, Amb. 228, a case decided before the disabilities of the Jews were removed by Act of Parliament, it appeared that a Jew by his will ordered that a certain amount of his estate should be appropriated to the establishment of a Jesiba, or assembly, for the daily reading of the Jewish holy law. The court held that the bequest was not good in law as it would promote a religion contrary to the established one. In Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & F. (Eng.) 355, a bequest for promoting Unitarianism was held to be void.

But by the modern doctrine both in England and in the United States a mere denial of the truth of Christianity does not constitute an offense. If the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of that religion may be attacked without incurring the penalties of blasphemy. See the note to Morrison v. State, Ann. Cas. 1914A 811. The modern doctrine is that Christianity is a part of the common law only in the qualified sense that it cannot be openly and maliciously reviled and blasphemed against. See the note to Clement v. Graham, Ann. Cas. 1913E 1208, at page 1228. The constitutional provisions securing liberty of conscience and freedom of religious worship were "intended to extend equally to all sects whether they believed in Christianity or not, and whether they were Jews or infidels." Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 127, 11 U. S. (L. ed.) 205.

Basing its decision principally on the changes heretofore discussed in the law of blasphemy the reported case which overrules several earlier cases (some of which are cited supra), upholds the validity of a testamentary gift to a society whose object is to "promote in such ways as may from time to time be determined the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge and not upon supernatural belief and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action."

In the United States the precise question under discussion does not seem to have been passed on. A somewhat analogous question was considered in the case of In re Bissell, 63 Neb. 585, 88 N. W. 683, wherein the court sustained a bequest to a "National Christian Association" whose principal activity consisted in opposition to the order of Freemasons. The case is illustrative of the modern policy of permitting free discussion of all sides of questions of a religious or semi-religious nature, since the order which the testator's gift was designed to oppose is not only sanctioned by law but has repeatedly been held to be a charity. See the note to Morrow v. Smith, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1183. In the case of In re Bissell, supra, the court said: "This is a country of free speech and free opinions. One who does not believe in secret societies, who thinks that their tendency is bad, has a right in every legitimate way to oppose their growth, and to seek by all legal means to cause their members to withdraw their membership. He may go out upon the street and preach against their existence, and he may hire others to do the same. No lawyer of standing would, we think, risk his reputation by urging that Mr. Bissell could avoid payment of any sum he might agree to pay Mr. Phillips, or any other speaker, for delivering a lecture in opposition to secret societies. He would not urge to the court that Mr. Bissell would not be liable for the rent of a hall engaged by him for such a purpose. He would not urge that Mr. Bissell might escape payment of his subscription to the Cynosure upon the ground that it was advocating illegal principles; and, if not, why might not he devote his property at his death for the employment of men to advocate the same principles for which he would be legally liable, had he contracted with them to advocate during his lifetime. Why may he not bequeath his property to the use of any purpose for which he could legally pledge it in his lifetime? Many churches oppose secret societies. Their ministers preach their opposition from the pulpit, and yet no one has advocated that they be suppressed for denouncing legal and legitimate organizations, and no one has yet sought to avoid a subscription to a church upon the ground that it is advocating principles at war with the legally established institutions of the state."

ducing gas company, under which the latter was to furnish gas to the former upon the basis of a percentage of meter readings, which had two or three years to run when the suit was commenced, remained in force, and no evidence was offered to show the rate paid by the distributing to the producing company after the expiration of such contract.

Error to Ohio Supreme Court.

Action by City of Newark, plaintiff, against Newark Natural Gas and Fuel Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in Court of Common Pleas, Licking county. Judgment affirmed by Court of Appeals and by Supreme Court of Ohio. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

James R. Fitzgibbon, Eugene Mackey, S. M. Douglass and Charles Montgomery for plaintiff in error.

Frank A. Bolton, Ralph Norpell and Edward Kibler for defendant in error.

[406] PITNEY, J.—The question upon which our jurisdiction is here invoked is whether an ordinance of the City of Newark, Ohio, passed March 6, 1911, fixing the maximum price that plaintiff in error might charge to consumers of natural gas in that city for a period of five years at 20 cents per thousand cubic feet, with 10% discount for prompt payment, a rate described as "18 cents net," is confiscatory, and therefore in violation of the "due process" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416). Plaintiff in error operates under a franchise granted by a city ordinance passed February 21, 1898, for a term of twenty-five years, which permitted a rate of 25 cents per thousand for a period of ten years from its passage, but within that period the company voluntarily introduced a net rate of 18 cents and maintained it for some years prior to the adoption of the ordinance of 1911. The company refused to accept the provisions of the latter ordinance and notified its customers that it would discontinue service unless the rate of 25 cents was paid. Thereupon the city filed a petition in the Court of Common Pleas of Licking County praying a mandatory injunction. The company answered that the ordinance provided no just compensation for the use of its property and therefore deprived it of its constitutional rights. Voluminous evidence was taken upon [407] this issue, and the court found the defense to be unfounded in fact, and made a decree in favor of the city, but without prejudice to the right of the company to apply for a modification "if at any time it should appear that said rate of 18c net does not render an adequate return to said defendant Company." An appeal was

CITY OF NEWARK.

Constitutional Law — Who May Assert Invalidity.

A gas-distributing company cannot assert that constitutional rights of a gas-producing and transporting company furnishing gas to the former company upon the basis of a percentage of meter readings will be infringed by a municipal ordinance fixing the gas rates which the distributing company may charge.

[See 19 Ann. Cas. 175; Ann. Cas. 1915C 57.]

Gas — Rate Regulation — Validity.

The property of a gas-distributing company cannot be said to have been taken without due process of law, contrary to U. S. Const. 14th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416), by a decree which enforced, without prejudice to the right to apply thereafter for a modification, a municipal ordinance fixing gas rates for five years, where there was no claim that the company could not operate profitably under such ordinance so long as its contract with a pro-taken to the Court of Appeals and there heard upon the evidence taken in the Court of Common Pleas and additional evidence, and the same decree was entered as in the Court of Common Pleas. The Supreme Court of Ohio affirmed the decree. 92 Ohio St. 393, 111 N. E. 150.

The opinions of the state courts show that they gave careful consideration to the questions of the value of the property of plaintiff in error at the time of the inquiry, the total amount of net profits that could be earned under the rate fixed, and whether this would be sufficient to provide a fair return on the value of the property. The concurring judgments were based upon principles thoroughly established by repeated decisions of this court, Covington, etc. Turnpike Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578, 597, 598, 17 S. Ct. 198, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 560; San Diego Land, etc. Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 754, 19 S. Ct. 804, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 1154; Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co. 212 U. S. 1, 29 S. Ct. 148, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 371; Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 19, 48, 29 S. Ct. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 382, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134; Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 163, 35 S. Ct. 811, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1244; and the finding that there was no confiscation is amply supported by the evidence. The reservation of the right to apply thereafter for a modification was in accord with the action of this court in the Knoxville and Willcox Cases, 212 U. S. p. 19, 29 S. Ct. 148, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 382, p. 55, 29 S. Ct. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 400, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134.

A distinction is sought to be based upon the fact that two companies are necessarily affected by the rate, a producing and a distributing company; it being contended that the state courts have ignored the cost of production. It appears that after the granting of the franchise of 1898 plaintiff in error, which theretofore had been both a producer and a distributor of gas, sold all of its property to [408] the stockholders of the Logan Natural Gas & Fuel Company, and thereafter confined its activities to distribution, the Logan Company being in control of production and transportation; and that in 1904 the Logan Company entered into a contract with plaintiff in error to furnish the gas needed to supply the city for a term of years, on the basis of a percentage of the aggregate readings of the consumer's meters, in the proportion of 70% of the gross receipts for the Logan Company and 30% for plaintiff in error. At the time the suit was commenced the contract had two or three years to run, while the limiting ordinance was to continue for five years. There is no contention that plaintiff in error could not operate profitably under the ordinance of 1911 so long as the contract remained in force; but it is said that because of changed conditions including the partial exhaustion of the gas producing field the contract was no longer profitable to the Logan Company under the rate permitted by the ordinance of 1911, the cost of production and transportation of natural gas alone being at that time, as is asserted, as much as the entire amount of the net rate of 18 cents allowed by the ordinance. But plaintiff in error cannot be heard here to assert the constitutional rights of the Logan Company (Plymouth Coal Co. v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 531, 544, 34 S. Ct. 359, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 713), and the pertinent question is what plaintiff in error would probably have to pay for gas during the life of the ordinance. The contract measured this so long as it continued in effect. And, although it expired some time before the closing of the evidence in the Court of Appeals, as the Supreme Court pointed out, no evidence was offered to show the rate paid by the Newark Company to the Logan Company after its expiration. The ordinance specified a period of five years, but by the decree this was made subject to the provision giving a right to plaintiff in error to apply for relief if it should appear that the 18 cent rate did not render an adequate return.

[409] Plaintiff in error has failed to show that the ordinance has the effect of depriving it of property without due process of law within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the judgment under review is Affirmed.

Scope of Note.

The earlier cases passing on the question of state or municipal regulation of gas rates are reviewed in the notes to Richmond v. Richmond Natural Gas Co. 11 Ann. Cas. 746;

242 U. S. 405.

Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 15 Ann. Cas. 1034; and Cedar Rapids Gas Light Co. v. Cedar Rapids, 138 Am. St. Rep. 299. This note presents the recent cases on the subject.

The validity of an ordinance forbidding a reduction in the rates of a gas company is discussed in the note to Economic Gas Co. v. Los Angeles, Ann. Cas. 1916A 931. The right of a gas company to make a minimum charge per month for service is treated in the note to State v. Water, etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914D 452; and the right of a gas company to require the payment of charges in advance, or a deposit as a condition of furnishing service, is discussed in the note to Woodley v. Carolina Telephone, etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914D 116.

In General.

The power of a state, acting directly or through a commission to which it has delegated the authority, or of a municipality, in the exercise of the authority given it by the legislature, to regulate reasonably the rates to be charged for gas, has not been questioned in the majority of the recent cases dealing with the state or municipal regulation of gas rates. In the few cases wherein the power of a state or municipality to regulate the rates to be charged for gas by a gas company has been questioned, it has generally been upheld. Moline v. Moline Drilling, etc. Co. 89 Kan. 670, 131 Pac. 1189; State v. Flannely, 96

Kan. 372, 152 Pac. 22; State v. Litchfield, 97 Kan. 592, 155 Pac. 814. See also State v. Redding, 84 Kan. 654, 114 Pac. 1094. Compare Shawnee Gas, etc. Co. v. Corporation Commission, 35 Okla. 454, 130 Pac. 127; Tacoma Gas, etc. Co. v. Tacoma, 14 Wash. 288, 44 Pac. 655. Under the Kansas statute (Laws 1897, c. 82) a city of the third class has authority to pass an ordinance granting to a gas-distributing company the right to furnish gas to the city and its inhabitants, and for that purpose to lay its pipes through the streets and alleys, and also by the same ordinance to fix the maximum rates for the proposed service. Moline v. Moline Drilling, etc. Co. 89 Kan. 670, 131 Pac. 1189. However, the price at which gas shall be furnished cannot be regulated by ordinance under a general power to a municipality to provide reasonable regulations for the supply, distribution, and consumption of gas or light. Tacoma Gas, etc. Co. v. Tacoma, 14 Wash. 288, 44 Pac. 655. In Shawnee Gas, etc. Co. v. Corporation Commission, 35 Okla. 454, 130 Pac. 127, it was held that the proviso to section 18 of article 9 of the constitution protecting from impairment municipal powers of regulation inhibited a construction of the section that would confer on the corporation commission authority to fix the rates for a gas company furnishing gas within the limits of a city under franchise from the city without regard to whether the city had authority conferred on it by the statute (Comp. Laws 1909, § 693) to regulate rates and charges therefor.

Under the West Virginia statute (Act Feb. 22, 1913, Laws 1913, c. 9) creating the Public Service Commission and prescribing its powers and duties, it has been held that the commission had authority under the statute to institute of its own motion an investigation into the reasonableness of rates, to find them unreasonable, and to direct a change to rates which it concluded from the investigation to be reasonable. And it was held that the rates for supplying natural gas fixed by the commission for supplying gas to the citizens of West Virginia by a West Virginia corporation were not confiscatory, merely because at the same rates the business of supplying natural gas to customers in other states by the same corporation did not allow a reasonable profit. Manufacturers' Light, etc. Co. v. Ott, 215 Fed. 940.

Under a New York statute (Transportation Corporations Law, Laws 1890, p. 1149, c. 566, § 70) providing that the maximum rate to be charged for gas in cities having a population of eight hundred thousand or over should be $1.25 per thousand cubic feet, it has been held that whatever price the legislature permitted a gas company to charge must be deemed reasonable, and hence that a charge of any sum less than the maximum rate must be held to be a reasonable charge. The court also held that when the price of gas was established by law, it was not competent for the person purchasing it to resist payment on the ground that the law permitted the seller to make an unreasonable charge, and hence where the plaintiff gas company furnished and the defendant city received and used the gas at the rate of ninety cents per thousand cubic feet, the latter was prohibited by statute from raising any controversy with respect to the reasonableness of the charge. Brooklyn Union Gas Co. v. New York, 188 N. Y. 334, 81 N. E. 141, 117 Am. St. Rep. 868, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 763.

The distributing companies of a natural gas company, whose system extends through several states, are to be regarded as the agents of the gas company, and therefore, in the matter of the rates charged for gas, are likewise subject to the control of the state through its public utilities commission. State v. Flannelly, 96 Kan. 372, 152 Pac. 22; State v. Litchfield, 97 Kan. 592, 155 Pac. 814. In the case last cited the question was whether a gas company, engaged in furnishing natural gas to the inhabitants of a city, obtained partly from its own wells, and partly from another company with which it had entered into a contract for a portion of its supply, and which latter company was engaged in transporting gas through Kansas and into Missouri, was subject to the jurisdiction of the public utilities commission so that the rate to be charged for gas could not be increased without the concurrence and authority of that tribunal. The contention of the Olathe Gas Company was that it had a franchise from the city of Olathe, a city of the second class, which permitted it to charge the thirty-cent rate; that the company was principally engaged in supplying the people of the city of Olathe, since it furnished gas to no one outside of the city except to nineteen farmers residing near its pipe line; and that the public utilities commission had no authority to fix the rate which it should charge. On behalf of the state it was contended that the Olathe Gas Company, under its contract with the Kansas Natural Gas Company in contemplation of which the Olathe franchise was obtained, became the agent of the Kansas Natural Gas Company and was therefore subject to the jurisdiction of the public utilities commission. The court held that the insistence of the Olathe Gas Company that it stood in a different relation because of the peculiar provisions of its contract and under which it sold and distributed more gas than it obtained from the Kansas Natural Gas Company, had no basis, where, in describing the parties to the contract the Kansas Natural Gas Company was designated as the "gas company" and the Olathe Gas Company as the "agent," and the provisions and recitals of the contract indicated that the relationship, intentionally entered into, was that of principal and agent, and that therefore its rates were subject to the regulation of the public utilities commission.

As the fixing of rates for public service corporations is essentially legislative action, in the absence of a delegation thereof by the legislature, express or necessarily implied, a municipal corporation has no power to regulate or control rates for public service, such as furnishing gas, or the terms and conditions of contracts thereof, otherwise than by contract with the corporation or person rendering such service. So, where a municipality granted by two ordinances franchises to operate plants to furnish natural gas to the town, it was held that a provision in the franchise ordinances fixing the rates to be charged for gas was valid; that they were contracts binding both the town and the grantees, and that, having accepted the grant, the grantees accepted all its terms and could not deny the town's power to fix the rates by contract; also that, in exercising its function under the statute (Code, c. 47) giving a town the power "to erect or authorize or prohibit the erection of gas works," etc., the council might impose conditions and rates in the franchise. St. Mary's v. Hope Natural Gas Co. 71 W. Va. 76, 76 S. E. 841, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 994.

But a municipality possesses no authority to make a contract limiting its power to fix reasonable rates for gas for the future. Wyandotte County Gas Co. v. Kansas, 231 U. S. 622, 34 S. Ct. 226, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 404, affirming 88 Kan. 165, 127 Pac. 639; Ft. Smith Light, etc. Co. v. Ft. Smith, 202 Fed. 581. Thus, in the case first cited by the statute under consideration (Laws Kansas 1903, c. 122, §§ 2, 51, 169, 170) cities of the first class were empowered "to make all contracts and do all other acts in relation to the property and concerns of the city necessary to the exercise of its corporate or administrative powers," to "prescribe and fix maximum rates and charges, and regulate the collection of the same" for gas service, which "rates and charges so prescribed shall at all times be reasonable and just," to "make contracts and grant franchises, etc., concerning heat, light, power," etc., and "at all times during the existence of any such grant, contract or privilege . . . to fix a reasonable schedule of maximum rates to be charged for public and private purposes, including street lighting by any such person, company, or corporation, to the inhabitants of any such city, for gas light, electric light, electric power, or heat," etc. Under section 170a. the foregoing limitations were made applicable to natural gas. The court said: "Considering these statutory provisions the court below (88 Kan. 165) decided that they did not authorize the city to divest itself by contract of its duty to see that nothing but reasonable rates were enforced, however much the statute might have as to other subjects conferred upon the city an authority to contract in the complete sense. Looking comprehensively at the provisions in question, in the light of the duty resting on us to which at the outset we referred, not lightly to disregard the construction which the state court of last resort has given to the statutes of the state, we can see no ground for holding that the court erred in its conclusion. Conceding that there are forms of expression used in the statute which taken isolatedly might be considered as having conferred the power to fix a contract rate, such concession is not decisive, since we must consider the statute as a whole. And when we do so, we think, to divorce the expressions referred to from the context would be, not to interpret and apply, but to distort, the statute. Especially is this conclusion necessary when the broad scope of the provisos which we have quoted is taken into view, since they in effect forbid the making of contract rates as to both water and gas by commanding that the governmental power see to it that only reasonable rates are exacted shall be perpetually preserved and exerted. In face of such a plain manifestation of the legislative will, it would be a departure from the obvious intent and purpose of the lawmaker to hold that the statute conferred the power to do that which the text makes it apparent there was a dominant and fixed purpose of the legislature to forbid. This conclusive view also applies to the special provision concerning natural gas. We say this because, as obviously the prior sections of the statute embraced only manufactured gas, the provision as to natural gas was rendered necessary in order to give the same power to deal with that subject as was conferred concerning manufactured gas. In other words, on its face, the purpose of the provision was to bring natural gas within the statute, subject to the regulations and limitations which the statute imposed and it could not therefore have been intended to cause dealings concerning natural gas to be for the purposes of power conferred within the statute and at the same time to exclude the conferred authority from the safeguards and regulations which the statute exacted. The bringing of natural gas within the power therefore caused it to be subject to the limitations which the statute imposed and which as we have seen rendered it impossible to contract away the governmental power to forbid unreasonable and secure reasonable rates."

In Ft. Smith Light, etc. Co. v. Ft. Smith, 202 Fed. 581, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was selling natural gas under an ordinance providing that the price charged for such gas should not exceed the sum of one dollar per thousand cubic feet, it was contended by the plaintiff that this provision for a maximum rate of one dollar, together with certain other provisions in the ordinance requiring the grantee of the franchise, and his successors, to furnish gas free to certain public buildings, constitute a contract which prevented the city from making a lower maximum than one dollar. However it was held that this contention was not good for three reasons: First, that the city by the ordinance did not undertake to surrender any right or power it had, but on the other hand, the grantee of the franchise in accepting the ordinance undertook to sell natural gas at a price not to exceed one dollar per thousand cubic feet regardless of conditions, that with reference to fixing the price of gas the ordinance was a limitation on the grantee of the franchise, and not upon the city; second, that the law giving municipalities the power to fix rates was in force at the time of the passage of the ordinance; that it therefore became a part of the contract between the city and the plaintiff as the successor of the original grantee of the franchise; and, third, that the city could not by contract divest itself of the power conferred upon it by the legislature.

In Cedar Rapids Gas Light Co. v. Cedar Rapids, 223 U. S. 655, 32 S. Ct. 389, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 594, affirming decree 144 Ia. 426, 120 N. W. 966, 138 Am. St. Rep. 299, 48 L.R.A. (N. S.) 1025, it appeared that an ordinance under which a gas company was granted a renewal of its franchise provided in part that "in consideration of the privileges herein granted to said company, it shall furnish to the inhabitants of said city gas for lighting at a price not to exceed $1.80 per thousand feet and 20 cents per thousand cubic feet discount if consumers pay on or before the 10th of each month after consumption," etc. It was admitted that under the laws of Iowa the rate could be changed by the city, but it was argued that the quoted words imported a contract that it should not be changed to such an extent as to make impossible the offer of a discount for prompt payment; that being the cheapest and most efficient way of collecting the price of the gas. The court held that there was no contract on the part of the city that the price should be kept high enough to allow a discount for prompt payment, and that the words relied on by the plaintiff expressed its promise in consideration of the privileges granted, not a promise by the city, and that while it was true that the contract was in the form of an ordinance, the ordinance was drawn as a contract to be accepted and it was accepted by the plaintiff; that it contained reciprocal undertakings, the one in question being that of the plaintiff; and it was subject to the power retained by the city to regulate rates, which power, it was expressly provided by the Iowa statute, was not to be abridged by ordinance, resolution or contract. (Code of 1897, § 725, 22 G. A. 1888, c. 16.)

The fact that the rate for gas as fixed by the city conflicts with unexpired contracts between the complaining company and its customers, does not invalidate the ordinance, as a customer cannot take away the power of the city to fix the rates (if it has that power) by making such a contract. Portland R. etc. Co. v. Portland, 200 Fed. 890.

The mere fact that gas is being sold in nearby towns in an adjacent state at a less rate does not of itself justify a city council in reducing rates. Ft. Smith Light, etc. Co. v. Ft. Smith, 202 Fed. 581.

If, under a statute authorizing the fixing of rates after investigation, the body authorized to act, in fact acts without investigation, its action is void. Ft. Smith Light, etc. Co. v. Ft. Smith, 202 Fed. 581, wherein the court said: "The law of this state empowers the city council to make such examination as will be necessary to determine whether or not the prices charged for water, gas, or electricity are reasonable, and, if upon examination the council shall determine that an exorbitant price is being charged, it will be its duty to fix such price to be paid as it may deem to be reasonable. Any person, company, or corporation owning or operating any water, gas, or electric lighting plant in any city or town of the state is required to appear before the city council, or any committee thereof, as often as such city council may deem necessary, and exhibit the books of the water, gas, or electric lighting plant. The law clearly contemplates such an investigation as will enable the council to come to a just conclusion as to a reasonable price to be charged. According to the allegations of the complaint and the evidence, no examination was made of the books of the plaintiff. The value of its plant used in the distribution and sale of gas was not ascertained; the cost of operation was not inquired into; no allowance was made for depreciation. If these allegations are true . . . it was impossible for the council to form a just conclusion as to a reasonable price."

In Kings County Lighting Co. v. New York, 162 N. Y. S. 583, it was held that the purpose should not be imputed to the legislature, in passing a statute (Laws 1905, c. 736) fixing seventy-five cents per thousand cubic feet as the price of gas to the city of New York as a consumer, of taking away the plaintiff's right to compensation under a prior contract not yet expired, by which the plaintiff did not furnish or sell gas, except as incidental to maintaining street lamps with the illumination therefor, when the gas consumed was but one item (and that not a separable one) of the service contracted for; that as the result of an inquiry into the cost of gas production, the legislature had by separate act fixed the price of gas in New York city to the public, with the express proviso that the regulation should not apply to gas furnished or sold to the city of New York (Laws 1906, c. 125), and that the act under construction fixed the price for gas furnished to the city, not in its governmental capacity, but merely as a large consumer, entitled to special terms; in no sense, therefore, was it an exercise of the police power, as it was not for the general public, but for the defendant's relief, standing apart from general local consumers.

In East Ohio Gas Co. v. Akron, 81 Ohio St. 33, 18 Ann. Cas. 332, 90 N. E. 40, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 92, it was said obiter that where a gas company and a city had entered into a contract regulating the price of gas for ten years under the statute (Rev. St. 1880, §§ 2478, 2479), the city might regulate the price of gas after the expiration of the ten years term expressed in the contract, if the gas company continued to exercise its franchise in the city, not by virtue of the contract, but by virtue of the statute which empowered the city council to fix the price for a period of ten years. Compare Granville v. Crawford Natural Gas, etc. Co. 34 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 256, wherein it was held that a demurrer lay to the petition of a municipality to restrain a gas company, after the expiration of an ordinance fixing the price of gas for ten years, from charging prices in excess of the amounts specified in a new ordinance for the succeeding term of ten years at flat or meter rates, and from refusing to furnish gas other than by meter and at meter rates.

Reasonableness of Rate.

IN GENERAL.

The rule is that the public is entitled to be served with gas at reasonable rates, and that the gas company is entitled to charge a rate sufficiently high to yield it a fair return on its investment on the reasonable value of the property used by it in the public service. Lincoln Gas, etc. Co. v. Lincoln, 223 U. S. 349, 32 S. Ct. 271, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 466, reversing 182 Fed. 926; Bondbright v. Geary, 210 Fed. 44; People v. Willcox, 210 N. Y. 479, 104 N. E. 911, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, modifying 156 App. Div. 603, 141 N. Y. S. 677; Newark Natural Gas, etc. Co. v. Newark, 92 Ohio St. 393, 111 N. E. 150, affirmed by the reported case. See also Portland R. etc. Co. v. Portland, 200 Fed. 890.

However, in a suit to restrain the enforcement of a city ordinance fixing certain rates to be charged by gas and electric light companies, the court may review the action of the rate-making body only to determine whether, under the rate prescribed and the other rates which the complainant may lawfully charge, it will be unable to realize a fair and just return on the value of its property devoted to the particular public use, and will amount to a taking of its property without just compensation. Portland R. etc. Co. v. Flannelly, 96 Kan. 372, 152 Pac. 22. But the court has no authority to fix rates, nor should it attempt to assume such a power and set aside rates fixed by a legislative body, because it might, on investigation, come to a different conclusion as to the reasonableness thereof. Portland R. etc. Co. v. Portland, 200 Fed. 890; Pacific Gas, etc. Co. v. San Francisco, 211 Fed. 202. See also State v. Flannelly, 96 Kan. 372, 152 Pac. 22, wherein the court said: "Who has the power to fix the rates at which natural gas shall be sold by the receivers of the Kansas Natural Gas Company, the public utilities commission, or the court appointing the receivers? The legislature has said that the public utilities commission shall fix these rates. The courts have repeatedly declared that the courts cannot fix rates, and that fixing rates is a legislative function. When rates are fixed, the courts can ascertain whether or not they are in violation of law or of some constitutional provision. But courts have not the authority to determine what rates will be reasonable, just, compensatory, or legal, and then put in effect those rates. The commission cannot finally determine what rates will be legal and will not violate constitutional provisions. The commission is the body authorized by law to say in the first instance what rates are legal and will not violate constitutional provisions, but the courts must finally say whether or not the rates fixed are illegal or do violate such provisions. The one function is legislative, while the other is judicial. The commission cannot invade the field occupied by the court; neither can the court invade the field occupied by the commission. The commission must act first, and the courts afterward."

In Pacific Gas, etc. Co. v. San Francisco, 211 Fed. 202, an ordinance fixing gas rates for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1913, was attacked as confiscatory, and a temporary restraining order was granted until the application for an injunction pendente lite could be heard. The defendant subsequently asked that the order should be modified so as to prohibit the complainant, pending the restraint, from collecting rates in excess of those fixed by the board of supervisors for the previous fiscal year of 1912-1913. The court said: "But obviously the court would not be justified in making such a modification. The ordinance fixing rates for that year has expired by limitation, and those rates, therefore, no longer exist as legal rates. For the court to so modify the order would be tantamount to itself undertaking to fix a rate, a thing which it may not competently do. Moreover, since the rates for that year, or the latter half of it, were substantially the same as the rates fixed by the present ordinance, such a modification would be practically equivalent to determining on this preliminary motion the substantive question involved in the controversy—whether the rates of the present ordinance are such as to furnish adequate compensation for the service. But while the court cannot undertake to do what defendant asks in that regard, it is not without power to protect defendant and its consumers against any effort by complainant to charge a rate palpably and obviously unconscionable, since upon such fact being brought to its attention, it is always within the power of the court to vacate the restraining order and leave the complainant at the mercy of the ordinance sought to be annulled. He who seeks equity must do equity."

Where the rate to be charged for gas is fixed by law, as by statute or by a municipal ordinance, the sufficiency of the price prescribed to produce a fair profit on the value of the property employed in the business is strongly to be presumed. Lincoln Gas, etc. Co. v. Lincoln, 223 U. S. 349, 32 S. Ct. 271, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 466, reversing 182 Fed. 926; Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 35 S. Ct. 811, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1244, modifying decree 199 Fed. 204; Brooklyn Union Gas Co. v. New York, 188 N. Y. 334, 81 N. E. 141, 117 Am. St. Rep. 868, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 763. See also Portland R. etc. Co. v. Portland, 200 Fed. 890; Minneapolis Gaslight Co. v. Minneapolis, 123 Minn. 231, 143 N. W. 728. And likewise, where an ordinance, which constitutes a contract between the city and the gas company, authorizes the city council to fix the rates for gas, it will be presumed that the rates so fixed are fair and reasonable until the contrary is shown. Minneapolis Gaslight Co. v. Minneapolis, 123 Minn. 231, 143 N. W. 728.

The burden of showing that an ordinance fixing the rates to be charged for gas is confiscatory in its character rests, therefore, on the complaining company. Lincoln Gas, etc. Co. v. Lincoln, 223 U. S. 349, 32 S. Ct. 271, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 466, reversing 182 Fed. 926; Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 35 S. Ct. 811, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1244, modifying decree 199 Fed. 204; Minneapolis Gaslight Co. v. Minneapolis, 123 Minn. 231, 143 N. W. 728; Newark Natural Gas, etc. Co.

v. Newark, 92 Ohio St. 393, 111 N. E. 150, affirmed by the reported case. See also Portland R. etc. Co. v. Portland, 200 Fed. 890. In State v. Public Service Commission, 76 Wash. 402, 136 Pac. 850, it was held that, in an inquiry by a public service commission at the instance of a city, as to the reasonableness of a gas company's proposed increase in its minimum monthly charge made to its customers, the burden of proof was not on the company to show the reasonableness of its proposed new rate and that the proposed rate was not so clearly unreasonable and exorbitant that the commission or the courts could judicially know that it was such, nor one which had been established by the commission and which could not, under the statute [Public Service Com. Law, § 84 (Laws 1911, c. 117)] be changed without first obtaining the consent of the commission.

In Public Service Gas Co. v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 84 N. J. L. 463, 87 Atl. 651, judgment affirmed 87 N. J. L. 597, 94 Atl. 634, 95 Atl. 1079, which overruled on rehearing 87 N. J. L. 581, 92 Atl. 606, the court said, in holding to be valid an order of the board of public utilities commissioners reducing the rate for gas supplied by a gas plant: "In these cases [when the court is dealing with the validity of the verdict of a jury upon a rule to show cause, or with the determination of commissioners of assessment as to the amount of special benefits, or the determination of the state board of taxation as to the valuation of property] there is a presumption in favor of the action of the inferior tribunal because in each case that tribunal is acting in a judicial capacity and may fairly be supposed to preserve a judicial attitude. The same rule has been sometimes applied in rate cases, but with less reason. The presumption in favor of the acts of a judicial or quasi-judicial tribunal does not apply with the same force to a legislative tribunal, nor to a tribunal which possesses not only to some extent the powers of a court but also to some extent the powers of a public prosecutor. A legislative body prescribing a rule for future conduct is not limited by the same considerations of justice as a tribunal required to do justice in accordance with existing rules; and one in the position of a public prosecutor can hardly be supposed to preserve a judicial frame of mind; he is rather in the position of one who is judge in his own cause. Under the Public Utilities Act, the commissioners are given extensive powers of legislation and are given the power of initiating proceedings themselves. The manner in which these powers shall be exercised involves often a consideration of large questions of public policy or business wisdom. For example, in this very case the commissioners have fixed a rate for the Passaic district alone, to the exclusion of all other parts of the state in which the gas company by its charter may operate. Whether it is wise to segregate in this way a thickly settled territory in which gas may be manufactured in large quantity and distributed at comparatively small expense, so as to give the inhabitants of the populous districts the advantage of their density of population, or whether it is wise to determine the rate by a consideration of the facts throughout the territory served as a whole, so that the smaller towns may profit by the economies resulting from business on a large scale, and so that the charge for distribution through miles of pipe where consumers are few may be reduced by entering into an average with the cost of distribution through short lines of pipe where consumers are many, is a question of public or business policy, not a question of law or abstract justice to be tested by fixed rules. In such a case there may perhaps be a fair presumption that the action of the commissioners is dictated by wise policy but hardly that its action is just and reasonable. In addition, disobedience to the order of the commission subjects to a penalty of $100 per day, and in some cases amounts to a misdemeanor, so that the public service company is entitled to the benefit of the ordinary rules that require penal and criminal statutes to be construed strictly. All these considerations lead us to the conclusion that if there is any presumption in favor of the order of the commissioners, it depends, like the opinion of the court of another state, upon the strength of the reasoning by which it is supported. This is subject, however, to the qualification that in legislative action the courts will not merely substitute their judgment for that of a legislative body."

In determining the reasonableness of a rate fixed for gas, as in every other legislative rate case, there are presented three questions of prime importance: First, the present reasonable value of the company's plant engaged in the regulated business; second, what will be the probable effect of the reduced rate on the future net income from the property engaged in serving the public; and third, in ascertaining the probable net income under the reduced rates prescribed, what deduction, if any, should be made from the gross receipts as a fund to preserve the property from future depreciation. Lincoln Gas, etc. Co. v. Lincoln, 223 U. S. 349, 32 S. Ct. 271, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 466, reversing 182 Fed. 926.

The inquiry into the reasonableness of a gas rate is also to be aided by another rule, that if the valuation of any one of the necessary elements of the public service plant is fixed by the rate-making authorities at an amount unjustly or unreasonably low in a substantial amount, or if the value of an element of substantial value used and useful in maintaining or operating such a plant is entirely omitted by the rate-fixing authority, such unreasonable and unjust valuation or omission of valuation is the taking of private property for a public use without just compensation. Bonbright v. Geary, 210 Fed. 44. However, in Public Service Gas Co. v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 84 N. J. L. 463, 87 Atl. 651, judgment affirmed 87 N. J. L. 597, 94 Atl. 634, 95 Atl. 1079, which overruled on rehearing 87 N. J. L. 581, 92 Atl. 606, the court said: "The commissioners undertook to ascertain the present value of the property. The cities insist that only the cost of reproduction should be allowed. We are met with difficulties and valid objections whether we adopt the standard of actual investment, of cost of reproduction or present value. It would be a waste of time for us to go over this discussion. We think it enough to say that the great weight of authority is in favor of the standard of present value. That standard has the sanction of the United States Supreme Court in cases involving the constitutional rights of the companies and is said by that court to be no longer open to dispute under the Constitution. San Diego Land, etc. Co. v. Jasper, 189 U. S. 439, 442, [23 S. Ct. 571, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 892]. Since all cases of the kind may come before that tribunal for final adjudication, and its decisions upon the constitutional question would be binding upon us, we ought to adopt the same rule. That it is not quite inflexible is shown by what the court has said as to the allowance for the increased value of the land. Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 19, 52, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034, 29 S. Ct. 192, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 382, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134. No difficulty of that kind is presented in the present case. There is as usual a difference in the valuation of the physical plant by the company and those employed on the part of the commissioners or the cities. The commissioners accepted neither valuation, but adopted a value above the lowest of all and above the assessed valuation, but less than that fixed by the lowest of the company's experts. Their method was not an exact one, but perhaps the result was as good as could be expected from the variance in the testimony. We should have no more confidence in our own result and are not disposed to disturb theirs."

COMPUTATION OF VALUE OF PLANT.

In General.

It has been said that the court, as one means of finding the present value of a gas-making plant, may find the present cost of replacing it, by estimating the cost of reproducing it new and then estimating the depreciation, which should be deducted, and the working capital, which should be added. Lincoln Gas, etc. Co. v. Lincoln, 223 U. S. 340, 32 S. Ct. 271, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 466, reversing 182 Fed. 926; Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 35 S. Ct. 811, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1244, modifying decree 199 Fed. 204; Bonbright v. Geary, 210 Fed. 44; Minneapolis Gaslight Co. v. Minneapolis, 123 Minn. 231, 143 N. W. 728; People v. Willcox, 210 N. Y. 479, 104 N. E. 911, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, modifying 156 App. Div. 603, 141 N. Y. S. 677.

The sum that it would cost to take up and replace street pavements which were not laid when the gas mains were put in, should not be considered in ascertaining its present value. Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 35 S. Ct. 811, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1244, modifying decree 199 Fed. 204; People v. Willcox, 210 N. Y. 479, 104 N. E. 911, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, modifying 156 App. Div. 603, 141 N. Y. S. 677. Thus, in the case first cited the court said: "As to the item of $140,000, which, it is contended, should be added to the valuation, because of the fact that the master valued the property on the basis of the cost of reproduction new, less depreciation, and it would be necessary in such reproduction to take up and replace pavements on streets which were unpaved when the gas mains were laid, in order to replace the mains, we are of opinion that the court below correctly disposed of this question. These pavements were already in place. It may be conceded that they would require removal at the time when it became necessary to reproduce the plant in this respect. The master reached the conclusion that the life of the mains would not be enhanced by the necessity of removing the pavements, and that the company had no right of property in the pavements thus dealt with, and that there was neither justice nor equity in requiring the people who had been at the expense of paving the streets to pay an additional sum for gas because the plant, when put in, would have to be at the expense of taking up and replacing the pavements in building the same. He held that such added value was wholly theoretical, when no benefit was derived therefrom. We find no error in this disposition of the question."

In People v. Willcox, 210 N. Y. 479, 104 N. E. 911, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, modifying 156 App. Div. 603, 141 N. Y. S. 677, the court said: "In determining the cost of reproduction the commission allowed $12,717 as the cost of restoring the pavement as it existed when the mains and service pipes were laid in the streets. The relator claimed an allowance of at least $200,000 for the cost of restoring pavements subsequently laid on the theory that that cost would have to be incurred if the mains were to be laid to-day. But the new pavements in fact added nothing to the property of the relator. Its mains were as servicable and intrinsically as valuable before as after the new pavements were laid. The controlling considerations under the preceding point also determine this. The rights of the public are not to be ignored. The question has a double aspect. What will be fair to the public as well as to the relator? (Smyth v. Ames [169 U. S. 466].) Should the public pay more for gas simply because improved pavements have been laid at public expense? It is no answer to say that the new expensive pavements suggest improved conditions which, though adding to the value of the plant, will not, by reason of the greater consumption, add to the expense per thousand feet of the gas consumed. The public are entitled to the benefit of the improved conditions, if thereby the relator is enabled to supply gas at a less rate. The relator is entitled to a fair return on its investment, not on improvements made at public expense. It is said that the mains will have to be relaid. So will the new pavements, and much oftener. Both might possibly be relaid at the same time. The case is not at all parallel to the so-called unearned increment of land. That the company owns. It does not own the pavements, and the laying of them does not add to its investment or increase the cost to it of producing gas. The cost of reproduction less accrued depreciation rule seems to be the one generally employed in rate cases. But it is merely a rule of convenience and must be applied with reason. On the one hand it should not be so applied as to deprive the corporation of a fair return at all times on the reasonable, proper and necessary investment made by it to serve the public, and on the other hand it should not be so applied as to give the corporation a return on improvements made at public expense which in no way increase the cost to it of performing that service."

In ascertaining the amount which should constitute a proper return on the value of the property used by a gas company in the public service the commission is not entitled to consider as part of what accrues to the company as gross receipts of its yearly operations the annual appreciation in the value of its land. People v. Willcox, 210 N. Y. 479, 104 N. E. 911, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1, modifying decree 156 App. Div. 603, 141 N. Y. S. 677.

The reasonable valuation of a contract with the federal government for power received from a plant operated by the reclamation service should be considered, as it is a contract having a substantial value for the company, and its omission in a gas rate-making proceeding is a substantial error. Bonbright v. Geary, 210 Fed. 44.

Value of Good Will.

"Good will," in the sense in which that term is generally used as indicating that element of value which inheres in the fixed and favorable consideration of customers, arising from an established and well-known and well-conducted business, has no place in the fixing of the valuation for the purpose of rate-making of public service gas companies. Des Moines Gas. Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 35 S. Ct. 811, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1244, modifying decree 199 Fed. 204.

Going Concern Value.

"Going value," or "going concern value," that is, the value which inheres in a plant where its business is established, as distinguished from one which has yet to establish its business, has been the subject of much discussion in rate-making cases before the courts and commissions. That there is an element of value in an assembled and established plant, doing business and earning money, over one not thus advanced, is self-evident. This element of value is a property right, and should be considered as a distinct item, to be appraised and included in the base in computing the value of the property on which the owner has a right to make a fair return when it is privately owned, although dedicated to public use. And the rule is that each case must be controlled by its own circumstances. Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 35 S. Ct. 811, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1244, modifying decree 199 Fed. 204; Bonbright v. Geary, 210 Fed. 44; People v. Willcox, 210 N. Y. 479, 104 N. E. 911, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1, modifying 156 App. Div. 603, 141 N. Y. S. 677. In Bonbright v. Geary, supra, the court said: "With respect to the item of accrued deficits based upon a reasonable return on the money invested since the organization of the company, estimated by the experts at $280,000, and for which no allowance was made by the corporation commission, we have not had time to examine the evidence with respect to this item. As has been stated, this is the valuation of a going concern as distinguished from the bare bones of the corporation. The courts recognize a difference between the value of a plant of this character, without customers or business, and a plant that has been fully established and connected up with a municipal lighting system and with the houses, business places, and factories of regular customers. The present corporation was in August of last year a going concern; it was connected up with the municipal lighting system, the houses, business places, factories, and other institutions of a prosperous community, and there was nothing more to do except to deliver the service, for which the corporation was fully and efficiently equipped. We think this element of valuation should be considered in connection with the other elements of valuation with the view of determining the actual present value of the whole plant."

In People v. Willcox, 210 N. Y. 479, 104 N. E. 911, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, modifying 156 App. Div. 603, 141 N. Y. S. 677, the court said: "The difficulty of determining the 'going value' will not justify the disregarding of it. Rate-making is difficult. But that will not justify confiscation. The difficulty, however, will lessen, as it does in most cases, when we cease to think about the subject vaguely. What then, is 'going value,' and how is it to be appraised? It takes time to put a new enterprise of any magnitude on its feet, after the construction work has been finished. Mistakes of construction have to be corrected. Substitutions have to be made. Economies have to be studied. Experiments have to be made, which sometimes turn out to be useless. An organization has to be perfected. Business has to be solicited and advertised for. In the case of a gas company, gratuitous work has to be done, such as selling appliances at less than a fair profit and demonstrating new devices to induce consumption of gas and to educate the public up to the maximum point of consumption. None of these things is reflected in the value of the physical property, unless, of course, exchange value be taken, which is not admissible in a rate case. The company starts out with the 'bare bones' of the plant, to borrow Mr. Justice Lurton's phrase in the Omaha v. Omaha Water Co. [218 U. S. 180, 30 S. Ct. 615, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 991, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1084]. By the expenditure of time, labor and money, it co-ordinates those bones into an efficient working organism and acquires a paying business. The proper and reasonable cost of doing that, whether included in operating expenses or not, is as much a part of the investment of the company as the cost of the physical property. The investors in a new enterprise have to be satisfied as a rule with meagre or no returns, while the business is being built up. In a business subject only to the natural laws of trade, they expect to make up for the early lean years by large profits later. In a business, classified among public callings, the rate-making power must allow for the losses during the lean years, or their rate will be confiscatory and of course will drive investors from the field. It remains to consider how 'going value' is to be appraised. That presents a question of fact, the determination of which is primarily within the province of the rate-making body. . . . Obviously, the most satisfactory method is to show the actual experience of the company, the original investment, its earnings from the start, the time actually required and expenses incurred in building up the business, all expenditures not reflected by the present condition of the physical property, the extent to which bad management or other causes prevented or depleted earnings, and any other facts bearing on the question, keeping in mind that the ultimate fact to be determined is not the amount of the expenditures, but the deficiency in the fair return to the investors due to the causes under consideration. The business in this case was twenty years old, the books of the old company were not available, and it is of course problematical whether, if produced, they would have shown the necessary facts. The question, therefore, had to be determined, as all questions of fact have to be, by the best evidence available. Here, I may repeat that mere difficulty in the proof would not justify a confiscatory rate. The value of the physical property was shown by opinion evidence as to the cost of reproduction. The same kind of evidence was given by two witnesses for the relator as to the cost of building up the business to its present state. In the appellants' brief it is said that they were men 'of mature age and much experience.' One witness said that thirty dollars a meter was an arbitrary sum usually adopted by engineers as the cost of building up such a business, and he put the cost in this case at $600,000. Another witness estimated the 'going value' to be $781,916. He explained at length how he arrived at that figure. He assumed the existence of two plants, situated exactly alike in the same community and with the same physical property, 1, the actual plant with its established business; 2, a suppositional plant with no business. He then estimated the length of time and expense required by the second plant to develop its business to the stage and revenue of the actual plant. There would appear to be as good ground for admitting the opinion of a qualified expert on such a subject as on the cost to reproduce the physical property. Of course, the commission was not bound by that evidence. It had in addition the experience of the relator and its predecessor as to payment of dividends, the amount of capitalization of both, and the value of the physical property in its present condition determined as above stated. With nothing opposed to those facts and the opinion evidence it was not justified in ignoring the evidence of 'going value' or of merely attaching some inappreciable importance to it."

In Public Service Gas Co. v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 84 N. J. L. 463, 87 Atl. 651, judgment affirmed 87 N. J. L. 597, 94 Atl. 634, 95 Atl. 1079, which overruled on rehearing 87 N. J. L. 581, 92 Atl. 606, in determining whether a gas rate was a just and reasonable individual rate under the statute

[Public Utilities Act, § 16 (P. L. 1911, p. 377)], the court said: "The controversy turns mainly on the allowance for going value and the refusal to allow anything for the value of the franchise. For going value or cost of developing the business, $1,025,000 was allowed. The cities claim that no allowance at all should be made and their writ was prosecuted to secure the correction of this alleged error. . . . It is necessary, therefore, to determine first whether any allowance at all for going value is proper. We think both on weight of authority and on reason there should be such an allowance. . . . The cost of a gas plant includes not merely the loss of interest while the plant is in course of construction and is building up a paying business, but even in the case of an old established plant, for the manufacture and distribution of a commodity to the use of which the public has become so accustomed that it seems a necessity, there must be loss while pipe lines are extended to await the coming of consumers as the city extends. There is the cost of securing and retaining customers, of encouraging the greater use of gas for fuel and for light by the introduction of new and approved appliances, the necessary loss attending experiments that promise improvement, the obsolescence of plant apart from that ordinary calculable depreciation which may be charged to current expenses instead of being capitalized, the expense that must attend and the additional value that arises from the uniting of separate concerns and the organization of a great industry with a view to economical production, and the cost of procuring capital for the original works or subsequent extensions. What items should be charged to construction; what to business development; how much to current expenses, and how much to permanent investment of capital, are all most important practical business questions. However these questions may be solved, all these expenses must be met. Whether they shall be met at the expense of present consumers by being charged at once to current expenses thus reducing the net return and making necessary a higher rate, or whether they shall be capitalized in whole or in part and constitute a permanent addition to capital, or be capitalized and gradually amortized, are business questions. The legal question is whether these items constitute a going value upon which the company is entitled to a return if the individual rate is to be just and reasonable. To this we answer yes. The argument addressed to us on the other side is that all the so-called going value appears in the valuation of the physical plant at the cost of reproduction; the suggestion is, that unless there was going value, the physical plant would be mere junk, and that the difference between the valuation of the physical plant at its cost of reproduction and its valuation as junk is the true going value. The argument seems to us specious rather than sound. We think that if by value we mean what the economists call exchange value, then a buyer would undoubtedly give more for a plant already doing a profitable business than for a plant of equal cost, capacity and future possibilities, but without the established business. To a purchaser the assurance of an immediate return is worth paying for, and we see no reason to doubt the correctness of the ruling of the United States Supreme Court in Omaha v. Omaha Water Co. [218 U. S. 180, 30 S. Ct. 615, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 991]. We agree with the view expressed for that court by Mr. Justice Lurton: 'That the difference between a dead plant and a live one is a real value, and is independent of any franchise to go on, or any mere good will as between such a plant and its customers.' It is true that that was a condemnation case and not a rate case, and involved therefore a question of exchange value, and not the question of a fair and reasonable valuation as between a public service company and the public. The two bases of valuation may properly be different, since upon a sale or condemnation the probability of an assured income and a continuance of the existing rates enters into and affects the exchange value; while in the case of a valuation for the purpose of fixing a rate, the question is what valuation and rate will tempt the investment of capital, and to what extent existing rates may with justice be lowered. In this view the fallacy of the argument on behalf of the cities is that it requires the investor to suffer all the loss if the enterprise fails and deprives him of the chance of additional gain if the enterprise succeeds; and it fails to allow any recompense for the skill shown in developing and conducting the business, or even for the value of experience, which is proverbially expensive. Even in a business as well established and as necessary as the gas business, there is competition with other methods of obtaining light, heat and power, and there are few of us who have not ourselves had experience of the extension in the use of gas due to the efforts of the company to introduce new appliances. Moreover, we think counsel for the company are right in their contention that the value of an assembled and united plant may be greater than the total value of the separate parts."

Valuation of Working Capital.

In Bonbright v. Geary, 210 Fed. 44, in fixing the amount to be allowed for the working capital of a gas plant, the court said: "The experts for the complainant value this item at $50,000. The corporation commission valued it at $23,500. We think the latter sum is too small for the current business of the corporation. The corporation must carry a certain amount of supplies and should pay its bills for repairs and supplies at the end of the week or month as they come due and should not be obliged to await the collection of its revenues from the rates collected by the company from its customers. There is always more or less delay in collecting rates. The company should therefore have constantly on hand what might be termed a revolving fund to pay its own current obligations and keep its credit good and enable it to transact its business promptly and satisfactorily to everybody concerned. We think that a working capital of $50,000 is a reasonable capital for the corporation in this case and should be allowed as a valuation in its plant."

Valuation of Overhead Charges.

With respect to the valuation of the overhead charges of a gas plant the court in Bonbright v. Geary, 210 Fed. 44, said; "This item is not very clearly defined, but appears to include the expenses that would necessarily be incurred in the reproduction of the property. It includes the legal expenses of organization and the expenses for office, engineering, inspection, supervision, and management during the period of construction; it would also include fire and casualty insurance, taxes, and interest during the period, contractors' profits, and other minor expenses of like character. The complainant's experts estimated this valuation at twenty per cent on the physical valuation of the material and cost of construction entering into the plant; the corporation commission has estimated it at twelve per cent of the physical valuation of the materials and cost of construction as they have estimated these elements. Complainant's criticism of this estimate is that it is too low and does not include all the expenses that necessarily enter into the reproduction of such plant. We think this estimate needs further consideration and probable revision in a final valuation of this item."

Valuation of Special Franchises.

In Public Service Gas Co. v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 84 N. J. L. 463, 87 Atl. 651, judgment affirmed 87 N. J. L. 597, 94 Atl. 634, 95 Atl. 1079, which overruled on rehearing 87 N. J. L. 581, 92 Atl. 606, it appeared that in the determination of the question whether the rate for gas fixed by the commissioners was a just and reasonable individual rate under the statute [Public Utilities Act, § 16 (P. L. 1911, p. 377)], the most important controversy in arriving at the present value of the plant in order to ascertain the reasonableness of the rate therefrom, was with reference to the allowance for the value of the special franchises. The court said: "The question of the propriety of allowing for the value of special franchises is one not yet settled upon authority. That they are property is well settled. . . . Our own taxing laws recognize them as property and tax them accordingly. . . . Such franchises, however, are property of a peculiar kind; the right of property in them is not absolute, but is qualified by the right of the state to fix reasonable rates. . . . Where, . . . the rate is fixed the value of the franchise may be calculated upon the assumption of that rate. But where, as in this case, the rate is not fixed and may be changed, there is no stable basis upon which to calculate the value of the franchise, since that value is dependent upon the rate. The rate must indeed be reasonable, but to assume a value for the franchise in order to determine the reasonableness of the rate is to reason in a circle; the value and the rate are mutually dependent, and one must be fixed independently if it is to form a basis for the calculation of the other. . . . That a special franchise in the absence of an exclusive right is property only in a qualified sense, is the result of the right of the state not only to regulate rates, but also to authorize a municipality to supply itself, and thereby destroy the value of the special franchise. . . . This argument is inapplicable where the public service company has an exclusive right. . . . That is not shown to be the present case. The charter of the Public Service Gas Company (Pamph. L. 1873, p. 1442) does not purport to create an exclusive right. We do not attribute much force to the argument that the special franchises were a gift from the state. Even if that is so as to the franchises under the Oxy-Hydrogen Company charter of 1873, it may not be so as to the special franchises of the constituent companies now merged in the Public Service Gas Company; they seem to have cost something. When it is said that these franchises were a gift, it is probably meant that the public received little or nothing for them except the obligation which the companies assumed—to perform the public duties for which they were chartered. This obligation may or may not have been a fair equivalent. Probably in the early days when the success of the business was doubtful, the bargain was a good one for the public, while in the later days when gas had become a public necessity and the growth of the municipalities to such a point as to make the business a probable success, was assured, the bargain was a good one for the companies. Assuming, however, that the bargain was always a good one for the companies and that the cost to the companies way always so trifling that the franchises may fairly be regarded in popular language as a gift, it does not follow that the franchise is not a valuable property. The value of property does not depend on the mode by which title is acquired. . . . There is, however, a sense in which the fact that franchises are the subject of gift may be important. The value of a gift to an existing company may be destroyed by a similar gift to a new corporation or other individuals; and it is obvious that in order to determine the wisdom of investing in the enterprise, the newcomers would be under no necessity of seeking a return upon a franchise for which they were to pay nothing. Since it is in the power of the state to bring about a supply without compelling the public to pay on the franchise valuation beyond the actual cost of procuring it, it would be likely to do so, and the effect would be to destroy the value of the special franchise of the existing company. These considerations lead us to the conclusion that logically no allowance should be made for the value of the special franchise in a case where it is not legally exclusive and where the state still retains the right to fix rates. That is the present case. We are, however, referred to Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 19 [15 Ann. Cas. 1034, 29 S. Ct. 192, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 382, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1134.] The court in that case did approve an allowance for the value of the special franchise, but it was so far from holding that the valuation of the franchise was always to be included in ascertaining the value of the property upon which the company was entitled to a reasonable return, that it disapproved such a valuation made in the court below. What it approved was a valuation made more than twenty years before, and it was careful to say that the allowance rested upon the peculiar facts of that case, and that its decision could form no precedent in regard to the valuation of franchises generally, where the facts were not similar. The prosecutors urge that the present case is similar and ask that the value of the franchise as fixed at the time of the merger in 1899, be included in the present valuation of their property. It is difficult to tell from the opinion in the Consolidated Gas Company case upon what exact ground the allowance was approved. The court refers to the report of a senate committee of investigation soon after the consolidation of the companies, the recognition for twenty years of the agreement as valid, and the fact that the stock had been dealt in for more than twenty years on the basis of the validity of the valuation and of the stock issued by the company. Neither of these considerations, however, justify the conclusion that the rates must continue to be so fixed as to make good for all time that valuation. The report of the senate committee seems to have been a mere report of the facts after consolidation was accomplished, and the fact that the stock was dealt in upon the basis of the validity of the valuation means no more than that in the general estimation of investors the state was not likely to exercise its power to reduce rates. In fact what the court said on this point was unnecessary to the decision since the result was to sustain the rate fixed by the commission; that is to say, the court held that the rate fixed was sufficient to yield an adequate return even though allowance was made for the valuation put upon the franchise in 1884. In order to make the case an authority for the contention of the present prosecutor, the rate should have been so low that its adequacy would depend upon whether the valuation of the special franchise was included or excluded. In reality the actual decision seems adverse to the present prosecutor; since the court held that the adequacy of the rate was not to be determined by including in the valuation of the company's property the actual present value of the special franchise. The argument of the present prosecutor drawn from the Consolidated Gas Company case is based on a false premise. The facts of the two cases are not similar. The controlling fact in that case was that the companies had earned such enormous dividends that it was fair to assume that they would be able to earn dividends in the future which would justify the capitalization of the franchises at the amount then fixed. The present case differs. The capitalization fixed in 1899 must have been larger than the amount upon which the companies could then expect to earn a normal return; for when the Paterson and Passaic Gas and Electric Company was leased to the Public Service Corporation in 1903, the latter corporation agreed to pay interest on the bonded debt and a dividend on the stock of one and one-half per cent for the first year, increasing one-half per cent a year until the limit of five per cent was reached. The stock for which the holders were willing to accept one and one-half per cent in 1903, and five per cent beginning with 1910 perpetually, could have hardly been worth par in 1899. Nothing is shown to have intervened to reduce its value. We are not called upon to consider the liability of holders of that stock to assessments for unpaid shares. Assuming that the shares must now be regarded as full paid, their par value is no measure of the value of the franchises in 1899, the date of the merger, as it was in the Consolidated Gas Company case."

Valuation of Depreciation.

In computing the present value of a gas plant for rate-making purposes, an estimate for depreciation is, of course, correct, and the only question is as to the amount which should be allowed. Bonbright v. Geary, 210 Fed. 44. In that case the court said: "The corporation commission estimated the value of the various physical units, and then estimated that the plant had depreciated at the rate of seven per cent per annum, which for an average of, say, seven years, would be 49 per cent for the total depreciation upon the whole plant, leaving the present value of the plant only 51 per cent of its original value. The experts for the complainant made an examination of the various units of the physical properties and as far as possible made an actual valuation of each unit, and when that was not possible then an estimated depreciation was made. Turning now to the affidavit of R. S. Masson, an expert engineer, and one of the experts who valued the plant for the company, we find the following uncontradicted statement concerning the plant: 'Condition of Property. The gas and electric plants of Pacific Gas & Electric Company are in good and efficient condition. All parts of the electric generating plant are modern, up-to-date installations, including turbo-generators, water tube boilers, condensers, oil and lamp black burning apparatus, etc. There is an ample water supply obtained from wells. The new gas generating plant is a modern, up-to-date reversible Lowe water gas apparatus. Both plants are housed in brick buildings with steel truss roofs covered with fire-proof material. Neither plant could be improved upon anywhere. The electric distributing system is the most modern type for distribution in cities of this character, and all the lines, transformers, and service equipment are of the latest, most improved type. The gas distributing system includes ample mains well laid, the greater portion of which have been installed during the last three years. This distributing system is in the best possible condition and of the most up-to-date qualifications. The utility equipment of the company is also of the latest design, including automobile trucks and the latest office labor-saving devices.' It would seem that, if the plant is in the condition set forth in this statement, a deduction of 49 per cent from its original value for depreciation, or approximately that percentage, is excessive; but to what extent it is excessive we do not now determine. . . . This brings us to a peculiar feature of this case. There was on hand in the treasury of the company at the time of the valuation of the plant the sum of $64,292.67, accumulated for the purpose of meeting the expense of current repairs and for replacing such parts of the property as had been worn out and the life of the part ended. The fund had been withheld from the stockholders that it might be used in preserving the plant in good condition and in proper efficiency. This was good business judgment on the part of the officers of the corporation and must be approved. Public service corporations are to be encouraged in maintaining their plants in a proper state of efficiency. We are of the opinion that the corporation commission was in error in its estimate of depreciation of this plant, and particularly was in error in omitting this reserve fund from its valuation of the plant."

In Newark Natural Gas, etc. Co. v. Newark, 92 Ohio St. 393, 111 N. E. 150, affirmed by the reported case, it was held that the evidence showed that a deduction of five per cent a year on the reasonable present value of the property would be a fair estimate for the depreciation of the plant.

In Landon v. Public Utilities Commission, 234 Fed. 152, it appeared that the commission, in fixing the net rates for the sales by the receiver of a natural gas company, which was directly and indirectly the owner of the pipe line extending from gas fields in the state of Oklahoma to thirty-seven cities in Kansas and eight cities in Missouri, and which was conducting natural gas from Oklahoma to these cities and their inhabitants, where it was distributed under contracts between the natural gas company and other corporations, to the public of the state, allowed one-twelfth of the present value of the company for future depreciation of its property, on the basis that the life of the company as a going concern would be twelve years. The court held that, in view of evidence of the exhaustion of the natural gas fields, of the increase in the cost of gas, and of the cost of adequate extensions to the company's pipe lines to secure an additional gas supply, which evidence was not considered by the commission, and also the fact that the probable life of the company was conceded to be temporary, inasmuch as the exhaustion of the gas fields which it could reach with permissible extensions must inevitably come, the evidence was convincing that the life of the company would not exceed six years, and that one-twelfth more each year during the six years should have been allowed by the commission for depreciation.

In Lincoln Gas, etc. Co. v. Lincoln, 223 U. S. 349, 32 S. Ct. 271, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 466, reversing 182 Fed. 926, in holding that the facts, as found by the circuit court, were not full enough to enable the court to determine what sum, if any, should be annually deducted from the net income as a permanent maintenance or replacement fund, the court said: "Conflicting expert evidence has been introduced presenting radically different theories as to the necessity, character and amount of such a fund, and as to how it should be created, preserved and expended.

Some of this evidence puts the sum to be annually deducted and set aside as a permanent fund at five per cent upon the value of the plant at the time of deduction. It is obvious that if this view is sound there will be little or nothing of the net income left for distribution among shareholders, and no basis for legislative rate reduction now, and none likely until such time as the income from the permanent fund will keep up the plant. The work of reconstructing and replacing old parts by new in a plant of this kind must, in the very nature of things, be going on constantly. Heretofore it seems to have been so well and continuously done that the value of the plant as a whole has suffered less than one per cent per annum if the total depreciation be distributed through the more than thirty years of operation. So far as can be now seen, reconstruction and replacement charges have, up to the present time, been borne by current revenue, with the result that the revenue remaining in the single year of 1907 showed a net surplus of $73,851.83, a sum large enough, if distributed to shareholders upon the basis of the value of property engaged in the business as claimed by appellant, to have paid a dividend of ten per cent, and about fifteen per cent upon the valuation settled by the circuit court. There is no finding as to the extent of the application of the revenue of 1907 to reconstruction or replacement, as distinguished from current repairs and operating expenses. It is, however, plainly inferable that the revenue of that year was used to the extent necessary. If, in the past, reconstruction and replacement charges have been met out of current expenses, the fact must be taken into consideration, both when we come to estimating future net income and in determining what sum shall be annually set aside to guard against future depreciation. This doubtless influenced the court below in settling upon the amount of $8,000 as a sufficient annual appropriation of income as insurance against future depreciation. But if the constantly recurring necessity to do reconstruction or replacement work was in 1907 met out of the current income of that year, thereby diminishing the net income, the fact should be given weight in estimating future net income; otherwise there will be a double deduction on that account, first, by paying such charges as they occur, and thereafter by a contribution out of the remaining income for the same object. The facts found are not full enough to at all justify this court in dealing with this problem of a replacement fund. There should be a full report upon past depreciation, past expense for reconstruction of replacement, and past operating expenses, including current repairs. We should be advised as to the gross receipts for recent years, and just how these receipts have been expended. Then the amount to be set aside for future depreciation will depend upon the character and probable life of the property and the method adopted in the past to preserve the property. It can be readily seen that the amount to be annually set aside may be such as to forbid rate reductions because of the requirement of such a fund. The matter is one first for a skilled master, who should make a full report upon the value of the property, the receipts and the expenses of operation and the sums paid out on reconstruction and replacements, and in dividends in recent years."

ADEQUACY OF RETURN ON VALUE OF PLANT.

In Public Service Gas Co. v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 84 N. J. L. 463, 87 Atl. 651, judgment affirmed 87 N. J. L. 597, 94 Atl. 634, 95 Atl. 1079, which overruled on rehearing 87 N. J. L. 581, 92 Atl. 606, in determining whether the rate fixed for gas was a just and reasonable individual rate under the statute [Public Utilities Act, § 16 (P. L. 1911, p. 377)], it was held that a return of eight per cent on the value of the plant was adequate.

In a case wherein it appeared that an ordinance fixing ninety cents per thousand cubic feet of gas as the highest price to be charged for gas had been passed, and the state supreme court had dismissed a bill to restrain its enforcement without prejudice to a later suit after it should have been given a fair test, and the court had fixed a value on the plant that considerably exceeded its cost and estimated that under the ordinance the return would be over six per cent, it was held that the supreme court would not reverse the decree of the state court. Cedar Rapids Gas Light Co. v. Cedar Rapids, 223 U. S. 655, 32 S. Ct. 389, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 594, affirming decree 144 Ia. 426, 120 N. W. 966, 138 Am. St. Rep. 299, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1025. To the same effect, see Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 35 S. Ct. 811, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1244, modifying decree 199 Fed. 204.

The rate of interest which a natural gas company should be permitted to earn on its investment may be affected by the fact that its business is of a character which is necessarily temporary. Landon v. Public Utilities Commission, 234 Fed. 152. In that case it appeared that the commission, in fixing the net rates for sales of gas by the receiver of a natural gas company which was directly and indirectly the owner of the pipe line extending from gas fields in the state of Oklahoma to thirty-seven cities in Kansas and eight cities in Missouri, and by means of a receiver was conducting natural gas from Oklahoma to these cities and their inhabitants, where it was distributed under contracts between the natural gas company and other corporations to the public of the state, allowed six per cent per annum for interest on the business of and the investment in the property of the company. The court held that, in view of the evidence of the exhaustion of the natural gas fields, of the increase of the cost of gas, and of the cost of adequate extensions to the company's pipe lines to secure an additional supply of gas, which evidence was not considered by the commission, and also the fact that the probable life of the company was conceded to be temporary, inasmuch as the exhaustion of the gas fields which it could reach with permissible extensions must inevitably come, and that the probable life of the company as a going concern was approximately six years, at least eight per cent annum should be allowed for interest on its present value, or an increase of the amount allowed by the commission of two per cent.

v.

FARMERS' AND MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK ET AL.

Oregon Supreme Court—April 6, 1915.

76 Oregon 113; 147 Pac. 537.

Judicial Sales — Advertisement — Misnomer of Party — Effect.

An advertisement of a sheriff's sale on execution reciting judgment in favor of a creditor against certain debtors, the levy upon all their right, title, and interest in the real property described by legal subdivisions, divests the debtors of any title to the property; the use of the name "Hattie Brown," instead of "Kittie Brown," not vitiating a prior sufficient description, and this independently of L. O. L. § 241, subd. 4, which expressly makes a confirmation of sale a conclusive determination of the regularity of the proceedings for sale.

[See note at end of this case.]

Vendor and Purchaser — Contract of Sale — Evidence of Writing Insufficient.

Evidence in behalf of cross-complainant in ejectment claiming under a contract for a conveyance by defendant bank, plaintiff's grantor, is held to be insufficient to prove any written agreement or memorandum to convey the realty, as required by L. O. L. § 808, subd. 6.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—66.

Specific Performance — Contract Lacking Mutuality.

Where there is no such mutuality in the contract to convey as entitles the vendor bank to compel the cross-complainant as purchaser to pay the purchase price of the land, the alleged contract cannot be specifically enforced against the bank.

Contracts — Formation — Withdrawal of Offer.

An offer to convey realty until accepted is subject to withdrawal without prejudice to the party making it, and where the alleged purchaser knows nothing of the offer there is no prejudice in its withdrawal, and the vendor is not under obligation to renew the offer.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Douglas county: HAMILTON, Judge.

Ejectment by E. V. Weaver against Kittie Brown et al., and cross-complaint by Kittie Brown, against Farmers' and Merchants' National Bank et al., defendants. Judgment for cross-complainant. Defendants appeal. CROSS-BILL DISMISSED.

[113] This suit had its inception in a cross-complaint in equity as a defense against an action in ejectment [114] brought against Kittie Brown and others by E. V. Weaver, who is a defendant herein. The bill alleges, in substance, that from the death of her father, Henry Wiley, until September 16, 1912, the plaintiff occupied certain lands in Douglas County as the owner thereof by virtue of a devise of the same in his last will and testament; that since that date she has been in the exclusive possession of the premises as vendee under an agreement with the defendant to sell and convey them to her. She traces the history of the title of the defendant bank in the realty in question from the giving of what she alleges was an accommodation note executed and delivered by her and her husband with one Blankenship to the bank October 18, 1905, for $770, through a judgment on that note against herself and her husband rendered by the Circuit Court of Douglas County on May 16, 1908, upon which execution was issued, the land sold, the sale confirmed June 27, 1911, and a sheriff's deed issued to the bank September 16, 1912. Concerning the notice of the sheriff's sale, she says, in substance, that the lands were advertised "under the name of Hattie Brown," which point will be hereafter noticed. She states that on February 5, 1913, while she was still on the lands under the contract she mentions, the bank attempted to get possession of the premises by virtue of a writ of assistance, which was afterward recalled by the Circuit Court. The following allegations then appear in the complaint:

"Plaintiff further alleges that she was led to believe by the defendant bank, and by its attorney and agent, O. P. Coshow, that they would re deed said lands first above described to her at any time after said sheriff's deed was made and delivered as aforesaid, upon the payment to the said defendant bank of their demands against her on account of said accommodation note which plaintiff signed as aforesaid, without regard to [115] the time allowed by law in which to redeem lands from execution sale, and relying upon their said promises in that behalf, the plaintiff let the statutory time for redemption expire without having redeemed said lands from said execution sale; that on the 25th day of October, 1912, and after the statutory time for redemption of said lands had expired, the plaintiff, in accord with the prior promises of the said defendant bank, offered to pay the said defendant bank in full all its demands against the plaintiff by reason of said accommodation note as aforesaid, in consideration for their deed reconveying to plaintiff said first above-described lands, and on the 6th day of November, 1912, while the said defendant bank was seised and possessed of said lands as above set forth, the said bank entered into a contract agreement to and with plaintiff, wherein and whereby it accepted the plaintiff's offer to pay all their demands as above stated, and in that behalf agreed to accept in full therefor the sum of $1,348.66, with interest at 8 per cent per annum from said 6th day of November, 1912, until paid, and in consideration therefor the said defendant bank would make, execute and deliver their deed for said lands first above described to whomever the plaintiff designated, and in that behalf and with that purpose in view the said defendant bank did, on or about the 25th day of November, 1912, make and execute their deed to said lands, and on the 30th day of November, 1912, deliver the same in escrow with the Douglas National Bank, of Roseburg, Oregon, with directions to said bank to deliver the same to the plaintiff or her agent, as per the terms of their said agreement above mentioned, upon the payment to said bank of the sum of $1,348.66, with interest thereon from November 6, 1912; that the plaintiff took and held possession of said first above-described lands under and pursuant to said contract agreement of purchase and sale aforesaid, and has ever since been, and is now, in the exclusive possession thereof, and has made improvements thereon, and by virtue of said agreement has farm let the same to the said J. A. Coplen, the defendant mentioned in the ejectment action against [116] which this suit is filed, for a term of three years from last fall, the year 1912."

She alleges that she duly performed "all the conditions of said contract agreement of sale and purchase" upon her part to be kept and performed, and at divers times tendered to the defendant bank through its attorney the full amount of all its demands against the plaintiff by reason of said accommodation note, and demanded a deed, without receiving the same. She avers other tenders on May 6, 1913. Her prayer is to the effect that a deed made by the defendant bank to the defendant Weaver, whom she alleges took with knowledge of her rights, be canceled or that he be held to be her trustee of the land; that he execute to her a deed on payment of the amount that would be due the bank on its note and judgment up to the time of the tender to Weaver; and that the defendants be adjudged to account to her for damages in the sum of $8,500. The defendants answering separately admit the plaintiff's original title in the land, the execution by her and her husband of the note in question, the commencement of the action against her, the rendition of the judgment mentioned, the execution, sale, confirmation and succeeding deed, the issuance of the writ of assistance and its recall; but deny every other allegation of the complaint. The Circuit Court, after a hearing, entered a decree to the effect that out of money tendered into its registry by the plaintiff there be paid to the defendant bank the sum of $1,535.34, and that within 20 days from such payment the defendants execute and deliver to the plaintiff a deed reconveying to her the land in question, in default of which the decree should stand for a deed. The defendants have appealed.

Oliver P. Coshow and A. N. Orcutt for appellants.

Benjamin F. Jones and Commodore S. Jackson for respondent.

[117] BURNETT, J. (after stating the facts).—The admitted history of the case reveals the execution of the note to the bank, action thereon against the plaintiff and her husband in the Circuit Court of Douglas County, personal service of summons upon them, judgment for want of an answer, execution upon the judgment, sale in pursuance thereof, confirmation of sale, and, after the expiration of a year, there being no redemption, a sheriff's deed conveying the land to the defendant bank.

1. The plaintiff's criticism of the notice of sheriff's sale is not well founded. The advertisement recites the judgment in favor of the bank against Kittie Brown and C. W. Brown, defendants, and the levy upon "all the right, title and interest that the said Kittie Brown and C. W. Brown, defendants aforesaid, or either of them, had on the 16th day of May, 1908, or have had at any time since, or now have," in the real property in dispute which is described in the notice by legal subdivisions. The announcement then goes on with this language:

"Said land being the identical tract devised and granted to the said Hattie Brown by the last will and testament of Henry Wiley, deceased."

The reference to the judgment and the recital of the levy, together with the description by legal subdivisions of the land, all as the property of Kittie Brown [118] and C. W. Brown, is enough in that respect to carry the title of the plaintiff here in the property, and the use of the name "Hattie Brown" does not vitiate the previous sufficient description. Indeed, in the trial of the case at bar and in the argument no reliance was made upon that point. Besides all this, in the language of our Code, the confirmation of sale was a "conclusive determination of the regularity of the proceedings concerning such sale, as to all persons, in any other action, suit, or proceeding whatever." Section 241, subd. 4, L. O. L.

As before stated, the sale of the plaintiff's property culminated in a sheriff's deed September 16, 1912. That instrument operated as a matter of law to utterly divest her of her title to the realty in question. To establish any further or subsequent hold on the premises, she must allege and prove a valid contract with the then holder of the title to convey the same to her which she is entitled to have specifically performed. Without discussing the sufficiency of her narration about such a contract, but giving it its full value in her favor, she must, in order to recover in this proceeding, prove an agreement complying with the statute on such subjects together with performance or a valid offer to perform while such a contract was in force. Section 808, L. O. L. thus fixes the standard of evidence applicable:

"In the following cases the agreement is void unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration, be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged; or by his lawfully authorized agent; evidence, therefor, of the agreement shall not be received other than the writing, or secondary evidence of its contents, in the cases prescribed by law. . . . (6) An agreement for the leasing, for a [119] longer period than one year, or for the sale of real property, or of any interest therein. . . ."

In one portion of her complaint she alleges that from September 16, 1912, the date of the sheriff's deed, she had been in possession of the lands under an agreement between her and the bank to sell the same to her; and in another portion she says, as quoted above, that the agreement was entered into November 6, 1912.

The business was conducted mainly by means of correspondence. On October 25, 1912, one C. I. Leavengood wrote to the defendant bank the following letter:

"Myrtle Creek, Oregon, October 25, 1912.

"Farmers & Merchants' Natl. Bank, El Dorado, Kansas—

"Dear Sirs: As attorney for Kittie Brown, from whom you secured a judgment some years ago, and on whose property you hold a sheriff's deed, I wish to know if you will accept the full amount of judgment, with costs and interests in cash, and release the property. I asked Mr. Coshow, your attorney, to make this inquiry, but he is so busy in politics that it may have escaped his notice or attention. This judgment was taken in default without the parties having been advised as to exemptions and both Mr. and Mrs. Brown were sick and in bed at the time when the action was brought. While it would appear from the will filed recently that Mrs. Brown has only a life estate in the land, yet if we can discharge the debt as above stated, I believe we can raise the money on 10 days' notice. An early reply will greatly oblige, "C. I. Leavengood."

The answer of the bank here follows:

"El Dorado, Kansas, Nov. 6, 1912.

"Mr. C. I. Leavengood, Myrtle Creek, Oregon:

"Yours of the 25th of Oct. at hand in regard to Kitty Brown property in which you offer to pay us what is due for redemption, and the directors have authorized [120] me to say to you that the consideration in deed is $1,110.23; our attorney's fees and cost paid $123.31, $1,233.54. Interest from Sept. 6, 1911, $115.12; total to Nov. 6, 1911, $1,348.66. Now, if you will pay us $1,348.66 and interest from this day at 8 per cent until paid we will make the deed to whoever Kitty Brown wishes. She seems anxious to get out of paying us, but still we ask nothing but the debt.

"Yours truly,

"Wm. I. Shriver,

"Cashier."

The reply of Leavengood is here quoted:

"Myrtle Creek, Ore., Nov. 12, 1912.

"Wm. I. Shriver, Cashier, El Dorado, Kansas—

"Dear Sir: Please execute deed to C. I. Leavengood and send to Douglas National Bank, Roseburg, Oregon, with whom I have arranged to send you check for $1,348.66 and interest from Nov. 6, 1912, at 8 per cent. It was necessary for me to give personal security to obtain the amount and as I will be obliged to sell a part of the farm in order to reimburse the bank the title is my only security. Should you doubt my authority make an order from Kitty Brown a condition precedent to its delivery from Douglas National Bank to me.

Yours truly,
"C. I. Leavengood."

On November 25, 1912, the defendant bank wrote to the Douglas National Bank of Roseburg, inclosing a deed to Leavengood with instructions to deliver it to him on payment of $1,490.66, stating that he had offered to pay their claim and expenses which they had concluded to accept, but had made a mistake in computing the amount, and consequently demanded the greater sum. They close their letter with this language:

"We have added that amount to our estimate of claim in the deed and must have the full amount. We feel that Mrs. Brown did everything she could to avoid [121] paying us and when we find we have a property more valuable than our claim, she should be proud to make us whole. If this price is not satisfactory with them, please return us the deed."

Leavengood then wrote the defendant bank the following letter:

"Myrtle Creek, Oregon, Dec. 16, 1912.
"Farmers & Merchants' National Bank, El Dorado Kansas—

"Dear Sir: Doubtless you are wondering why the money is not forthcoming in the matter of deed sent in escrow to Douglas National Bank at Roseburg. Well it is about the same old story of crooked intent on the part of Kittie Brown. I have been her attorney in probation for her father's will, and after she received notice from Mr. Coshow, as your attorney, to vacate on ranch, she realized she was in trouble and for a stipulated fee offered by her I undertook to secure back the place and to sell off sufficient to pay off your claim and my fee. After she learned I had succeeded in both—or have a buyer for the hill portion on west of road who offers sufficient to pay all indebtedness, she disclaims her offer, which was made in presence of the county judge and others. I have asked Mr. Coshow to write to you asking that her consent to delivery of deed be not required, but he seems either to be unwilling or too busy to write. Her idea is to evade paying any debt and in this as well as in your case has shown her dishonesty. My action in the matter was solely as an attorney and for a stipulated fee, and as to my integrity and honesty we refer to any business firm or bank at Roseburg or the Citizens' State Bank at this place. Trusting that no other arrangements will be made nor the deed recalled until you have investigated, as my money is ready at bank.

"Your truly,
"C. I. Leavengood."

On receipt of this communication from Leavengood the defendant bank addressed the following letter to the Douglas National Bank:

[122] "El Dorado, Kansas, December 24, 1912.
"Douglas National Bank, Roseburg, Oregon—

"Dear Sir: Please return a deed sent you by us to C. I. Leavengood about Nov. 6, 1912, as we are informed they cannot comply. Return at once and oblige.

Wm. I. Shriver,
"Cashier."

In pursuance of this letter the deed was returned as requested. Other negotiations were had, but no agreement was reached on the subject, and finally on March 31, 1913, the bank conveyed the property to the defendant Weaver, who instituted the ejectment action already mentioned.

The plaintiff herself says that the first negotiation had with the bank was the letter written by Leavengood October 25, 1912, a date more than a month after the execution and delivery of the sheriff's deed. Part of her cross-examination is here set down:

"Q. Did you ever tender the money to the bank while the deed was here to take up the deed?

"A. I did not have any money to tender while the deed was here. I think the deed had gone back before then.

"Q. Now, in order to be clear on this matter, Mrs. Brown, as I understand you that personally or up to the time you went to Kansas in March, 1913, you had no personal correspondence or arrangement between yourself or the Kansas bank as to the repurchasing of this property, is that true?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. That is true, is it?

"A. I do not understand what you mean.

"Q. (Question read to witness.)

"A. No, sir; I did not.

"Q. And all the negotiations were carried on between Mr. Leavengood and the bank, is that correct?

"A. Until I went to Kansas?

[123] "Q. Yes, up to the time you went back there in March.

"A. Yes, that is all there was just between Leavengood and the bank.

"Q. So that whatever contract or agreement you had with the bank up to that time is included in the letter that passed between Mr. Leavengood and the bank? Is that right?

"A. That is all there was done, just what was done between Mr. Leavengood and the bank.

"Q. You say that pursuant to those arrangements that you went into possession of this land under your agreement with the bank?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. It is not a fact, then, that you went into possession under your agreement with the bank to repurchase at the date that the sheriff's deed was made to the bank?

"A. I cannot tell you anything about those dates.

"Q. That was September 12, 1912. Now these arrangements were all after that time, were they not, Mrs. Brown?

"A. I cannot remember the dates. There is too many dates for me to remember.

"Q. Had the bank made you any promises before that Leavengood correspondence in regard to what they would do?

"A. No.

"Q. In regard to this land?

"A. No.

"Q. Your only relations with the bank was through Mr. Leavengood and what you did personally while you were in Kansas?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Why didn't you redeem from the sheriff's sale before the year for redemption had expired?

"A. I couldn't get the money."

The plaintiff testified that she had an interview with the bank in El Dorado, Kansas, on March 29, 1913. On that point her evidence here follows:

[124] "Q. Now, referring a moment to this trip which you say you made to Kansas, I think you testified that the bank there sent you back to Mr. Coshow to fix up some papers?

"A. They said to come out here and settle with Mr. Coshow.

"Q. Did you do it?

"A. I came out here and they were putting us out of the house.

"Q. Did you go back and see Mr. Coshow at all?

"A. I do not think that I came back to Mr. Coshow's office.

"Q. Did they put you out of the house?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you go back to Mr. Coshow?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. You never have since then?

"A. No, sir; I didn't suppose it was necessary."

Further, on the subject of the deed sent by the defendant to the Douglas National Bank, her testimony is:

"Q. State when you first knew that the deed that had been deposited in escrow in the Douglas National Bank had been returned.

"A. Mr. Coshow told me that it had gone back that night that I went there to see him. That is the first I knew of it.

"Q. That is when you came down in answer to the summons in regard to the writ of assistance?

"A. Yes, in regard to the writ of assistance."

2. The utmost that can be claimed by the correspondence between Leavengood and the bank upon which plaintiff relies to prove her allegation of the contract to sell her land is that there was an offer of the bank to convey the property to Leavengood with the consent of plaintiff. She herself says she knew nothing of the deed tendered to Leavengood until after it had been returned. The offer had then [125] been withdrawn, and it is inconceivable that she could have been a contracting party to something of which she was in total ignorance. In short, there is no situation disclosed by the testimony in which the bank could have tendered to the plaintiff a deed for the property at any time and have successfully compelled her to pay the purchase price.

3, 4. The first tender which she made, as disclosed by the testimony, was in writing of date May 6, 1913, which was long after the bank had recalled the deed it had tendered to Leavengood and had conveyed the property of Weaver, on March 31, 1913. The offer of the bank having been withdrawn, as already noted, it was at an end. It is hornbook law that until an offer has been accepted it is open to withdrawal without prejudice to the party making it. The plaintiff herself says she knew nothing of the offer; hence she could not have accepted. Having withdrawn it under these circumstances, the bank was under no obligation whatever to renew it. It is in evidence that some time in March, 1913, through its attorney, the bank endeavored to get the plaintiff and her husband to attorn to it and acknowledge its title; but they refused to do so. It cannot be that she could be contracting with the bank for the purchase of the property and at the same time deny its title. The testimony utterly fails to establish any contract the specific performance of which could be enforced against the bank, for the very good reason that the bank could not at any time have compelled the plaintiff to pay the purchase price of the land. There must be mutuality in any contract to make it enforceable. It may be that in the beginning the plaintiff received nothing of the proceeds of the accommodation note which she signed, but the bank was not to blame for that. The transaction has been long [126] drawn out and the burden of interest and expenses has largely increased. The plaintiff has shown no effort to liquidate the claim until after her title in the property had been utterly extinguished by sheriff's deed. She recounts efforts after that to obtain a purchaser for the land who would take up the defendants' claim, but admits they were all unsuccessful; and the first actual offer to pay anything to the bank was made after it had sold the property.

While the circumstances viewed from the plaintiff's standpoint suggest the exercise of magnanimity in her favor beyond the confines of law and equity, the record presents no feature which the court can consider as a basis for nullifying the title of the defendants to the land. The cross-bill must be dismissed.

Cross-bill dismissed. Rehearing denied.

NOTE.

Misnomer of Party in Advertisement or Notice of Sale as Affecting Validity of Judicial Sale.

"The object of a notice of sale is to inform the public of the nature and condition of the property to be sold and of the time, place and terms of the sale and thus to attract bidders and prevent a sacrifice of the property. If these objects are attained, immaterial errors and mistakes will not affect the sufficiency of the notice." 16 R. C. L. tit. Judicial Sales, par. 39. Applying that principle it is ordinarily considered that the misnomer of a party in an advertisement or notice of a judicial sale does not affect the validity of a sale had pursuant thereto, since the error is not one which will naturally or ordinarily mislead any person desirous of attending the sale. Thus in the reported case it is held that an execution sale was not vitiated by the fact that the advertisement described one of the debtors as "Hattie Brown" instead of "Kittie Brown."

In Miller v. Kipple, 2 Pearson (Pa.) 118, it was held that the use of the name "Kepple" for "Kipple" in a sheriff's advertisement did not vitiate the sale. The court said: "The first exception we shall consider is that to the name of the defendants in the sheriff's advertisement. It is described as belonging to Lydia Ann Kepple and Peter Kepple, whereas the name is Kipple. We do not often interfere with process in this state because of the failure to dot the i or cross the t, unless some one has been actually misled by the failure. The doctrine of idem sonans applies."

In Jeffries v. Bartlett, 75 Ga. 230, it was held that the use of the name "Jeffers" for "Jeffries," the defendant, in the advertisement of an execution sale, would not interfere with the validity of the sale, the name being idem sonans.

In Horton v. Bassett, 16 R. I. 419, 16 Atl. 715, it was held that the use of the name

"Richard Bartlett" instead of "Richard Bassett" in a sheriff's notice of sale did not vitiate the sale. The court said: "In this notice the execution was described as one wherein Richard Bartlett of Pawtucket, instead of Richard Bassett, was plaintiff, the execution being otherwise correctly described. On February 17, 1888, the officer substituted in said notice Richard Bassett for Richard Bartlett, but never published said notice as thus corrected after February 17, 1888. No notifications were set up except those which were originally set up immediately after the levy. The sale was made as advertised, and this bill is brought to prevent the officer from making a deed according to it. This case comes before us on demurrer. The complainant contends that the sale was illegal because of the error in the notice, and ought not to be carried into effect. We do not see how the error, which seems to have been merely a typographical error, could have prejudiced the sale, and, if it could not, it is immaterial and the sale ought to be sustained. The purpose of the notice is to draw bidders by advertising what the property is that is to be sold, and what the authority is under which the sale is to take place."

In Stephenson v. January, 49 Mo. 465, it was held that a sale under a deed of trust was not invalidated by the fact that the advertisement in one place misnamed one of the trustees. The court said: "But it is insisted that there was an inaccuracy in this last publication that destroyed its force and rendered it altogether worthless. The advertisement was in regular form, the names of the trustees were inserted correctly in the body of it, but at the bottom James was printed instead of Joseph in Cabot's name. Certainly, place, description and time are all requisite in the notice of sale by trustees. But mere omissions or inaccuracies, not calculated to mislead and working no injury, will be disregarded. (Gray v. Howard, 14 Mo. 341; Beattie v. Butler, 20 Mo. 313.) The advertisement, as published in the Republican, contained everything that was necessary to apprise the public of what property was to be sold, the time when and the place where it was to be sold, for what debt the sale would take place, and the names of the trustees were properly and correctly printed in the body of the advertisement, but a mistake was made in the name of one of them at the bottom. This certainly could neither deceive nor operate to the prejudice of anyone, and ought not to be allowed to vitiate the sale and render it illegal."

EXCELSIOR PRODUCTS MANUFACTURING COMPANY

v.

KANSAS CITY SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Missouri Supreme Court, Division No. 1—
December 19, 1914.

263 Mo. 142; 172 S. W. 359.

Master and Servant — Liability to Third Person for Act of Servant — Starting Fire.

Railroad laborers who are living in bunk cars provided by the railroad company, and who, when off duty, build a fire upon the right of way to heat water to wash their clothes, are not acting within the scope of their employment in building such fire, so as to render the railroad liable for their negligence to the owner of adjoining property destroyed by fire communicated therefrom.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The negligence of a railroad company in permitting combustibles to accumulate on its right of way is not the proximate cause of the burning of adjoining property, where the fire was started by railroad laborers on the right of way for their own purposes, and there was no evidence that the rubbish became ignited and thereby communicated the fire to the plaintiff's property.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The placing by a railroad company of bunk cars for the use of its laborers upon its right of way, adjacent to plaintiff's property, does not of itself create a nuisance so as to render the railroad liable for loss caused by a fire kindled by the laborers upon the right of way to heat water to wash their clothes, and communicated to plaintiff's property.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Rev. St. 1909, §§ 3150, 3151, making railroads liable for fires started by engines and those communicated by the ignition of dry vegetation negligently permitted to remain on the right of way, does not make the railroad liable for a fire kindled by its laborers on the right of way outside the scope of their employment and communicated directly to adjoining property without the ignition of rubbish upon the right of way.

[See note at end of this case.]

Fires — Duty of Landowner — Extinguishing Fire Started by Another.

An owner of premises, who discovers fire thereon for which he is not responsible, must use ordinary care to prevent it from spreading to adjoining property.

Same.

The knowledge of railroad laborers who kindled a fire on a railroad right of way for a purpose outside the scope of their employment is not knowledge of the fire by the railroad company, which requires it to use due care to prevent the spread of the fire.

Same.

Where the conductor of a railroad passenger train observed a fire upon the right of way kindled by laborers for their own purpose and not obviously dangerous to adjoining premises, the railroad is not liable for his failure to stop his train and extinguish the fire, since the circumstances did not impose such a duty upon him.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson county: SLOVER, Judge.

Action by Excelsior Product Manufacturing Company, plaintiff, against Kansas City Southern Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Cyrus Crane and George J. Mersereau for appellant.

Joseph P. Fontron and Fyke & Snyder for respondent.

[146] BLAIR, C.—This appeal is from a judgment for $35,000 for damages by fire to plaintiff's factory and raw material.

[147] Plaintiff manufactured excelsior, and on its lot adjoining defendant's right of way had its factory and had collected a large quantity of cotton wood which was stacked north of and near plaintiff's private switch track which was on the south part of its lot. South of this was the north line of defendant's right of way and near that line defendant had a switch track on which it had placed some "bunk" cars in which were housed some laborers who were engaged in constructing for defendant a concrete subway some hundreds of yards west of these cars. One Sunday morning, in April, one of these laborers built a fire on the right of way south of the "bunk" cars for the purpose of heating water to wash clothing. A south wind was blowing and soon plaintiff's wood was discovered to be on fire and in a short time the wood and factory were in flames.

The specific allegations of negligence are as follows:

"Plaintiff further states that at said time one of two alternatives was true, and plaintiff is ignorant of which alternative was true, viz: that either said employees or concrete men were under the direct charge, care, protection and direction of a foreman, Oscar Carrington, and a subforeman or straw boss, whose name was Frank Stiles, whose general duties were to care for, oversee and watch over said cars and said employees, and to see that nothing was done by said employees in the ordinary acts of living in or about said cars that would endanger the property of this plaintiff and others having property along the right of way of defendant; or said employees were carelessly and negligently permitted by defendant to be and remain and live in and about said cars without being placed in charge of any foreman, overseer or guard; that on said 11th day of April, 1909, said string of cars was yet standing in said place on said side track south of the cordwood piled along on plaintiff's ground some [148] thirty feet west of the factory of the plaintiff; that said day was Sunday, and the wind at said time was blowing at a high velocity from the south—from the direction in which said cars stood, toward the property and cordwood of this plaintiff; that at said time the said cars were occupied and used by the said employees of the defendant aforesaid, and said cars and employees were then and there in the charge and care of the defendant's said foreman, or straw boss, Frank Stiles, as aforesaid, or were carelessly and negligently permitted by defendant to be and remain in and about said cars without being placed in charge of a foreman, overseer or guard.

"Plaintiff further states that on said day and at about 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, one or more of the said employees or concrete men, the agents and servants of the defendant, whose names are now unknown to plaintiff, while in the employ of defendant and while in the pursuit of the ordinary duties of living in and about the said bunk cars, as provided for by defendant, carelessly and negligently built and caused to be built a fire upon the ground along the side of the east car of said string of cars belonging to defendant, for the purpose of heating some water over said fire, and built said fire within a small circle of a single tier of bricks, making said fire of wood; that said place was a dangerous place in which to build a fire as said Frank Stiles and said employees knew or in the exercise of care and caution should have known; that the water was heated by placing a bucket of water and resting same upon said bricks and the blaze of said fire arose at said time high about said bucket; that the defendant had carelessly and negligently permitted an accumulation of straw and debris on said right of way under said car and over to the property of the plaintiff; that at said time said fire blazed up fiercely and the said high wind catching said flame and sparks, caused said sparks to be passed and carried and communicated [149] across and to the said trash and debris and through the air across the intervening distance between said car to plaintiff's property, causing plaintiff's property to become ignited and burned; that the said employees of the defendant at no time after building said fire and when they saw said fire threatening and dangerous to plaintiff's property, made any effort to extinguish said fire or to prevent said fire from spreading and being carried across the said right of way to the said cordwood of the plaintiff; that said fire spread through said cordwood with great velocity and communicated to said factory belonging to plaintiff, entirely destroying said factory and destroying said cordwood.

"Plaintiff further states that it would not have suffered said loss by said fire if it had not been for the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, its agents and servants as aforesaid, in this, to-wit:

"1. That it was careless and negligent of the said defendant, its agents and servants, to place said living or bunk cars in and upon said side track in such close proximity to plaintiff's property, as to make it highly dangerous to plaintiff's property to have said living cars so close to said plaintiff's property, in view of the necessity of said employees or said section men to do and perform the ordinary and customary duties connected with living, such as building fires for preparing meals, heating water and other necessary things for which fires are built in ordinary modes of living; and that it would so be highly dangerous and hazardous to plaintiff's property for said living or bunk cars to be so placed and used, was known to defendant, its agent and servants, or in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence could have been known by it and them.

"2. That it was careless and negligent in said defendant and its said subforeman, Frank Stiles, then and there in charge of said employees and said cars, to [150] permit said employees to build said fire at said time and place, in a position so near to plaintiff's property and in the face of such a high wind, making it a dangerous place in which to build said fire, all of which was well known to said Frank Stiles and to the said employees, or in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence could have been known; or by the other alternative, if defendant had no foreman, overseer or guard over and in charge of said employees, it was careless and negligent in not placing a foreman, overseer or guard over said employees in charge of them to prevent them from setting out or building fires alongside of or near plaintiff's property to endanger same.

"3. That it was careless and negligent on the part of the defendant, its said agents and servants, the said subforeman and said employees, to permit and allow said cars so built upon its said right of way, to be blown, spread and escape from defendant's said right of way to plaintiff's property.

"4. That it was careless and negligent in the said defendant and its said agents and servants, the said subforeman and said employees, in failing to extinguish said fire after it had been built upon said right of way and in failing to prevent its spreading after they saw or in the exercise of ordinary care and judgment should have seen that said fire was exceedingly hazardous and dangerous to plaintiff's property.

"5. That it was careless and negligent on the part of the defendant, its agents and servants who had charge of the said tracks and right of way of defendant at said place, to permit or allow rubbish, trash or debris to gather and accumulate upon said tracks and right of way, whereby fires set out by said employees of defendant could spread and communicate from said right of way to the said property and cordwood of the plaintiff, and that such accumulation of rubbish, trash and debris would be dangerous to plaintiff's property in case of such a fire, was well known to the defendant [151] its agents and servants, or in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, could have been known by them."

The answer was a general denial.

The evidence tended to show that on the Sunday morning when the fire occurred the wind was blowing strongly from the south and the weather had been clear for several days; defendant's bunk cars, occupied as living quarters by some fifteen laborers employed on week days in constructing a concrete subway 600 or 800 feet west of the cars, had stood for some weeks upon a switch track near the north boundary of defendant's right of way and some six or eight feet south of plaintiff's private switch track on its lot; north of this last mentioned track plaintiff had piles of cotton-wood intended for use in the manufacture of excelsior; there is some evidence that there was some loose wood near the north side of the private track; on Sunday morning, April 11, some of the laborers built a fire for the purpose of washing their clothing; this fire they built between the bunk cars and defendant's main line track at a point about 25 feet from the nearest of plaintiff's wood and about 50 feet west of its factory; pieces of bark and wood were used in building the fire and it was built around a bucket or can placed on bricks and filled with water; it appears that this fire was kindled probably about 9 a. m. and that some of the laborers were seen around it; 30 or 40 minutes later fire was discovered in the wood about 25 feet north and when discovered was nearly or quite beyond control; in a very few minutes the factory caught and was quickly consumed.

The men did not work on Sundays and were not on duty on the Sunday morning in question and had not been since six o'clock p. m. the preceding Saturday; they were free to come and go as they pleased except while at work on the subway on week days; they paid for their own provisions and paid their cook, [152] the amounts being prorated and paid out of their wages by the foreman; there is some evidence that the stoves in the cook cars were available for heating water for washing, but it does not appear they were so used nor does it appear that any arrangement for washing or laundry work was made by defendant nor that the men made any joint arrangement concerning it; there is no evidence defendant furnished any utensils for that purpose or concerned itself with the matter further than that the foreman testifies he directed that no fire be kindled outside on April 11, his attention being drawn to this possibility by one of the men asking him on Saturday to buy him a cake of laundry soap.

The man designated as foreman superintended the work on the subway, but did not stay in or near the bunk cars at night or on Sundays, and there is no evidence defendant charged him with any duty of oversight except on the work on the subway. One Stiles, a carpenter, at times acted as "straw boss," which term seems to mean (in this instance, at least) a sort of substitute foreman, selected by the foreman to act in the latter's absence. Stiles slept in one of the cars, and there is some testimony he was in his car on the Sunday in question, though no one testifies he saw him there or that Stiles saw the fire at any time or was himself seen about the cars that morning. There is no substantial evidence Stiles had any authority to superintend the laborers outside of the hours they were actually employed on the subway. One witness did testify that when Carrington, the foreman, was not present "they looked to" Stiles, adding: "There had to be somebody around there to govern them or the deuce would be to pay. There always was a white man there usually." On motion of defendant's counsel, plaintiff's counsel consented to have this last quoted portion of the answer stricken out.

There was some evidence tending to show that the men had done some washing on previous Sundays, but [153] no evidence they had previously built a fire at the place the fire was built on the day the loss occurred. One witness testified that all previous fires had been built some distance south of the bunk cars, across the tracks therefrom. Another testified fires had previously been built "out on the tracks; that is, between the tracks." The other witnesses added nothing to this. There were at least three tracks south of that on which the bunk cars stood—and perhaps others. The country was open—a house here and there. The switch track south of the main line tracks was used for oil cars and in making up trains.

As to the condition of the right of way around and under the bunk car, one witness described it thus: "Well, there were a few dry weeds and a few green weeds and then some scraps of cordwood bark and little chunks of coal, and everything." Another said the ground "was pretty well cleaned up around there." The other witnesses were not questioned about it.

There was no testimony that debris on the right of way caught fire or that there was any fire on the right of way except that kindled by the men to heat water for washing.

I. The workmen were off duty and in kindling a fire to wash their clothing were not acting within the scope of their employment.

"A master is not responsible for any act or omission of his servants which is not connected with the business in which they serve him, though in general he is responsible for the manner in which they execute his orders and for their negligence in selecting means by which the orders are to be carried out. In determining whether the particular act is done in the course of a servant's employment, it is proper, first, to inquire whether the servant was, at the time, [154] engaged in serving his master. If the act was done while the servant was at liberty from his service and pursuing his own ends exclusively, there can be no question that the master is not responsible, even though the injuries complained of could not have been committed without the facilities afforded by the servant's relations to his master. [Sherman & Redfield on Negligence, sec. 63]" [Garretzen v. Duenckel, 50 Mo. 104, 11 Am. Rep. 405; Milton v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 193 Mo. 1. c. 55, 56, 91 S. W. 949, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 282.]

This principle has been applied to facts bearing considerable resemblance to those in this case. In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, the case of Southern R. Co. v. Power Fuel Co. 152 Fed. 917, 82 C. C. A. 65, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 472, was decided. In that case the defendant had placed near plaintiff's property bunk cars occupied by laborers engaged in building a trestle. One Ayres, a subboss, who had, in the foreman's absence, charge of the men while at work on the trestle, occupied one of these cars. Some of the negro laborers regarded Ayres as in charge at night in the foreman's absence, but the evidence all showed (the court says he was, outside of regular working hours, "a free man." His car was provided with a kerosene lamp. On the night of the fire Ayres seems to have been drunk, and when fire was discovered in his car was standing at the car window making no effort to subdue the fire. The car was filled with kerosene smoke and the bedding was ablaze. It was held that plaintiff could not recover because Ayres "was not engaged in performing any duty as an employee," and defendant was, therefore, not liable, either under the common law or the South Carolina statute.

A case on the same facts (North River Ins. Co. v. Southern R. Co. 93 S. C. 358, 76 S. E. 1095) was instituted in the State court. The Supreme Court of South Carolina, on appeal from a judgment on a verdict directed for defendant, remanded the case on the ground that there was evidence in the record tending to show that Ayres [155] was the agent of defendant and acting foreman and in charge of the train at the time. Under a South Carolina statute railroads are liable for all loss resulting from the fire originating on their right of way from the acts of employees, negligent or otherwise. The evidence is not reported, simply the conclusion of the court as to its tendency to prove that Ayres was at the time on duty as defendant's employee. It does not appear, therefore, what difference the evidence showed when compared with that in Southern R. Co. v. Power Fuel Co. supra.

In this case there is no substantial evidence that Stiles was in charge of the cars or had any duty to perform except while at work on the subway. The evidence in this case, in this particular, is strikingly like that reported in Southern R. Co. v. Power Fuel Co.

Clark v. Kansas City, etc. R. Co. 129 Fed. 341, 64 C. C. A. 19, subsequently referred to, clearly affords plaintiff no support on the branch of the case now being considered. There the ground of liability was the negligent failure to prevent the spread of fire after notice of its presence in ample time to have prevented loss. It did not turn in any sense on any relation to defendant borne by those who kindled the fire.

In McLaughlin v. Cloquet Tie, etc. Co. 119 Minn. 454, 138 N. W. 434, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 544, defendant's foreman and another, by its direction, were driving a raft down a natural stream flowing through plaintiff's lands, and it became necessary, at a point near plaintiff's house, to remove from the stream a stump which interfered with their progress. To dry their clothing defendant's employees then kindled a fire which spread and destroyed plaintiff's timber, poles, etc. The court held that "the execution of the work intrusted by the defendant to its employees required them to pass over the plaintiff's land along the banks of the stream, and the defendant owed to the plaintiff the duty of exercising due care to prevent [156] injury to the plaintiff's land in the course of the work assigned to its employees. The building of the fire by the driver to dry his clothes was not, as a matter of law, a departure from the course of his employment, for it was incidentally connected therewith, and was made necessary by his going into the stream to remove the obstruction, which was a part of the work assigned to him."

The court points out the distinction between that case and Morier v. St. Paul, etc. R. Co. 31 Minn. 351, 17 N. W. 952, 47 Am. Rep. 793, saying that in the Morier case the facts were "that the employees of the defendant were engaged in repairing its railroad track and were charged with no duty outside of it. They usually went to their boarding house for their dinners, but on the day in question they brought their dinner with them, and at noon left their work, went upon the right of way and built the fire, which destroyed plaintiff's property, for the purpose of warming their coffee. These special facts distinguished that case from the one at bar."

In like manner is this case distinguished from the McLaughlin case, and for stronger reasons. The Morier case has been criticized in Baxter v. Great Northern R. Co. 73 Minn. l. c. 191, 75 N. W. 1114, but that criticism was leveled at that part of the opinion which refused judicial notice that duties of section men included the extinguishment of fire on the right of way, in some circumstances. That criticism did not affect the decision in so far as it held that in kindling the fire the section men were not acting within the scope of their employment.

Nor is the washing of clothing by employees, for themselves, such a necessity of usual modes of living that it can be said that courts can say employment of the kind shown in this case includes it as an incident and as incidental to the employment. Such a view has been taken by some courts of eating, drinking and other absolute necessities, but none, so far as we discover, [157] has applied such a rule beyond the actual necessities of living.

The cases in which servants have negligently left water running in lavatories provided for their use are not in point or of like character. They depend upon negligence in the use of conveniences furnished by the master, for both the control and use of which he is legally responsible.

There is no principle which justifies the conclusion that the men, in kindling the wash fire, were acting within the scope of their employment, and the judgment cannot be maintained on that ground.

II. There was no evidence that combustibles negligently allowed to collect on the right of way became ignited and thus communicated fire to plaintiff's wood. As a consequence there is, of course, no support for the allegation that defendant's negligence in permitting combustibles to accumulate was the proximate cause of the fire. In these circumstances the question whether there was substantial evidence of the negligent accumulation of combustible matter on the right of way need not be discussed.

III. The contention most strongly pressed by plaintiff's counsel is that by placing the bunk cars where it did, occupied as they were, the existing circumstances considered, defendant created a nuisance which caused loss to plaintiff, and must, consequently, respond in damages.

In this connection plaintiff relies upon some facts of which there is no evidence and some others which in no way contributed to the loss. These must be eliminated. The debris on the right of way, even if it be assumed there was substantial evidence of a negligent [158] accumulation of it, is negligible because it in no way contributed to plaintiff's injury; nor does the fact, if it be a fact, that the bunk cars were furnished in part consideration of the services of the laborers add anything to plaintiff's case; nor is there any evidence that the laborers were "irresponsible" in the sense in which counsel use the term; nor is there any evidence that fire used in the cars in cooking or otherwise contributed to the ignition of plaintiff's wood; nor is there evidence of "constant building fires around . . . or about" the cars, nor of the building, previously, of any fire outside the cars at the place the fire was built April 11 or at any other place by which plaintiff's property was endangered; nor is there any evidence that for any considerable time previous to the morning mentioned there had been any loose wood on plaintiff's lot.

Eliminating these things and looking to relevant facts supported by substantial evidence, it appears that plaintiff's real position is that living quarters for laborers near cordwood constitute a nuisance because the ordinary processes of living include the washing of clothes and the use of fire in that connection.

In support of their position counsel cite several decisions. Manifestly the rule that one may not, in blasting, cast stones upon his neighbor's property and escape liability for ensuing damage (Scalpino v. Smith, 154 Mo. App. l. c. 534, 135 S. W. 1000) is not applicable. In the case cited there was a direct invasion of another's right by an act defendant did or authorized to be done. Whether done negligently or with due care, defendant did it. In the use of fire ordinary care (in the absence of a controlling statute) is a defense (Berger v. Minneapolis Gaslight Co. 60 Minn. l. c. 300, 301, 62 N. W. 336), and negligence must be proved before liability for its escape arises.

Nor, for the same reason, is the rule applied in this last cited case (cited also by plaintiff) that one who [159] collects petroleum on his premises and allows it to escape and go upon those of another, is liable without regard to negligence, applicable here.

The case of Vaughan v. Menlove, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 468, 32 E. C. L. 209, is likewise inapplicable. In that case defendant stacked hay near plaintiff's cottage with notice that the condition of the hay was such that spontaneous combustion was likely. It ensued and defendant was held on the ground of his own negligence.

St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. McGrath (Tex.) 160 S. W. 444, simply applied the rule that a railway consenting to the use of its road by the engines of another was liable for loss resulting from fires negligently set out by such engines.

In Rolfe v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 69 N. H. 476, 45 Atl. 251, it was decided that heating a car to prevent the freezing of vegetables was reasonable and necessary and a part "of the actual operation of the road" and that the company could not escape liability to a third person for the destruction of his storehouse by fire resulting from negligent management of fire in the car by the shipper of the vegetables, whom it permitted to maintain the fire in consideration of his relieving the company of loss to him from the freezing of his vegetables. The court said the company could not avoid liability for damages from negligent exercise of its extraordinary powers by contracting for their exercise by some irresponsible person. In other words, it held, in effect, that defendant was negligent in the operation of its road and was liable on that ground.

In Harrington v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 143 Mo. App. 418, 128 S. W. 807, a judgment was affirmed in which the trial court found, in effect, that mules shipped in a car in which hay had been placed for bedding had been injured by reason of fire which caught from sparks, the car having been negligently placed too near the engine.

In Pratt v. Missouri Pac. Railroad, 139 Mo. App. 502, 122 S. W. 1125, a judgment was affirmed for damages for the death of a [160] switchman, killed at night by being thrown under the wheels of a car on which he was riding when it came into collision with another which a brakeman negligently stopped before it cleared the "lead track" along which the moving car was passing. This was a case of simple negligence of an employee, as was the preceding case.

In Ross v. Chester Traction Co. 224 Pa. St. 86, 73 Atl. 188, defendant was held liable for the death of a child of seven whose clothing caught fire from embers fanned into a blaze by the wind, the fire having been set out by defendant's servant acting in the scope of his employment, but negligently left by him before it died to the point of harmlessness.

The case of Marine Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 41 Fed. 643, is cited. The Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas found that about 4000 bales of cotton had accumulated, filling warehouses of a compress company and sheds not intended for storing cotton, and also being piled along and across a public street (of Little Rock) leaving only a narrow passageway for public use.

The cotton was exposed to sparks from engines, and for five weeks persons smoking cigars and cigarettes were continually passing through the narrow passageway left. The cotton had caught fire more than once previously.

The court found that defendant was responsible for the accumulation of the cotton and that the cotton in the street, in the circumstances, constituted a nuisance, and that cotton having caught fire and that fire having been communicated to the cotton insured by plaintiff, defendant was liable for damages for the loss.

On appeal a like case (St. Louis, etc. R. v. Commercial Union Ins. Co. 139 U. S. 223, 11 S. Ct. 554, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 154) was reversed for error in instructions submitting the question of defendant's responsibility for the accumulation of the cotton, and [161] subsequently the case cited was reversed on stipulation (154 U. S. 515).

Waiving the weakening effect of these matters, the case is nevertheless not authority for plaintiff's position. It may be conceded that the placing of combustible matter, such as cotton, in a public street and leaving it there for five weeks constantly exposed to fire dropped by careless passersby who several times set the cotton on fire, constituted a nuisance. The fire causing the loss was actually set by a boy lighting a cigarette (139 U. S. 223).

That is not this case. It cannot be said that bunk cars, properly constructed, are nuisances in all cases, though occupied as living quarters by laborers. Nor does it appear there was any danger of fire in plaintiff's wood in this case from any reasonable use of the cars themselves, nor that loss resulted from any use of the cars. Plaintiff's loss resulted from the negligence of the men in kindling the wash fire at a place at which, so far as the evidence shows, they had not kindled a fire previously.

The nuisance in this case, if nuisance it can be called, required the addition, to what defendant did, of the negligence of the men. Unless defendant is responsible for that in some way it is not responsible for the so-called nuisance of which that negligence is an essential element.

In the case of Marine Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. supra, the conditions which resulted in the ignition of the cotton were present and apparent when the cotton was put in the street, and the obstruction of a public street is in itself a nuisance. In this case the cars were on defendant's own property and the element which endangered and destroyed plaintiff's property was added by the negligent act of the men occupying the cars.

"The liability of a defendant for injuries caused by a nuisance depends solely upon whether it was [162] caused or continued by him" (6 Labatt on M. & S. [2 Ed.] sec. 2396) and, conversely, he must cause or continue it or he is not liable.

It is suggested that the washing of clothing is a necessary incident to ordinary modes of living and that the use of fires outside the cars was a necessary means of performing this function. No cases are cited in support of this view, though there are authorities which apply such a principle to the absolute necessities of living, such as eating, drinking, etc., but none, so far as we can find, which go to the length plaintiff's suggestion goes.

So far as the argument as to the creation of a nuisance is concerned, in this case, it is clear enough that plaintiff's position can be supported only on the theory that defendant was in some way responsible for the act of the men in kindling the fire, and this depends simply upon the question of defendant's responsibility as master. That question has already been considered.

IV. It is argued, in substance, that the fact defendant did not, before plaintiff's wood was ignited, extinguish the fire kindled by the laborers, constituted actionable negligence.

As already pointed out, defendant cannot be held responsible for the act of the men in kindling the fire in the first instance. Neither is there any evidence that dry weeds or other combustible matter on the right of way contributed to plaintiff's loss. The plaintiff is not, therefore, aided in any way by the sections of the statutes (Secs. 3150, 3151, R. S. 1909) relating to fires set out by engines and those communicated by the ignition of dry vegetation and undergrowth negligently permitted to remain on the right of way. The facts of this case do not bring it within their purview.

[163] We do not understand plaintiff to contend that a railroad company is liable in every case for damages resulting from loss from fire on its right of way originating from no act of its own, negligent or otherwise. Nor could such a contention be successfully maintained. The rule is that the owner of premises who discovers fire thereon, for the origin of which he is not responsible, is bound to use ordinary care to prevent such fire spreading to adjoining property. [Baird v. Chambers, 15 N. D. 618, 109 N. W. 61, 125 Am. St. Rep. 620, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 882]. Apply it to this case. The knowledge of the laborers of the existence of the fire they kindled on the right of way was not defendant's knowledge, for the same reason that their act in kindling the fire was not defendant's act—they were not acting for defendant or within the scope of employment by it at the time.

The only evidence that the fire was seen by any employee of defendant before plaintiff's wood caught fire is that which shows it was seen by a conductor of one of defendant's passenger trains which passed the spot at 9:25 a. m., but a few minutes before the wood caught and the fire therein got beyond control. When the conductor saw the fire he was engaged in taking his train into Kansas City; the fire was in charge of the laborers who had kindled it; the bunk cars were between it and plaintiff's wood, which was twenty-five feet away, and there was no fire other than that under the wash kettle. It does not appear that the conductor knew of any loosely piled wood upon plaintiff's lot or that any other employee or representative of defendant had knowledge of it, nor does it appear that the cordwood in ricks or stacks could reasonably have been expected to catch from sparks from the fire mentioned. The failure of the conductor to stop his passenger train to extinguish the fire under the wash kettle did not, in the circumstances, constitute negligence. There is no evidence defendant imposed any such duty upon its passenger conductors, and it would too much [164] endanger the lives of passengers, whose safety so much depends upon trains complying with their schedules, for the courts to require the stopping of passenger trains in order that those in charge might extinguish fires on the right of way, in circumstances like those in this case at least. [Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Donaldson, 73 Tex. 124, 11 S. W. 163; Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. v. Brough, 168 Ind. 378, 81 N. E. 57, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 401.] It is also clear there is no evidence the conductor had any opportunity to report the fire to defendant in time for it to have saved plaintiff's property. That phase of the case need not, therefore, be discussed.

In any view, consequently, there is no substantial evidence to support the contention that there was a negligent failure to extinguish the fire.

The case of Clark v. Kansas City, etc. R. Co. 129 Fed. 341, 64 C. C. A. 19, does not support plaintiff's position. In that case some of the facts bore considerable resemblance to those in this case. A gang or crew of laborers, housed in bunk cars, kindled fires, for washing clothes, near plaintiff's warehouse and maintained such fires all day. Defendant had notice, however, in the forenoon, of the fires and of the danger to plaintiff's property, but took no precautionary measures. The warehouse caught fire at 11 p. m., the fires first having been kindled about 9 a. m. Defendant was held liable on the ground of its failure, after "the fires became a known fact and condition on" its premises, to employ ordinary care to prevent damage to adjacent property, that question and that as to plaintiff's contributory negligence being for the jury. In that case there was notice and ample time thereafter to act. In that vital particular it differs from this case.

The judgment should be reversed. Brown, C., concurs.

PER CURIAM.—The foregoing opinion Blair, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All of the judges concur.

Rehearing denied December 31, 1914.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that railroad laborers living in "bunk cars" placed on a switch track do not act within the scope of their employment in building a fire on the right of way to heat water for the purpose of washing their clothes. The railroad company is accordingly held not to be liable for damage caused by the fire escaping from control and burning property on adjacent land. The liability of a master to a third person for damage caused by a fire started by a servant is discussed in the note to Seybold v. Eisle, Ann. Cas. 1914A 1097.

v.

McARTHUR ET AL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—January 13, 1915.

168 N. Car. 48; 84 S. E. 39.

Trial — Misconduct of Judge — Reference to Failure to Call Witness.

Where, in an action on certain notes, the alleged signatures of indorsers are claimed to be forgeries, a question by the trial judge to plaintiff's counsel as to why he did not call the maker to testify as to the genuineness of the indorsers' signatures is prejudicial error.

Handwriting — Expert Witness — Test by Other Writings.

On an issue as to the genuineness of the alleged signatures of indorsers to the notes sued on, it is error to submit to witnesses, testifying to their opinion as to the genuineness of the signatures, on cross-examination, imitated signatures made by engravers in order to test the witnesses' knowledge

[See note at end of this case.]

Photographs — Admissibility — Preliminary Proof Requisite.

On an issue as to the genuineness of the signatures of alleged indorsers of certain notes sued on, enlarged photographs of the disputed writings are inadmissible without preliminary evidence of the photographer who made them as to how and under what conditions they were taken, so that the jury might determine whether they were exact reproductions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland county: ROUNTREE, Judge.

Action by Fourth National Bank of Fayetteville, plaintiff, against Adam McArthur et al., defendants. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. REVERSED.

[49] This is an action upon two promissory notes of $10,000 each, dated 3 and 4 February, 1913, and due respectively at sixty and ninety days after their date. They were signed by J. Sprunt Newton as maker, and apparently indorsed by Adam McArthur, Newton's brother-in-law, and Mrs. M. C. McArthur, his mother-in-law. Judgment by default for want of an answer was taken against J. Sprunt Newton, and the other defendants filed answers denying the genuineness of the indorsements and averring that they never indorsed the said notes or authorized any one to do so for them, and out of this controversy the issue in the case arose.

It may be well for a proper understanding of the exceptions considered in this Court to state, in a summary way, the nature of the testimony introduced by the parties to support their respective contentions.

The plaintiff's evidence was of the following kind:

(1) Opinions of witnesses who testified that they were acquainted with the defendants' handwriting by virtue of having seen the defendants write, or their admitted signatures in the course of business prior to this controversy, and that from such a recollection they were able to form an opinion as to the genuineness of the indorsements in controversy.

(2) Opinions of witnesses who, by virtue of experience or special study, were either admitted or shown to be experts, and had thereby become qualified to compare admittedly genuine handwritings and those in dispute and give their opinion upon the disputed signatures.

(3) Other circumstances and inferences which the plaintiff attempted to use, such as statements from their witnesses as to alleged conversations with Adam McArthur about his obligations upon notes similar to these in controversy, and some of these notes referred to in the conversations the plaintiff claimed to be old notes of which the notes in controversy were renewals. These conversations were denied by Adam McArthur, and the defendants contend that there were corroborating circumstances tending to show that the denial was true. Among the above stated circumstances, the plaintiff contended that there was similarity between the signatures of the defendants admitted in the cases as standards of comparison and the signatures in controversy.

[50] On the other hand, the defendants relied upon the following kind of testimony:

(1) The statements of the defendants themselves that they did not sign their names upon the notes in controversy, which was corroborated by other testimony.

(2) The opinion of witnesses, who had known the defendants for many years, and had become acquainted with the handwriting of both of the defendants in the course of business with them, that the alleged indorsements were not genuine.

(3) The opinions of experts by comparison of the signatures in dispute with admitted standards to the effect that, in their opinion, the signatures in controversy were not genuine, and these witnesses gave many reasons, facts, and circumstances tending to corroborate their opinion, and to show before the jury how they arrived at such an opinion.

(4) Other facts and circumstances which tended to show the improbability that the defendants indorsed the said notes, such as the entire lack of consideration on the part of the defendants to become liable for the $20,000 in notes sued upon, the proceeds of the notes having been paid to other parties, and evidence that some controversy had already arisen before the date of the alleged notes which tended to put the defendants upon their guard about papers coming from the source that these notes are alleged to have come, and the evidence of good character of the defendants and their witnesses, and the dissimilarity, as shown on the standards, and the signatures in controversy.

The above statement of the nature of the evidence, rather than a summary of the evidence itself which is not necessary, was taken, substantially only, from the defendants' brief, and may not be quite as strong for or favorable to the plaintiff as, perhaps, it should be. It will, however, answer our purpose, and the defendant cannot complain of it.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendants, and from the judgment thereon plaintiff appealed.

Rose & Rose for appellant.

Shaw & MacLean and McLean, Varner & McLean for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts):—There are many exceptions in the record, thirty-two, we believe. The number could easily be reduced to less formidable proportions, without any sacrifice to the plaintiff, if we desired to do so; but as only two or three of them will be examined, we will not undertake the task of reduction, but may be permitted to suggest that counsel, in preparing assignments of error, would greatly simplify and facilitate the work of this Court if after having had the time and the opportunity to carefully examine their exceptions reserved during the hurry of the trial, some of which are necessarily made inadvisedly [51] and not upon proper or sufficient study and due deliberation, they would cull out those by a process of intelligent selection or elimination, as the case may require, and thus leave only those of real or suppose merit. This method would not only be of decided advantage to the Court by excluding immaterial matter calculated to divert attention from the main questions and relieve it of useless labor, but it would also greatly conserve the interests of the appellant by presenting his case in a more solid and compact form. We respectfully commend this admonition to our brethren of the bar, in the confident hope that they will heed it in the future preparation of appeals.

The three exceptions we will consider are these:

1. The alleged expression of opinion by his Honor, when asking the plaintiff's counsel why they did not call J. Sprunt Newton.

2. The testimony of the witness O. A. Lester as to imitations of the genuine signatures of Adam McArthur made by him, he being an expert engraver, which were used and submitted to the jury, with his explanation and illustration of them, to show that the signature of Adam McArthur was easily simulated, and also similar imitations of Mrs. McArthur's genuine signature, which were permitted to be used for the purpose of disproving the genuineness of her signature to the notes in dispute. Certain of these imitations by the engraver were handed to some of plaintiff's witnesses, among others, A. L. McGowan and S. W. Cooper, D. L. Fort and R. M. Nixon, who had testified to the signatures of the two McArthurs as being genuine. They were shown to the witnesses in an envelope, with a section of the same cut out in the lower right-hand corner, sufficient only for the purpose of exhibiting the signature itself, and not the remainder of the paper. The witnesses were then asked for their opinions as to the genuineness of those signatures, and the court allowed them to be cross-examined in regard thereto, with a view of contradicting or at least weakening their former testimony.

3. The introduction of certain enlarged photographs of the disputed signatures—known as photographic-microscopic reproductions of the same, magnified 154 times by the process of photography—for the purpose of enabling David N. Carvalho and O. A. Lester to compare or contrast them with the admittedly genuine signatures, which had not been so photographed and enlarged, and thereby show the discrepancies between the two, and otherwise to explain and illustrate their testimony as handwriting experts.

There was a vast deal of testimony in the case, and, as we have stated, numerous other exceptions, some of merit, and some having none, but the foregoing synopsis of three points will suffice for a clear apprehension of the case, so far as we will discuss it.

[52] First. We are of the opinion that the remark of the learned and unusually careful judge, in regard to calling J. Sprunt Newton, should not have been made, and was calculated, as an intimation, if not a direct expression, of opinion upon the facts, to prejudice the plaintiff, and is forbidden by the statute, which provides: "No judge, in giving a charge to the petit jury, either in a civil or criminal action, shall give an opinion as to whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven, such matter being the true office and province of the jury; but he shall state in a plain and correct manner the evidence given in the case and declare and explain the law arising thereon." There have been numerous decisions upon this statute, and this Court has shown a fixed purpose to enforce it rigidly as it is written. There must be no indication of the judge's opinion upon the facts, to the hurt of either party, either directly or indirectly, by words or conduct. The judges should be punctilious to avoid it, and to obey the statutory injunction strictly. We are absolutely sure that they fully desire to do so, and their occasional expressions which have come before this Court for review and held to be violations of the statute have evidently been inadvertent, but none the less harmful. The evil impression when once made upon the jury becomes well-nigh ineradicable. Judge Manly, who was one of the most eminent and just of our judges, said in State v. Dick, 60 N. C. 440, 86 Am. Dec. 439: "He (the presiding judge) endeavored to obviate the effect of his opinion by announcing in distinct terms the jury's independence of him; but this was not practicable for him to do. The opinion had been expressed and was incapable of being recalled. The object (of the statute) is not to inform the jury of their province, but to guard them against any invasion of it. The division of our courts of record into two departments—the one for the judging of the law, the other for the judging of the facts—is a matter lying on the surface of our judicature, and is known to everybody. It was not information on this subject the Legislature intended to furnish, but their purpose was to lay down an inflexible rule of practice, that the judge of the law should not undertake to decide the facts. If he cannot do so directly, he cannot indirectly; if not explicitly, he cannot by innuendo. What we take to be the inadvertence of the judge, therefore, was not cured of its illicit character by the information which he immediately conveyed. The error is one of the casualties which may happen to the most circumspect in the progress of a trial on the circuit. When once committed, however, it was irrevocable, and the prisoner was entitled to have his case tried by another jury." And to the same effect did Justice Hoke speak in State v. Cook, 162 N. C. 586, 77 S. E. 759, citing and approving State v. Dick: "The learned and usually careful judge was evidently conscious that he had probably and by inadvertence prejudiced the prisoner's case, for he added: 'But the court has no right to express an opinion about [53] the case,' but the forbidden impression had already been made, and as to the vital portion of the prisoner's plea, and on authority, the attempted correction by his Honor must be held inefficient for the purpose." So in State v. Ownby, 146 N. C. 678, 61 S. E. 630, we said: "The slightest intimation from a judge as to the strength of the evidence or as to the credibility of a witness will always have great weight with the jury, and therefore we must be careful to see that neither party is unduly prejudiced by an expression from the bench which is likely to prevent a fair and impartial trial." And again in the same case: "We know that his Honor unguardedly commented upon the testimony of the witnesses, but when the prejudicial remark is made inadvertently, it invalidates the verdict as much so as if used intentionally. The probable effect or influence upon the jury, and not the motive of the judge, determines whether the party whose right to a fair trial has thus been impaired is entitled to another trial." Like views and cautionary requests to the judges were stated in Withers v. Lane, 133 N. C. 184, 56 S. E. 855: "The learned and able judge who presided at the trial, inspired, no doubt, by a laudable motive and a profound sense of justice, was perhaps too zealous that what he conceived to be right should prevail; but just here the law, conscious of the frailty of human nature at its best, both on the bench and in the jury box, intervenes and imposes its restraint upon the judge, enjoining strictly that he shall not in any manner sway the jury by imparting to them the slightest knowledge of his opinion of the case." The case of Perry v. Perry, 144 N. C. 330, 57 S. E. 1, repeats this injunction to observe the mandate of the statute, for it is there said: "Any remarks by the presiding judge, made in the presence of the jury, which have a tendency to prejudice their minds against the unsuccessful party, will afford ground for a reversal of the judgment." It is very strongly and urgently reiterated in Park v. Exum, 156 N. C. 228, 72 S. E. 309, as follows: "The Court has always been swift to enforce obedience to our law which forbids a presiding judge to express an opinion on the disputed facts of the trial, and under numerous decisions construing the statute, we must hold this remark of his Honor, in the presence of the jury and before the verdict, to be reversible error."

We have not cited these cases for the purpose of adjudging that plaintiff can avail itself of what was said by the judge during the trial of this case, but to again emphasize the imperative necessity of keeping the statute steadily in mind and freeing trials of an adverse or injurious intimation of opinion, to the end that there may be such a fair and impartial trial as is guaranteed by the Constitution and enforced by the statute. Many more cases could be cited to illustrate the great importance of this matter, but we omit any reference to them for the obvious reason that those mentioned are quite sufficient for the purpose. It is true, we have [54] held that where, by the nature of the case, a party is called upon to prove or disprove a fact material to his success, and the witness who, if anybody, can testify to it, is accessible to him, the failure to produce and examine him is a proper subject of comment before the jury (Powell v. Strickland, 163 N. C. 393, Ann. Cas. 1915B 709, 79 S. E. 872; Goodman v. Sapp, 102 N. C. 477, 9 S. E. 483); but this, of course, meant comment of counsel and not of the judge, whose slightest intimation as to whether a fact has been found or not will have the greatest weight with the jury. It is not necessary to decide whether plaintiff was prompt and diligent enough in the protection of its rights to now take advantage of this slip of the judge, as we will order a new trial upon another point. It may be that he has, under the circumstances; but we leave the question undecided.

Second. Our opinion is that there was error in permitting the witness of the plaintiff to be cross-examined in regard to the signatures which were written or engraved by Mr. Lester and exhibited to them through the aperture made in the envelope, without showing the rest of the paper in which the signature was written, it being called in this case, rather facetiously, though not inappropriately, the "cat-hole test." These papers should not have been admitted at all. They tended to introduce collateral questions; to multiply the issues, in fact, though perhaps not in form; to divert the minds of the jurors from the real and only question to be decided; to confuse them in their deliberations and to put the witness to an unfair disadvantage and to entrap him unwarily, and also to take the plaintiff by surprise and deprive him of a fair opportunity to know the general nature of the evidence, so that he may prepare to meet it. It tends more to muddy the waters, like the cuttle-fish, than to advance the purpose for which all judicial procedure is adopted, and that is, to conduct the trial so as to establish the truth and to adjudicate rights according to the pertinent and determinative facts, and always to adhere closely to the issue upon which the decision should turn. It was well said in Hardy v. Harbin, 154 U. S. 598, 14 S. Ct. 1172, 22 L. ed. 378, 1 Sawy. 194, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,059, that, taken at its best, evidence of experts by comparison of handwriting is very unreliable. And in Adams v. Field, 21 Vt. 256: "Those having much experience in the trial of questions depending upon the genuineness of handwriting will not require to be reminded that there is nothing in the whole range of the law of evidence more unreliable, or where courts and juries are more liable to be imposed upon." Expert testimony is permissible in such cases, but it is not always the best proof of which the matter is susceptible, and its efficiency and probative force is sometimes easily magnified, and by it the truth is deftly concealed. It, therefore, follows that all proper precautions should be taken to prevent impositions upon the court and jury. Hoag v. Wright, 174 N. Y. 36, 66 N. E. 579, 63 L.R.A. 163; U. S. v. Pendergast, 32 Fed. 198.

[55] We may remark imprimis, and for the purpose of showing the application of the authorities hereinafter cited, that it was not competent to submit specimens of the admittedly genuine and the disputed papers to the jury for their independent examination, before the passage of our recent statute. The old and strict rule had been somewhat relaxed before then, by allowing the witness to hand the papers to the jury—the standards and the questioned documents—and explain the similarities and the dissimilarities to them, so as to illustrate his own testimony and the reasons for his opinion. Fuller v. Fox, 101 N. C. 119, 7 S. E. 589; Martin v. Knight, 147 N. C. 564, 61 S. E. 447; Nicholson v. Eureka Lumber Co. 156 N. C. 59, 72 S. E. 86, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162; Thomas v. State, 18 Tex. App. 213. But this was the extreme limit, beyond which the party was not allowed to go. The statute changes the rule, but is so carefully and explicitly worded as to exclude by clear implication the examination of any papers but those admitted to be genuine, as standards or models of the true handwriting, and the writings in dispute. It provides: "In all trials in this State, when it may otherwise be competent and relevant to compare handwritings, a comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine shall be permitted to be made by witnesses, and such writings and the evidence of the witnesses respecting the same may be submitted to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the writing in dispute." Before the enactment of this law, this Court held, in Tunstall v. Cobb, 109 N. C. 316, 14 S. E. 28, and other cases, that the investigation must be restricted to the writings that are genuine and those alleged to be spurious, and that other writings, not of this class, should be excluded in making the comparison. We are aware that there has been some conflict of authority upon this question, but in the midst of all the differing notions about it, we prefer, as we have the choice, not only to abide by the language of our statute as being restrictive in its nature, but to adopt what is said in Rogers on Expert Testimony (2 ed.), p. 342, sec. 144, which is as follows: "The question has been raised whether it is competent on cross-examination to test the knowledge of the witness by showing him real and fictitious signatures and asking him to say which of them are genuine. In those States where a comparison is only allowed to be made with writings which are admitted to be genuine, it is evident that such a comparison should not be allowed except both parties are agreed which of the signatures are real and which false, for unless so agreed, side issues are raised which complicate the case. The rule which excludes writings not admittedly genuine applies with as much force to the cross-examination as to the direct examination. To admit such writings would lead, as well in the one case as in the other, to an indefinite number of collateral issues, and would operate as a surprise to the opposite [56] party, who would not know what writings were to be produced, and therefore could not be prepared to meet them," citing Howard v. Patrick, 43 Mich. 121, 128, 5 N. W. 84; Rose v. Springfield First Nat. Bank, 91 Mo. 399, 3 S. W. 876, 60 Am. Rep. 258; Massey v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 104 Ill. 327; Hilsley v. Palmer, 32 Hun. (N. Y.) 472 (1884); Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439, which support the text. See also Dietz v. Grand Rapids Fourth Nat. Bank, 69 Mich. 287, 289, 37 N. W. 220. The case of Hilsley v. Palmer, supra, is an interesting one and decisive of this one, if we follow it as authority and adopt its conclusions, and we do not see why we should not, as it is of a very persuasive character, by reason of its clear statement and strong reasoning.

The New York Court of Appeals has considered this question in at least one famous and hotly contested case, People v. Patrick, 182 N. Y. 175, 74 N. E. 843, in which, with its usual convincing logic, it demonstrates the unfairness of this kind of examination when applied to an opinion witness, that is, one who testifies from actual knowledge of the handwriting in question, or his familiarity with it acquired by business intercourse or other association with its supposed author, and concludes that "it was obviously an unfair test," and then says: "It is to be observed that Harmon was called upon to testify, by reason of his competency to form an opinion from long acquaintance with the handwriting of the deceased, and not by reason of his being a professional expert in handwriting or penmanship. I think the question is distinguishable, upon the facts, from that passed upon in Hoag v. Wright, 174 N. Y. 36." The case of Hoag v. Wright, supra, was distinguished from People v. Patrick because in the former the witness was an acknowledged expert in handwriting, and we suppose was, therefore, thought to be able to take care of himself, and to be better acquainted with the "tricks of the trade." The law is well stated in Andrews v. Hayden, 88 Ky. 455, 459, 11 S. W. 428: "The admissions of these spurious signatures, prepared by an experienced expert, for the purpose of being presented to the witnesses for the plaintiff, was manifestly wrong. They were executed with such skill as to deceive any ordinary observer, or those having no other experience than their familiarity with their neighbor and his handwriting. Such writings should have been excluded because tending to obstruct the proper administration of the law, and deceiving, by the skill in their execution, the minds of honest men. It was neither a just nor legal test, and threw no light on the issue presented." A strong case favoring this view is Wilmington Sav. Bank v. Waste, 76 Vt. 331, 336, 57 Atl. 241, where the Court held that, in cross-examination, it was competent for the defendant, for the purpose of testing the correctness of the witness's judgment, to show him signatures of the defendant conceded or proved to be genuine; but this was the limit of comparison.

[57] The defendant examined the witness as though he were an expert, when he was not. His testimony was directly upon the question whether or not the signature upon the note in suit was genuine. But if the witness had been an expert the rule required that a standard of comparison should be established before he could be examined by the use of signatures made for the purpose of the trial. It appears that the signature upon another note in evidence was conceded to be the defendant's, but the exceptions do not show that it was used in the cross-examination. The witness was required to select from the three papers the genuine signatures of the defendant, and then the papers went to the jury. It was error to permit this course of examination and to allow the papers to be submitted to the jury. Sanderson v. Osgood, 52 Vt. 309; Rowell v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 688, 10 Atl. 853; Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 352; Abbott's Trial Ev. (2 ed.) 488, 489.

Speaking of collateral writings, the Court in State v. Minton, 116 Mo. 605, 614, 22 S. W. 808, said: "They were no part of the record in the case, not admitted to be in the handwriting of either one of the defendants, and clearly inadmissible for the purpose of comparison."

While we have noted that there is some conflict, we yet think the weight of authority, and the rule of reason, is in favor of the plaintiff's contention and against the court's ruling. We add to the authorities already cited the following: Thomas v. State, 18 Tex. App. 213, approved by repeated decisions in that Court; Wigmore on Evidence, secs. 1996, 2001, and 2002; King v. Donahue, 110 Mass. 155, 14 Am. Rep. 589; Sanderson v. Osgood, 52 Vt. 309; U. S. v. Chamberlain, 12 Blatchf. 390, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,778; Gaunt v. Harkness, 53 Kan. 405, 36 Pac. 739, 42 Am. St. Rep. 297; Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439; Hornellsville First Nat. Bank v. Hyland, 53 Hun 108, 6 N. Y. S. 87; Rose v. Springfield First Nat. Bank, 91 Mo. 399, 3 S. W. 828, 60 Am. Rep. 258. And analogous cases are: State v. Griswold, 67 Conn. 290, 34 Atl. 1046, 33 L.R.A. 227; Bacon v. Williams, 13 Gray (Mass.) 525; Kirksey v. Kirksey, 41 Ala. 636; Howard v. Patrick, 43 Mich. 128, 5 N. W. 84; People v. Murphy, 135 N. Y. 455, 32 N. E. 138; Fogg v. Dennis, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 48. In Rose v. Springfield First Nat. Bank, supra, the Court said: "The rule which includes extrinsic papers and signatures is substantially the same in the direct and cross-examination. Papers not relevant as evidence to the other issues are excluded mainly on the ground that to admit such documents would lead to an indefinite number of collateral issues, and would operate as a surprise upon the other party, who would not know what documents were to be produced. The reason of the rule applies to the cross-examination with as much force as to the direct examination. The signature should have been excluded, whether used to test the witness as an expert or to test his knowledge of the handwriting of the plaintiff." Wigmore on Ev. at sections 1996, and 2001, 2002, subsec. 2, says: "The specimens, to afford a fairly trustworthy inference, must of course be genuine. But, [58] furthermore, the process of proving their genuineness may result (as in the case of the expert's use of them) in a multiplicity and confusion of issues. The specimens submitted to the jury must be genuine." 2 Elliott on Ev. sec. 1105, says: "In those jurisdictions where there are no statutes regulating the admission of opinions as to a comparison of handwriting three distinct rules seem to prevail. In a few jurisdictions the rule is that the opinions of experts based on any comparison are improper; in other jurisdictions the rule is that opinions are admissible in case the writings to be compared are in evidence for another purpose and admitted to be genuine; and the third rule is that opinions of experts are admissible as in the rule immediately preceding and, in addition, on writings whose genuineness has been proved on the trial for the express purpose of comparison. The reason given for holding that the only papers that can be used in such an examination of an expert are those which have been brought into the case for another purpose is that such a limitation is necessary in order to avoid the evil of collateral issues, the danger of fraud in selecting specimens, and the danger of misleading the jury." It is perfectly clear that evidence of this kind may be liable to abuse, and so manipulated or used as to give the jury a false impression as to the real value of a witness's testimony. It is dangerous, to say the least of it, and may tend more to suppress than to disclose the truth. The limitation may be made so perfect as to mislead a trained expert, and it seems from the books that this has sometimes been done. How, even, can a mere opinion witness be expected to stand the ordeal of such an examination, without the benefit even of a tithe of the expert's study and experience, if the latter fails? It shows the necessity of confining the examination to the genuine specimens and the disputed writings.

The above authorities, or some of them, also hold that it is incompetent to introduce such imitations of the genuine signature for the purpose of showing how easily it may be forged or counterfeited. Thomas v. State, 18 Tex. App. 213. And in Hickory v. U. S. 151 U. S. 306, 14 S. Ct. 334, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 170, the Court said: "In the absence of statute, papers irrelevant to the issues on the record were held not receivable in evidence at the trial for the mere purpose of enabling the jury or witnesses to institute a comparison of hands. Bromage v. Rice, 7 C. & P. 548, 32 E. C. L. 625; Doe v. Newton, 5 Ad. and El. 514, 31 E. C. L. 382; Griffits v. Ivery, 11 Ad. & El. 322, 39 E. C. L. 104; 1 Greenleaf Ev. sec. 580. The danger of fraud or surprise and the multiplication of collateral issues were deemed insuperable objections, although not applicable to papers already in the cause, in respect of which, also, comparison by the jury could not be avoided."

Third. The enlarged photographs of the disputed writings should not have been used, at least without proving, by the man who made them, how and under what conditions they were taken by him, so as to let the [59] jury finally decide, from the facts, whether they are exact reproductions. It was held in Paducah First Nat. Bank v. Wisdom, 111 Ky.

148, 63 S. W. 467, that such enlargements of the signatures should be authenticated by the photographer. In Tome v. Parkersburg Branch R. Co. 39 Md. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 540, it is said, with reference to this subject: "The testimony of the photographer comes within the same principle as that of Paine. It was offered to establish the forgery of the certificates in controversy, by comparing them with copies (obtained by photographic processes, either magnified or of natural size) of certain signatures assumed or admitted to be genuine, and pointing out the differences between the supposed genuine and the disputed signatures. As a general rule, in proportion as the media of evidence are multiplied, the chances of error or mistake are increased. Photographers do not always produce exact facsimiles of the objects delineated, and however indebted we may be to that beautiful science for much that is useful as well as ornamental, it is at least a mimetic art, which furnishes only secondary impressions of the original, that vary according to the lights and shadows which prevail whilst being taken." This principle has been sanctioned by the following authorities: Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 41, 50, 37 Am. Rep. 538; Merchants, etc. Cotton Oil Co. v. Cufkin Nat. Bank, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 555, 79 S. W. 651; Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 56 Ohio St. 385, 47 N. E. 249, 43 L.R.A. 777; New York Fifth Ave. Bank v. Forty-Second St. etc. Ferry R. Co. 137 N. Y. 242, 33 N. E. 378, 33 Am. St. Rep. 712, 19 L.R.A. 331; Houston v. Blythe, 60 Tex. 512; Eborn v. Zempelmann, 47 Tex. 513, 26 Am. Rep. 315; Howard v. Illinois Trust, etc. Bank, 189 Ill. 577; Smith v. Martin, 135 Cal. 251, 67 Pac. 779; Healy v. Defiance City Bank, 160 Ill. App. 637; Erb v. Great Western R. Co. 42 U. C. Q. B. 90; Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Wilkens, 44 Md. 27, 22 Am. Rep. 26; Harrison v. Annapolis, etc. R. Co. 50 Md. 513; Western Maryland R. Co. v. Franklin Bank, 60 Md. 42, 48; Burrows v. Klunk, 70 Md. 460, 17 Atl. 378, 14 Am. St. Rep. 371, 3 L.R.A. 576; Barabasz v. Kabat, 86 Md. 34; Lamm v. Port Deposit Homestead Assoc. 49 Md. 241, 33 Am. Rep. 246; New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Swain, 100 Md. 575, 60 Atl. 469; Moore v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 111 U. S. 169, 4 S. Ct. 345, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 385.

The Court said in Hynes v. McDermott, supra: "It would be carrying the matter much farther to permit an expert to compare photographic copies of signatures, and therefrom to testify as to the genuineness of a disputed signature. We may recognize that the photographic process is ruled by general laws that are uniform in their operation, and that almost without exception a likeness is brought forth of the object set before the camera. Still, somewhat for exact likeness will depend upon the adjustment of the machinery, upon the atmospheric conditions, and the skill of the manipulator. And in so delicate a matter as the reaching of judicial results by the comparison of writings through the testimony of experts, it ought to be required that the witness should exercise his acumen upon the thing itself which is to be the basis of his judgment; and still more, that the thing itself should be at hand, to be put under the eye of other witnesses for the trial upon it of their skill. The certainty of expert testimony in these cases is not so well assured as that we can [60] afford to let in the hazard of errors or differences in copying, though it be done by howsoever a scientific process. Besides, as before said, there was no proof here of the manner and exactness of the photographic method used. It was right not to receive Loader's evidence as that of an expert." The courts that have allowed this kind of evidence have generally held that both the admittedly genuine signature and the one in dispute shall be alike photographed and the testimony of the photographer taken as to the accuracy of the method pursued by him and the results obtained. U. S. v. Ortiz, 176 U. S. 422, 20 S. Ct. 466, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 529, and other cases supra.

It is not necessary now to say more upon this question, as the deficiencies in the proof may be easily supplied. All we decide is that the photographic copies were not admissible in the then state of the evidence, and no more.

There are other errors assigned, which seem to have merit in them, but we will refrain from any further reference to them, as they may not occur again. For those already indicated, a new trial is ordered.

New trial.

IV. Rule in New York, 1073.

I. Introductory.

The purpose of the present note is to review the cases deciding the specific question whether it is competent or allowable to test a handwriting witness by the use of a writing other than that the genuineness of which is in issue. This question is not to be confused with that of proving handwriting by comparison, although as the note shows, the law in that regard is probably the basis of, or at least has influenced, the law as to testing witnesses by other writings. Therefore cases concerning proof by comparison of handwritings are excluded unless they involve the specific question of testing the witness. Cases in which the person whose handwriting is in issue is on the stand and is asked to write his name or to give a specimen of his handwriting are also excluded as turning on the question of comparison of handwriting, rather than on the question of testing the witness. The decisions on the question herein treated are inharmonious, especial conflict being found where the question arises in the case of an expert witness. For the reason that more uniformity is to be found in the rulings as to the testing of a nonexpert witness, the two classes of cases are treated separately, although no decision has been found which points out any clear reason for a difference between the rule as to experts and that as to nonexperts.

II. Nonexpert Witness.1. USE OF IRRELEVANT OR DISPUTED WRITING.a. View Rejecting Test.

It is the rule in a majority of the jurisdictions that a nonexpert witness, testifying as to the genuineness of a writing in question, may not, on cross-examination, be tested as to his knowledge of the questioned chirography by the use of other writings which have not been admitted or proved to be genuine writings of the person whose handwriting is in dispute. Griffits v. Ivery, 11 Ad. & El. 322, 39 E. C. L. 104; Massey v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 104 Ill. 327; Andrews v. Hayden, 88 Ky. 455, 11 S. W. 428; Bacon v. Williams, 13 Gray (Mass.) 525; Howard v. Patrick, 43 Mich. 121, 5 N. W. 84; Fogg v. Dennis, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 47; Wilmington Sav. Bank v. Waste, 76 Vt. 331, 57 Atl. 241; Pierce v. Northey, 14 Wis. 10.

And a further general rule, which is really a part of or an incident to the foregoing rule, is that a nonexpert handwriting witness may not be tested on cross-examination by eliciting his opinion as to the genuineness of other writings not in evidence and irrelevant to the cause at issue. Griffits v. Ivery, 11 Ad. & El. 322, 39 E. C. L. 104; Hughes v. Rogers, 8 M. & W. (Eng.) 123, 10 L. J. Exch. 238; Gleeson v. Wallace, 4 U. C. Q. B. 245; McDonald v. McDonald, 142 Ind. 55, 41 N. E. 340; Howard v. Patrick, 43 Mich. 128, 5 N. W. 84; Rose v. Springfield First Nat. Bank, 91 Mo. 399, 3 S. W. 876, 60 Am. Rep. 258; Fogg v. Dennis, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 47. See also Melvin v. Hodges, 71 Ill. 424. And see the reported case. Compare Royal Canadian Bank v. Brown, 27 U. C. Q. B. 41.

The practical identity of the two rules is shown by the fact that they have in some cases been stated as one, viz., that it is incompetent to test a nonexpert handwriting witness by the use of other writings irrelevant to the cause, or not in evidence, unless they are proved or admitted to be genuine. Griffits v. Ivery, 11 Ad. & El. 322, 39 E. C. L. 104; McDonald v. McDonald, 142 Ind. 55, 41 N. E. 340.

The principal reason for the rule that a witness may not be tested by the use of irrelevant writings, or writings not proved or admitted to be genuine, is that to allow that method of testing the witness raises collateral issues as to the genuineness of the writings used for the test, and the rule is based on the strong administrative policy against allowing collateral issues to be raised. Griffits v. Ivery, 11 Ad. & El. 322, 39 E. C. L. 104; Hughes v. Rogers, 8 M. & W. (Eng.) 123, 10 L. J. Exch. 238; Bacon v. Williams, 13 Gray (Mass.) 525; Howard v. Patrick, 43 Mich. 121, 5 N. W. 84; Rose v. Springfield First Nat. Bank, 91 Mo. 399, 3 S. W. 876, 60 Am. Rep. 258. See also Melvin v. Hodges, 71 Ill. 424. Thus in Bacon v. Williams, supra, it was said: "If disputed signatures were admissible for the purpose of trying the correctness of the opinions of witnesses, a collateral inquiry would be raised concerning each signature so offered, and a case might be filled with issues aside from the real question before the jury. In the present case, the signature offered to the witness was neither proved nor admitted to be in the handwriting of the plaintiff, nor did the defendant purpose to show that it was his genuine signature. The evidence was therefore rightly excluded." And in Rose v. Springfield First Nat. Bank, 3 S. W. 876, 60 Am. Rep. 258, the court said: "The rule which excludes extrinsic papers and signatures is substantially the same in the direct and cross examination.

. . . Papers not a part of the case and not relevant, as evidence to the other issues, are excluded mainly on the ground that, to admit such documents would lead to an indefinite number of collateral issues, and would operate as a surprise upon the other party, who would not know what documents were to be produced, and, hence, could not be prepared to meet them. The reason of the rule applies to the cross-examination with as much force as to the direct examination. The signatures should have been excluded, whether used to test the witness as an expert, or to test his knowledge of the handwriting of the plaintiff."

The leading case holding that a nonexpert witness may not be tested on cross-examination by questioning him as to the genuineness of other writings not relevant to the case and not proved to be genuine is Griffiths v. Ivery, 11 Ad. & El. 322, 39 E. C. L. 104, which shows that the rule grew, not only out of the policy of preventing collateral issues, but also out of the rule of evidence against proof by comparison of handwritings. It was reasoned in that case that to submit the witness to such a test would involve an incidental examination by the jury of the irrelevant writings, thus violating both the rule against the comparison with such writings and the rule against the raising of collateral issues. It was said per Coleridge, J.: "The case comes within the rule laid down in Doe v. Newton, 5 Ad. & El. 514 [31 E. C. L. 382]. We must not allow papers which are not evidence in the cause to be let in for any purpose whatever. It is said that this was offered merely for the purpose of trying the knowledge of the witnesses; but the inquiry would not stop there. It would be impossible to keep from the jury questions, whether this or that paper was or was not in fact written by the party."

In Hughes v. Rogers, 8 M. & W. (Eng.) 123, 10 L. J. Exch. 238, it was held to be incompetent, when a nonexpert has testified as to handwriting, to put into his hands another paper, not in evidence in the cause, to elicit his opinion as to the genuineness thereof, as a test of his knowledge, and then to introduce testimony to contradict him, since this is to raise a collateral issue.

But, it has been held in England that the rule of Griffiths v. Ivery, 11 Ad. & El. 322, 39 E. C. L. 104, has no application where a witness testifies that the handwriting in question is not genuine, basing his judgment on the fact of a peculiarity in the person's manner of writing his name, and is then handed a signature not showing that peculiarity, which he admits is genuine; though the court were of the opinion that if the witness had denied the genuineness of the test signature it could not have been shown because that would have raised a collateral issue. See Young v. Honner, 2 M. & Rob. (Eng.) 536, wherein the following facts appeared: "A witness called for the defendant swore he believed the signature not to be the genuine signature of the defendant; and as a reason for that belief he added, that the defendant always signed his name thus—'R. W. Honner.' Upon this Lee, for the plaintiff, in cross-examining the witness, put into his hands a document purporting to be signed 'Robert Honner,' and asked him whether he believed it to be the genuine signature of the defendant: and on his answering in the affirmative, he was asked whether the document was not signed 'Robert Honner' and whether, after seeing that document, he would persevere in saying that the defendant always signed his name 'R. W. Honner?' The document was not in any way relevant to the present issue. The judge objected that this course of cross-examination was not allowable, and insisted that it was merely instituting a comparison of handwriting; he cited Doe v. Suckermore and Griffiths v. Ivery." The reported decision is as follows: "Alderson, B. (after consulting the other Barons, who were sitting in banco) said the court was unanimously of opinion that the cross-examination, as far as it had been pursued, was regular, and that the question objected to might be properly put. His Lordship added that they could not subscribe to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Griffiths v. Ivery; but the inconvenience there suggested, viz., that the jury would have to try various collateral issues, did not arise here, for the witness had himself admitted the document now put into his hands to be genuine; and surely, if the peculiarity existed in it which he relied upon, as disproving the genuineness of the signature now in dispute, that must be a circumstance by which to test the value of his belief on the subject. But if the witness had denied the genuineness of the signature to the document now put into his hands, he should not have allowed any issue to be raised upon that point."

The ruling of the leading English cases that a witness may not be tested by the use of irrelevant writings not admitted or proved to be genuine, was followed in the case of Gleeson v. Wallace, 4 U. C. Q. B. 245, which case seems, however, to turn rather on the admissibility of the writing in evidence than on the competency of the manner of testing the witness. But in a later case in the same court the test was allowed. Royal Canadian Bank v. Brown, 27 U. C. Q. B. 41, wherein it appeared that no question as to the test was made but the question was whether, after the test had been made, the writings used for the test were evidence for the jury generally, and it was held that, being admissible for the purpose of the test, i. e., to impeach the witness, they were admissible generally. The court said: "The issue was, whether the defendant indorsed the note in suit? Frisby, the defendant's witness, after stating his knowledge of the defendant's handwriting, expressed his opinion that the indorsement was not defendant's signature. A paper was shown to him—not then proved to be genuine, and certainly not direct evidence on the issue, for nothing but the defendant's name was written on it twice—and he was asked if he thought the writing was the defendant's, and he said he thought not. Afterwards the evidence in reply was received, after objection made and overruled that this was evidence to support the issue which was on the plaintiffs, and therefore could not be given in reply. We think the objection was properly overruled. But then the jury had to form their conclusion as to the value of Frisby's evidence, and, as appears to us, the paper which he said did not contain the defendant's signature, but which was satisfactorily proved to contain it, should have been submitted to their inspection to enable them to put a right estimate upon his evidence as to the indorsement. If this was, as Mr. Paterson asserts, withheld from them, we are not prepared to uphold the ruling. Nor have we been able to satisfy ourselves that if this paper was admissible as evidence for any purpose, it was not evidence generally in the cause."

In Massey v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 104 Ill. 327, it was held to be incompetent to test a nonexpert witness by submitting to him sixteen signatures of the name of the person whose handwriting was in issue, these signatures having been specially prepared and arranged for the test. The court said: "One Gattton, a witness for plaintiff, testified that some years before, he had seen Henderson E. Massey write, and that it was his impression that the signature of the name of said Massey to the note in question was in his handwriting. After then stating, on cross-examination, that it was six or seven years since he saw Massey write, and that he did not know whether he would know his signature now, and did not know that 'he could pick out his signature in the bank,' defendant's counsel handed the witness a paper having written on it the name 'H. E. Massey' sixteen times, and asked the witness to point out the genuine signatures, if any were genuine. The court excluded the question, and exception is taken to this. It is urged that this question was proper on cross-examination, for the purpose of testing the knowledge of the witness, and as authority therefore reference is made to 1 Wharton on Evidence, sec. 710, where the author says: 'There is little question that a witness may, on cross-examination, be tested by putting to him other writings not admitted in evidence in the case, and asking him whether such writings are in the same hand with that in litigation.' Without stopping to inquire as to the general correctness of this observation, and especially where the rule obtains, as in this state, that evidence of the genuineness of handwriting, based on comparison of hands, is not admissible, we think that at least with reference to test papers got up for the occasion, as in the present case, there was no error in not allowing the course of cross-examination proposed. The same author, further on, in section 715, remarks: 'We have already seen that a party cannot make testimony for himself by writing specimens for the instruction of witnesses afterwards to be called, as to his handwriting. By the same reasoning a party cannot be permitted to get up in this way test papers to be used subsequently for comparison of hands.' And although the paper here offered was not to be used professedly for comparison of hands, we think its admission for the purpose declared would be alike objectionable."

In Fogg v. Dennis, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 47, the court said: "One of his [the testator's] sons, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that he was acquainted with the peculiar manner of making his mark for his signature, by often seeing him do it—and that he was of opinion that the mark in the present case affixed to the signature was his father's. The counsel for defendant then offered to submit to the inspection of the witness, what purported to be other signatures of his father without having admitted or shown them to be genuine or otherwise, for the purpose of asking him whether they were his signatures or not. This was refused by the court. At a subsequent part of the trial, the defendant offered to prove, that these papers which had no relation to the case were in fact signed by the father, which was refused by the court. And it is insisted in argument here, that in these respects, the court erred. The counsel for the defendant disclaiming all right to have contradicted the testimony of the witness by a comparison of signatures; yet insists that to test the knowledge or the truth of the witness, he had a right to submit to him signatures either spurious or genuine, and ask his opinion of them. To this we can by no means agree. It would lead in practice to much inconvenience and confusion, not to say, trickery and imposition—and after all could not attain the end proposed, that is, show to the jury the ignorance or falsehood of the witness as to the handwriting, without submitting to the jury the inspection and comparison of those other writings. This is an answer to the whole case."

In Wilmington Sav. Bank v. Waste, 76 Vt. 331, 57 Atl. 241, it was said: "The plaintiff called Martin A. Brown as a witness, who testified that he was familiar with the signature of the defendant, that he had seen him write, and that in his opinion the signature upon the note was the defendant's. In cross-examination the defendant showed the witness a paper which had the name 'C. H. Waste' written upon it ten times, in connection with an offer to show later in the trial that certain of the signatures upon the paper were the defendant's. The defendant was permitted to cross-examine the witness as to whether in his opinion any of the ten signatures were in the defendant's handwriting, and if so, which ones; whether any of them were not in the defendant's handwriting, and how many handwritings there were upon the paper. The defendant showed the witness two other papers of the same character and used them for the same purpose, and the three papers were admitted in evidence. In cross-examination it was competent for the defendant, for the purpose of testing the correctness of the witness's judgment, to show him signatures of the defendant conceded or proved to be genuine, but this was the limit of comparison. . . . The defendant examined the witness as though he were an expert, when he was not. His testimony was directly upon the question whether or not the signature upon the note in suit was genuine. But if the witness had been an expert the rule required that a standard of comparison should be established before he could be examined by the use of signatures made for the purpose of the trial. . . . It appears that the signature upon another note in evidence was conceded to be the defendant's, but the exceptions do not show that it was used in the cross-examination. The witness was required to select from the three papers the genuine signatures of the defendant, and then the papers went to the jury. It was error not to permit this course of examination and to allow the papers to be submitted to the jury."

The case of Pierce v. Northey, 14 Wis. 10, apparently involved a test of a nonexpert witness, for, although the decision does not disclose whether the witness was an expert or a nonexpert, no question of his status as an expert appears to have been raised. It was held to be an improper test to submit to the witness signatures later shown to have been fabricated, in imitation of the signature in question, for the purpose of deceiving the witness. The court said: "If they were generally admitted, the opposite party would often be taken by surprise. He would be unprepared, in case he were disposed and able to do so, to establish either the authenticity or the falsehood of the signatures, by a comparison with which it was proposed to test the genuineness of that which was denied. And another and more cogent ground of objection would seem to be, that it would open the door to great frauds and unfairness in the selections to be made. Experiments might be tried and selections made for the very purpose of tricking and deceiving the witnesses and the jury. No better exemplification of the force and correctness of this ground of objection could be found than that furnished by the facts of the present case. The papers offered were mere slips, having upon them the name of the party only, and these names were copied by others, from his genuine signature, by means of colored impression paper. They were, of course, facsimiles of the genuine, and because the witnesses testified that they believed them to be genuine, other witnesses were introduced to show that they were not, and thus to impeach their knowledge and credibility. A more naked and wanton trick, devised to entrap and impose upon the witnesses and jury, could not well be imagined; and although it was exposed in this instance, it shows the danger of receiving such papers in evidence."

Even in a jurisdiction in which proof by comparison of handwritings is allowed it has been held that it is incompetent to test a nonexpert handwriting witness by submitting to him a number of expertly imitated spurious signatures, intermingled with genuine signatures, and requiring him to select the genuine from the spurious. Andrews v. Hayden, 88 Ky. 455, 11 S. W. 428, wherein the court said: "When witnesses were examined by the appellant touching the genuineness of the handwriting of Hayden to the note in controversy, and who were his neighbors and some of them familiar with his handwriting, a number of spurious signatures to writings were intermingled with writings containing the genuine signature of the intestate, and on cross-examination the witnesses for the plaintiff were asked to select from those writings such as contained the genuine signatures of Hayden. This they failed in some instances to do, and, in fact, it would have been difficult for the most experienced expert to have detected the difference between the genuine and spurious signatures. This mode of testing the knowledge of the witnesses as to the handwriting of the intestate was objected to by the appellant at the time, and his objections were disregarded. Prior to the Act of May 17, 1886, the rule of evidence in this state forbade the proof of handwriting by comparison, but under that act such evidence is now competent, with certain restrictions. The genuineness of the writing with which the signature or writing in controversy is to be compared, 'should be proved to the satisfaction of the judge by other than opinion evidence.' It must also appear to the satisfaction of the judge that the writings offered for comparison 'were written before any controversy arose as to the genuineness of the writing in dispute, and that no fraud was practiced in their selection.' The party proposing to introduce such writings must give reasonable notice of his intention to the opposite party or his attorney, with reasonable opportunity to examine them before the commencement of the trial. The admission of these spurious signatures, prepared by an experienced expert, for the purpose of being presented to the witnesses for the plaintiff, was manifestly wrong. They were executed with such skill as to deceive any ordinary observer, or those having no other experience than their familiarity with their neighbor and his handwriting. Such writings should have been excluded because tending to obstruct the proper administration of the law, and deceiving, by the skill in their execution, the minds of honest men. It was neither a just nor legal test, and threw no light on the issue presented."

It has also been held that a nonexpert witness may not be tested by a question as to what opinion the witness had expressed at a former time, as to the genuineness of other writings, since that would be to raise a collateral issue. Nuckols v. Jones, 8 Grat. (Va.) 267, wherein it was said: "The question before the jury was whether the paper offered for probate was in the handwriting of the deceased; any statements made at another time by the witness touching the matter in issue and contradicting her evidence in chief in regard to the paper, to the handwriting of which she had deposed, would have been proper as tending to impeach the credit of the witness. But what she may have said about any other paper at any other time, having no relation to the paper offered for probate, was a distinct collateral fact, as to which she could not be examined for the purpose of impeaching her testimony by contradicting her, nor was it competent after such question was put and answered to adduce evidence to contradict the answer."

In West v. State, 22 N. J. L. 212, while the court did not go to the length of holding a test by other writings to be inadmissible, it did hold that when it is sought to test a nonexpert handwriting witness by showing him an instrument in writing, partially covered up, and only a part of which is visible, it is not error for the trial court to require that the witness should be shown the whole writing. The court said: "The fourth exception is, that on a cross-examination, by the defendant, of a witness on the part of the state, and who had testified that the deed alleged to be forged was in the handwriting of the defendant, the witness was shown an instrument of writing, a part of the writing being covered and concealed by a piece of newspaper tied over it, and was asked by the counsel of the defendant if the portion of the writing that was visible was West's, the defendant's. To the question and mode of exhibiting the paper, the counsel of the state objected. The court sustained the objection, and decided that the paper must be so shown that the witness could see the whole of the writing. In this there was no error. It does not clearly appear for what purpose the evidence was offered. It may have been to prove the instrument shown, for the purpose of offering it in evidence, or it may have been, as was probably the case, for the purpose of testing the value of the witness's opinion in respect to the handwriting of West, and discrediting him before the jury. If the former were the object, the witness could form and express his opinion only upon the whole writing. If the latter, the better opinion seems to be, that the party was entitled to lay the paper before the jury, to form their opinion as to the testimony of the witness, and therefore the whole paper should be shown. For the jury should not judge, from the inspection of the entire instrument, of the value of the opinion of a witness who has only seen a part of it."

b. View Allowing Test.

While there are a number of cases allowing a test of a nonexpert witness, by the use of other writings, which may be harmonized with the foregoing majority rule by drawing the distinction between the use of writings not admitted or proved to be genuine and the use of writings concerning the genuineness of which no question is raised, there are a few cases allowing the test which are not so susceptible of being distinguished on the facts, and which must, therefore, be considered as establishing a minority rule. Kirksey v. Kirksey, 41 Ala. 626; Groff v. Groff, 209 Pa. St. 603, 59 Atl. 65. Thus in the case first cited it was held to be admissible, in order to test the capacity of a nonexpert witness who had testified as to the genuineness of a disputed chirography, to show the witness a signature purporting to be that of the person whose handwriting was in issue, covering part of the signature and the paper on which it appeared, and to elicit the witness's opinion as to its genuineness. The court said: "The first assignment of error raises the question, whether, in a case involving the genuineness of the signature of the maker of a promissory note, which is the foundation of the suit or controversy, a witness may be shown a signature of the maker to another instrument, purporting to have been signed by him, and, concealing a part of the name from the witness, asked, in whose handwriting is the part shown him. The appellants objected to the question being asked, 'unless the whole name shown to the witness.' Without deciding whether such evidence is admissible on the issue made up in this case, as that question is not raised by the exception, we hold, that it only raises the point, whether the witness should have been allowed to testify as to a part of the name of Isaac Kirksey, without seeing it all. The phrase, 'unless the whole name [was] shown to the witness,' serves to point out a specific objection; and the party excepting must be held to that, as the ground of his objection. If it had been admissible to make such proof in this case, we can see no reason why it was not permissible for a party to show the witness a part of the signature, concealing the balance, and ask him in whose handwriting the part shown was. Such a mode of examination may be allowable, to test the capacity of the witness to testify to the handwriting of the supposed maker of the instrument, or for other purposes."

In Groff v. Groff, 209 Pa. St. 603, 59 Atl. 65, it was held that when a nonexpert witness categorically asserts that he is so well acquainted with the signature of a person that he can judge as to the genuineness of an isolated signature, it is competent cross-examination for counsel to test him by the method referred to in the reported case as the "cat hole test," that is by showing him a number of signatures through apertures in an envelope, so that the other parts of the writings are hid, and eliciting his judgment as to the genuineness of those signatures. The court said: "Then, on cross-examination, counsel for plaintiff, declaring his purpose to test the extent of witness's ability to form such a judgment as he professed to possess, exhibited to him a paper on which was written the name 'Solomon C. Groff' which was placed inside an envelope, but so that through an aperture cut in the envelope the entire name could be plainly seen, and asked, 'In your judgment is that Solomon C. Groff's genuine signature?' Sometimes the witness answered it was, and at times that it was forgery. Quite often it was shown the witness was mistaken. Counsel for defendant strenuously objected to the method of cross-examination as unfair to the witness, because he was not called as an expert in handwriting but only as one familiar with the signature of Solomon C. Groff, and as such a witness he was entitled to have placed before him the whole paper containing the signature. This would have been a good objection if the witness's knowledge had been limited to a sight of the signature on a check, bill, note, bond or other such writing; the jury would have known that his familiarity with the signature was not thorough, but limited, and would have given it weight accordingly. But notice the scope of the witness's knowledge as stated by himself. That he might not misunderstand, the court itself in one instance put the question thus: 'Do you understand the question? Have you such a knowledge of this decedent's handwriting, that on being presented with a signature purporting to be his you could say on sight whether it is his or not? That is the question. Answer. Yes sir, I could form a judgment.' In every other instance either the counsel or the court put before the witness substantially the same question when the isolated name 'Solomon C. Groff' was placed before the eyes of the witness. From the mistaken answers it is clear that in most cases the witness had no such extensive or thorough knowledge of the signature as he professed. This was not untruthfulness, but to use a common term, it was only because many of the witnesses thought themselves 'smarter' than they really were; but there was no deception or unfairness, as argued, in this method of cross-examination when the real purpose is considered. If the witness had answered, 'I could distinguish the signature if I saw it appended to a note or check or other document, but standing by itself I could not be sure,' the court would doubtless have sustained the objection of defendants' counsel, but as the record stands, we see no error in the court's rulings." In Page v. Homans, 14 Me. 478, it was held not to have been reversible error for the trial court to allow a test of the knowledge of a nonexpert handwriting witness by the use of skillfully imitated signatures, although the trial court might in its discretion have excluded the test, as raising a collateral issue. The court said: "The question in issue was the genuineness of a disputed signature. A witness, acquainted with the handwriting of the party sought to be charged, testified that he believed it to be his. The defendant was permitted to prove that signatures could be so perfectly imitated by an adroit penman as to render detection extremely difficult. We do not regard it as clear that such testimony did not bear upon the issue, and was not proper for the consideration of the jury in determining the weight of evidence depending upon resemblance, whether deduced from a standard of comparison in the mind of a witness, or from genuine signatures before them. Such resemblance may generally be satisfactory. But if signatures proved to be spurious, may have a resemblance equally striking, it may not be sufficient to over-balance facts and circumstances, calculated to throw suspicion upon the integrity of the instrument in controversy. That a resemblance is so far from being conclusive evidence upon this point, that it may be altogether delusive, was proved by the testimony of the two witnesses taken together. The jury were called upon to find the signature genuine, because such was the opinion of the witness. We are not prepared to determine, that the admission of testimony fairly calculated to test the accuracy of his judgment, or the force of his conclusions, in regard to handwriting, if it may be deemed collateral in its character, is an objection sufficiently important to require that the verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted."

2. USE OF UNDISPUTED OR PROVED WRITING.

It is a generally accepted rule that a writing admitted or proved to be in the genuine handwriting of the person whose signature or writing is in question, or a writing as to the genuineness of which no question is or can be made, may be used to test the knowledge or accuracy of a nonexpert handwriting witness. Melvin v. Hodges, 71 Ill. 422; Bevan v. Atlanta Nat. Bank, 142 Ill. 302, 31 N. E. 679, reversing 39 Ill. App. 577; Wentz v. Black, 75 N. C. 491; State v. Hopkins, 50 Vt. 316. Compare Fogg v. Dennis, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 47. In Melvin v. Hodges, supra, it was held that where a witness qualifies by having often seen the person whose signature is in question write, it is competent to test his reliability, and the accuracy of the mental exemplar formed by seeing the person write, by having the witness examine the person's signature attached to a plea filed in the cause, as to the genuineness of which signature there is no question. The court said: "The present case, however, is quite different. The witness had testified, on his direct examination, that he was well acquainted with Melvin; that he had gone to school with him in Tennessee; had seen him write often; was well acquainted with his writing when young; was absent from him for eighteen years; had known him and seen him write during the last four years, and would not take the signature to the note to be his handwriting. The signature to the plea was not in controversy, nor was its genuineness questioned. The object in having the witness to examine this signature, was not to prove a signature by comparison, but to test the accuracy of the witness's memory. Had there been any question as to the genuineness of the signature to the plea, it would certainly not have been competent to have asked the witness whether it was Melvin's signature or not, with a view of contradicting him, as that would have raised a collateral issue, entirely irrelevant to the case. But the signature being admitted, no such issue could be raised; and the only effect the examination could have, would be to enable the witness to determine how accurate and reliable was the impression of Melvin's signature, as fixed in his memory, with the view of confirming or modifying his previously expressed opinion in regard to the signature in controversy."

In Bevan v. Atlanta Nat. Bank, 142 Ill. 302, 31 N. E. 679, reversing 39 Ill. App. 577, it appeared that the witness had seen the person whose handwriting was in question sign other notes and, from the mental exemplar formed by that experience, testified as to the genuineness of the writing in question; and that counsel produced the notes which the witness had seen signed, and sought to test the witness by them. The trial court sustained an objection to the test, but the court on appeal held that it was competent cross-examination, and should have been allowed there being no question as to the genuineness of the signatures on which the mental exemplar had been formed. The court said: "In many cases, in order to ascertain the truth and arrive at a correct result, it is necessary that considerable latitude be given on the cross-examination of witnesses, in order to test the accuracy of their evidence. The genuineness of the signatures to the several notes to which the attention of the witnesses was called was not in controversy, and the purpose was not to prove a signature by comparison, but, as was done in Melvin v. Hodges, 71 Ill. 425, to test the accuracy of the witness's opinion or judgment, which had, in the direct examination, gone to the jury. If the witnesses called by the plaintiff to prove that the signature of Mrs. Williams on the note in question was genuine, predicated their judgment, in whole or in part, upon signatures to notes they saw her sign, and the signatures to those notes differed from the signature to the note in question, it seems plain that the defendant had the right to call out that fact in cross-examination, as it was a fact proper for the consideration of the jury in determining what weight they should give the opinions of the witnesses who gave their opinion that the note was genuine."

In Wentz v. Black, 75 N. C. 491, it was held that when a nonexpert witness has testified as to the genuineness of handwriting and the counsel for the party calling him has submitted to him other genuine signatures in the same handwriting, for the purpose of comparison, it is competent for opposing counsel on cross-examination, to submit to the witness still other signatures admitted to be genuine for the purpose of testing the comparison. It was said by the court: "The witness, Elliott, had his opinion, not on the general character of Black's handwriting, but on a difference in the letter 'K' from his usual signature. After the defendant's counsel had fortified his witness by exhibiting to him two genuine signatures, it surely was only fair play to permit the plaintiff's counsel to attack him by exhibiting to the witness other signatures of Black, admitted to be genuine, either to make him change his opinion or to weaken his confidence in it, so that from his manner the jury could see that his opinion was not to be relied on. This was fair, and there is no rule of evidence to the contrary."

In State v. Hopkins, 50 Vt. 316, the court said: "The state introduced Charles Calderwood as a witness, who testified, from his knowledge of the handwriting of Green, that in his opinion the signature upon the draft was a forgery. In his cross-examination the witness was shown a signature of Green's which had been used upon the trial, and which was acknowledged to be genuine, and was asked to point out the difference between that signature and the signature of Green upon the draft. Upon objection being made by the state, the court ruled that the question was inadmissible, upon the ground that the witness was not an expert. That ruling we think was erroneous. The weight to be given to the opinion of a witness who bases his opinion upon familiarity with handwriting depends largely upon the extent of his familiarity: and for the purpose of testing that and his ability to distinguish between a signature that is claimed to be forged and one that has been used upon the trial and is acknowledged to be genuine, it is the right of the party accused of committing the forgery to inquire of the witness what difference there is between the two signatures."

In Fogg v. Dennis, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 47, there is a dictum to the effect that even though the writings used for the test are proved to be genuine before the test is made, the testing of the witness by them is not allowable. The court said: "But if the writings in question had been proved to be genuine previously to the offer to examine the witness with regard to them, we are of opinion that it would not be proper. If the witness had been of opinion that such genuine signatures were not those of the testator, the inference of ignorance and inaccuracy to be drawn from such circumstance could have been fairly repelled by the introduction of other genuine signatures which the witness might adopt. This would lead to innumerable examinations; and after all, the degree of credit the jury should yield to the witness is entirely uncertain, unless they could inspect and compare the several documents produced."

In a jurisdiction in which it is admissible to prove signatures by comparison with writings admitted to be genuine, or which are in the case for any purpose, a fortiori a nonexpert handwriting witness may be tested by submitting to him signatures of the person signed to pleadings and affidavits filed in the cause. Tucker v. Hyatt, 144 Ind. 635, 41 N. E. 1407, 43 N. E. 872, wherein the court said: "The appellant produced three witnesses, Albert L. Keysecker, his wife, Lugarda Keysecker, and Joseph Tillman, who each testified that they were acquainted with the handwriting of the appellee, and that the signature to the release was her genuine signature. On the cross-examination of these witnesses, the court permitted appellee's counsel, over the objection of appellant, to place in the hands of the witnesses the appellee's affidavit for a change of venue and her verified reply of non est factum, and have the witnesses compare appellee's signatures to those papers with the signature of the release. It is claimed that this was error. . . . We think there can be little doubt that in this state, after some fluctuation in our decisions, the rule is, that any writings admitted to be genuine, or writings which are properly papers in the case for any purpose, may be used, by way of comparison, to prove, or disprove, the genuineness of the writing in dispute. . . . The writings used for comparison in the case at bar, being the affidavit of appellee for a change of venue, made and signed by her long before the release in dispute was brought into the record by appellant, and her verified reply, were both 'papers in the case;' papers, too, which the appellant on the trial admitted were 'before the jury for all purposes,' and, under the rule above stated, it was not error to allow these papers to be used by the witnesses, on cross-examination, to compare the signatures of appellee thereto with the signature to the release."

3. WITNESS'S OWN WRITING IN ISSUE.

Where the person whose chirography is in issue is himself the witness as to his own writing, the majority of courts hold that he may be tested as to his knowledge of, or ability to identify, his own writing by the use of other writings, whether relevant or irrelevant to the cause, or whether proved to be genuine or disputed. Birmingham First Nat. Bank v. Allen, 100 Ala. 476, 489, 14 So. 335, 46 Am. St. Rep. 80, 27 L.R.A. 426; Neal v. Neal, 58 Cal. 287; Brown v. Woodward, 75 Conn. 254, 53 Atl. 112. Compare Loving v. Warren County, 1 Ky. L. Rep. (abstract) 340.

In Birmingham First Nat. Bank v. Allen, supra, it was held that where the person whose name is signed is the witness as to the genuineness of that signature, it is admissible to test his ability to identify his own signature by submitting to him certain signatures, some of which have been admitted by him to be genuine, others of which are forgeries. The court said in that case: "The defendant took some of the checks found on the person of Tomlin, and which were forgeries, and others admitted to be genuine, and arranged them, so that nothing but the signatures of the drawer could be seen, and plaintiff was requested to point out the genuine and false checks. The plaintiff objected to this evidence and the court sustained the objection. We think this testimony admissible. It is a circumstance that the jury or court should consider in weighing his evidence. The inability of the plaintiff to distinguish the true from the false signatures would not be conclusive against him. He might be able to show by other evidence that certain checks were forged, although he could not himself determine the question by an examination of the signature. Doubtless in many cases a person's name is so skilfully forged, that he could not distinguish it from his own proper signature, and yet, he may know from the amount, or payee, or other facts, absolutely that the instrument was forged. We think however the fact that he cannot distinguish a signature which he admits to be genuine, from that alleged to be false is a circumstance. The rule which prohibits a non-expert from giving an opinion based upon a comparison of handwriting has no application where the party whose name is signed, is himself being examined as to whether the signature in question is his signature or not."

In Neal v. Neal, 58 Cal. 287, it was held that in such a case it is admissible to hand the witness a document purporting to have been signed by him, which has already been used in the case for comparison, and to ask him if that is his signature. It was said by the court: "A document which purported to have been signed by him [the defendant] and had been used in the case for comparison was handed to him by the counsel of plaintiff, who asked him the following question: 'Look at this signature, "Joseph W. Neal," and state whether that is your genuine signature?' To the question counsel for defendant objected on the ground that it was not legitimate cross-examination, and the objection was sustained. We think the ruling was erroneous. The question was, doubtless, asked for the purpose of testing the accuracy and judgment of the defendant, as a witness, as to his own signature, which constituted the subject-matter of his direct examination. It was, therefore, responsive to the examination in chief. A witness may be asked on his cross-examination any question which tends to test his accuracy, veracity, or credibility. . . . Especially should courts be liberal in cross-examination of a witness who is himself a party to the suit. It may be that the answer of the witness to the question propounded would have satisfied the jury that the witness was mistaken when he testified that his signature to the instrument in controversy was not genuine. At all events plaintiff's counsel had the right on cross-examination to test the ability and judgment of the witness upon the subject of his own signature."

In Brown v. Woodward, 75 Conn. 254, 53 Atl. 112, it was held to be admissible when the person whose writing is disputed is on the stand, to show him a board to which are fastened several documents purporting to be signed by him, but so covered that only the signatures are visible, and to ask him, for the purpose of cross-examination, which of the signatures are genuine. The court said: "Charles E. Woodward having testified, as before stated, that the signature upon the note was not his, counsel for plaintiff upon cross-examination showed him a board, upon which were various written instruments signed with his name, and over which instruments a paper was so placed that only the signatures were visible, and against the objection of the defendant that the witness should be permitted to see documents to which the signatures were attached, allowed plaintiff's counsel to inquire as to the genuineness of the several signatures. The finding states that 'the witness testified that some of the signatures were genuine and some were not,' and that the paper having been removed in the presence of the court and jury the witness was again inquired of as to the genuineness of each signature, and that some of the signatures he admitted to be genuine, some he denied.' . . . The witness having testified, apparently from an inspection of the signature to the note, that it was not his handwriting, his ability to identify his own handwriting was a proper subject of cross-examination. If, for that purpose only, he was asked if certain signatures, other than that upon the note, were his, he was not entitled as a matter of right, or of fair treatment, to see the documents to which they were attached, before answering. When a witness may properly be thus asked whether various signatures shown him are genuine, the trial court should always see to it that he has a perfectly fair opportunity to fully examine them, before being required to answer. Just how the documents upon which the signatures are attached should be shown to the witness is largely a matter of discretion with the trial court. While we express no approval of the method permitted in the present case, we are unable to say from the record that such discretion was improperly exercised, or that the defendant could have been prejudiced from the manner in which the examination was conducted."

In Loving v. Warren County, 1 Ky. L. Rep. (abstract) 340, however, the contrary rule was laid down and it was held to be incompetent to test a witness's knowledge as to his own handwriting by requiring him, from a number of signatures of his own name, some genuine, others imitated, to point out the genuine. The report of that case was as follows: "The issue herein was whether the county judge had signed certain bonds. He was produced as a witness to prove his handwriting. On cross-examination he was shown a number of signatures of his own name; some genuine, others imitated, and was required to point out the genuine. Held—proving handwriting—that this was an unfair test . . . very few persons other than experts observe their own signatures or handwriting so closely as not to be deceived by imitations written for the purpose of misleading."

It has also been held that where a witness is testifying as to his own handwriting, it is competent to test his accuracy by submitting to him his name as signed in a hotel register, if he does not question the genuineness of the signature in the register. Hobart v. Van Aernam, 146 Ill. App. 1, wherein it was said: "It was claimed on behalf of appellant that the signature appearing upon the hotel register did not present the point of difference between the signature to the order and his genuine signature as testified to by the witness, and that the question was competent for the purpose of refreshing the recollection of the witness and as tending to test the accuracy of his statement made upon direct examination. For this purpose we think the question was competent, and that the court erred in sustaining the objection thereto. Bevan v. Atlanta Nat. Bank, 142 Ill. 302. If the witness had denied that the signature upon the local register was in his handwriting, no further examination of the witness upon that subject would have been proper, but if the witness had answered the question in the affirmative and admitted that the signature upon the hotel register was in his handwriting, counsel for appellant could have pursued a line of cross-examination for the purpose indicated."

III. Expert Witness.

1. USE OF IRRELEVANT OR DISPUTED WRITING.

a. View Rejecting Test.

The authorities are irreconcilably divided as to the question of whether an expert handwriting witness's knowledge and accuracy may be tested on cross-examination by the use of other writings than those in issue.

In a majority of the jurisdictions the rule is laid down that an expert handwriting witness may not be tested by submitting to him, and eliciting his opinion as to the genuineness of, other writings not admitted or proved to be genuine. McArthur v. Citizens' Bank, 223 Fed. 1004, 137 C. C. A. 380; Gaunt v. Harkness, 53 Kan. 405, 36 Pac. 739, 42 Am. St. Rep. 297; Underwood v. Quantic, 85 Kan. 111, 116 Pac. 361; Tyler v. Todd, 36 Conn. 218.

In Underwood v. Quantic, supra, it was held to be incompetent to test an expert by submitting to him signatures purporting to be those of the person whose handwriting is in question, but which are shown to have been fabricated by counsel for the purpose of testing and, if possible, deceiving the witness. The court said: "The plaintiff called a number of expert witnesses who testified that in their opinion the indorsement of Cress was genuine. The court permitted the attorney for the defendants, in cross-examination of these witnesses, to ask them concerning the genuineness of several signatures of Cress written on a sheet of paper, and afterward permitted the attorney to testify that some of these signatures were written by himself. This brought into the case a collateral issue and was error. The precise point was decided in Gaunt v. Harkness, 53 Kan. 405, 36 Pac. 739, 42 Am. St. Rep. 297, where the question is discussed, and this manner of cross-examining expert witnesses respecting the genuineness of a signature was held to be reversible error."

And it has been held to be incompetent to test the knowledge of an expert in handwriting by placing before him irrelevant papers, for the mere purpose of contradicting his testimony as to the handwriting thereof. U. S. v. Chamberlain, 12 Blatchf. 390, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14, 778; State v. Griswold, 67 Conn. 290, 34 Atl. 1046.

The reason for the rule excluding that method of testing the witness is to be found in the administrative rule against the raising of collateral issues. Tyler v. Todd, 36 Conn. 222; State v. Griswold, 67 Conn. 290, 34 Atl. 1046, 33 L.R.A. 227; Underwood v. Quantic, 85 Kan. 111, 116 Pac. 361. In State v. Griswold, supra, the court said: "The questions asked in cross-examination of the witnesses Ames and Fairbanks were properly excluded, and for the reason assigned by the trial court: that they would raise a collateral issue. Take one instance to illustrate all: The witness Fairbanks was shown a collection of slips of paper, on each of which there was handwriting, and he was asked, 'How many handwritings do you find there?" These pieces of paper had not been in the case; the writing on them was not admitted or claimed to be that of the defendant or of the witness Jackson. Any possible answer that the witness might have given to the question would have been utterly meaningless, unless other evidence was admitted to show that the answer was incorrect."

b. View Allowing Test.

In at least two jurisdictions it has been held that writings neither admitted nor proved to be genuine, and even though irrelevant otherwise, may be used to test an expert handwriting witness. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 12 S. E. 18; Browning v. Gosnell, 91 Ia. 448, 59 N. W. 340. Thus in the case first cited it was quite broadly held that an expert may be tested on cross-examination by the submission to him of incomplete or mutilated copies which are neither admitted nor proved to be genuine, no matter by whom written, and that neither the witness nor opposing counsel are entitled to know who wrote the specimens, whether they are genuine or not, or what writings will be used. The court said: "One of the questions which arose during the trial . . . was whether certain letters, purporting to be written by Horton, were in the same handwriting as certain other documents, which latter were written by Sheppard. On this question experts were examined by defendant, and to test their skill the plaintiff's counsel interrogated them upon certain incomplete or mutilated writings which were partial copies by another hand of documents which Sheppard had written though that the copies were written by another and not by Sheppard was not avowed or proved until this test examination was concluded. These copies being some of the writings to which the expert testimony applied, and being proved to be copies not written by Sheppard, were admitted in evidence, to which defendant objected because they were not proved to be genuine nor submitted to defendant before the announcement of ready, and because they had been mutilated by plaintiff's counsel in presence of the court by cutting off matter which was neither submitted to defendant's counsel nor tendered in evidence. The purpose of the experiment was to show that the experts were not reliable; that they would mistake writings not done by Sheppard for writing which he had done. The whole object of the test would have been defeated, had other proof been required that the documents were genuine before they could be used. By what color of right could the defendant claim to see or known anything of them before the trial commenced? And why should not scraps and fragments be used to test the experts on the mere question of manual or mechanical execution? The contents or completeness of the writings had no evidentiary relation to the hand in which they were written. The complaint that plaintiff's counsel was allowed to fold the papers and exhibit to one of the experts only the part exposed, and the further complaint that he was allowed to exhibit them to him at all for comparison with the genuine writings or other writings attributed to Sheppard, are both without merit, for the reason that to test the skill of the expert, it was reasonable and proper to grant to counsel a wide and liberal discretion in the use of means and methods. The same observation applies to cutting off and withholding such parts of the papers as counsel wished to conceal, the papers being his own and not then having been offered in evidence."

In Browning v. Gosnell, 91 Ia. 448, 59 N. W. 340, the court held that it was competent to test an expert handwriting witness by submitting a number of slips, prepared for the occasion, some of them bearing genuine, and others imitated, signatures of the person whose handwriting was in question, and requiring the witness to select the genuine from the spurious. It was said: "We think it is proper, when a witness testifies to the genuineness of a handwriting or signature, to test the value of his evidence thoroughly, and for that purpose he may be asked to give his opinion as to the genuineness of signatures which are prepared for that purpose, and in the handwriting of any person. Opinions as to the genuineness of handwriting are, at best, weak and unsatisfactory evidence, and every reasonable opportunity should be afforded, on cross-examination, to test the value of the opinion of the witness, and we know of no better way than was resorted to in this case. Generally, testimony as to the genuineness of handwriting is the nearest guesswork. Of necessity, it is admitted, because, often, no other evidence is attainable. But it should be open always to full investigation on cross-examination, for thus only can its utter unreliability, in many cases, be established."

2. USE OF UNDISPUTED WRITING.

An expert may be tested on cross-examination by eliciting his opinion as to the genuineness of signatures appended to pleadings filed in the cause, the signatures being so folded down that the witness cannot know what the instruments are. Brown v. Chenoworth, 51 Tex. 469, 477, wherein the court said: "Ben Brown, one of the defendants, was put on the stand by the counsel for himself and E. A. Brown, and testified that he never signed the note sued on; that he and

E. A. Brown paid for the Kaufman county lands in cash, and never gave a note to J. S. Able for the purchase money; that he believed the signature of his codefendant E. A. Brown was not genuine, and that the note was in the handwriting of Joseph S. Able. Plaintiff's counsel then took the plea of non est factum filed by appellants in this case and signed by them, and also the depositions of the witnesses B. Brown and E. A. Brown, taken in the case, and turned down the signatures 'B. Brown' and 'E. A. Brown' on the plea of non est factum so that the signatures alone were visible to the witness, and then asked him if he signed said paper, and whether his brother, E. A. Brown, signed the same. Witness answered that he did not think that either of said signatures was his or his brother's. Counsel for plaintiff also turned down the signature 'B. Brown' to his depositions so that the signature alone was visible to witness, and asked him if that was his signature, and he replied that he did not think that it was. The same course was pursued by plaintiff's counsel, while cross-examining the witness, with reference to the genuineness of the signatures 'B. Brown' and 'E. A. Brown' attached to a receipt from B. Brown to J. S. Able, and first and second answers in chancery, made in the United States court at Austin and sworn to by B. Brown and E. A. Brown. . . . The witness not only testified as to his own signature, but, unlike the case of the North American F. Ins. Co. v. Throop, 22 Mich. 160, he also gave his opinion as to that of E. A. Brown and as to the handwriting of Joseph S. Able, thus making himself an expert. We think, under the general rule of practice, that the opposite party should have considerable latitude, on the cross-examination, to ascertain the accuracy of the knowledge, skill, and judgment of the witness; and that, under the circumstances, the test was not an unreasonable one, and particularly as on re-examination the witness had the opportunity of explanation with the papers exhibited in full before him." It will be noticed that the court in that case assumed to treat the witness as an expert, simply because he expressed his opinion as to the signatures of the other Brown and of Able. In this the court appears to have fallen into the error of thinking that any witness expressing an opinion as to handwriting is ipso facto an expert. A nonexpert witness however, may testify as to his opinion, basing it on a comparison with a mental exemplar formed by personal knowledge of the handwriting of the person whose signature is in issue; [see the cases cited supra, in subdivision II. Non-expert Witness] an expert gives his opinion based on a direct comparison or on a comparison with a mental exemplar formed by examination of admitted signatures. In the foregoing case it appears that the witness was in business with the other Brown and Able, knew them personally, and must have been testifying from personal and empiric rather than from expert knowledge of their handwritings.

It is competent to test an expert on cross-examination by eliciting his opinion as to the genuineness of two other signatures purporting to have been made by the person whose handwriting is in question, one of which is admitted by him to be genuine, the other of which was signed for him by another person at his direction. Johnston Harvester Co. v. Miller, 72 Mich. 265, 40 N. W. 429, 16 Am. St. Rep. 536, wherein it was said: "Two experts in handwriting, both of whom had never seen defendant write, were examined, and, from a comparison between the signature to the note in suit and signatures of Miller in the case admitted to be genuine, gave their opinion that the defendant signed the note. To test the value of their evidence, the counsel for the defense asked them to make comparisons between two signatures of the witness Reynolds in the case—one admitted by him to be genuine, and the other claimed by him to have been written by another than himself, but by his authority and direction. One saw a very close similarity between the letters 'yn' in the two signatures, while the other, not seeing this, insisted that the 'lds' were very much alike. The object evidently was to show the fallibility and unreliable character of the testimony. The plaintiff's counsel insists that this was error, and invokes the rule that a writing, the genuineness of which is disputed, cannot be used to test his accuracy. We do not think the rule applies in this instance. It was not claimed that one of these signatures was the genuine signature of Reynolds; but it was used, as not being his signature, in comparison with his admitted signature, for the express purpose of ascertaining what was the value of the opinions of these experts. We know of no rule prohibiting such a test, when the writings are properly in the case as they were here. The sequel showed that the opinions of the experts were of but little worth, and we are not disposed to limit or confine the opportunities for testing and determining the accuracy and value of expert evidence. These men were testifying entirely from comparisons, and it was competent by the comparison thus made upon cross-examination to show that they differed radically in their views of the similarity of letters, and that one as well as both might be easily mistaken in their assumptions from a comparison of signatures. The fact that the witnesses did not know whether the signatures were made by one man or two but added to the value of the test."

IV. Rule in New York.

It is not clear what the state of the law of New York is as to the testing of handwriting witnesses by other writings. The cases are in conflict. Earlier cases have been in part overruled by later decisions but it is difficult to ascertain to just what extent.

It seems clear that the law formerly was to the effect that it was incompetent to test a handwriting witness by eliciting his opinion as to collateral writings. Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439; Commonwealth Bank v. Mudgett, 44 N. Y. 514, affirming 45 Barb. 663; Hoyt v. Stuart, 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 447. In Commonwealth Bank v. Mudgett, supra, the court said: "Counsel for the defendant produced a number of checks on a bank, which, it was alleged, were drawn by him, and proposed to inquire of certain witnesses whether the signatures to them were in the handwriting of Mr. Mudgett. The court refused to allow the inquiry; and the defendant's counsel excepted. It is said that the inquiry was not for the purpose of comparison, which would be inadmissible, nor for exhibition to the jury; but for the purpose of testing the knowledge and accuracy of the witnesses. Two of the witnesses were produced by the plaintiff, and were then on cross-examination. It could be no test, unless other witnesses were so called to prove their genuineness. No precedent can be found for such a test. If allowed to call witnesses to prove these checks, others might be called by the plaintiff to prove the contrary. Such a proceeding would involve the trial of an issue wholly collateral to the main question. If the witnesses should pronounce them to be genuine, the evidence would be wholly immaterial, or would then degenerate to a comparison of signatures, and, perhaps, to their exhibition to jurors not expert in handwriting. If the witnesses said, on the contrary, that they were not genuine, it would be inadmissible to contradict them, on such a collateral issue, by showing that they were, in fact, genuine."

In a later case it seems to have been deemed competent to cross-examine expert witnesses by submitting to them a number of writings in evidence and eliciting their opinions as to the genuineness of those writings, but it was, however, held to be incompetent to introduce, thereupon, testimony to show that the specimens so submitted to the expert were not genuine, because this would multiply collateral issues. People v. Murphy, 135 N. Y. 450, 32 N. E. 138, wherein it was said: "Upon the cross-examination of the expert witnesses for the prosecution, the defendant, for the purpose of testing the accuracy of their judgment, submitted to them nine different specimens of handwriting, and each was asked to compare them with the letters and the specimens put in evidence by the people, and to say whether in his opinion, they were in the same handwriting. Each gave a different answer, and with two exceptions, each testified that some of the specimens were written by the same person who wrote the letters and the other specimens; but no two witnesses agreed as to the particular specimens which were so written. The defendant then offered to prove that these nine specimens were not in the handwriting of the defendant, but were written by his brother, and the evidence was excluded. We can discover no error in this ruling. It was a collateral matter properly used for the purposes of a cross-examination, and the defendant was bound by the replies of the witness to the questions put. It served as an impressive warning to the jury to closely scrutinize the expert evidence, because of the want of concurrence of judgment on the part of the witnesses when they were required to compare the letters with specimens, of whose authorship they were ignorant; and, to that extent, the cross-examination was valuable and proper, although it must rest somewhat in the sound discretion of the trial court to determine how far it shall be carried. But the defendant could not be permitted to go farther and to litigate the immaterial issue of the authenticity of the additional specimens submitted by him for such a purpose. . . . It would give rise to a multiplicity of collateral issues which might render the litigation interminable; for the people would have the right to disprove if they could the testimony offered, and by a comparison of handwriting show that these specimens were not written by the defendant's brother."

The earlier rule has been changed, however, by the case of Hoag v. Wright, 174 N. Y. 36, 66 N. E. 579, 63 L.R.A. 163, in so far as that case is inconsistent with the earlier cases, for the court in that case specifically limited the decisions in People v. Murphy, 135 N. Y. 450, 32 N. E. 138, and in Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439, in so far as inconsistent with the case at bar. The specific ruling in Hoag v. Wright was that after an expert had testified as to the genuineness of a disputed signature it was competent to show him instruments containing spurious signatures and to ask him if, in a former trial of the cause, he had not been shown these same instruments, so folded as to leave only the signatures visible, and if he had not at that time declared them to be genuine. The court said: "The opinions of experts upon handwriting who testify from comparison only are regarded by the courts as of uncertain value, because in so many cases where such evidence is received witnesses of equal honesty, intelligence and experience reach conclusions not only diametrically opposite, but always in favor of the party who called them. The right to cross-examine such witnesses is of great importance, and, while it should be confined within reasonable limits, it should not be so restricted as to deprive it of all value. The trial judge has a wide discretion in controlling the cross-examination of witnesses in order to save time, but after the time has been consumed and the evidence received, it can be stricken out only as a matter of right and not as a matter of discretion. If it is immaterial or incompetent it may be struck from the record for that reason, but the court has no right to strike it out in the exercise of a supposed discretionary power. The evidence stricken out in this case was not only competent and material, but was of decided value, and might have turned the scale toward the defendants upon an issue so closely contested. It tended to cast doubt upon the credibility of the witness and his skill as an expert. It suggested the question whether, if the witness was at fault as to the spurious signatures, he was not at fault as to the signatures in question. It made a direct attack upon the value of his opinion, and tended to show that it was unreliable. The defendants were deprived of the right to test, in an effective and practical manner, the accuracy and worth of the opinions of the three experts relied upon by the plaintiff. . . . There has been a change by legislation since the Van Wyck case was decided, so that writings 'proved to be genuine to the satisfaction of the court,' may be introduced for the purpose of comparison (L. 1880, ch. 36; L. 1888, ch. 555). Suppose a witness should testify that a writing, not in issue, was genuine and the court should receive it for the purpose of comparison, could it not be shown by the other party that such signature was not, in fact, genuine? Such an issue might be collateral, but is an issue as to the competency of a witness to express an opinion collateral in a vicious sense? Is not the competency of a witness upon handwriting always a relevant fact, inasmuch as his opinion is not relevant unless he is competent to express it? The competency of a witness is a fact necessary to be known in order to learn the value of his opinion. While it is not an issue raised by the pleadings, it becomes a subordinate issue by the tender of the witness as an expert. As the opinion may determine the main issue, the question whether the opinion is relevant, that is, whether it is the opinion of one legally qualified to give it, is necessarily an incidental issue, as otherwise the main issue might be decided upon an irrelevant fact. It is incidental to the main issue, because it attacks the foundation of the evidence, and it may be the only evidence, received to establish the main issue. It is not enough to permit the opinion of an incompetent witness to be met by the opinion of a witness who is competent, for the jury may not be able, even when instructed by the cross-examination, to tell the good from the bad, unless they are guided by further evidence. . . . We think that any testimony of an alleged expert upon handwriting which bears on his competency to express an opinion, may, within reasonable limits, be contradicted by the testimony of other witnesses. We deem it our duty to limit such cases as People v. Murphy, 135 N. Y. 450, and Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439, in so far as the conclusion thus announced is inconsistent with the views therein expressed."

In a still later case it has been held that it is an unfair test, which in the discretion of the trial court may be rejected, to elicit the opinion of a nonexpert handwriting witness as to signatures shown only through slits in envelopes, hiding the rest of the paper and then to show the whole paper to an expert and have him testify that he prepared the signature as an imitation. People v. Patrick, 182 N. Y. 131, 175, 74 N. E. 843, wherein the court, distinguishing Hoag v. Wright, 174 N. Y. 36, 66 N. E. 579, 63 L.R.A. 163, supra, said: "In this case, Harmon had been examined as a witness for the prosecution. He had been for many years a clerk with Swenson Sons, the bankers of the deceased. He knew the deceased and had a familiarity with his handwriting, from seeing him write and from handling his checks. He had testified to the spuriousness of signatures of the deceased upon the disputed instruments. The defendant submitted to him certain signatures, purporting to be by the deceased, which were visible only through slits, or openings, made in envelopes, and he pronounced his opinion upon them. One of the signatures, which he had pronounced genuine, had been written, inferentially, by an expert in handwriting. Being called as a witness, this expert was shown the signature, but without the envelope, and he was not allowed to testify about it, or to the effect that he had written it. The court ruled that it was unfair, when Harmon had only seen the signature through an aperture, that Trendley should be allowed to pass upon it, aided by the knowledge that it was upon a blank sheet of paper and, therefore, not a genuine one, but, presumably, one of his own making. It was, obviously, an unfair test and the court did not abuse its discretionary power in the cross-examination. It is to be observed that Harmon was called upon to testify, by reason of his competency to form an opinion from long acquaintance with the handwriting of the deceased and not by reason of his being a professional expert in handwriting or penmanship. I think the question is distinguishable, upon the facts, from that passed upon in Hoag v. Wright; but were it to be considered as controlled by that case, then the error must be regarded as of negligible importance, in view of the mass of expert evidence admitted upon the subject. The defendant could not have been prejudiced; for, clearly, the jury could not but infer, from the questions and the discussion, that the purpose of the defendant was to prove that Harmon had made a mistake in undertaking to testify from comparisons of signatures."

A similar conflict appears in two cases in the supreme court, which do not seem to have been considered by the foregoing cases in the court of appeals. In the case of Hilsley v. Palmer, 32 Hun (N. Y.) 472, it was held that where an expert had testified as to handwriting, it was an incompetent test to submit to him thirty-three signatures for his opinion as to their genuineness, and then to introduce another witness to testify that several of the signatures deemed by the expert to be genuine were in fact prepared by him and were not the genuine signatures of the person whose signatures they purported to be. The court said: "It was not material to the issue to show whether any of those thirty-three signatures were genuine or false. The proof was not made to introduce them in evidence, because plaintiff had already exhausted her evidence on that subject. No such purpose was claimed. It is plain the signatures were prepared for the sole purpose of testing the skill of witnesses. O'Neil's attention was called to them in the belief that he would not be able to pick out the genuine from the false. He expressed his opinion. The evidence of Williams did not contradict him. It showed his opinion was in some respects inaccurate. But how was it material whether these thirty-three signatures were genuine or not? The issue was as to the signature to the note. Whether O'Neil was right or wrong as to the thirty-three signatures it did not aid in determining the real issue. It was a collateral issue and if by possibility O'Neil could have been legally permitted or required to answer the question, his answer was conclusive upon the plaintiff. She could not afterwards call witnesses to contradict him on that collateral and immaterial issue. The case of Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439, is directly in point." The case of Hilsley v. Palmer, supra, was criticised however, in Hornellsville First Nat. Bank v. Hyland, 53 Hun 108, 6 N. Y. S. 87, affirmed 125 N. Y. 711, 26 N. E. 755, wherein it was held that when an expert has given his opinion as to the genuineness of a signature, it is competent to test the correctness of his judgment by requiring his opinion as to the genuineness of other signatures of the same name which are in evidence. The court said: "The cross-examination allowed of the witness O'Meara was not improper. He had testified, in behalf of the defendant, to his opinion of the genuineness of the indorsement of the defendant's name on the note in suit. The questions put to him as to his opinion of the genuineness of defendant's signatures to other notes or indorsements which were in evidence was calculated to test the correctness of his judgment. So far as the opinion of the court in Hilsley v. Palmer, 32 Hun 472, can be construed to hold that such a test of the judgment of an expert may not properly be applied, we are not inclined to follow it as authority."

v.

STATE.

Mississippi Supreme Court—May 11, 1914.

107 Miss. 118; 65 So. 118.

Banks — Receiving Deposit When Insolvent — Criminal Intent — Deposits Identified with Intent to Return.

A cashier who, pending a decision of the board of directors to liquidate the bank because of its financial condition, receives all deposits offered, but with intent to secure their return to the depositors keeps the same separate from the funds of the bank by pinning the money received from each depositor to the deposit slip and placing the same in a box, does not receive any deposit in violation of the statute, where, after the appointment of a receiver, the identical money is returned to each depositor with a single exception, and where the failure of that depositor to call for and receive his deposit results from his failure to receive a notice to call at the bank and receive the deposit.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Newton county:
DOBBS, Judge.

Criminal action. H. F. Sively convicted of receiving deposit in insolvent bank and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

R. N. Miller and Julian C. Wilson for appellant.

Geo. H. Ethridge for appellee.

[119] COOK, J.—Appellant was indicted and convicted for receiving a deposit of seventy dollars while he was acting as cashier of a bank he knew was insolvent, or had good reason to believe was insolvent, without informing the depositor of the bank's financial condition. There is a controversy about the insolvency of the bank at the time of the alleged deposit, but, in considering the question as to whether or not appellant received a deposit in the sense of the statute the insolvency of the bank will be assumed.

On the evening of the 18th day of June, 1912, the father of appellant, a director of the bank, left his home in Jackson, and went to Newton, where the bank was located, for the purpose of consulting with his associate directors about the condition of the bank. It appears that there were then reasons to believe that the bank was not in a prosperous condition, and it was necessary for the directors to take some action looking to the future government of same, and no doubt, appellant's father believed the bank would be liquidated. The directors of the bank were in session on the 19th and 20th of July, and on the latter date the decision to liquidate the bank was reached, and an order to this effect was entered on the minutes of the governing board.

In the meantime, on the 19th and 20th, the cashier (appellant) kept the doors open and received all deposits offered, but, upon the advice of his father, all deposits so received were kept separate from the funds of the bank; the identical money received from each depositor being pinned to the deposit slip and placed in a tin-box.

After the appointment of a receiver the identical money received during the two days was returned to each depositor, except the deposit of seventy dollars upon which the [120] indictment was based. The record shows that the depositor was notified by mail to call and the seventy dollars would be returned to him, but by some misadventure the depositor did not receive the notice, and the indictment naturally followed.

In short, pending the examination of the financial condition of the bank and the final action of the board of directors, the deposits were received in the manner stated for the purpose of returning same should the directors decide to liquidate. The depositors were not advised of this purpose of the bank, and, so far as they were concerned, the deposits were made and received in the ordinary way.

Two courses were opened to the officers of the bank pending the decision of the directors; one to close the doors and refuse to receive deposits; the other the one pursued in the instant case. If deposits had been declined, a run on the bank was reasonably certain, and this probably would have put this bank, or any other bank in the hands of a receiver, solvent or insolvent. It is easily conceivable that a bank solvent in the legal sense would be wrecked by a refusal to receive deposits; confidence once weakened is difficult to revive.

The question is, conceding that the cashier had good reason to believe the bank was insolvent when Mr. Atkinson delivered his money to the cashier: Did the cashier, under the facts of this case, "receive any deposit" in violation of the statute?

According to the undisputed intention and purpose of the cashier, the money received was not to become a deposit in case it was decided to liquidate. It was the undisclosed intention and purpose of the cashier to take the money conditionally. He never, in fact, received the money for the bank, and never mingled same with the bank's funds, nor did he record the transaction upon the bank's books. There seems to be no reason to doubt that appellant as cashier endeavored to protect the interest [121] of the depositor should disaster come. In other words, the record leaves no room for doubt of the cashier's intention to prevent any loss to individual depositors during the two days the board of directors were diagnosing the sick bank.

Under a state of facts similar to the facts in the present case, construing a statute in all essentials the same as ours, the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Com. v. Junkin, 170 Pa. St. 201, 32 Atl. 619, 31 L.R.A. 124, said: "Putting aside for the present the question raised as to Junkin's unanswerability criminally for the acts of his agent, assume that he had himself been in the bank that day, had personally received this twenty dollars at the counter, and had put it in an envelope, marked with Rice's name, to be returned to him in case the bank closed, and then did return to him the same twenty dollars, would that, without the meaning of the act, have been the receipt by a banker, knowing the bank to be insolvent, of money on deposit? The peril to and loss of the depositor's money arises from the concealed insolvency of the bank; but if it never mingles with or forms part of the bank's funds, which are assets for the payment of creditors generally, remains separate from all other funds, and is capable of absolute identification, so that it may be returned, and is actually returned, that does not constitute the criminal receipt of money as a bank deposit. The real deposit, whether on time or call, when passed over the counter, is thereafter the property of the bank absolutely. It is the intention of the depositor and the bank that the latter shall thereafter use it as its own by loaning it to others, and paying it out on checks drawn by others. The express or implied promise of the bank is that it will repay him, not that money, but that amount of money. In the case we are supposing the intention of the banker is to hand back the identical money received, and that intention is manifested, not by what he says, but by what he does, not only at the time, but [122] afterwards. This method of not receiving money on deposit by a banker knowing his insolvency, as demonstrated by the event here, is not an open, unequivocal observance of the law. He subjects himself to the peril of misconstruction of his real intention, and invites criminal accusation. But, unwise as may be the conduct, if no intention, in fact, existed to appropriate in aid of his insolvent bank the depositor's money, and he did not, in fact, so appropriate it, he is not a criminal. If such a transaction is not a deposit by a depositor, if there be no contract to which the minds of both parties assented, then it is not within the terms of the act."

In State v. Strait, 99 Minn. 327, 109 N. W. 598, the supreme court of Minnesota has this to say: "It is argued on behalf of the state that it was immaterial what effort appellant may have made to prevent the deposits being made, so long as it did not, in fact, result in the actual return of the money to the depositors; that what his intention may have been was immaterial, and he was bound absolutely by the technical legal result of his cashier permitting the money to remain in the bank and pass into the hands of the referee. Such is not our view of the law." This court also quotes with approval Com. v. Junkin, supra.

In the last analysis the question to be decided in the present case is about this: Was appellant a felon when he took Mr. Atkinson's money, having good reason to believe that the bank was insolvent at the time, even though he intended to receive, and did, in fact, receive the money as a special deposit, for the purpose of giving the directors an opportunity to kill or cure the bank, and in the former event it was his purpose to restore the money to Mr. Atkinson?

There are many ways by which the creditors of a hopelessly insolvent bank may be made secure, and there are also many ways by which a bank unable to meet all legal demands of creditors may be rejuvenated and put upon [123] its feet. It may have been, and probably was, the hope of the bank's officers that some way would be found to continue the operation of this bank upon a basis of solvency, so far as creditors were concerned, but, whether this is true or not, it is manifest that the cashier acted in perfect good faith with the depositor, by so arranging matters as to insure the return of his money in any event.

The statute is a wise and just law for the protection of bank depositors, but to hold that appellant violated this statute when he did the very thing the statute was designed to accomplish would be a sacrifice of the spirit to the letter of the law.

Mr. Atkinson has suffered no injury; the money deposited by him never became an asset of the bank, and should have been returned to him. Michie, Banks and Banking, 406.

Reversed, and judgment here discharging appellant.

Reversed.

SMITH, C. J. (dissenting).—The jury found, as a fact, and the majority opinion concedes for the purpose of this discussion, that at the time the deposit in question was received the bank was insolvent, and that appellant either knew or had good reason to believe that this was true. The money was received by the bank in the usual and ordinary way, and became, immediately upon its receipt, the property of the bank.

Appellant claims that it was the bank's intention to return the money to the depositor in event it should be determined by its directors that it was necessary for the bank to discontinue business. In other words, his claim is that the deposit was received without any intention of defrauding the depositor. The defect in this defense is that the presence or absence of an intent to defraud is immaterial; for the statute makes it unlawful to receive a deposit into an insolvent bank with knowledge of [124] its insolvency without reference to the intent with which the deposit was received. If a fraudulent intent is necessary, few convictions can be had under this statute, for the reason that, I think I am safe in saying, few deposits are received with an intention on the part of the bank officials of defrauding the depositor. Insolvent banks are usually kept open because of the fact that, should they discontinue business, it is hardly possible for them to realize the value of their assets, and because of the hope of their officials that they will in the end recoup their losses and be enabled to discharge all of their liabilities and save harmless their stockholders. The statute was designed to prevent insolvent banks from pursuing this course, to prevent them from continuing to receive, and subject to probable loss, the money of unsuspecting depositors. What happened here is just what the statute was designed to prevent; for the depositor has lost his money when, had he been told of the insolvency of the bank, he could have prevented the loss by not making the deposit.

It is true that by a proper proceeding this depositor could have recovered the particular money deposited by him while it remained in the hands of the bank, but this results not from the fact that there existed an intention on the part of the bank officials to return it to him in event a certain condition should arise, but results from that principle of law which permits a fraudulent contract to be repudiated by the innocent party and which then reverts him with the ownership of property obtained from him by virtue of the fraudulent contract. Any depositor whose money has been received by a bank when insolvent, to the knowledge of its officials, can recover it while it remains in the hands of the bank, provided the insolvency of the bank was unknown to the depositor at the time the deposit was made. If authority is desired for this statement of the law, see 1 Bolles, Modern Law of Banking, 188, and, as illustrating the principle, Meridian First Nat. Bank v. Strauss, 66 Miss. 479, 6 So. 232, 14 Am. St. Rep. 579.

[125] The statute here under consideration was construed in accordance with the views herein expressed in Hughes v. Lake, 63 Miss. 552. In that case "L., a banker, having failed in business and made an assignment, H., one of his depositors, sued out an attachment against him on the ground that the debt due the plaintiff was 'fraudulently contracted.' On the trial of the issue joined to test the ground of the attachment the plaintiff adduced evidence tending to show that L. knew at the time he received plaintiff's deposit that the bank was insolvent." The plaintiff asked, but was refused, "an instruction to the effect that, if L. was guilty of violating the statute (the one here in question in receiving H.'s deposit, then he fraudulently contracted the debt therefor." This court affirmed the action of the trial court in refusing this instruction, and, speaking through Judge Campbell, pointed out the distinction between the civil and criminal liability of a banker for receiving a deposit into his bank knowing it to be insolvent, as follows: "The first instruction asked by the plaintiff was properly refused, and was correctly modified by the court. It is true that one may be guilty, and sent to the penitentiary, under paragraph 2814 of the Code, without having entertained the fraudulent purpose necessary to sustain an attachment. Guilt, under paragraph 2814, depends on the facts recited in it, and not upon intent or purpose. The object of the statute is to protect the confiding public from the victimization apt to result from depositing in an insolvent establishment, and it seeks to give protection by denouncing its penalty against him who receives a deposit, knowing, or having good reason to believe, that the establishment is insolvent, without informing the depositor of such condition. Receiving a deposit in such circumstances constitutes the crime, no matter what may be the purpose or hope of the person receiving it. He may think all will be well, and that his insolvent condition will never be known, and that he will achieve success by the use of his [126] credit, and his purpose may be to act honestly and pay all depositors, but, if he receives a deposit, knowing or having reason to believe that insolvency exists, he is guilty of a felony, and cannot escape the just consequences of his crime because of his hopes and purposes. The legislature has determined that it is dangerous to the community for an insolvent bank to receive deposits, because of the probable result, and, in order to prevent the evil, has declared it felony for any person to receive deposits into an insolvent establishment without informing the depositor of such condition. No professed or really existing honesty of purpose will relieve against the crime, which consists in doing what is forbidden, regardless of motive. If the bank is insolvent, dare not to receive a deposit from an unsuspecting person, but tell him of the insolvent condition, that he may foresee the evil and avoid it." It is true that the criminal liability of the defendant was not there in question, but it was necessary in order that the court might intelligently decide the matter before it for it to draw the distinction between civil and criminal liability under the statute, and, while it may be that the construction there placed upon the statute is not binding upon us, it expressed the views of a very able court, and, in my judgment, is correct. The statute has been twice re-enacted since that case was decided, and for that reason the views therein expressed, whether necessary to the decision or not, should not be lightly disregarded.

Only two cases have been cited in support of appellant's contention, and these are the two referred to in the majority opinion, to wit, Com. v. Junkin, 170 Pa. St. 194, 32 Atl. 619, 31 L.R.A. 124, and State v. Strait, 99 Minn. 327, 109 N. W. 598. The first decision seems to proceed upon two grounds: (1) That the deposit was received without any intention to defraud; and (2) that no deposit was, in fact, made, for the reason that the person receiving the deposit secretly intended to return it. The [127] ground on which the second case proceeds is not clearly stated, but it refers to the first as authority for the conclusion reached. I have already discussed the first ground on which Com. v. Junkin proceeds, and do not deem the second worthy of consideration, for the reason that no other cases have come under my observation wherein it is held that a contract can be modified or changed by reason of an intention on the part of one of the parties thereto different from that expressed in the contract and not disclosed to the other party. In the case of State v. Strait, the deposit there is question had been received by the cashier and mingled with the money of the bank before he was notified by Strait, one of the owners of the bank, to put all money received on deposit in envelopes marked with the names of the depositors, so that it might be returned to them. An amount of money equal to the deposit in question was then put in an envelope, marked with the depositor's name, and, though by an oversight it was not returned to the depositor, the court held that no crime had been committed. It would follow from this that no conviction can be had if the debt which the bank owes the depositor by reason of his having made the deposit is afterwards paid. At least one statute has come under my observation which contains a provision to the effect that loss to the depositor must result from the reception of the deposit in order for a crime to be committed, but the statute here under consideration contains no such provision.

It may be, and I am inclined to think, that the statute should be amended so as to provide for the doing of what was done by appellant here, but that is the province of the legislature, and not of the court. Should the statute be so amended, the amendment should be so framed as to protect the rights of the unsuspecting stockholder, as well as of the person receiving his deposit.

For these reasons, I think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

[128] REED, J. (concurring).—The chief justice, in his dissenting opinion, referring to the alleged deposit, says that "the money was received by the bank in the usual and ordinary way, and became immediately upon its receipt the property of the bank." I cannot agree that this is shown by the proof. I understand from the evidence that Mr. Atkinson handed to appellant, the cashier of the bank, to be deposited, seventy dollars in currency, consisting of one twenty dollar bill and ten five dollar bills, and received a duplicate deposit ticket therefor. This currency was taken by appellant, pinned to a deposit slip, placed in a tin box set apart to receive sums left by others on the same day, and never entered upon the books of the bank as a deposit nor mingled with its general funds. All of the other money left with the bank by other parties was returned after the bank's failure, except the amount which was handed in by Mr. Atkinson. It appears that the different persons were notified to call and get their money, and that Mr. Atkinson failed to receive the notice mailed to him.

I understand that Mr. Atkinson's money went into the hands of the temporary liquidator of the bank, and was afterwards turned over to the receiver, and was brought into court on the trial of this case. During all of this time it was kept separate from other funds, and kept just as it was received by appellant.

The record shows that appellant did physically receive this money over the counter and into his possession, but it is not shown that when it came into his hands it was treated and disposed of as an ordinary deposit in the bank and as the property of the bank. Appellant kept it separate and apart from the funds of the bank, and purposed and endeavored to return it to Mr. Atkinson. Mr. Atkinson did not receive information as to this. However, appellant is not on trial for failure to tell Mr. Atkinson of his purpose to keep the money separate and apart from the funds of the bank and return it in the [129] event of the bank's failure. The offense charged against him is receiving a deposit into an insolvent bank.

Was this such a deposit as is meant by the statute? Surely the statute means a general deposit; that is, the placing of money in a bank to be repaid on demand "in any current money not the same pieces of money deposited." In such deposit the title to the money deposited passes to the bank, which becomes the debtor to the depositor for the amount. Black's Law Dictionary. It was undoubtedly the purpose of Mr. Atkinson, when he presented his money to the appellant, to make a general deposit in the bank, but the making of such deposit does not consist alone of the act of the one who desires to deposit his money. The amount offered must be received into the bank. It must become a part of the bank's funds. The entire transaction between the two parties is that which constitutes the contract of deposit. If a contract, the minds of the parties thereto must meet. I do not find that this was so in this case. Mr. Atkinson purposed to make a general deposit, but appellant did not, on his part, receive it as such. Their minds did not meet. The contract of a general deposit was not completed.

I do not know that we can term the transaction between Mr. Atkinson and appellant as amounting to a deposit. If it can be, from any view, termed a deposit at all, then I see in it a special deposit; that is, "one in which the depositor is entitled to the return of the identical thing deposited (gold, bullion, securities, etc.) and the title to the property remains in him, the deposit being usually made only for purposes of safe-keeping." Black's Law Dictionary, citing Shipman v. State Bank, 59 Hun 621, 13 N. Y. S. 475; State v. Clark, 4 Ind. 318; Brahm v. Adkins, 77 Ill. 263; Marine Bank v. Fulton County Bank, 2 Wall. 252, 17 U. S. (L. ed.) 785.

In discussing what is a special deposit, Mr. Bolles, in his treatise on the Modern Law of Banking, vol. 1, p. 434, says: "The term 'special deposit' has a varying judicial [130] meaning. Thus a court in Illinois, when saying that a special deposit must always be returned to the owner, whether the bank is solvent or otherwise, meant a specific thing, like a bond or a specific deposit of money. To these may be added deposits marked 'special,' or which are put into a special place at the time of receiving them, because of the bank's pending insolvency, or other reason."

The facts in this case clearly show to me that this money was received into the bank by appellant, and treated and held as the property of Mr. Atkinson, and that the title thereto did not pass to the bank, but remained in him. The bank did not become his debtor for the amount. It was not a general deposit "received by the bank in the usual and ordinary way." It was not the receiving of money into the bank as a deposit, which is made a criminal offense by statute.

The chief justice quotes at length from Hughes v. Lake, 63 Miss. 552, and I gather from what he writes that he relies upon the discussion of the purpose of the statute in the opinion in that case to sustain his views in the present case. I do not see how this case can, in any manner, be controlled by the decision of the court in Hughes v. Lake. The eminent judge who delivered the opinion did very fully express his approval of the statute. I am sure we all agree that the proper enforcement of the statute will be very helpful in protecting the confiding depositors from losing their money. I believe that the great man had in mind, while writing the receiving of an ordinary or general deposit into an insolvent bank. That is what is forbidden. The wrong act condemned by the law is the taking of money from a depositor into the funds of an insolvent bank, and thereby causing him loss. The depositor must be defrauded or injured by the taking of his money. This will be so if it is taken into an insolvent bank as a general deposit and mingled with the funds of the bank. It will not be so if the money is [131] received by a teller, and not taken into the funds of the bank, but kept separate and apart as the property of the one offering to deposit it, and so that the identical money may be returned to him. We may approve the sentiments expressed by the judge delivering the opinion in the case of Hughes v. Lake without in any manner recognizing that there was anything decided in that case to control the case at bar.

The chief justice says in his dissenting opinion that only two cases have been cited in support of appellant's contention. We learn from the able and painstaking counsel who represent appellant that a very thorough search of the books only disclosed two cases in point. It is significant that both of these cases sustain the position of the majority opinion in this case. The case of Com. v. Junkin, 170 Pa. St. 194, 32 Atl. 619, 31 L.R.A. 124, is very like the present case. This is shown in Judge Cook's reference to that case and his quotation from the opinion therein.

I think the case of State v. Strait, 99 Minn. 327, 109 N. W. 598, also fully sustains the decision in this case. Judge Cook quoted from the opinion, and Judge Smith referred to the facts, in that case. I will presume to make a more extended quotation, including that already made, because I deem it very pertinent in this consideration, and helpful in reaching a right conclusion in this case: "The cashier testified that he followed appellant's instructions, put the amount (though he could not say it was the identical money) received by the two depositors that morning in separate envelopes, addressed to the respective depositors, and laid the same in the safe. It appears that after closing of the bank, but before the money had been returned to the two depositors, a committee representing the bank's depositors, headed by the county attorney, visited the bank, and in the excitement the actual delivery of the envelopes was overlooked, and the receiver in bankruptcy took charge of appellant's estate, including the [132] bank and its contents. We will assume that the referee in bankruptcy acquired title to the money for the creditors as against the depositors, so that, conceding there was technically a deposit, in the sense that the depositors lost title to their money, yet is the inference warranted from the facts and circumstances stated that there was a deposit such as to constitute the criminal offense contemplated by chapter 219? It is argued on behalf of the state that it was immaterial what effort appellant may have made to prevent the deposits being made, so long as it did not, in fact, result in the actual return of the money to the depositors; that what his intention may have been was immaterial, and he was bound absolutely by the technical legal result of his cashier permitting the money to remain in the bank and pass into the hands of the referee. Such is not our view of the law. We are decidedly of the opinion that, if the evidence referred to is true, appellant took every reasonable precaution which could be taken to prevent the occurrence of the very act for which he stands charged in the indictment. The inevitable inference from the declarations and acts of appellant, and from all the evidence, is that the accused did not willfully or negligently receive, or permit his agents to receive, the money."

I do not see that the proof in this case is sufficient to support the conviction of appellant for violation of the statute.

NOTE.

Intent as Element of Offense of Receiving Deposit in Insolvent Bank.

The statutes penalizing the receipt of deposits by an officer or agent of an insolvent bank usually make knowledge on the part of the accused of the insolvency of the bank an essential element of the offense (3 R. C. L. tit. Banks, p. 494), and the scienter thus required has sometimes been referred to as criminal intent. See State v. Eifert, 102 Ia. 188, 65 N. W. 309, 71 N. W. 248, 63 Am. St. Rep. 433, 38 L.R.A. 485. But intent in the stricter sense, i. e., a specified intent to defraud the depositor, is not ordinarily required by the statutes, and a statute making the reception of a deposit with knowledge of insolvency proof of a fraudulent intent is valid. See 3 R. C. L. tit. Banks, p. 491. If the statute makes no requirement of a specific intent to defraud, such an intent is not an essential element of the offense. State v. Quackenbush, 98 Minn. 515, 108 N. W. 953; Com. v. Junkin, 170 Pa. St. 194, 32 Atl. 617, 31 L.R.A. 124. In the case first cited it was said: "Certain acts, in themselves innocent and indifferent, are made criminal when done under circumstances which experience has taught will probably result in some harm which the law seeks to prevent. As stated by a learned historian of the criminal law, 'it would be a mistake to suppose that in order that an act may amount to a crime the offender must intend to commit the crime to which his act amounts, but he must in all cases intend to do the act which constitutes the crime.' 2 Stephens, Hist. Crim. Law, 112. In Reg. v. Tolson, 23 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 168, 16 Cox C. C. 629, the court said: 'Although prima facie, and as a general rule, there must be a mind at fault before there can be a crime, it is not an inflexible rule, and a statute may relate to such a subject-matter and may be so framed as to make an act criminal, whether there has been any intention to break the law or otherwise to do wrong or not. . . . Whether an enactment is to be construed in this sense, or with the qualification ordinarily imported into the construction of criminal statutes that there must be a guilty mind, must, I think, depend upon the subject-matter of the enactment, and the various circumstances that may make the one construction or the other reasonable or unreasonable.' The statute under which this indictment was drawn creates a statutory crime. The act which is forbidden and made criminal is the receiving of money for deposit by a banker when he knows, or has good reason to know, that the bank is unsafe or insolvent. The prohibited act is made criminal without reference to whether the person receiving the money intends to defraud the depositor. As a fraudulent intent is not by the statute made an essential element of the crime, it need not be alleged in the indictment."

But it seems that there must be not only an intent to receive the money but an intent to receive it on general deposit; in other words, the intent of the bank officer must be that money offered for deposit shall go into the funds of the bank and be subjected to the risk of loss which arises from the known insolvency of the bank. Accordingly if money offered for deposit is not mingled with the funds of the bank but is marked with the name of the depositor with the purpose of returning it to him in case it is found that the bank is unable to continue business, the officer so receiving it is not criminally liable. State v. Strait, 99 Minn. 327, 109 N. W. 598; Com. v. Junkin, 170 Pa. St. 194, 32 Atl. 619, 31 L.R.A. 124. And see the reported case. Compare Com. v. Sponsler, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 116. The leading case of Com. v. Junkin, supra, is fully set out in the reported case. In State v. Strait, supra, it appeared that the owner of a private bank, becoming satisfied of its insolvency after the beginning of banking hours on a particular day, directed the cashier to put the amounts of the deposits received on that day into envelopes, marking each envelope with the name of the depositor, and to return the deposits at once. The cashier testified that he followed the appellant's instructions, put the amount (though he could not say it was the identical money) received from the two depositors that morning in separate envelopes, addressed to the respective depositors, and laid the same in the safe. It appears that after the closing of the bank, but before the money had been returned to the two depositors, a committee representing the bank's depositors, headed by the county attorney, visited the bank, and in the excitement the actual delivery of the envelopes was overlooked and the receiver in bankruptcy took charge of appellant's estate, including the bank and its contents. The court said: "We will assume that the referee in bankruptcy acquired title to the money for the creditors as against the depositors, so that, conceding there was technically a deposit, in the sense that the depositors lost title to their money, yet is the inference warranted from the facts and circumstances stated that there was a deposit such as to constitute the criminal offense contemplated by chapter 219? It is argued on behalf of the state that it was immaterial what effort appellant may have made to prevent the deposits being made, so long as it, did not in fact result in the actual return of the money to the depositors; that what his intention may have been was immaterial, and he was bound absolutely by the technical legal result of his cashier permitting the money to remain in the bank and pass into the hands of the referee. Such is not our view of the law. We are decidedly of the opinion that, if the evidence referred to is true, appellant took every reasonable precaution which could be taken to prevent the occurrence of the very act for which he stands charged in the indictment. The inevitable inference from the declarations and acts of appellant, and from all the evidence, is that the accused did not wilfully or negligently receive, or permit his agents to receive, the money."

The decision in Com. v. Sponsler, supra, would seem to be overruled by Com. v. Junkin, supra. In the Sponsler case it does not appear from the opinion just what was done by the bank officer. The court, however, said: "It was most strenuously contended that judgment should be arrested because defendants did not receive the money as a deposit, but with the intention of returning it. The evidence of cashier Willis, a witness called by the commonwealth, does show that it was received with such intention; by an oversight it was not returned to J. W. Rice, and the identical money deposited by Rice was never returned to him, but after a true bill had been found and only a few days before the trial, a like amount was given him. If defendants are absolved from guilt by reason of this intention to return, the fact that, by oversight, such return was not made, we think, would not fasten guilt on defendants. At the trial we instructed the jury that such intention to return the money was immaterial. The very able oral argument of counsel for defendants and the clearly expressed and exhaustive briefs submitted by them have failed to convince us that such instruction was error."

ARMSTRONG ET AL.

v.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court—April 12, 1915.

249 Pa. St. 39; 94 Atl. 455.

Appeal and Error — Extent of Review — Theory Below.

A case will not be reviewed on a theory different from that on which it was tried below, nor will questions argued for the first time on appeal be considered.

Municipal Corporations — Liability for Acts of Agents — Business Function — Operating Filtration Plant.

Where a city undertakes to construct and operate a filtration plant to supply water to its inhabitants, it is exercising a business, as distinguished from a governmental, function, and the maxim respondeat superior applies to the acts of its officers and agents in exercising such functions; and therefore it cannot avoid liability for the wrongful acts of its servants in holding what they believe to be the city's property.

Replevin — Damages for Detention of Property.

Where plaintiff in replevin has secured possession of property, he may ordinarily recover damages for the detention measured by interest and depreciation in value.

Exemplary Damages for Detention.

Exemplary damages may be recovered in replevin only where there have been particular circumstances of fraud, oppression, or wrong in the taking or detention of the property.

[See 4 Ann. Cas. 71.]

Value of Use of Property Detained.

Where property replevied is capable of such physical use and enjoyment as cannot be compensated for by allowing interest, the damages recoverable by plaintiff must be determined by considering the value of such use, but in determining such value, care should be taken not to permit the fixing of an amount out of proportion to the value of the thing itself.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The measure of damages for the detention of rentable property is the rental value, unless the property be not used, in which case the value of depreciation by use must be deducted from the rental value.

[See note at end of this case.]

Pleading — Amendment — New Cause of Action.

An amended statement, which merely introduces an additional element of damages drawn from the circumstances alleged in the original statement in replevin, does not introduce a new cause of action and may therefore be allowed at any time.

Same.

A claim for damages for delay in payment for the detention of property cannot be first introduced by an amendment made to plaintiff's statement in replevin more than six years after the original statement was filed.

Jury — Custody and Conduct — Taking Out Papers — Calculation of Damages.

The matter of permitting plaintiff to send out to the jury a calculation of items of damages claimed, is within the trial court's discretion, where the paper contains no items not supported by evidence and the jury are instructed that the calculations are not evidence but are merely to be used as an aid to their own calculation.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia county: MARTIN, Judge.

Action by William J. Armstrong et al., plaintiffs, against City of Philadelphia, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. REVERSED.

[40] From the record it appears that the provisions of the contract between McNichol and the city relating to the tools and machinery were as follows:

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

"154. Prices to Include.—The prices specified in the accepted proposal shall include the furnishing and erection in a good, sound, substantial and workmanlike manner, of all items required for the completion of the whole work proposed for, and shall include all items shown and described in the specification; also, all dams, pilings, shoring, sheeting, forms, centering, falseworks, tramways, machinery, scaffolding, pumping, labor, workmanship, tools and materials necessary and best adapted to the efficient, prompt and safe execution of both the permanent and temporary works. All materials used must be of the best quality, and all work must be executed according to the true intent and meaning of the [41] drawings and the specification as may be necessary for the proper and entire completion of the structures.

"156. Personal Attention.—The contractor will be required to give the prosecution of the work his faithful personal attention, and will not be permitted to assign or sublet the same, excepting as herein provided, but shall at all times keep it under his control. In case of his absence he must have a competent representative or foreman on the work, who shall receive orders and directions from the engineer, or his authorized assistants and inspectors, and said representative or foreman shall have full authority to supply tools, materials, appliances and labor to carry on the work diligently and continuously until its completion.

"(The clause with reference to subletting will not be construed to prevent a general contractor from purchasing materials from approved manufacturers and dealers.) The contractor who is not a manufacturer of or dealer in materials, will be required to state the names and addresses of the manufacturers of or dealers in the materials which he proposes to supply, subject to the approval of the engineer. (See p. 101, of this book.)"

Other facts appear in the opinion.

Paul Reilly and Michael J. Ryan for appellant.

Henry P. Brown, John Kent Kane and Hampton L. Carson for appellee.

[42] FRAZER, J.—The City of Philadelphia contracted with Daniel J. McNichol for work on a filtration plant, under which contract McNichol was to furnish materials, tools, machinery and equipment for the execution of the work at the Torresdale Intake. McNichol later entered into a contract with plaintiffs by which the latter were to furnish the labor and materials in the construction of a coffer dam required in the prosecution of the work, and to furnish all tools, implements and machinery necessary for that purpose. Plaintiffs began work in 1905 and continued until June 16th of that year, when they were ordered to stop by reason of trouble between the city and McNichol in the prosecution of the work under the latter's contract. Plaintiffs then attempted to remove their tools and machinery and were prevented from doing so by officers of the city who were in charge of the work, and who contended that the property was vested in the city under the terms of its contract with McNichol.

On March 18, 1906, following both oral and written negotiations between plaintiffs and the city, plaintiffs wrote the chief of the Bureau of Filtration stating that the tools and machinery belonged to them and were not the property of McNichol and that they were needed in plaintiffs' business. This communication was not answered, and defendant persisted in its refusal to permit the tools and machinery to be removed. On April 10, 1906, a writ of replevin was issued by plaintiffs and on May 8th an agreement of counsel was filed, under which plaintiffs were to receive the property from the sheriff and retain possession under the replevin bond filed by them. Plaintiffs claim damages for loss incident to the detention of the property from June 16, 1905, to May 8, 1906, the date on which they were given possession.

Plaintiffs' original statement places the value of the property at $4,400.00, which is based on its cost to them. In the amended statement filed, the value is increased to $6,595.84. Mr. Latta, one of the plaintiffs, testified that [43] the articles were in first-class condition and could be bought for $6,500. Since the property was actually delivered to plaintiffs, this item is eliminated as a measure of damage and is referred to only because of its bearing on the measure of damages for the period of detention, which the jury fixed at $13,774.00, with $604.34 added as compensation for delay in payment, making a total of $14,378.34.

Defendants have laid particular stress in their argument on the contention that the property passed to them under the principle contract by which the contractor was to furnish all items required for the completion of the work, including machinery, tools, materials, etc., claiming that these articles became the property of the city upon the completion of the work and that therefore plaintiffs had no right or title therein as their right could rise no higher than that of the principle contractor. This question, as far as the record shows, was not raised in the lower court, but appears to have been an afterthought and is raised for the first time on this appeal. The charge of the court contains nothing to indicate that there was before it any disputed question of ownership of the property and the necessity of submitting such question to the jury was not suggested by counsel, nor was there any contention, as far as the record shows, that, as a matter of law under the contract, plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. It is a well established rule that the appellate court will not review a case on a theory different from that upon which it was tried by the court below, nor will it consider questions which were not raised in the lower court, but were argued for the first time on appeal. For this reason the question of ownership of the property might well be treated as settled by the acts of the parties as being in plaintiffs; however, as this case must go back for another trial, we deem it proper to state that the ownership of the property in dispute under proper interpretation of the provisions [44] of the contract was in plaintiffs and should be so treated by the parties.

It is argued by defendant that it is not liable for the acts of its officers and agents in seizing the property, for the reason that at the time there was no work being done, and therefore any wrongful act committed with reference to the property of plaintiffs was an act by the servants of the city without authority and not in the course of the performance of any duty incident to their office or employment, and that the responsibility for their acts must rest on their own shoulders, and to them plaintiffs must look for redress.

When a municipal corporation undertakes to construct and operate a filtration plant for the purpose of supplying water to its inhabitants, it is exercising a business, as distinguished from a governmental function and the maxim respondeat superior applies to the acts of its officers and agents in exercising such function: Philadelphia v. Gilmartin, 71 Pa. St. 140; Bodge v. Philadelphia, 167 Pa. St. 492, 31 Atl. 728; Harrisburg v. Saylor, 87 Pa. 216; Morgan v. Duquesne, 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 100. Nor is it material that the actual work on the contract had been suspended. The officers and employees, who had charge of the department under which this particular work was done, were acting as much for the city in refusing to surrender the property as in doing any other act incident to the work. It appears they acted in good faith, and for the purpose of serving the city, by holding what they believed to be the property of the city. While a city can act only through its officers, upon one of its officers necessarily devolved the duty of determining whether the municipality owned the property in dispute, and, if so, it was the duty of that officer to see that its rights were enforced. The question was one which arose immediately in connection with the performance of the work contracted for, and was as much within the scope of the duty of the representatives of the municipality as any other matter connected with the enforcement [45] of the terms of the contract: Philadelphia v. Gilmartin, supra.

The question of the measure of damages is a more difficult one. The general rule in an action of replevin, where the plaintiff has finally secured possession of the property, is that he may recover damages for detention and any costs incident thereto: Cobbey on Replevin, Sec. 853; Fisher v. Whoolery, 25 Pa. St. 197; Duroth Mfg. Co. v. Cauffiel, 243 Pa. St. 24, 89 Atl. 798. These damages are usually measured by interest and depreciation in value: Cobbey on Replevin, Sec. 877; McDonald v. Scaife, 11 Pa. St. 381, 51 Am. Dec. 556; Duroth Mfg. Co. v. Cauffiel, 243 Pa. St. 24, 89 Atl. 798; Cox v. Burdett, 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 346; Allen v. Fox, 51 N. Y. 562. Exemplary damages may also be allowed in cases where there have been particular circumstances of fraud, oppression, or wrong in the taking or the detention of the property: McDonald v. Scaife, 11 Pa. St. 381, 51 Am. Dec. 556; Wiley v. McGrath, 194 Pa. St. 498, 45 Atl. 331, 75 Am. St. Rep. 709. There being no evidence in this case to support a claim for such damages the only question is as to the proper measure to compensate plaintiffs for the injuries sustained.

When property is capable of such physical use and enjoyment as cannot be compensated by allowance of interest, it is necessary to consider the value of such use. Thus where the property detained consists of horses, tools, implements of trade, etc., the general rule is that the party deprived of possession is entitled to the reasonable value of the use during the period of wrongful detention: Cobbey on Replevin, Sec. 887, 889 and the cases cited.

The general theory and basis of this rule is well stated by the Supreme Court of New York in Allen v. Fox, 51 N. Y. 562, which was an action to recover possession of a horse. Title was found to be in defendant, who gave evidence of the value of the use of the horse during the period plaintiff had it in his possession under the writ. This evidence was admitted under objection. The jury found the value of the horse to be $175 and the value of [46] its use $75. In affirming the judgment the Supreme Court said: "In the action of replevin, the plaintiff seeks to recover the property, and is, in all stages of the case to final judgment, in pursuit of that, and not its value. And during the whole time the defendant may have the possession and the use (if it can be used) of his property. At the termination of the suit it is not optional with him to take the property or its value. If the defendant has the property, and will permit him to take it, he is obliged to take it (Code Sec. 277; Dwight v. Enos, 9 N. Y. 470; Fitzhugh v. Wiman, 9 N. Y. 559). Hence the plaintiff cannot always be expected or required, in such cases, to go into the market and supply himself with the same kind of property at its market value. Suppose the controversy be about a canal boat or a carriage, or an expensive machine. If the plaintiff should go into the market and buy another, at the end of the litigation, in case of success, he would have on hand duplicates of the article, and would thus be subjected to further loss and inconvenience.

. . . What should be the measure of damages for the detention? In many cases interest on the value from the time of the wrongful taking would be a proper measure. It would be generally in all cases where the property detained was merchandise kept for sale, grain and all other articles or property useful only for sale or consumption. In such cases, if the owner recover the interest on the value of his property from the time he was deprived of it, he will generally have complete indemnity unless the property has depreciated in value, in which case the depreciation must be added to the interest on the value, taken as it was before the depreciation, and the two items will furnish the amount of the damage. This damage, together with the property or its value at the time of the trial, will give the owner as complete indemnity as the law is generally able to give any person seeking redress for a wrong. But the same measure of damages would not generally furnish the owner an indemnity in [47] case the property claimed had a value for use, or, in other words, a usable value, such as horses, cows, carriages and boats. In such case the direct damage which the owners suffers is the loss of the use, and the value of the use should be the meaning of damages."

In determining the value of the use under the above rule, care should be taken not to permit the fixing of an amount out of all proportion to the value of the thing itself; otherwise the result is not compensation for use but punishment for a wrong, in a case where exemplary damages, as such, would not be allowed. Plaintiffs at the trial submitted a written calculation of damages, consisting of the rental value of the machinery from June 16, 1905, to April 12, 1906, the time during which defendant had possession and refused to turn it over to plaintiffs, by reason of which plaintiffs were deprived of its use. The calculation shows a claim amounting to $13,774.00 for the use of the machinery for a period less than one year. This estimate, according to the testimony in the case, is more than twice the price at which the property could be replaced. If the true measure of damage is such amount as will compensate plaintiff for the loss sustained, the damages given in the present case are grossly in excess of such measure. For instance, it would have been extremely profitable for plaintiffs if defendant had retained the machinery indefinitely, as plaintiffs would have obtained sufficient compensation each year from the rental value to purchase two or more entire new plants. This amount of damage shows on its face that there is something radically wrong in the method of calculation, if compensation is to be taken as the proper measure: Brunell v. Cook, 13 Mont. 497, 34 Pac. 1015; Romberg v. Hughes, 18 Neb. 579, 26 N. W. 351.

In the charge of the court, the plaintiffs' second point, to the effect that damages should be allowed for detention measured by the ordinary market or rental value of the use of the property during the period of detention, was affirmed. If defendant had actually made use of the [48] property, there would naturally have been some depreciation in its value because of such use, and, when plaintiffs received possession, they would take it subject to this depreciation, for which they would be compensated in rental value. They could not recover both. There is here no evidence of the ordinary amount of depreciation by use, but in view of the fact that the rental value was so high in proportion to the amount of money invested, the depreciation, from a business point of view, must be considerable. If defendant did not use the property, the deterioration which it would have suffered by use must be deducted from the value of the use: Brunell v. Cook, 13 Mont. 497, 34 Pac. 1015; Peerless Mach. Co. v. Gates, 61 Minn. 124, 63 N. W. 260; White v. Sheffield, etc. St. R. Co. 90 Ala. 253, 7 So. 910, 24 Am. St. Rep. 772, and the jury should have been so instructed. They should also have been instructed to take into consideration the fact that plaintiffs might not have been able either to use or rent the tools and machinery continuously during the eleven months, and, if they so found, this fact would also materially reduce the measure of damages.

The amount of damages for detention should also bear some reasonable proportion to the value of the goods: Romberg v. Hughes, 18

Neb. 579, 26 N. W. 351, in the absence of evidence of extraordinary conditions or circumstances tending to enhance the damages above ordinary results: Brunell v. Cook, 13 Mont. 497, 34 Pac. 1015.

There was no error in the allowance of the amendment, even though the statute of limitations had run at the time it was made. It is true that the amended statement claims for an additional item of damage, to wit, the wrongful detention of the property, and alleges that, by reason thereof, plaintiffs lost the rental value to the extent of $18,000.00. In the original statement there was no claim for loss of the use of the machinery and tools, but only for the tools themselves. The criterion adopted for determining whether or not an amendment is within the statute of limitations, is whether the cause [49] of action has been changed: Rochester v. Kennedy, 229 Pa. St. 251, 78 Atl. 133. The cause of action in both the original and amended statements is the wrongful taking and detention of the property. In the amended statement there is no departure from this cause of action, but merely an additional claim of damages because of the detention of the property. It is well settled law that an amendment which merely introduces an additional element of damage drawn out of the same circumstances may be allowed at any time, as it does not introduce a new cause of action: Tassey v. Church, 4 Watts & S. 141, 39 Am. Dec. 65; Puritan Coal Min. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 237 Pa. St. 420, Ann. Cas. 1914B 37, 85 Atl. 426; Jackson v. Gunton, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 203.

The trial judge charged that if plaintiffs were entitled to damages for detention of their property, they were also entitled to additional damage for delay in payment not exceeding six per cent. In the original statement filed, no claim is made for damages for detention, nor was any such claim made until nearly seven years later, during which time plaintiffs were in possession of the property and failed to prosecute their claim for damages. Plaintiffs themselves were apparently in doubt as to their right to recover damages for the detention, and after waiting over six years without asserting their rights by prosecuting their claim to judgment, they are not now in a position to ask compensation for delay in payment.

There was no error in permitting plaintiffs to send out with the jury a calculation of the items of damage claimed. This is within the discretion of the court and is proper so long as the paper contains no items not supported by evidence and the jury are instructed that the calculations are not evidence but are merely to be used as an aid to their own calculations: Person, etc. Co. v. Lipps, 219 Pa. St. 99, 67 Atl. 1081; Anderson v.

Snyder, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 424. This was done in the present case. On a new trial, however, such calculations, if submitted, should be [50] governed by the measure of damages outlined in this opinion.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that in an action of replevin for the tools and machinery of a building contractor the plaintiff is entitled to recover as part of his damages the value of the use of the property during the time it was wrongfully detained by the defendant. In arriving at the amount to be allowed, it is held that, where the property was not used by the defendant, there must be deducted from the rental value of the property the amount of the depreciation which it would have suffered had it during that period been in use by the plaintiff. The cases discussing the right of a successful party in replevin to recover as damages the value of the use of his property during the period of its detention are reviewed in the note to Thomas v. Tecumseh First Nat. Bank, Ann. Cas. 1914A 376.

NORTHWEST STEEL COMPANY

v.

SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 16.

Oregon Supreme Court—May 25, 1915.

76 Oregon 321; 148 Pac. 1134.

Public Contracts — Failure to Require Bond — Liability of Municipality to Materialman.

One furnishing material to a contractor, erecting a schoolhouse for a school district which neglected to exact a bond required by L. O. L. § 6266, of anyone contracting with any school district for the construction of any building, with the additional obligation that he will promptly pay all materialmen, has a right of action against the district for damages consequent upon the contractor's insolvency leaving a balance due for the materials furnished.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Umatilla county: HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Northwest Steel Company, plaintiff, against School District No. 16 of Umatilla county, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. REVERSED.

[321] This is an action by the Northwest Steel Company, a private corporation, against School District No. 16 of Umatilla County, Oregon, a municipal corporation. The facts are as follows:

In January, 1912, the defendant school district entered into a contract with the Advance Construction Company for the erection of a schoolhouse, exacting from the said company a bond for the faithful performance of the terms and conditions of such contract, but failed to require any bond for the protection of materialmen and laborers in the collection of their claims. Plaintiff, a private corporation, furnished certain structural steel to be used in the erection of the building at the agreed price of $3,212. Certain payments were made by the contracting company upon the indebtedness thus incurred, but, while there was still [322] a balance of $810.70 due and unpaid thereon, the construction company became insolvent, and made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors, and is unable to pay this claim. Plaintiff sold and delivered the steel, not upon the credit of the construction company, but relying upon the presumption that the defendant would obey the mandate of Section 6266, L. O. L., which provides that:

"Any person or persons, firm or corporation, entering into a formal contract with the State of Oregon, or any municipality, county, or school district within said state . . . shall be required before commencing such work, to execute the usual penal bond with good and sufficient sureties, with the additional obligations that such contractor or contractors shall promptly make payments to all persons supplying him or them labor or materials for any prosecution of the work provided for in such contracts."

The above covers the substance of the allegations of the complaint, except as to certain details unnecessary to this discussion. The prayer of the complaint demands damages in the amount of plaintiff's unpaid claim, with interest. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, the action dismissed, with judgment in favor of defendant for its costs and disbursements, and plaintiff appeals.

A. R. Watzek, Platt & Platt and Raley & Raley for appellant.

Carter & Smythe for respondent.

[323] BENSON, J. (after stating the facts).—There is but one question to be determined, and that is: Has the materialman, under the facts stated, a right of action against the school district for damages by reason of the negligence of the defendant in failing to exact a bond such as is required by Section 6266, L. O. L.? Defendant contends, and the trial court held, that the requirements of the statute create a public, and not a corporate or municipal, liability and therefore the defendant is not liable in damages for failure to comply therewith. There appear to be but few cases in which the question as applied to statutes similar to ours has been considered, and our attention has been called to the decisions of only three states, which are Michigan, Minnesota, and Kansas. Of these, the Michigan cases support the contention of plaintiff, while those of Minnesota and Kansas maintain an interpretation favorable to the defense.

We shall first consider the Michigan statute (Public Acts 1883, No. 94) and decisions. The title of the act reads:

"An act to insure payment of wages earned, and for materials used in constructing, repairing, or ornamenting public buildings and public works."

Section 1 is as follows:

"That when public buildings, or other public works, are about to be built, repaired, or ornamented under contract, at the expense of this state, or of any county, city, village, township or school district thereof, upon which buildings or works liens might attach for labor or materials if belonging to private persons, it shall be the duty of the board officers or agents contracting on behalf of the state, county, city, village, township or school district, to require sufficient security, by bond, for the payment by the contractor, and all subcontractors [324] for all labor performed or materials furnished in the erection, repairing, or ornamenting of such building."

Then follow various provisions for making the act effective. The first reported case under this statute is that of Owen v. Hill, 67 Mich. 43, 34 N. W. 649, in which the trustees of a school district were made defendants in an action, similar to the one at bar, to recover damages sustained by the negligence of the defendants to exact the statutory bond. The court held that the act of requiring the bond is a ministerial act, involving no discretion, and consequently no judicial functions. The acts of fixing the amount in which the bond shall be given and of passing upon the sufficiency of the sureties are conceded to be, in a limited measure, judicial, but these acts were not the ones of which complaint was made. The opinion then discusses the question as to whether the requirements of the act constitute a public duty or a corporate one. Upon this point the court says:

"In this case the position was assumed by counsel for defendants that the duty imposed by the statute was a public duty, and the neglect to perform it only affected the public. If this were so, there would be no liability. But the contrary is, to my mind, the object and purpose of the law. The duty was imposed to protect individuals, and for the benefit of individual laborers and materialmen. That this is so is too plain for argument. No person can read the condition of the bond and not be satisfied that it was intended for the protection of the individuals who should furnish to the contractor or subcontractor either labor or material. Express provision of the law is that the bond shall be deposited for the use of any person interested therein, and that it may be prosecuted and recovery had by any person, etc., to whom any money shall be due and payable on account of having performed labor, [325] etc. The principle is this: "That if the duty which the official authority imposes upon an officer is a duty to the public, a failure to perform it, or an inadequate or erroneous performance, must be a public, not an individual, injury, and must be redressed; if at all, in some form of public prosecution. On the other hand, if the duty is a duty to the individual, then a neglect to perform it or to perform it properly, is an individual wrong, and may support an individual action for damages:" Cooley Torts, 379. I am aware that it may be regarded as a great hardship to impose this liability upon persons who accept office and perform burdens gratuitously. But the law makes no exceptions, and I can make none. It is presumed that they know the law, and the further presumption is that they will obey it. If they do not, on whom should the loss properly fall; on those who neglect to perform a duty enjoined by law, or those whom the law was designed to protect from loss?"

The leading Minnesota case is that of Ihk v. Duluth City, 58 Minn. 182, 59 N. W. 960. This was an action for damages incurred through the city's neglect to exact a bond, under the provisions of the municipal charter which are stated, in the opinion, to be as follows:

"That, whenever the board of public works shall award a contract for making any of the improvements mentioned in the subchapter, the person to whom it is awarded shall furnish to the city a bond with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the board of public works, conditioned that he will execute the work for the price mentioned in the bid and according to the plans and specifications, and that he will pay for all labor done and material furnished for said improvement."

The court holds that the city is not liable, for the reason that the duty to exact the bond is a public, and not a corporate, duty, and cites Dillon on Municipal [326] Corporations, Section 967, as the controlling test. In order to make clear the application, we quote the following from the opinion:

"The distinction between these two classes of duties, i. e., municipal or corporate duties, and public duties, and that for misfeasance or nonfeasance, that in the one case the municipality will be liable, and not in the other, is well established: 2 Dillon Mun. Corp. §§ 966, 967. The difficulty usually lies in determining what are to be deemed municipal or corporate duties and what public duties. The test suggested by Dillon in Section 967, that to be a municipal duty it must relate to the local or special interests of the municipality, is the most reasonable and satisfactory test, and was applied by this court in Bryant v. St. Paul, 33 Minn. 289, 23 N. W. 220, 53 Am. Rep. 31. Tried by that test, the duty to take a bond for security of laborers and materialmen was a public, and not a corporate, duty; in other words, it was imposed on the particular officers, and not on the corporation as such. It did not relate to the local or special interests of the municipality nor of its citizens. It was a matter of indifference to the city that those claims were or were not secured. Such a bond, when taken, operates as security not merely for those who reside in the city, but equally for those who reside elsewhere—in Wisconsin, for instance."

The leading Kansas case is that of Freeman v. Chanute, 63 Kan. 573, 66 Pac. 647. This was a similar action based upon a statute (Gen. Stats. Kan. 1901, § 5130; 1 Code Civ. Proc. § 638e) which reads, in part, as follows:

"Whenever any public officer shall, under the laws of the state, enter into contract in any sum exceeding $100 with any person or persons, for purpose of making any public improvements, or constructing any public building, or making repairs on the same, such officer shall take from the party contracted with a bond with good and sufficient sureties to the state of Kansas, in [327] a sum not less than the sum total in the contract, conditioned that such contractor or contractors shall pay all indebtedness incurred for labor or material furnished in the construction of said public building or in making said public improvements."

The act further provides for filing such bond with the clerk of the district court, and contains other details for making the act effective. The court held that the city was not liable, for the reason that the duty imposed by the statute was a public, and not a corporate, one, expressly following the case of Ihk v. Duluth, 58 Minn. 182, 59 N. W. 960, calling special attention to the fact that the duty to exact the bond is imposed, not upon the corporation itself, but upon the officer. We have set out pretty fully the holdings of the courts of the states which have passed upon the question before us for the purpose of comparison. It is noteworthy that in all three of the cases the statute places the burden of requiring the bond upon particular officers, while the Oregon statute treats of the corporation as an entity. They all agree that the controlling problem is to determine whether the duty enjoined by law is a public or a corporate one. The Michigan court takes for its test the language of Judge Cooley, which we reiterate:

"That if the duty which the official authority imposes upon an officer is a duty to the public, a failure to perform it, or an inadequate or erroneous performance, must be a public, not an individual, injury, and must be redressed, if at all, in some form of public prosecution. On the other hand, if the duty is a duty to the individual, then a neglect to perform it, or to perform it properly, is an individual wrong, and may support an individual action for damages." Cooley Torts, 379.

The others adopt as decisive the rule as expressed in Dillon's Municipal Corporations (4 ed.) Section 967, from which we quote:

[328] "Not only is the distinction just mentioned well established, but, as practically applied in the reported judgments of the courts, it has tended, in our judgment, to promote justice and to secure individual rights. This liability on the part of municipal corporations springs, as we think, from the particular nature of the duty enjoined, which must relate to the local or special interests of the municipality, and be imperative, and not discretionary, legislative or judicial, and from the means given for its performance, which must be ample, or such as were considered to be so by the legislature, and not from the supposed circumstance that they received and accepted their charters or grants of powers and franchises upon an implied contract with the state that they would discharge their corporate duties, and that this contract inures to the benefit of every individual interested in the performance."

We are unable to see that this section supports the contention for which it is cited, and we think that the quotation from Cooley on Torts is the authority applicable to the case at bar. It must not be forgotten that these laws were enacted for the purpose of protecting laborers and materialmen in cases wherein the lien laws are ineffective. To entertain the theory of the Minnesota and Kansas courts would be to thwart the plain purpose of the statute by invoking a doctrine whose application thereto is far fetched. We therefore conclude that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—69.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTE.

Liability of Municipality or Officer for Failure to Take from Contractor Bond for Protection of Laborers or Materialmen.

Liability for Municipality.

The duty of a municipality to require a contractor to give a bond for the protection of laborers and materialmen being wholly statutory, any liability for the failure to take a bond necessarily depends on the provisions of the various statutes, and so under the general rule that a municipality is not liable for the breach of a public as distinguished from a municipal or corporate duty, a laborer or a person furnishing material to a contractor cannot hold the municipality responsible for his losses unless the statute imposing the duty to take the bond expressly provides for such a liability. Pike County v. Norrington, 82 Ind. 190; Rock Island Lumber, etc. Co. v. Elliott, 59 Kan. 42, 51 Pac. 894; Freeman v. Chanute, 63 Kan. 573, 66 Pac. 647; Rhea County v. Sneed, 105 Tenn. 581, 58 S. W. 1063. See also Eaton v. Monroe, 63 Mich. 525, 29 N. W. 885.

The rule and the reason therefor were stated in Rock Island Lumber, etc. Co. v. Elliott, supra, as follows: "While the statute specifically requires a public officer to take the bond, it does not provide that the neglect of an officer to perform the duty so enjoined raises a liability against the public corporation for which he acts. A quasi-municipal corporation, like a school board, is never liable for the consequences of a breach of public duty or the neglect or wrong of its officers unless there is an express statute imposing the liability. Eikenberry v. Bazaar Tp. 22 Kan. 556; Marion County v. Riggs, 24 Kan. 255; 1 Beach on Public Corporations, § 739. No language in the statute imposes such liability or indicates a legislative purpose that public corporations shall suffer a penalty for the neglect of their officers. Whatever liability may be incurred by the officers themselves for a breach of public duty, it is certain that in the absence of an express statute imposing such liability the municipalities cannot be held liable for their neglect."

In Rhea County v. Sneed, 105 Tenn. 581, 58 S. W. 1063, the court, holding county commissioners to be liable personally for the failure to take a bond from the contractor but denying the liability of the county, said: "It does not follow, however, that the county is liable for the neglect of its commissioners. The duty of requiring the prescribed bond is by the statute devolved upon the 'public officer' charged with letting the contract, and for the failure to perform that duty, the statute declares 'such officer shall be guilty of a misdemeanor' (secs. 1 and 2). The duty and liability for its breach are imposed on the same person; consequently, these commissioners, who should have taken the bond, and not the county, are responsible for the omission disclosed in this case. The mere fact that the commissioners were appointees of the county and acting for it, does not render it responsible for their failure to take the bond. Their departure from the course of duty in this regard was in no legal sense the act of the county, nor one for which any statute fixes liability upon the county. It is a general rule that a private action cannot be maintained against a county for damages arising from the neglect of its officers in connection with public highways, unless some statute confers the right to do so."

In Pike County v. Norrington, 82 Ind. 190, it was said: "The Act of March 14th, 1877, as its title indicates, was passed to 'indemnify counties against loss' upon contracts made by county boards for the construction or repairs of public buildings. Certainly, it was not contemplated by the legislature, in the enactment of that act, that if, from any cause, the board of commissioners of any county should fail or neglect to require of and receive from the contractor, for the construction or repairs of any county building, the bond provided for in the first section of the act, the county should be held liable to any third party for any loss or damages which might be claimed to result from such failure or neglect. There is nothing in the act which imposes any liability upon the county in such a case; and the courts are not authorized to extend the provisions of the act by construction, so as to impose such liability upon the county."

Without directly determining the liability of a municipality under the statute requiring it to take a bond from contractors, the court in Woodward Lumber Co. v. Grantville, 13 Ga. App. 405, 79 S. E. 221, refused to hold a town liable to a person furnishing material to the contractor on the ground that the neglect of the materialman to ascertain whether a bond had been given barred his right of action. In that case it was said: "The lumber company furnishing material to the contractor was bound at its peril to ascertain the terms of the contract and of the bond executed by the contractor. If it knew the terms of the bond, it furnished the material at its peril. If it did not know that the municipality had failed to take the bond required by the Act of 1910, it was guilty of gross negligence, because the contract and bond were matters of public record in the office of the municipal corporation and open to the inspection of all those interested in ascertaining their terms. So that, without discussing the general liability or municipal corporations under section 897 of the Civil Code, or undertaking to determine what are legislative or judicial powers and what are ministerial duties, we are very clear that the petition set forth no cause of action; for the plaintiff has sustained loss as much on account of its own negligence in failing to ascertain the terms of the bond as on account of the failure of the municipality to take the bond required by the Act of 1910."

However, the legislature has the power to make a public corporation responsible for damages resulting from its failure to perform a governmental duty, and in some jurisdictions it is expressly provided by statute that the failure of a municipality to require a bond for the contractor shall render it liable to persons furnishing the contractor with labor or materials. Black v. Polk County, 97 Minn. 487, 107 N. W. 560; Wilcox Lumber Co. v. School Dist. No. 268, 103 Minn. 43, 114 N. W. 262; Waterous Engine Works Co. v. Clinton, 110 Minn. 267, 125 N. W. 269; Scott-Graff Lumber Co. v. Independent School Dist. No. 1, 112 Minn. 474, 128 N. W. 672; Plumbing Supply Co. v. Board of Education, 32 S. D. 129, 270, 142 N. W. 260, 1131; Handelan v. Smee School Dist. No. 4 (S. D.) 159 N. W. 888; Maxon v. School Dist. No. 34, 5 Wash. 142, 31 Pac. 462, 32 Pac. 110; Pacific Mfg. Co. v. School Dist. No. 7, 6 Wash. 121, 33 Pac. 68; Wadsworth v. School Dist. No. 1, 7 Wash. 485, 35 Pac. 371; Puget Sound Brick, etc. Co. v. School Dist. No. 73, 12 Wash. 118, 40 Pac. 608; Rounds v. Whatcom County, 22 Wash. 106, 60 Pac. 139; Gate City Lumber Co. v. Montesano, 60 Wash. 586, 111 Pac. 799; Gate City Lumber Co. v. Montesano, 67 Wash. 594, 122 Pac. 26; Hambach v. Ward, 69 Wash. 351, 125 Pac. 140; Crab Creek Lumber Co. v. Othello, 81 Wash. 52, 142 Pac. 429. And see the reported case wherein it is held that under the Oregon statute the corporation is treated as an entity and its duty to take the bond being a corporate duty rather than a public one, it is liable for a failure to exact it. Compare Ihk v. Duluth City, 58 Minn. 182, 59 N. W. 960, decided prior to the enactment of the statute specifically making the municipality liable.

Under the Minnesota statute it has been held that the liability of a municipality does not arise unless the laborer or materialman has been actually damaged through the inability to collect his claim from the contractor. Wilcox Lumber Co. v. School Dist. No. 268, 103 Minn. 43, 114 N. W. 262; Waterous Engine Works Co. v. Clinton, 110 Minn. 269, 125 N. W. 269; Scott-Graff Lumber Co. v. Independent School Dist. No. 1, 112 Minn. 474, 128 N. W. 672. In Wilcox Lumber Co. v. School Dist. No. 268, supra, the nature and extent of the liability under the statute was stated as follows: "The statute provides that, in case a bond is not required by the officers, the corporation shall be liable for any loss sustained by any person furnishing labor or material under the contract. This language is significant, and it seems clear that the legislature did not intend to create an absolute liability on the part of the corporation, where the bond was not given, to the full extent of the obligations incurred by the contractor, but only to the extent of the contractor's failure and inability to pay the debts incurred by him. The liability thus created is analogous to that of indemnity contracts against loss or damage or a guaranty of collection of commercial paper, and extends only to losses actually suffered by those dealing with the contractor. . . . If the contractor in any such case be able to pay all debts incurred by him in the work, no loss occurs to those trusting him and no liability attaches to the corporation. If, on the other hand, he is unable to pay and cannot be compelled to pay by resort to legal proceedings, a loss does occur, within the meaning of the law, and the corporation becomes liable therefor."

But under the South Dakota statute (chap. 245, Laws 1909) it has been held that the liability of a municipality does not depend on the insolvency of the contractor. Handelan v. Smee School Dist. No. 4 (S. D.) 159 N. W. 888, wherein it was said: "It is sufficient to say that under this statute the liability of the corporation and the right of plaintiff to maintain the action are not predicated upon the insolvency of the principal contractor, as it is under a somewhat similar statute of Minnesota. . . . The statute in terms declares that a failure or neglect to require the bond creates a liability against the district in favor of any person who shall have performed labor or furnished any material that entered into the erection of the building, and such liability arises by force of the statute, without regard to the solvency or insolvency of the principal contractor."

In Washington it has been held that it is not necessary that the indebtedness shall have been established by prior suit against the contractor, nor is it necessary to make the contractor a party to the suit against the municipality. Maxon v. School Dist. No. 34, 5 Wash. 142, 31 Pac. 462, 32 Pac. 110. And so, it was held in Pacific Mfg. Co. v. School Dist. No. 7, 6 Wash. 121, 33 Pac. 68, that it was not necessary that the school district should be made a party to an action against the contractor, in order later to subject the district to liability under the statute requiring bonds to be taken.

Likewise it has been held that the failure to give the notice of the claim provided for by the statute does not defeat the right of action against the city. Gate City Lumber Co. v. City of Montesano, 60 Wash. 586, 111 Pac. 799; Crab Creek Lumber Co. v. Othello, 81 Wash. 52, 142 Pac. 429. In the case first cited, it was said: "It is next contended that the notice prescribed by section 3 (Id. § 1161) of the act was not given. Such notice is only required when the statutory bond has been taken. The notice is for the protection of sureties, and has no application to a case like this where no bond was in fact taken. In such cases the liability of the city is made absolute by section 2 of the act."

Though a bond is given, if it is taken for an insufficient amount, a municipality is liable for any loss that may occur. Waterous Engine Works Co. v. Clinton, 110 Minn. 267, 125 N. W. 269; Puget Sound Brick, etc. Co. v. School Dist. No. 73, 12 Wash. 118, 40 Pac. 608. And so where the bond is invalid because of improper conditions, a municipality may be held liable under the statute as if no bond had been given. Scott-Graff Lumber Co. v. Independent School Dist. No. 1, 112 Minn. 474, 128 N. W. 672.

Where the contract is invalid for the reason that it is in excess of the authorized limit of municipal indebtedness, it has been held that no liability attaches to the city for the failure to take the bond required by the statute. Kettle River Quarries Co. v. East Grand Forks, 96 Minn. 290, 104 N. W. 1077. But where the contract is one which the authorities are authorized to carry on, it has been held that the city cannot escape liability for failure to take a bond on the ground that the contract is not legally executed, particularly when the city has accepted the work. Hambach v. Ward, 69 Wash. 351, 125 Pac. 140.

The Washington statute has been held to be inapplicable to persons furnishing labor or material to a contractor for a street improvement contract on the ground that by the terms of the statute it is limited to contracts where the right to a mechanic's lien would exist provided the same work was done for an individual. Clough v. Spokane, 7 Wash. 279, 34 Pac. 934. And in Wallace v. Skagit County, 8 Wash. 457, 36 Pac. 252, the statute was held to be inapplicable where the contract was for purely local work. The two foregoing cases were explained and distinguished in Rounds v. Whatcom County, 22 Wash. 106, 60 Pac. 139, wherein it was said: "The cases from this court which are cited deserve special notice. The first is Clough v. Spokane, 7 Wash. 279, 34 Pac. 934, in which it was held that, where a city is grading and improving streets at the exclusive cost and expense of the abutting property, it is not required to take the bond provided by § 2415, supra. But an examination of that case discloses that the reason for the holding is not because the city authorities are merely statutory agents, but because it was ruled that no right of lien existed for work of that character when performed for a private individual. Sears v. Williams, 9 Wash. 428, 37 Pac. 665, presented a similar question, and neither of these cases is analogous to the case at bar. In Wallace v. Skagit County, 8 Wash. 457, 36 Pac. 252, this court held that the construction of a local ditch, the cost of which was payable solely by the district benefited, was not such a county improvement as required the commissioners to take a bond. It was there held that the construction of such a ditch was not a county improvement, but a purely local one, and that the commissioners acted as the statutory agents of the improvers. We do not care to extend the doctrine of that case beyond what was there decided, but the present case is easily distinguishable from that one. The improvement in the present case was something more than merely local improvement for the benefit of a particular district. It was a county improvement in the broadest sense of that term. The sole authority to build county roads, under our law, rests in the county commissioners of the various counties and in the boards of construction which they are authorized to appoint."

Liability of Officer.

The decisions are not in accord as to the liability of a public officer for the failure to take a bond from the contractor for the protection of laborers and materialmen. In some jurisdictions it is held that the duty to take a bond imposed by the statute is an administrative or ministerial duty, for the neglect of which an action will lie by an individual of the class for whose benefit the bond is required, for any injury sustained by him. Stephenson v. Monmouth Min. etc. Co. 84 Fed. 114, 28 C. C. A. 292 (construing the Michigan statute); Owen v. Hill, 67 Mich. 43, 34 N. W. 649; Plummer v. Kennedy, 79 Mich. 295, 40 N. W. 433; Wells v. Board of Education, 78 Mich. 260, 44 N. W. 267; Staffon v. Lyon, 104 Mich. 249, 62 N. W.

354; Smith v. Hubbell, 142 Mich. 637, 106 N. W. 547; Michaels v. McRoy, 148 Mich. 577, 112 N. W. 129; Michaels v. McRoy, 158 Mich. 605, 123 N. W. 37; C. A. Burton Machinery Co. v. Ruth (Mo.) 186 S. W. 737; Rhea County v. Sneed, 105 Tenn. 581, 58 S. W. 1063; Hardison v. Yeaman, 115 Tenn. 639, 91 S. W. 111. See also Alpena v. Title Guaranty, etc. Co. 158 Mich. 678, 123 N. W. 536; Templeton v. Nipper, 107 Tenn. 548, 64 S. W. 889. Compare Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. School Dist. 79 Mo. App. 665 (decided before the statute was amended so as to require the officers personally to take the bond).

The rule was stated in Owen v. Hill, supra, as follows: "The mere act of requiring a bond is a ministerial act involving no discretion, and consequently no judicial functions. In addition to requiring the bond the law requires that they shall first fix the amount in which the bond shall be given, and second they shall pass upon the sufficiency of the sureties. These two requirements doubtless involve in a limited measure the exercise of judicial functions. I do not think these functions are so connected with the ministerial duty of requiring the bond as to be inseparable, nor do I think that the performance of one involves the exercise of the other. In neglecting to require a bond at all, the board neglected the performance of a plain ministerial duty imposed by statute, and it is well settled that, when the law casts any duty upon a person which he refuses or fails to perform, he is answerable in damages to those whom his refusal or failure injures."

And in Rhea County v. Sneed, 105 Tenn. 581, 58 S. W. 1063, it was said: "The object of chapter 182 of the Act of 1899, as recited in the title, is 'to protect laborers and furnishers of materials on public works.' The first section prohibits the letting of 'any public work' for the city, county, or state 'until the contractor shall first execute a good and solvent bond to the effect that he will pay for all materials and labor used in said contract.' The second and fourth sections authorize every unpaid laborer and materialman, who has given the prescribed notice of his demand, to bring an action upon that bond in his own name; and the third section makes it a misdemeanor for any officer to let a contract for any public work without requiring the bond provided for in the first section. Undoubtedly the structure erected by the Groton Bridge Company was a 'public work' within the contemplation of this act and the county's commissioners were as certainly guilty of a misdemeanor in letting the contract without first taking the required bond. Under a well-established rule of law, that marked dereliction of positive duty on the part of the commissioners constitutes negligence per se, and renders them liable not only to a criminal prosecution for the statutory misdemeanor, but also to a civil action for damages resulting to laborers and materialmen who would have been protected by the prescribed bond if executed."

Failure to give the statutory notice of claims will not defeat the right of action against the officer for failure to take the required bond. Hardison v. Yeaman, 115 Tenn. 639, 91 S. W. 1111. Nor does the fact that one who furnishes materials to the contractor relies on a mistaken belief in his right to a mechanic's lien relieve the officers from liability for failure to take the bond. Michaels v. McRoy, 158 Mich. 605, 123 N. W. 37.

However, the officers are not individually liable where the bond taken is defective in form or the sureties are insufficient, if in taking the bond they act in good faith. Stephenson v. Monmouth Min. etc. Co. 84 Fed. 114, 28 C. C. A. 292; Huebner v. Nims, 132 Mich. 657, 94 N. W. 180; Sailing v. Morrell, 97 Neb. 454, 150 N. W. 195. The rule was stated in Sailing v. Morrell, supra, as follows: "We do not think the defendants are liable individually, for the reason that it is neither pleaded nor proved that their action was wilfully wrong. On the contrary, the evidence clearly shows that defendants acted in good faith and required the giving of a bond which they evidently thought was sufficient to protect all parties interested. For an error of official judgment they are not individually liable." And in Huebner v. Nims, supra, it was said: "In the case before us the board of trustees undertook to comply with the provisions of the statute, and, before accepting the bonds, sought counsel as to their duty. It was not until after the bonds had been accepted, and the contract signed, that the board learned from one of the sureties that his property was not in this state, but in Windsor, he at the same time saying he had property of the requisite value in Windsor. The record is clear, we think, that the board acted in good faith, meaning to comply with the provisions of the law. . . . While the board might be liable for neglect to act at all, if they had in good faith attempted to comply with the statute, there would be no liability. There is no safety in any other rule. It is for the board to determine the amount for which the bond shall be given, and the sufficiency of the sureties. In deciding these essentials it is acting at least quasi judicially, and for an error of judgment its members are not to be mulcted in damages."

Also, it has been held that before a materialman can recover against the officers personally he must show that he was injured by the failure to require the bond and where he fails to show that the contractor is unwilling or unable to pay his claim he cannot recover. Michaels v. McRoy, 148 Mich. 577, 112 N. W. 129. And it has been held that statutes requiring officers of a municipality to take a bond from a contractor for the protection of laborers and materialmen are not applicable to subcontractors. Avery v. Ionia County, 71 Mich. 538, 39 N. W. 742; Templeton v. Nipper, 107 Tenn. 548, 64 S. W. 889. Similarly, it has been held that the Michigan statute was not applicable to the regents of the state university as the statute omitted them in its enumeration of the state, counties, cities, villages, townships and school districts as the municipalities which were required to exact the bond. Weinberg v. University of Michigan, 97 Mich. 246, 56 N. W. 605.

In other jurisdictions it is held that the failure of an officer to take the bond required by the statute for the protection of laborers and materialmen does not make him personally liable for any losses they may sustain. Blanchard v. Burns, 110 Ark. 515, 162 S. W. 63, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1199; Fore v. Feimster, 171 N. C. 551, L.R.A.1016F 481, 88 S. E. 977; Bushnell v. Haynes (Okla.) 156 Pac. 343. In Blanchard v. Burns, supra, it was sought to hold the directors of a school district individually liable for materials furnished under the Arkansas statute (Acts 1911, p. 463) which provided as follows: "Whenever any public officer shall, under the laws of this state, enter into a contract in any sum exceeding one hundred dollars, with any person or persons, for the purpose of making any public improvements, or constructing any public building, or making any repairs on the same, such officer shall take from the party contracted with a bond with good and sufficient sureties to the state of Arkansas, in a sum not less than double the sum total of the contract whose qualifications shall be verified, and such sureties shall be approved by the clerk of the circuit court in the county in which the property is situated, conditioned that such contractor or contractors shall pay all indebtedness for labor and material furnished in the construction of said public building, or in making said public improvements." The court construing the statute said: "It will be observed that the statute does not, in terms, impose any liability, either on the school district or the officers. If any liability exists at all, it must be by virtue of a breach of duty by the directors as individuals. The language of the statute, in referring to the officers, does so in an official, and not in an individual, capacity. It is not intended to impose any duty as individuals, but as officials representing the public. In other words, so far as it applies to improvements made for a school district, it means the district itself, and the duty is only imposed on the officers as the representatives of the district, collectively, in their representative capacity, and not as individuals."

As a further reason why the directors could not be held liable, it was pointed out in Blanchard v. Burns, supra, that the statute required that bonds given thereunder should be recorded so that all persons dealing with the contractor might know whether the bond had been executed, and as no such bond was recorded it was held that the materialman was chargeable with notice thereof, and therefore could not impose liability either on the district or the directors when he knew or could have known that no bond had been given.

In Bushnell v. Haynes (Okla.) 156 Pac. 343, a similar reason for refusing to hold county officers liable was given, the court saying: "All men are charged with knowledge of the law, and men who sell material to public improvement contractors are charged with knowledge of that condition which the law implies as being a part of the contract of every such contractor; and, if they sell material to such contractors before their contracts have been made effective by the filing of the bond which the law requires, they do so at their own peril, and if they sustain losses thereby, the proximate cause thereof is their own negligence, and not that of the contracting officers, because if the contracting officers have neglected to write into the contract in express terms that which the law says shall be there, the law, by its own operation, puts it there by implication."

In Fore v. Feimster, 171 N. C. 551, 88 S. E. 977, L.R.A.1916F 481, the court based its holding that county commissioners were not liable on the wording of the statute requiring counties, cities, towns or other municipal corporations to take such bonds. In that case it was said: "These boards of commissioners, charged with manifold and important duties in the governance and well ordering of their counties, many of them legislative or quasi-judicial in their nature, serving oftentimes at great personal sacrifice, should not be held individually responsible unless clearly made so by express enactment or some imperative principle of law, and, while the duty in this case is no doubt ministerial when proper weight is given to the language of the statute itself, imposing the duty on 'counties, cities, towns or other municipal corporations,' thus in terms creating a corporate duty, and to the fact that, in the body of the law applicable, whenever individual liability has been heretofore desired, express provision has been made for it, we are of opinion that it is the correct interpretation of this legislation that, in its coercive features, the remedy is confined to that given by the statute itself, to wit, by indictment, and that no civil liability on the individual members of the board is intended or permissible. The entire body of law applicable to this subject, being in pari materia, is to be construed as one and the same statute, and the fact that the legislature, having created in terms a corporate duty, has imposed the personal liability in the one case and failed to do so in the other is equivalent to a legislative declaration that, in the latter instance, the liability does not exist."

IN RE GRANING ET AL.

IN RE POWERS.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit—January 11, 1916.

229 Fed. 370.

Bankruptcy — Accounting for Assets — Improbable Testimony by Bankrupt.

On a Saturday about two weeks before bankruptcy, the members of a partnership received a check for $2,000, and instead of depositing it they drew it out in bills from the bank upon which the check was drawn. On returning to their place of business about 12:30 they dismissed their bookkeeper for the day, and, as they claimed, put the money in their safe. Though they were at the store nearly all the afternoon, and though the store was locked when they left, and though there was nothing to show that the store or the safe was broken open, or that anything unusual happened, they claimed the money was not there the following Monday. They told the bookkeeper on Monday to charge the $2,000 to expenses, but later directed her to change the entry and charge it to materials, and one of them testified that he did this because he thought it would look better to creditors. It is held that, while the trustee, seeking to compel the turning over of this money to him, had the burden of proving that the money was in the bankrupt's possession by evidence which was clear and convincing, he did this, and the burden was shifted to the bankrupts to show what became of the money.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The bankrupts utterly failed to give any satisfactory or reasonable explanation as to what became of the money, and the court erred in refusing to adjudge them in contempt for failing to restore it to the estate.

[See note at end of this case.]

Burden of Proof — Concealment of Assets.

While the burden of proving the concealment of assets by a bankrupt is upon the trustee, he is not required to produce positive proof of an agreement to conceal, followed by proof that the property was actually abstracted, and such proof is usually established by presumptions drawn from the facts.

Petition to Revise Order of United States District Court, Western District of New York.

In matter of Charles T. Graning et al., individually and as copartners doing business under firm name of Graning and Wellman, bankrupts. Motion by John R. Powers, trustee, for order adjudging bankrupts in contempt denied. Trustee files petition to revise. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Isaac Adler for trustee.

Hampton H. Halsey for bankrupts.

Sitting: LACOMBE, COXE and ROGERS, Circuit Judges.

[371] COXE, J.—This is an appeal from an order denying the trustee's motion for an order adjudging the bankrupts in contempt for not restoring to the estate $1,975 alleged to have been fraudulently taken and concealed by the bankrupts. The referee had previously decided that the money should be returned upon the ground that the proof was insufficient to show that the bankrupts were not in possession of the money when the petition was filed.

Briefly, these are the facts. About two weeks before the petition was filed in bankruptcy the bankrupts received a check for $2,000. This was on Saturday, January 9, 1915, about noon. Instead of depositing the money in their own bank they drew it out in bills from the Alliance Bank, upon which the check was drawn. At 12:30 they [372] reached their own place of business. The bookkeeper, Miss Coleman, was there when they arrived and she was told that she need not return again that afternoon. This was an unusual occurrence, such a dismissal not having taken place since the preceeding summer. Wellman testified that he put all the money in the cash drawer of the safe, the amount being $1,975. The bankrupts were at the store nearly all the afternoon. This was the last seen of the money. The bankrupts concededly had this money on Saturday afternoon when it was last seen.

It is true that the trustee must prove that it was in the bankrupts' possession by evidence which is clear and convincing. This he has done. The burden is then shifted to the bankrupts to show what has become of it. This the bankrupts have utterly failed to do. What possible reason was there for getting the money in bills Saturday afternoon when they could have deposited the check in their bank? If they deposited it in their own safe, which was a most unusual thing to do on Saturday afternoon, it must have been there when they returned the Monday following. It was not there. There is not a particle of proof that the store or safe was broken open or that anything unusual had happened at the store. So far as accounting for the money they might as well have testified that they put the bills in a box in the front window of the store expecting to find it when they returned on Monday. Their story is too improbable for human credence. It does not even have the merit of ingenuity which is sometimes shown in the attempt to conceal assets. There is not a particle of credible evidence that the store or safe was robbed. When the bankrupts left on Saturday afternoon, the doors were locked and they were the last persons to leave on that day. When they came to the store on Saturday afternoon no mention of the money was given to the bookkeeper, Miss Coleman, and of course no entry was made in the books. On her return on Monday morning she inquired of the bankrupt Wellman what entry she should make of the transaction and was told to charge the $2,000 to expense but later he directed her to change the entry from "expense" to "materials," which was done. When asked why this change was made Wellman testified that he thought it would look better to creditors. There was no evidence that the store was entered between Saturday afternoon and Monday morning or that the safe had been opened. There was testimony that the safe might be unlocked by turning the knob, but, if this were so, it seems incredible that any sane man would place $1,975 in such a safe and leave it there from Saturday afternoon until Monday.

In a similar case arising in the Southern District of New York, Judge Addison Brown said:

"No account is given of what disposition was made of the $2,000, which it is said was received in bills, except that they were paid out, or deposited. There is no corresponding deposit in the bank book. In several details of his testimony the bankrupt's evidence was inconsistent and contradictory, and was in some particulars proved to be false. The referee considered it incredible that the bankrupt was as ignorant of his business and his payments as he professed to be, and he did not consider him worthy of belief. No special losses, and no special causes of loss in business, were intimated by the bankrupt in his testimony." In re Schlesinger, 97 Fed. 930.

[373] This court in the In re Weber Co. 200 Fed. 404, 118 C. C. A. 556, said:

"Upon the application to punish for contempt he made no explanation as to how or why it was that this particular sum had disappeared, merely denying that he ever had it. His statement that he had no money when the proceeding for contempt was instituted, without some such explanation, was insufficient, and the judge quite properly held him in contempt for not paying it over. To excuse disobedience of the order by such general denial would make it easy to evade the requirements of the Bankruptcy Act [Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544]."

If such excuses as are here interposed are permitted, it will put a premium upon fraud and make deception easy. These bankrupts on Saturday afternoon had in their possession $2,000. The drawing of this money in bills from a bank other than their own was an unusual proceeding. In the ordinary course the $2,000 check would have been deposited in their own bank. No satisfactory explanation is given of the necessity of having so large an amount of specie at such a time. No plausible reason is given for carrying such a large sum of money over Sunday in a safe which could easily be opened. Is it credible that men possessed of ordinary intelligence would do an act so inexcusably careless? It is true that the burden of proving the concealment of assets is upon the trustee; he is not required to produce positive proof of an agreement to conceal followed by proof that the property was actually abstracted by the bankrupt. Such proof is usually established by presumptions drawn from facts. In the case at bar we have on Saturday afternoon $2,000 in the possession of the bankrupts. On Monday morning the money has disappeared. No one else is shown to have access to the money, no robbery is shown, no fire has taken place and nothing but the most improbable suggestions are offered as an explanation for the disappearance of the money. To sustain such excuses puts a premium on fraud. The bankrupts here are shown to have been in possession of the $2,000 and they have not shown any plausible excuse for not producing it.

The order of the District Court is reversed and the order of the referee is affirmed.

I. Introductory.

Bankrupts, in order to explain their disposition of money, their failure to turn over assets, or an apparent deficiency in funds, frequently adduce for the consideration of the court improbable stories, ranging all the way from the boldest and most patent inventions to fictions of the most artistic workmanship, and sometimes even adduce stories of proved truth which are stranger than fiction.

As was said in the case of In re Leslie, 119 Fed. 406, 408, "a witness may be as thoroughly discredited by the inherent improbabilities of his testimony as by the direct testimony of witnesses." And the courts have frequently, as in the reported case, applied this principle to the stories of bankrupts. The purpose of this note is to review, from the standpoint of the facts and the improbable testimony itself, cases in bankruptcy in which the decision has turned on the inherent improbability or incredibility of the testimony presented by the bankrupt. Cases of this nature arise mainly in three ways: (1) Under an order directing the bankrupt to pay assets to the trustee; (2) in contempt proceedings against a bankrupt for failure to pay assets over to the trustee under order of court; and (3) on an application by a bankrupt for discharge, when creditors file specifications in opposition to the discharge on the ground that the bankrupt has fraudulently concealed or disposed of assets.

For an interesting treatment of the general subject of incredibilities and improbabilities in evidence, see 1 Moore on Facts 179. And for a complete consideration of the question of the withdrawal of unreasonable testimony from the consideration of the jury, see the notes to Wolf v. City, etc. R. Co. 15 Ann. Cas. 1181, and Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Chambers, reported ante, this volume, at page 471.

II. Testimony Not Believed.

1. INCREDIBLE IGNORANCE OF BUSINESS.

Testimony by a bankrupt that he had no remembrance of what he did with over $24,000, drawn by him from his bank deposit shortly before the filing of this petition, has been held to show such an incredible ignorance of his own business as to be unworthy of belief. In re Schlesinger, 97 Fed. 930, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 342, wherein it was said: "In the summary of facts, the referee finds that upwards of $12,000, which has come into the possession of the bankrupt during the seven or eight months preceding the filing of the petition, was in no way satisfactorily accounted for. Debts for merchandise to the amount of nearly $18,000 during that period are unpaid; the stock was made up and sold, and the proceeds all collected, except the remaining stock and debts to the amount of about $3,200. During the same period the bankrupt deposited as shown by his bank pass book, $24,465.85, all of which was drawn out, the last on April 17th, three days before his petition was filed. The bankrupt kept no books of account. The check book was not produced, and all checks returned were destroyed. No account could be extracted from him as to what was done with these moneys, except that they were paid out. To all inquiries for particulars, his answer was, 'I don't know,' or 'I don't remember.' He was contemplating an application in bankruptcy for about a month prior to filing his petition. From the 17th of March to the 17th of April he deposited in his bank about $4,600. His book was balanced on the 17th of April, and according to the entry in the pass book, 244 vouchers were then returned to him, amounting to $13,300.16 from the previous December 30th. Though counsel had already been employed by him for the preparation of his petition in bankruptcy, all these 244 vouchers the bankrupt said were destroyed by him as soon as received, and nothing can be ascertained as to whom or for what these payments were made. The bankrupt further testified that in March he received $2,000 for the conveyance of his equity in a house and lot, 34 E. Fourth street. The deed was dated March 23rd and recorded April 20th the same day his petition in bankruptcy was filed. The grantee being absent in Europe, he could not be examined. No account is given of what disposition was made of the $2,000 which it is said were received in bills, except that they were paid out, or deposited. There is no corresponding deposit in the bank book. In several details of his testimony the bankrupt's evidence was inconsistent and contradictory and was in some particulars proved to be false. The referee considered it incredible that the bankrupt was as ignorant of his business and his payments as he professed to be, and he did not consider him worthy of belief. No special losses, and no special causes of loss in business, were intimated by the bankrupt in his testimony. It is seldom, I think, that so open a defiance of the requirements of the bankrupt law is met with. The examination of the bankrupt was begun on May 9th, while in his business transactions were yet recent. The ignorance he professed in regard to the disposition of his money, is altogether incredible. I cannot regard his testimony on this subject as other than a tissue of perjuries. The destruction of vouchers while his papers in bankruptcy were preparing is not consistent with any other inference than the intent to conceal the facts and defraud his creditors. . . . It is no doubt correct, as the referee observes, that no order for the payment of money 'should be made unless the testimony in the case is such as to satisfy one beyond a reasonable doubt that the same is in fact in the possession or under the control of the bankrupt;' and great caution should no doubt be observed in applying this remedy. . . . A debtor, however, is not to go scot free because the precise amount of his frauds and concealments is not ascertainable; nor should the bankrupt act be suffered to be paralyzed, as respects the interests of creditors, by such means. Upon the evidence I cannot conceive that a jury of merchants would for a moment hesitate in declaring that beyond all reasonable doubt the bankrupt has concealed a large amount of his property."

In a case where the testimony showed a balance of over $5,000 worth of goods unaccounted for by a bankrupt woman tradesman, with no further explanation on her part than that occasionally she had been absent from the store and had left it in charge of her husband and son, the court said that it was unreasonable that she should be so ignorant of her business as not to know what disposition had been made of so large an amount of stock, and held that she must either have been in possession of the goods or their value, or have known where they were, and ordered her to be committed until she accounted or turned the amount of $3,000 over to the trustee. In re Deuell, 100 Fed. 633, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 60, wherein the court said: "By her own statement she had on hand goods, about the 1st of July, 1899, invoiced at $1,700. Between that time and the making of her deed of assignment, about the 1st of December, 1899, she had obtained on credit from a large number of merchants, at various distant points, goods aggregating $10,000. Of these she purchased, in October, $2,649, and in November, $2,282, for none of which she had paid up to the time of her assignment and the proceeding in bankruptcy against her in the fore part of December, 1899. Taking credit for every conceivable payment, outlay, and expenditure between July and the time of the assignment, it would not exceed, $2,300. She claims that the value of the goods by her turned over to the assignee was $2,193.50. If this were conceded to be correct, the aggregate credit to which she is entitled would amount to $4,493.50. But the evidence shows that the cost price of the goods turned over to the assignee did not exceed $1,200, and the sum realized by the trustee in bankruptcy out of these assets does not exceed but little over $500. Some of the goods surreptitiously sent away from the store during the fall of 1899, which have been traced by the trustee, would amount to about, say in round numbers, $400. Adding this to the $2,300, as claimed expenditure by her, and the $1,200 worth of goods turned over to the assignee, would make an aggregate of $3,900; or, if she were allowed $2,193.50, claimed by her to have been the value of the goods turned over to the assignee, it would make an aggregate of $4,893.50, which, on the most favorable view to her, would leave unaccounted for $5,106.50. This leaves out of view the goods invoiced the 1st of July, 1899. She testified before this court that the goods shipped to her from July to the time of the assignment were put into the store, and sold. She denies that any of the goods thus unaccounted for were shipped or spirited away; thus leaving, according to her own showing, as already stated, $5,106.50 worth of goods, at their invoice price, unaccounted for. She kept no book account, from July forward, giving an account of sales or the cash taken in; no accounts against debtors for goods sold are found; no money was deposited in the bank to her credit; and, when inquired of as to what explanation she had to make to account for such great discrepancy, her only answer was that she had none to make. When asked if she did not talk this matter over with her husband and son, who were assisting her in running the store, and ascertain what explanation they gave, or as to what theory they had to account therefor, her answer was equally uncertain and indefinite. As the goods were not on hand when she was declared a bankrupt, and as she claims the goods had not been spirited away, and testified that they had been received and sold, the conclusion is irresistible that she must have the money in her possession, or that she knows who did receive it, and who has it. The business was conducted in her name. She thus published to the world that she was capable of transacting business, and she obtained credit for these goods upon the faith of her credibility and business capacity. Shall she be permitted thus to obtain property of other people, secrete and appropriate it, without even so much as rendering any intelligible account thereof, and escape the pains and penalties imposed by the bankrupt law, simply because she is a woman, and under the naked assumption, or bare possibility, that her husband and son embezzled the proceeds of these goods? When she assumed the office of a tradesman she became amenable to its obligations and responsibilities. She claims that part of the time—through the fall of 1899—she was sick, and was not at the store all the time; that her husband and son were, as theretofore, in charge, acting for her; but her own evidence is that these absences from the store were only occasional, and only for a few days at a time, so that it is quite inferable that during all this time she was at the store frequently enough to have been fully advised of what was going on in the business; and she must be presumed, as she is an intelligent woman, to have looked sufficiently into the daily and weekly transactions to have been fully advised of the disposition of the goods, and to have known where the money was."

A remarkable scheme of fraudulent cotton sales, by means of which a cotton company handled nearly two million dollars in less than five months, was disclosed, and the bankrupt respondent's story as to his participation in the scheme was held to be unreasonable and incredible, in the case of Re Alphin, etc. Cotton Co. 134 Fed. 477, wherein the money raising scheme was stated by the court as follows: "The liabilities of the cotton company about which there is no dispute are $381,636.93. How this large indebtedness could have been incurred within so short a time seems incredible but for the fact that the evidence conclusively establishes that the entire business was conceived in fraud, and was carried on for no other purpose. At the time of the organization respondent owed over $118,000 to banks in Little Rock, secured by fraudulent warehouse receipts for cotton which he did not own, and which had no existence, and this debt was paid off by the cotton company. Most of the cotton seems to have been purchased in El Dorado, Ark, where the respondent Lake and one Smith, cashier of the bank at El Dorado, owned a cotton compress built with the money furnished by the cotton company. Drafts would be drawn by Lake on the bank at El Dorado, not only for business purposes, but also for every other purpose requiring money, including his individual expenses, and for any other purpose that he might want it. The cashier of the bank at El Dorado would draw on the corporation, and in most instances specify that these drafts were for cotton purchased, attaching thereto warehouse receipts issued by the compress company. Upon depositing these warehouse receipts with the banks in Little Rock as security, they would advance him the money to pay these drafts. The warehouse receipts for about 8,000 bales of cotton thus issued by the compress company and hypothecated with the banks in Little Rock during that season were fraudulent, and represented no cotton whatever. These warehouse receipts would be delivered to the railroad companies as cotton on hand in the compress, and the agents of the railroad company would issue to Lake bills of lading therefor, which bills of lading would be attached to drafts drawn on mills in the East to whom cotton had been sold by the cotton company, and these would be deposited in the bank at Little Rock as credits. As the warehouse receipts represented no actual cotton, but were fraudulently issued, of course no cotton was actually delivered." The respondent bankrupt claimed that he was ignorant of the fraudulent nature of the transactions, but the court, holding this claim to be unworthy of credence, said: "The only explanation of this deficiency that has been advanced is that the drafts for cotton drawn by the cashier of the El Dorado bank and clerks employed in buying cotton were paid by respondent in good faith, believing that the cotton was actually bought, when in fact no cotton was bought, and the warehouse receipts were fraudulently issued. If this is true, it would certainly relieve respondent of all liability in this proceeding. The mere fact that he was guilty of negligence in paying drafts for such large sums, without making any investigation whether the cotton was actually purchased, would not justify the court in finding, that he had possession or control of this money. But do the facts warrant the court in adopting this explanation? The cotton company carried on its business at El Dorado, Ark., and the city of Little Rock, Ark. Respondent was most of the time in the city of Little Rock, where probably 40 per cent of the cotton handled by the company was purchased, but visited quite frequently the town of El Dorado. As stated before, he was practically the owner of the compress company which issued those warehouse receipts. The town of El Dorado has about 3,000 inhabitants. Is it reasonable to suppose that respondent, when at El Dorado, spending there several days on some of the visits and a day or two on every visit, would not go to the compress for the purpose of examining it and making some examination of the cotton supposed to be on hand? A deficiency of nearly 8,000 bales would be apparent at once. That number of bales would cover at least an acre of ground. How, then, could he have helped noticing, after having paid for so much cotton, that there was something wrong? But, if there were any doubt in the mind of the court on that subject, it would be removed by the fact that the same frauds had been perpetrated by respondent the preceding year, before the corporation had been organized as heretofore stated. That the cotton represented by the warehouse receipts carried by the banks of Little Rock for moneys loaned during the cotton season of 1901-02 was not in the warehouse at El Dorado certainly was known to respondent, for, if there was no cotton there when nearly 4,000 bales should have been, a man who visited the warehouse, as it is shown respondent did in the summer of 1902, could not help but notice it. Taking all the circumstances surrounding this case into consideration, the court cannot avoid reaching the conclusion that respondent well knew when these drafts were drawn on him and the warehouse receipts sent to him they were fraudulently issued, and did not represent actual cotton."

Testimony of a bankrupt showing an incredible ignorance, on his part, of his own business and transactions was rejected as unreasonable in the case of In re Richards, 183 Fed. 501, wherein it was said: "This record shows conclusively and beyond all reasonable doubt that when the bankrupt found he could not meet his obligations, and was sued or about to be sued, he made up his mind to convert all of his assets he could into money and first refuse to pay any creditors, and then after the bankruptcy to defy the bankrupt court by the false statement that he did not know how to account for the deficit in his assets. Indeed, he says that he sold a wholesale bill to one man for about $300, intending at the time to pay it to one of his creditors, but upon getting it he changed his mind and decided not to pay his creditor and pocketed the money. He says he sold his interest in the second-hand store about January 1, 1910, and yet swears that he cannot tell what he got for it. The man who bought it knew and testified to the facts in detail. The conclusion cannot be escaped that the bankrupt knew it also; that he did not is incredible. He discounted a part of the commercial paper taken in part for that stock only a short time before, and to a solvent merchant, and pocketed the money; he refurnished his house out of his stock and did not schedule the furniture so taken, saying he had given it to his wife; he made no pretense she had paid for it; or that it was other than a pure gift; he closed his account at the bank early in 1910, and subsequently made no deposits; he gave in part what he took in to his wife and kept the other, keeping no account of the amount of either; he kept no account of sales or collections; he concealed the cash book he had kept before he began his scheme to swindle his creditors, and he sold goods at 25 per cent below wholesale price, and kept no account of them, and pocketed the money; he continued to buy goods during the conduct related, and to sell and not pay those he purchased of; he paid no creditors after the scheme began. Is a court of conscience to be blind to the shamelessness and dishonesty of a man who presents himself in this attitude and makes no attempt to excuse it or explain it except by saying, 'I don't know,' or 'I can't remember?'"

2. PROPERTY CLAIMED TO BELONG TO WIFE.

The claim of a bankrupt that the amount of $3,583.02, paid by him to his wife, shortly before proceedings in bankruptcy, was a repayment of amounts furnished by the wife, from her sole and separate estate, for the expenses of her husband's business, accompanied with evidence of inconsistent circumstances, was rejected by the court in the case of In re Mayer, 98 Fed. 839, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 533; wherein it was said: "The account of $3,583.02 of purported payments to the wife is either fictitious, as found by the referee, or a manifest subterfuge on the part of the bankrupt to retain that amount for his own use and benefit. The assertion of advances by the wife from her own means is discredited by all the circumstances, and this amount must be regarded as within the possession and control of the bankrupt; and the finding, to that extent, is approved."

The claim made by a bankrupt that he had no financial interest in a business run by him in the name of his brother, but that the business, which had been so enormously successful as to earn profits which, invested in real estate, amounted to about a million dollars, was owned equally by his wife and brother, the wife having put only $10,000 in the business, was held in the case of In re Herrman, 136 Fed. 767, 69 C. C. A. 413, to be unworthy of belief and to show a fraudulent concealment of assets from the creditors. The district judge, on whose opinion the case was decided, said: "The evidence shows that Mrs. Herrman's father gave her on the day of her marriage $10,000. The bankrupt claims that the $10,000 was contributed as capital by Mrs. Deborah Herrman to the business carried on under the name of Morris S. Herrman, and that he (the bankrupt) did not contribute any part of said $10,000. The evidence of Mrs. Herrman and of her husband is explicit that she never received any other property from her father or from any other source during the first ten years of her married life, except the $10,000 given her by her father the day she was married. The schedules in bankruptcy of the old firm of A. B. Herrman & Co., which are signed and sworn to by the bankrupt in this case, state that that firm was indebted to Deborah Herrman for $6,000 for money loaned in the year 1869. If that money was loaned by Mrs. Deborah Herrman to the old firm, it was loaned out of the $10,000 given to her by her father, for she had no other money at that time, leaving but $4,000 in the possession of Mrs. Herrman. The only way in which that $6,000 could get back to Mrs. Herrman, to be contributed by her to the new firm carried on under the style of Morris S. Herrman, would be for the old firm of A. B. Herrman & Co. to pay her that amount after they went into bankruptcy. If they paid her that amount, and that amount was then put into a new business in which she was alleged to be a partner, the transaction was in substance nothing but a concealment by the bankrupt Herman Herrman of money which belonged to his creditors in bankruptcy with which to start in business for himself again. It is probable that all of the substantial capital of the new business carried on under the style of Morris S. Herrman was contributed by the bankrupt Herman Herrman from assets which belonged to the creditors of his old firm, but which he fraudulently concealed and appropriated to his own use; but at all events the evidence in this case shows that to the extent of $6,000 at least that was the case. The facts that the bankrupt had the new business carried on in the name of his brother, and had the title to the real estate taken in the name of his brother, there being nothing to indicate that even his wife had any interest in the business or in the real estate, are extremely suspicious. The entire transaction has every mark of fraud. The only witnesses called, or who apparently could have been called, in the case, are the bankrupt and his wife and his brother, Morris S. Herrman. The wife's evidence shows that she substantially knows nothing about the business, and leaves it all to her husband. The testimony both of the bankrupt and his brother is extremely unsatisfactory. Its general tone is improbable, contradictory, and untrustworthy. The bankrupt admits, in substance, that during the last 30 years he and his family have lived in a large and expensive house, on a liberal scale, and that he has had whatever money he wanted from the business; but his claim all these years has been that, as everything belongs to his wife, he is not bound to pay his creditors anything. I think his claim that his wife contributed all the capital to the business, and that therefore she is the sole owner of the half interest in the real estate and of the stock of the Morris S. Herrman Company standing in her name, is invalid; that the bankrupt has always owned and now owns a substantial interest in the business and in the real estate bought with the profits of it; and that he made a false oath by swearing to schedules stating that he had no such property."

A bankrupt's story that diamonds and cash for which he failed to account belonged to his wife was discredited in the case of In re Lippman, 184 Fed. 551, wherein the court said: "The bankrupt was given an opportunity, before another special commissioner, who had had nothing to do with the case, to explain these discrepancies, and to prove the credits allowed to him for the purpose of argument, but as to which his previous testimony had been held not persuasive. He has utterly failed to furnish any satisfactory proof of the alleged loss of $800 worth of diamonds and $1,020 cash. The testimony as to this loss and these amounts is exceedingly contradictory. He intimates that certain diamonds were left in the hands of one Breslavsky, amounting to $315, but this is categorically denied by Breslavsky, and the evidence in corroboration of Breslavsky is stronger than that for the bankrupt. He explains a stock on hand of $1,200 by saying now that his own and his wife's diamonds were included in this stock. But, if so, his creditors would seem to be entitled to the diamonds, if they were used as a part of the goods upon which credit was secured; and, assuming that his explanation satisfactorily states how they were disposed of, nevertheless the value which he gives for the pieces of jewelry so used (viz., $1,100 to $1,200) is altogether too near the exact amount of his stock in trade to make it credible. A person could not start in business with nine pieces of jewelry, and no other stock, in a store having fixtures worth $1,000, and with over $3,000 in cash in the bank. He also now suggests that $1,500 of money which he had belonged to his wife, as the result of certain earnings on her part in a jewelry instalment business which she conducted. Not only is the testimony unpersuasive, but, if any such payment had been made, the time to claim it was when an explanation was demanded as to what became of the money in the bank. The presentation of testimony regarding such a loan, after a contempt proceeding has been started, when at the most the payment would have been preferential if actually made as stated, indicates that the story is an afterthought, and that the property, if ever turned over, was concealed in the contemplation of bankruptcy."

A bankrupt's claim that properties transferred to his wife were so transferred because deemed to be worthless, was rejected as improbable and incredible in the case of In re Guilbert, 16 Fed. 149, wherein it was said: "An examination of the record shows that the bankrupt had an interest in the properties mentioned in the fourth and fifth specifications of objections, and that he placed them in his wife's name for the purpose of keeping them out of the reach of his creditors. The properties were owned by one Albrecht, and figured in a trade of property in the county of Montgomery. They were mortgaged for $3,000, and played a part in the transaction which was negotiated and conducted by the bankrupt as the real estate agent. Three or four properties were involved, together with some cash, and the bankrupt was entitled to a commission. He was paid $100, and the title to these properties was placed in the name of his wife, for which she paid nothing, and she held the title when the schedule of his property in bankruptcy was filed. There was an effort to show that during the negotiations for the exchange by Guilbert, as agent, it was discovered that the properties mentioned in the fourth and fifth specifications had no value over and above the mortgage, and that they were simply given to Mrs. Guilbert to have somebody to hold the title; in other words, they were so worthless that neither Albrecht nor any of the other parties interested in the transaction cared to have the title in their names, and that Mrs. Guilbert was willing to have the burden thrust upon her. This is such an unusual and improbable story that the mere recital of it, in connection with the other facts and circumstances established by documentary evidence and the uncontradicted testimony of witnesses, is the most convincing proof of the fact that the transfer was intended as part compensation to Guilbert for his commission as agent in bringing about the exchange of the properties."

3. FICTITIOUS LOAN.

A claim that, during days in which a bankrupt was extensively engaged in playing the races, he made a loan of some $3,000 to a man at Sheepshead Bay for the purpose of purchasing some motor boats at a bargain, in consideration of which loan he accepted a promissory note, was held to be preposterous inherently, and it was held that the note was fraudulent and given merely for the purpose of concealing assets. In re Vyse, 220 Fed. 727, wherein it was said by the court: "As to the $3,000, it seems that the bankrupt Vyse, during the days in which he was gambling extensively, says that he turned over to one Kirby, of Sheepshead Bay, $1,700, and then $1,300, within a few days of each other, only a short time before bankruptcy, and only a week before he consulted a lawyer with reference thereto. The ostensible reason for turning the money over was that this man Kirby might invest in some motor boats which were to be sold at a bargain. But there is no satisfactory evidence upon the part of either the bankrupt or Kirby that this reason was then advanced seriously by Kirby, or taken seriously by the bankrupt. In fact, all the indications are that the money was given to Kirby for some kind of gambling outlay, or else to conceal it for the bankrupt, and some of it was used by him in gambling upon horse racing and promptly lost. The bankrupt and Kirby now wish the court to believe that the bankrupt placed credence in Kirby's proposition that he could make a valuable investment in motor boats, and then within a few days thereafter made another loan for the same purpose, without inquiring as to the result of the first loan. For these amounts, however, Kirby actually gave the bankrupt a promissory note, and the trustee actually started suit in the state court upon this promissory note, but immediately withdrew the action and changed to this proceeding, in which it is alleged that this promissory note is but a cover to protect the bankrupt in securing for his own purposes the $3,000 which he says he loaned to Kirby. Some elements of the story are inherently preposterous."

4. FICTITIOUS DEBT.

A story by a bankrupt that he owed a debt of $3,000, for various sums of $50 to $100 loaned to him by his sister who was 18 or 20 years of age and who appeared to have no property of any kind or to be receiving no income or earnings from any source, has been held to be so highly improbable as to create of itself the necessary inference that the alleged debt was a fiction to shield the bankrupt's household goods from his creditors. In re Heyman, 104 Fed. 677, wherein it was said: "I must withhold discharge in this case. The bankrupt's testimony presents so improbable a story, and is so destitute of any corroborating circumstance whatever, that I cannot resist the conviction that the alleged debt of $3,000 for moneys loaned by the sister is largely, if not wholly, fictitious. The schedules state this debt as accruing on February 26, 1898. The bankrupt says that it was made up of sums of $50 to $100 loaned at various times during a year or two preceding. The sister was unmarried and at that time was only from 18 to 20 years of age. Her father and mother were dead and left her no property. She had no business and was earning nothing. No apparent means of hers are shown. The bankrupt could give no further particulars. The greatest efforts were made by the creditors to procure the attendance of the sister as a witness—all unsuccessful. Unfortunately she died in July, 1899, but until within a few weeks before that she might have been produced by the bankrupt and would have been subpoenaed by the creditors if she could have been found. She lived at various places mostly with her brothers and sisters, from time to time. She did not prove the debt in bankruptcy. The mortgage given for it was upon the household furniture, paintings and effects of the bankrupt. I cannot conceive that a jury, upon the testimony given, would credit the bankrupt's story or uphold the mortgage as a bona fide transaction. The necessary inference is that it was given to shield the bankrupt's valuable household effects from creditors."

The testimony of a bankrupt that the sum of over $3,000 traced into his hands was disbursed by him in paying debts to creditors of long standing, those creditors not being produced or even proved to exist, and no evidence being adduced to corroborate the story, was held to be incredible in the case of In re Leinweber, 128 Fed. 641, 12 Am. Bankr. Rep. 175, wherein the court said: "The creditors contend that upon the evidence, taken as a whole and critically examined, it was evident that the names were those of mythical characters, or, at best, of existing characters to whom was attributed a part in a mythical transaction. Divers efforts were made to compel the bankrupt to corroborate his story by producing the alleged payees, with their statements of such facts as would naturally be in their possession. The referee gave him unusual opportunities to raise a reasonable doubt, but he failed to do so. At a meeting in New Haven the bankrupt finally produced one man, said to be James Hurst, and another, who was expected to remove the mystery which surrounded Smith. But, just as the performance was about to begin, both witnesses vanished into thin air, and after exhaustive search they were not located, and the mystery remained, and still remains, as impenetrable as ever. Wertzel was a Meriden man, and the bankrupt succeeded in producing him, and it would seem that his testimony must have mollified the creditors, since the amount now ordered to be paid does not include the $500 which the bankrupt testified he had paid to him. In these circumstances, the referee issued the order which I am asked to review. I have examined the testimony with care. The circumstances surrounding the alleged payments, when aggregated, fall little short of producing an irresistible inference that the bankrupt did not tell the truth. If there were room for a reasonable doubt to creep in, the creditors ought not to ask the court to apply the rack and thumbscrew, or to experiment upon the bankrupt; but the action of the referee was from every possible viewpoint quite appropriate and laudable. I am satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that on the date of the order the bankrupt had in his possession, or under his control, the moneys which he was ordered to pay over to the trustee, and, as I understand my duty, I must sustain and approve the order."

A story of the purchase of diamonds on credit, without any record being made in regular books of the transaction and an explanation of a deficiency of over $18,000 in assets turned over to the trustee, by saying that this amount had been used to pay for the diamonds, was held to be unworthy of credence in the case of In re Weinreb, 146 Fed. 243, 76 C. C. A. 609, 16 Am. Bankr. Rep. 702. In that case the court said: "On their first examination, when asked as to what had been done with this $18,200 drawn in cash, each of them refused to answer, on the ground that the answer would tend to incriminate and degrade him. Several months later they applied for a discharge, and one of the specifications of objection to discharge was that they had refused to answer material questions. Thereupon the bankrupts appeared before the referee and offered to answer the questions which they had previously refused to answer, and they thereupon testified, in substance, as follows: That Merker, when in Paris, in May or June, 1902, was introduced to a man named Freundlich, by a diamond broker. He does not remember the name of the broker. He does not know the residence, business address or first name of Freundlich. Freundlich told Merker that he would like to do business with him. Merker said that he would buy if the goods were right and reasonable. Freundlich said that he would send a man to him in New York with the goods, and in the package he would find a memorandum of prices. Freundlich said that he sold goods only for cash, that he didn't want any note or receipt, and didn't want his name entered in the bankrupts' books. Merker explained that they were not able to pay cash, and Freundlich thereupon agreed to sell on eight months' credit. Thereafter, in the fall of 1902, a man came to the bankrupts' office. He said that his name was Jackson. The bankrupts did not know where he lived, or where his place of business was, or what his first name was. He brought some diamonds, and said that he represented Mr. Freundlich. The diamonds had inclosed with them a memorandum stating their weight and value. The memorandum had no billhead. The bankrupts purchased the diamonds on eight months' credit. They gave no receipt, note, or writing of any kind for them. They made no entry of them in their regular books, but say they made an entry in a little book like a bank book, which the receiver did not find and which has never been produced. At the expiration of the eight months, which happened to be during the latter part of July, immediately before the bankruptcy, Jackson appeared at the office and asked to be paid. He objected to checks and wanted cash, and thereupon both bankrupts drew the checks in question and went to the bank and drew the cash and gave it to Jackson. Jackson gave them no receipt or paper of any kind. One of the bankrupts admitted that he suspected that these goods had been smuggled, and their claim is substantially that that fact was the explanation of the circumstances under which these goods were bought and paid for. This story is extremely improbable. Of course, smuggled goods may be purchased, and, if purchased, the acts of the parties engaged in such a business are frequently stealthy and furtive. But if that is the explanation of the circumstances of this purchase, it is not enough for the bankrupts to simply say so. Their story, if true, could be corroborated in various ways. But it is entirely uncorroborated. It is precisely the kind of story which bankrupts would tell, who had been engaged in the diamond business, and had been planning a fraudulent bankruptcy, and had drawn $18,000 in cash just before their bankruptcy, for the purpose of concealing it from their creditors. I cannot avoid the conclusion that their story is an entire fabrication, and that the bankrupts have this money concealed from their creditors, and that they should be ordered to pay it to the trustee."

In the case of In re Nisenon, 182 Fed. 912, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 915, it appeared that immediately following a judgment against him in a breach of promise suit, a bankrupt withdrew $1,200, which he had invested in a building and loan association, and, in part explanation of his failure to turn this amount over to the trustee, he claimed to have paid $300 of the amount to his mother for past due board. The court refused to credit this explanation, saying: "His first act upon the withdrawal of such money, according to his testimony, and that of his father and mother, was to pay over to the latter the sum of $300 for board. If board to that amount was due from him, such payment was within his rights, and would be a satisfactory accounting, so far as this order is concerned, as such money would then be out of his possession and beyond his control. The referee did not believe this testimony in this regard, although corroborated in part by that of his father and mother. Neither do I. Even in cold type it lacks probability. If board was exacted from the son, that he should have been permitted to get so far behind, when it was known to the parents what his earnings were, and which they must have known because of their acquaintance with the character of his employment, is not likely, in view of their later attitude as testified to by the mother that they refused to give him his meals because he would not pay for them. To my mind the matter of an unpaid board bill was an afterthought, and the bankrupt either did pay his board, week by week, if board was exacted, or he was given his board without charge. Such payment, if made, was only a subterfuge—but part of a scheme to remove the money beyond the reach of the creditors, to be returned to the bankrupt on demand.”

A story of the payment by a bankrupt of $998 to his sister, in satisfaction of his promissory note held by her for a consideration, was rejected as incredible by the referee in the case of In re Stokes, 185 Fed. 994, and the court sustained the ruling on the report of the referee, quoted in the case as follows: “In regard to this note it will be noticed that, having been previously twice examined under oath, and particularly interrogated as to the disposition of this fund. Stokes failed to remember or disclose this disbursement. When confronted by the serious formal demand of the trustee in this proceeding, he descended for the first time from vague statements of payment to his commercial neighbors ‘and others’ to this particular. While he was yet testifying to the time, place, and circumstances under which this alleged promissory note was given and paid, and before opportunity to compare notes, the creditors had his sister, Mrs. C. V. Tuten, subpoenaed and brought into court. Agreeing as to the main fact of the note, its payment, her account of the details as to the time, place, and circumstances of the loan, and the execution of the note, was so discordant with his statement as to utterly discredit both. After careful consideration of the demeanor of the witnesses while being examined, their intimate relationship, their variation in testimony with regard to a sum of money which was large enough to impress the time, place, and circumstances of the loan upon the mind of the borrower and lender, the referee finds that this note was fictitious, and that no such money was loaned by the sister to the brother, and no such note was ever executed as claimed by the respondent, Stokes. The whole scheme was an afterthought, an attempt to make a showing in response to the formal demand of the trustee.”

In the case of In re Mitchell, 202 Fed. 806, it was held that unsupported testimony by a bankrupt that certain amounts of money had been paid to creditors, no testimony being given, however, as to the names of the creditors, was unworthy of belief. The evidence in the case was not, however, set out in detail by the court.

In the case of In re Kempner, 6 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 521, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,689, a bankrupt who, previous to the bankruptcy proceedings, had called his creditors together and had sought to secure their acceptance of twenty-five cents on the dollar, testified before the referee in bankruptcy that most of his assets had been sold for several promissory notes amounting to about $900, that he had sold the notes and that practically all of the amount so acquired had been spent by him in the payment of debts. The referee held that this testimony was too improbable to be believed. The court said: “The whole amount of his debts when he stopped business was only about eleven thousand or twelve thousand dollars, and his assets amounted to about two thousand seven hundred or three thousand dollars. They would pay nominally exactly thirty-two and one-half cents on a dollar of his debts (see answer to question fifty-eight). These notes comprise one-third of his assets (really nearly all of them as the result shows); that he should have got rid of this sum between Saturday afternoon and Monday, at the hour the order was served upon him, can be accounted for only upon the hypothesis that he was endeavoring to hide it in anticipation of such service, to keep it from his assignee. But that he should have used it in payment of debts, paying one hundred cents on a dollar, is contradicted by his whole course of conduct; a man who labors strenuously to obtain a compromise on Friday and Saturday by the payment of twenty-five cents on a dollar, and is expecting to succeed in this compromise up to the moment the bankruptcy papers are served upon him (fol. 72) would not be likely to use nearly all his available means during those few hours in paying one hundred cents on a dollar of his debts.”

5. IMPROBABLE BUSINESS LOSS.

An extravagant claim as to the amount of business losses by bankrupts, in explanation of their failure to turn over assets, was rejected as unbelievable in the case of In re Greenberg, 179 Fed. 413, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 943, wherein the court said: “If any items are to be allowed at all, and if such ridiculous testimony as was given by these bankrupts in estimating their business losses is to be believed, there would seem to be no reason for disputing the statements of the bankrupts as to when they made the payments in question, and their maximum estimates of loss should be used, rather than the minimum estimates thereof. It is impossible to explain the loss of goods in such wholesale manner, and such large items by ordinary expenses and mere shrinkage of business between March 1st and November 5th of the same year. Either the goods of the firm were secreted and disposed of in large quantities, or the firm had no such stock as they claimed when they attempted to show a surplus of over $11,000 in March, 1908. But, even if that be granted them, their business from that time until November shows no such depreciation as would cause a shrinkage to a point where their liabilities exceeded their assets by over $14,000; and if any satisfactory method of tracing the property, or of picking out the amount of assets which the bankrupts have not satisfactorily explained, had been presented, there would be abundant testimony upon which to base the referee's report. Inasmuch, however, as the referee has found in favor of the bankrupts upon all the items of testimony, with the exception of the small ones above mentioned, and as he refuses to believe the same sort of statements as those previously made by them, it is difficult to see how he reached such a conclusion. Upon the entire matter, the court has no hesitation in directing that the bankrupts turn over to the trustee in bankruptcy whatever property they have in their control or which they have secreted from the trustee, and to hold that (judged from their attempted explanation) this property amounts to much more than the sum named by the referee."

Testimony by bankrupt wholesale millinery merchants that a deficit to an amount of about $30,000 was due to business losses, was held to be unbelievable in the case of In re Peltasohn, 4 Dill. 107, 16 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 265, 10 Chicago Leg. N. 10, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 10,912. The court said: "The bankrupts attempt to account for this large deficit by showing a great decline in the value of goods of this character between January 1 and November 1, and that they had to sell at great loss. Undoubtedly, the old stock—that is, the stock on hand January 1—was not worth its cost price, and sales from that were made, on the average, greatly below cost; but it is very doubtful whether there was much, if any, loss—as likely, indeed, that there was a profit—on the goods sold from the new purchases. On the whole, I am not satisfied with the explanations offered for this large and striking deficit, and I think the district court and the master were well justified in reaching the conclusions they did. Certain circumstances, pregnant with suspicion, strongly support his conclusion. I mention these without dwelling upon them. The change, during the time they had a bookkeeper, of their system of bookkeeping from double to single entry; the loss or non-production of two important books—'bills receivable and payable,' and the 'stock or sales book'—by no means satisfactorily accounted for; the alleged increase by one half of family expenses during 1873, and taking money therefor, without any real increase being shown; the alleged sending of money to Europe to poor relations, and payments to a relative in this country, not otherwise shown to be true than by the unsupported statement of the bankrupts—this at a time when they were claiming to be anxious to reduce expenses, and when they were embarrassed; and particularly the statement of Peltasohn, that his wife, had $5,000 or $6,000, and had had since 1871, or before that, which she kept in her house in bank bills and had never invested—the profits, as he alleged, of business which she had conducted on her own account, and which I must say, under the circumstances, is very improbable; and the further fact that since the bankruptcy the bankrupts have gone into business as the professed agents of their wives."

6. ACCIDENTAL LOSS.

A very remarkable story of the loss of several thousands of dollars, carried in a satchel, by the dropping out of the body of the satchel, leaving only the handle in the hands of the custodian, without the custodian's realizing the loss for some time, was held to be utterly incredible in the case of In re Frankfort, 144 Fed. 721, 15 Am. Bankr. Rep. 210, wherein the court said: "He accounts for some four thousand and odd dollars by the introduction of returned checks showing payments to various creditors aggregating that amount. He accounts for the balance of the amount which he should have on hand in the following way: He testified that on the 19th of April he had in his possession $4,000 in bills and $2,039.10 in checks of customers. This money and these checks he put into a satchel, which, as both he and his wife testified, was large enough to carry lunch for five or six people, and had been used for that purpose, and he told his wife to take this money and checks to the Borough Bank of Brooklyn where he had an account, and to have the checks certified at the various banks on which they were drawn, and have the bills changed to ones of larger denominations. The reason why, as he testified, he wished to have this done, instead of depositing this in the Borough Bank, was that he was going to change his account to the Kings County Bank and that he wanted certified checks so that a deposit could be made as if it was cash, and as he didn't propose to change his account for several days, he wanted the bills of larger denomination so that they would not occupy so much space in his safe. We are met at the outset of this story with, it seems to me, a very insufficient reason for its existence. Mrs. Frankfort testified that she took the satchel containing the money and the checks and went to the various banks to have the checks certified or cashed, and was unable on account of her not being known at those banks, to accomplish this object. She then went to the Borough Bank and there the cashier told her that she could deposit the checks and then draw a check against the amount of the deposited checks which the bank would honor and pay to her in cash. To get the check she had to go back to the store, and so, with the satchel and the money, she went back to the store, had her husband sign the check, and then she came back again to the Borough Bank, presented the check, and the money, two thousand and odd dollars, was paid to her in cash which she put into this satchel, together with the $4,000 already in it. She further testifies that she went to several banks in the neighborhood and changed some of this money so that she had 21 $100 bills and the rest of the $6,000 in smaller bills, with the exception of about $50.10 in silver. She then started back to the store, but, as she says, thought that she would go down Fulton street and look in at the shop windows and see the bargains, and that this shopping excursion lasted from a half an hour to an hour. She said she carried the satchel lightly in her left hand, and that it was quite heavy to carry. Having carried it along Fulton street, and looked at the bargains and the shop windows she then made up her mind that she would go home, and coming to the corner of Smith and Fulton streets, where she was to take the car, she looked down to open the bag to get ten cents for her car fare when she found that she had only the handle of the satchel in her hand, and that the body of it was gone. She says that some time before, when she was looking in at Matthews' window on Fulton street, she had felt the satchel lighter, but that she did not look down to see the reason for this, and, in fact, she hadn't looked down at the bag from the time she left the Borough Bank until, wishing to open it, she found that it was gone; that she had not felt anyone grab it, or attempt to take it away from her; and that, in fact, nothing unusual had occurred while she was on her shopping expedition, so far as the bag was concerned; that then, without making any outcry, without retracing her steps, without notifying the police, she threw the handle into the street and walked home weeping. When she arrived at home she told her husband that she had lost the money, but she didn't tell him how, the circumstances, and he didn't ask her. He told her not to say anything about it, not to tell anybody anything about it; and she even testified that her brother-in-law, David Frankfort, who was in the employ of her husband, didn't know anything about the loss until he heard the story of it as she told it in court. She also testified that after she came home and told her husband of this loss that he sent her again to the Borough Bank for the purpose of withdrawing one of the checks which had been deposited and that even then she did not tell anyone at the Borough Bank that she had lost this $6,000. The bankrupt says that he didn't tell anybody of this loss; that he didn't notify the police; that he didn't advertise for it; in fact, that he made no effort whatsoever to recover the money. That he went over that afternoon to the market in New York, and saw some parties with whom he was in the habit of dealing, but that he said nothing to them about this loss. I think the story of both the bankrupt and his wife is false, and that the money was not lost as they say it was. It is beyond belief that this woman should have lost the money as she said she did; that she could have walked the street holding the handle only for so long a time, and not have missed it; and it seems to me that this was a bald conspiracy, hatched up between the husband and wife to defraud the creditors of this amount of money."

A bankrupt's claim that certain checks and books, which he had failed to turn over, had been left in his store when it was surrendered by him, and must have been lost, was rejected as incredible in the case of In re Herr, 182 Fed. 715. In that case it was said: "The only answer of the bankrupt to the rule is that he left all his books and papers in his store, and, as corroborative of this, it is urged that those of them which the trustee now has were so found. But the receiver, who took immediate possession, after the petition was filed, found nothing of the kind in the store, and it is impossible that they should have escaped him, if they had been there. Nor was there any intermediate period of occupation, when they might have been unwittingly destroyed. Enough has developed to show that the bankrupt has a motive for the concealment of these checks, and it permits of too easy an evasion to accept his statement, that he left them behind when he gave up possession of the store, in the face of the denial by those who immediately went in, that they were not there. The referee heard the witnesses and did not believe the bankrupt's story, and I am not any better impressed with its truth."

7. ROBBERY.

In the case of In re McCormick, 97 Fed. 566, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 340, testimony by a bankrupt, under an order to pay to the trustee $1,500, to the effect that he carried that amount in cash in his pocket for two or three weeks until he lost it by having his pocket picked returning from Coney Island, was held to be unworthy of credence when accompanied by contradictory testimony as to other improbable circumstances, and the bankrupt was ordered to be committed until he should pay. The court said: "As respects the sum of $1,500 ordered to be paid to his trustee, the explanation given by the bankrupt that he carried that money in his trousers pocket for some two or three weeks until he lost it by having his pocket picked upon an Eighth avenue car, after a visit to Coney Island, though quite possible in itself, is accompanied by such improbable circumstances stated by him as occurring before and after, that it is difficult to be credited. I think it better to pursue the course indicated by Judge Drummond (In re Salkey, 6 Biss. 280, 11 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 516, 7 Chicago Leg. N. 195, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,254) to direct the bankrupt to be brought before me for further examination as to whether or not he has made a full disclosure of the facts." After a personal examination of the bankrupt, the court said: "The account of the $1,500 given by the bankrupt not being a credible one, as given before the referee, I have spent nearly a day in a personal examination of him in court; his statements increase the previous contradictions, and his explanations are hardly better than might be expected of a lunatic, or an imbecile, or of a man without memory. My examination was largely directed to testing him in these regards; and I find he is not suffering any mental disability, and his memory is sufficiently precise and exact in whatever he seems interested in explaining. My conclusion is that his story is a fabrication, and that he conceals the $1,500 and should be committed until payment."

A claim by a bankrupt that an amount of $7,500 which he had failed to pay over to the trustee had been lost in a robbery, no showing being made of any breaking into the house, or any forcible opening of the safe in which the money had been contained, has been held to be unworthy of belief, and to be a mere fabrication to cover up a fraudulent disposition of property. In re De Gottardi, 114 Fed. 328, 7 Am. Bankr. Rep. 723, wherein it was said: "On this issue of the alleged robbery, as on the one already disposed of, the referee's finding is fully justified by the evidence. There is no room for controversy but that the bankrupts accumulated the large amount of money, of which they claim they were robbed, for the purpose of in some way concealing it from their creditors. This and the other facts enumerated by the referee are sufficient to determine said issue against the bankrupts. Furthermore, the immediate circumstances of the alleged robbery confirm its improbability. Forcible means were not employed in opening the safe. Neither drill nor explosive was used. The safe was opened by some one familiar with the combination, or else the combination was not turned on the night of the robbery. There was no indication of a forcible entry into the house, other than an auger hole through the back door, designed, apparently, to reach a bolt which fastened the door; and this hole was so located with reference to the bolt and a defective and unused lock as to show that the hole was bored by one who knew of the situation and use of the bolt, as well as the disuse of the lock. To my mind, the boring of this hole was a mere artifice on the part of the bankrupts to divert suspicion from themselves. Upon the competent evidence in the record, there can be no reasonable doubt but that there was on the part of the bankrupts a deliberate scheme to defraud their creditors, and that . . . the alleged robbery was fictitious, and part of said scheme. These conclusions are fully warranted by the facts which the referee enumerates in his findings, and strengthened by the further facts that the bankrupts have at other times made or attempted dispositions or arrangements of different pieces of property, which, if successful, will place those pieces of property beyond the reach of their creditors."

In Schweer v. Brown, 130 Fed. 328, 64 C. C. A. 574, 12 Am. Bankr. Rep. 178, it appeared from the receiver's inventory and from a sworn statement by the bankrupt himself, made a few days before the institution of bankruptcy proceedings, that his stock in trade at that time was worth $2,300. Testimony by the bankrupt that this inventory and his sworn statement were wrong, that his stock was at that time worth eight or nine thousand dollars, and that most of it had been stolen in some mysterious way by unknown persons, was held to be too improbable of truth to be worthy of serious consideration. The court said: "A few days before the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy, and in contemplation of such proceedings, the bankrupt made a statement under oath that the value of his stock of merchandise then on hand was $2,300. The approximate accuracy of this statement was demonstrated by the inventory of the receiver, who took temporary charge of the store, which showed the value of the property to be $2,400. The bankrupt claimed at the trial that his sworn statement was inaccurate, that at the time it was made he actually had on hand between eight and nine thousand dollars worth of merchandise, and that, during the three or four days which elapsed before possession was taken for the receiver, about two-thirds thereof was stolen in some mysterious way by persons unknown. The evidence offered in support of this contention was not unworthy of serious consideration."

Testimony that seven or eight thousand dollars in bills should be deposited, in an insecure wooden desk in a public store and left unguarded two whole nights, there to be stolen by a burglar, has been held to be transparently incredible. Barton v. Texas Produce Co. 136 Fed. 355, 69 C. C. A. 181, In that case the court said: "The evidence, without contradiction, showed that on or about the 25th day of November, 1902, Clib Barton, who was the active manager of the business, went to Little Rock, Ark., and sold a lot of cotton of the firm, and received therefor between seven and eight thousand dollars in money, in packages of fifty and one hundred dollar bills, which he brought home and delivered to William P. Barton, Jr., who was the bookkeeper of the firm, who claims to have put the package containing the money in an ordinary wooden desk, with a roller top, and inside of a drawer inclosed with a door, and that he locked the door and the desk, where the money, according to the petitioners' statement, remained during Friday night and Saturday and Saturday night following, when they allege the storehouse was burglarized, and the desk opened, and the money abstracted and stolen. This was a simple question of fact for the determination of the trial court on the evidence. The function of the district judge on such a hearing is akin to that of a chancellor in an equity proceeding. Where, as in this case, the hearing was on oral testimony, his conclusions on disputed questions of fact should not be disturbed by the appellate court, except for cogent reasons, such as a palpable mistake or misconception of the decided weight of the evidence. . . . When the partners received between seven and eight thousand dollars for said cotton, their assets reduced to cash were inadequate to meet their liabilities. They had past-due obligations to creditors. This large amount of cash, without notice of its possession to their creditors, was placed in an insecure wooden desk in a public store, and left unguarded for two whole nights. This money was not entered by the bookkeeper on the cash book of the company. It was not even counted by said bookkeeper, for the flimsy reason, assigned by him, that he was busy, and for the lack of opportunity to make the count without exposing the money to the public, although two nights had intervened, when they would have had the privacy of their own counting room for such purpose. The three partners knew of the deposit of this money in said desk. There was a large safe in the storeroom, which, while it may not have been burglar proof, was a much safer place for money against an accident of fire. William P. Barton, Jr., claims to have left the store the evening before the alleged burglary, and gone to his home, where he remained all night. The other two brothers were in the store after he left, and were in there when the principle clerk left. All the doors to the storeroom were securely fastened from the inside, except the front door, which was locked from the outside. On the following Sunday morning the loss of this money was proclaimed by William P. and Ross Barton, and when third parties reached the store the back door was open, and a window in the rear of the building was shown to be raised, and there was a goods box on the outside, below this window, to indicate that the entrance to the building might have been effected through said window. But the presence of a layer of dust on the sill of the window, and cobwebs on the inside thereof, undisturbed, disproved the entry of any person through the window. The physical condition of desk just after the loss of the money was proclaimed well warranted the conclusion that the person or persons who abstracted the money accomplished their work by having keys to the front door of the storehouse and to the desk. There was no indication of any breaking of the outside roller to the desk, nor any evidence of a violent entry into the drawer or the door inside of the desk. It is true that the door was found open and wrenched from the hinges, but as these hinges were inside of the door, and the lock of the door was unbroken, this wrenching of the door from its hinges could only have been done after the door itself was opened with a key. All of which indicated that the job was done by a bungler, who sought inconsiderately to leave evidence of a violent entry, which was transparently foolish."

An explanation that money had been lost by robbery has been held to be unreasonable where it appeared that the police recovered practically the whole amount on the person of the thief, and no showing was made as to why the bankrupt should not have received the stolen money from the police. In re Smith, 185 Fed. 983, wherein it was said: "Upon the reference to a special master, to allow him to explain these various transactions, he being nominally in contempt of the court's order ordering him to turn over or account for these properties, he has shown principally a course of dissipation, including a robbery and several hours' incarceration in a police station, in a state of total unconsciousness from drink, thus seeking to substantiate his story that he did not know what he had done with cash received and property on hand up to the time of this dissipation. The newspaper clipping used to prove his story shows, however, that the police took into their possession some $170 in cash, and a gold watch and chain, found upon the person of the alleged thief. As the amount originally supposed to have been lost was but $200, the story of this theft does not satisfactorily explain what became of the money, or why it did not get back into the hands of Smith after its deposit in the police court. The special master has reported that Smith has failed to appear, has not testified satisfactorily, and is plainly in contempt of the court."

A bankrupt's explanation of his failure to turn over $1,310, by saying that it had been stolen from him on the morning the petition of bankruptcy was filed, was rejected as incredible in the case of In re Speyer, 6 Nat. Bankr. Rep. 255, 42 How. Pr. 397, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,239. The court said: "I am unable to accept the statements of the said bankrupts, as affording the true reason why the said sum of $1,310.05 was not paid over to the said custodian on his demand, nor was there anything in the manner of either of the said bankrupts while under examination calculated to inspire confidence in their statements. I cannot entertain the slightest doubt that the loss of said money is a mere pretense on the part of the said Abraham Speyer."

See also the reported case, for the rejection of an improbable story as to robbery.

8. GAMBLING.

In a case wherein it appeared that before the institution of bankruptcy proceedings the bankrupt had secured large stocks of goods on credit, had conducted a slaughter sale, selling the goods at great reduction, for cash, of which an amount of over $2,000 remained unaccounted for, and the bankrupt made no other explanation as to the disposition of that amount than that he had lost it in gambling, the court refused to accept the explanation. Ripon Knitting Works v. Schreiber, 101 Fed. 810, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 299, wherein it was said: "The decision of the court that the bankrupt has at least $3,000 in his possession or under his control is based upon convincing evidence to the effect that a large amount of money actually came into his possession within a few months before the adjudication. Of the money so received more than $2,000 remains entirely unaccounted for after giving full credit for all expenditures shown by the respondent's books of account, and after allowing in full the extravagant amount which he claims to have used for his personal expenses, and in dissolute practices, and losses in gambling. As to so much of the money, this is not a case of failure to give a satisfactory account, or to show in a satisfactory way how it has been disposed of, but it is a case of total failure to account in any way whatever, or to give any explanation. I am also convinced that the amount which the respondent claims to have lost in gambling is considerable in excess of the total amount of his actual losses. I am also convinced that, with a deliberately formed intention to defraud his creditors, the respondent proceeded methodically to make liberal purchases of merchandise on credit, and to dispose of his stock for cash as rapidly as possible. During the spring and summer months he conducted a slaughter sale, selling goods so much below the market value as to create a rush of business. In the month of August he pledged a large amount of new goods as security for $2,500, which he borrowed. In September, he purchased other goods on credit, and soon afterwards permitted the pledgee to sell the goods held as security for the $2,500 for a price much below the market value thereof, without making any attempt to redeem them. In view of the indisputable evidence which I have to consider, it would be ridiculous for the court to permit its decision holding that the respondent has money to the amount of at least $3,000 in his possession, or subject to his control, to be reversed by the mere denial of this bankrupt, who stultifies himself by alleging in his answer that he has squandered money which should have been paid to his creditors in gambling and indulgence in other vices."

A bankrupt's explanation that he lost $1,000 in drinking and gambling was held by the court to be neither reasonable nor plausible, and to be unworthy of belief, in the case of In re Wilson, 116 Fed. 419, 8 Am. Bankr. Rep. 612. The court said: "It developed upon the examination of the bankrupt that during the months of October and November, 1901, the bankrupt had been drinking and debauching to great excess, and that about the 20th of November (eight or nine days before the petition in bankruptcy was filed against him) he left his home, taking with him about $1,000 in money; stating to his clerks that he was going to try to get means to tide him over his business difficulties. On examination, however, he testified that he started to Texas to meet the traveling agent of one of his creditors, to see what arrangements he could make with him to aid him in his business troubles; that after he started he got drunk, and turned up in Oklahoma, where he remained drunk and gambled until he had squandered the greater portion of the $1,000. He gives no account, however, as to who he gambled with, or how much he lost, or how much he had upon his return. The court is of opinion that this explanation is a mere subterfuge and afterthought, and wholly without any foundation in truth. It is not supported by any evidence, and is neither reasonable nor plausible."

Testimony by a bankrupt that he wasted $13,700 between July and November in gambling, betting, and riotous living, the corroboratory evidence being of an untrustworthy and contradictory character, was held to be unworthy of belief, in Schweer v. Brown, 130 Fed. 328, 64 C. C. A. 574, 12 Am. Bankr. Rep. 178. In that case it was said: "The claim was also made that between the 1st day of July, 1902, and the time when the receiver took possession in the following November, the bankrupt lost and squandered $13,700 in gambling, betting upon the races, and in riotous living. But his testimony upon that subject was so vague, indefinite, and unsatisfactory as to be entitled to very little credit in a court of justice. Almost every attempt on the part of counsel for the trustee to secure from the bankrupt a statement of the details of his alleged losses was frustrated by the answer that he did not remember. Such corroboration as his testimony received—and it was only in part—was from testimony similar in character of professional gamblers, who in many instances contradicted each other and the bankrupt himself. The proper limits of an opinion forbid more than a general characterization of the mass of inconsistencies and improbable statements appearing in the record.”

Uncorroborated testimony by a bankrupt as to large amounts spent by him in gambling and dissipation was not believed by the court in the case of In re Henderson, 130 Fed. 385, 12 Am. Bankr. Rep. 351.

Testimony by a bankrupt to the effect that he had gambled away $2,000 in 66 days, when he showed on examination no more knowledge of the game of poker than the veriest tyro, was rejected in the case of In re Lasky, 163 Fed. 99, 20 Am. Bankr. Rep. 729. The court said: “Upon his examination the bankrupt, Lasky, attempted to account for this surprising condition of things by saying that he had lost some $2,000 of the money in gambling, and that these losses were sustained upon some 14 or 17 trips to Birmingham, one trip to Montgomery, and in night games at the McLeister Hotel in Tuscaloosa. Upon his first examination he said that he could not tell the name of a single person with whom he played or a single person who ever saw him playing in Birmingham, Montgomery, or Tuscaloosa. He said upon that examination that all of his Birmingham games, except one played at the Gayety Hotel about the time of his adjudication, had been played either at the Florence or at the Birmingham hotels. He said, also, that of the numerous trips he made to Birmingham—14 in all—on 12 of these trips he put up either at the Metropolitan or the Gayety hotels, and that he registered some three or four times under an assumed name and upon all other occasions in his own name. He could not remember by whom he was invited into the games at the various hotels, and he could not remember the number of any of the hotel rooms in which he played the various games. Under Lasky’s testimony, all of these losses must have been sustained between March 1st and May 5th, 66 days. It appears from his own testimony that he was in Tuscaloosa a very considerable portion of the time attending to his business. About one-half of this time he was running the store alone, as his partner had decamped. The testimony of his young lady clerk shows that he was in Tuscaloosa four out of the nine weeks, with the exception of three days, during which time he was said to have been sick. He was there regularly, because he opened the store every morning and was there awaiting her when she arrived for the day’s work. With the four weeks accounted for by this clerk out of the reckoning, his testimony claims 17 trips to Birmingham, 1 trip to Montgomery, and numerous night games at the McLeister Hotel in Tuscaloosa, that is to say, that out of the 35 days in which he was out of town he was engaged in gambling 18 days, and that during the 17 days he was at home he was doing heavy night gambling, and losing uniformly. This is remarkable, to say the least. But his claim is that numbers of the Birmingham trips lasted at least two days, so that, if his story is true, he was out of town substantially all of the time accounted for by his clerk, leaving him no opportunity to have attended to his business after Goldberg left, as he testified he did quite closely for some six months, and he is unable to remember the name of one single individual with whom he played at any time or to whom he lost so much money. To believe this story would tax my credulity beyond endurance. But Lasky is further discredited when the Metropolitan Hotel register is produced, covering the entire period from March 1st to May 5th, and it shows no registration of Joseph Lasky at all, and when the register is laid before him, and he is called upon to identify the registration under assumed names, he points out a few names entered on the register prior to March 26th, which he claims to believe were his registrations, but would not identify them positively as such. Further than this, the testimony shows that, upon the examination of Lasky as to his knowledge of the game of poker at which he claims to have lost his money, he seemed to have no real acquaintance with the game, but only knew the simpler hands which any tyro might know, and he fails to meet a test of knowledge which any player of his claimed experience ought certainly to be able to meet.”

The rejection as unreasonable of a bankrupt’s explanation that he had lost between eleven and thirteen thousand dollars in eight months at poker, was affirmed in Seigel v. Cartel, 164 Fed. 691, wherein it was said: “The only tangible explanation of this shortage of funds by the petitioner is that he lost the money in gambling at poker. His evidence was that he had long indulged this habit of gambling, and estimated that he had probably at different times lost an aggregate of $100,000. As he seems to have been a most unlucky gambler, to say the least, it was not honest for him to thus take the proceeds of the goods he had purchased on credit to indulge his passion at the expense of his confiding creditors. . . . He kept no book account of the withdrawal of this money or its disbursement. He did not introduce any evidence corroborative of the losses at gaming. He failed on close inquiry to give the name of one person with whom he played or the name of the proprietor of the establishment where he played, save one who was out of the state and last heard of at the St. Louis World's Exposition, thus making it quite impracticable, if not impossible, for the objecting creditors to contradict him. He could give no particular dates or particular sums lost at 'the sittings.' The credibility and reasonableness of his story were addressed to the judicial discretion of the district judge. As there was, in our judgment, reasonable ground for discrediting his explanation, we will not review the exercise of that discretion."

A claim by a bankrupt, of proved thrifty disposition, that he had spent about $900 in gambling, riotous living, and consorting with lewd women, was not credited in the case of In re Nisenon, 182 Fed. 912. The court said: "The bankrupt's testimony is uncorroborated either by human testimony or by the circumstances detailed by him, accompanying the expenditure of such moneys. He says he took this money with him to Providence, R. I., for the purpose of investing it in business. He accepted employment at $12 a week, but made no such investment. He spent such money in riotous living, gambling—playing dice and shooting crap—and consorting with lewd women. He fails to give the names of persons with whom he gambled, the places where, the times when, or the names of any of the persons present when he gambled. His explanations of how he was accosted by the person who took him to the gambling place, his introduction to the game, his repeated visits and losses, is a recital that has the possibility of truth, but is improbable as applying to a man of his thrifty disposition. His explanations as to the meeting of the particular woman that he names, and the unnamed others whose acquaintance he made through her instrumentality, is of the same character, and does not commend itself to the unprejudiced mind. The failure of the bankrupt to remember the details of these transactions such as would impress themselves upon the ordinary mind, suggest purposed evasion or untruthfulness. Is it evasion? If so, to hide what? Gambling and consorting with lewd women are frequently indulged in by persons who would not care to have such conduct brought to light, and evasive answering in an attempt to cover up such profligacy may be well understood, but the bankrupt seeks to such cover.

He not only admits his profligacy, but asserts it in his defense. His resort, therefore, to the answers which indicate a lack of observation of the things that impress themselves on the ordinary person, or to a failure to remember, was not for the purpose of hiding his shamelessness. Like acts of profligacy have been frequently asserted in explanation of disappeared assets, and as frequently repudiated."

In the case of In re Goodman, 196 Fed. 506, 27 Am. Bankr. Rep. 697, the court held to be incredible testimony by the bankrupt that over a thousand dollars had been spent by him in gambling and other dissipations, no attempt being made by the court to elaborate the evidence or the reasons for the holding.

For evidence held to be highly suspicious, regarding gambling, see In re Cunney, 225 Fed. 426, cited in the following subdivision.

9. LEWDNESS OR DRUNKENNESS.

Uncorroborated testimony by a bankrupt, in explanation of his failure to pay to the trustee an amount of $6,500, that the money was expended as the result of an intrigue with a woman, the bankrupt claiming that he got in a scrape with a woman to get out of which he paid her $6,000 and that he paid $425 to a doctor for his services in connection with the scrape, but refusing to name either the woman or the doctor, has been held to be so preposterous as to be worthy of no credence by the court. In re De Gottardi, 114 Fed. 328, 7 Am. Bankr. Rep. 723, wherein the court said: "De Gottardi's claim that he gave $6,000 to a woman and $425 to a doctor involves the admission that he did have that amount of money in his possession, belonging to the estate of the bankrupts. This fact, however, is also testified to by Righetti, as well as evidenced by the books of the firm. The only question, therefore, to be determined on this branch of the case, is whether or not De Gottardi's statement of his disposition of the money is to be believed. . . . Can it be claimed that De Gottardi has accounted in a reasonable manner for the $6,500 which he admits to have been in his possession but a short time before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, by asserting that he gave $6,000 to a woman and $425 to a doctor, when he refuses, on cross-examination, where there is no immunity from self-criminatory evidence, to name the woman or the doctor to whom he says the money was given? Such a claim would be preposterous. If his testimony in this regard had been true, its corroboration would have been within his power. In the absence of such corroboration, under all the circumstances of this case, the issue cannot be otherwise found than against him."

For discredited testimony by a bankrupt to the effect that assets traced to him had been spent in consorting with lewd women, see In re Nisenson, 182 Fed. 912, cited and quoted, supra, in subdivision 8, Gambling.

When, in a hearing on an order committing a bankrupt for contempt for refusal to pay over assets amounting to $2,106.44, he attempted to explain his refusal by testifying that a considerable part of the money had been spent in a drunken spree, the court refused to credit the testimony or to make any allowance for such expenditure. In re Tudor, 100 Fed. 796, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 78.

In the case of In re Cunney, 225 Fed. 426, testimony by two bankrupts, journeymen tanners working at fifteen dollars a week, that they drank and gambled away $7,200 within about four months was held to be highly suspicious, and the judgment of the referee was reversed and remanded to him to hear further evidence.

For testimony as to loss by drinking, rejected as improbable, see the case of In re Wilson, 116 Fed. 419, 8 Am. Bankr. Rep. 612, cited and quoted, supra, in subdivision 8, Gambling.

10. TRAVEL.

In the case of In re Tudor, 100 Fed. 796, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 78, a story by a bankrupt, in explanation of his refusal to turn over an amount of over $2,000, to the effect that he spent a considerable part of it in a trip from Denver to Cincinnati, looking for a position, was deemed unworthy of credence by the court, and it was held that, even though credited, testimony of that nature showed no allowable expenditure. The court said: "If he chooses to make a journey to Cincinnati for the purpose of finding a position, no court is bound to allow him the expenses of such a journey. He may have concluded that a good place for him to seek employment would be in China or the Philippine Islands, and he would go there to renew his fortunes. So, also, as to his going to Cincinnati and preparing for that journey; the referee is not required to allow expenses for that. It is not true that a bankrupt failing in business is at liberty to go on and spend money as seems to him either expedient or necessary. If he does conduct himself economically, quietly, and properly, the court would undoubtedly allow him the reasonable expense and cost of living. If he fails in that, he cannot claim indulgence as to his vices or his habits of living. I do not care to go into this testimony to find whether one of these items or another has been properly disallowed. I am not called upon in behalf of a man in the situation of this man, who has conducted himself as he has, to scrutinize his testimony to the last item to find out whether there is any dollar or cent yet to be accounted for. The court is not engaged in that business. People who pursue such a course as this must know that they do it at their peril; that the law of the land does not uphold them in such practices. I have no doubt but that the referee in this instance is fully within the law as to the amounts which this man should be required to pay over for the use of his creditors."

11. EXTRAVAGANT LIVING.

For a bankrupt to try to explain her failure to turn over a balance on hand of over $24,000 by claiming that it was spent by her and her children in various forms of extravagance in living and other expenses, has been held to be too highly incredible to be accepted. In re Gerstel, 123 Fed. 166, 10 Am. Bankr. Rep. 411, wherein the court said: "These accountants agreed in the statement that the bankrupt should have had on hand at the time of her adjudication $24,871.76, in addition to the $14,000 shown by her schedules, and this without allowing anything for the profits of the business. In explanation of this large deficit, the bankrupt, by her testimony and that of her children, seeks to explain the dissipation of the funds by various forms of extravagance in living and other expenses. The testimony utterly fails to satisfy the court. It is in many respects highly incredible, and I am unable to bring my mind to the point of accepting it as at all satisfactory to discharge the rule."

Testimony by a bankrupt in very reduced circumstances that the whole of a sum of $690 traced into his hands was used and expended for the benefit of him and his family within the space of about six weeks, before the bankrupt secured a job as a motorman, was held to be incredible, in the case of In re Kane, 125 Fed. 984, 10 Am. Bankr. Rep. 478. In that case it was said: "Assuming, as testified, that the money turned over to him was $1,340 although the amount left with the bank was somewhat more than this—and taking out that which the bankrupt paid to his attorney and to his brother, there was left in his hands, including that returned to his wife, the sum of $690. The only thing he has to say of this is that he gave it to his wife, and that it has been spent for the benefit of himself and family. This, however, is not a sufficient accounting for it, nor does it seem at all probable. He stayed at Milville, according to his story, about six weeks, and then got work at Philadelphia as a motorman, and went there to live, by which time his earnings, as we have the right to assume, would largely support those dependent on him. He was only called to draw upon this money, therefore, for a brief period; and he was likely, from his reduced circumstances, to be somewhat saving of it. It is hardly to be believed that by the middle of October, when he was examined before the referee, he had made away with the whole of it, as he testifies. Money having been traced directly into his hands, he cannot swear himself free from liability by any such general and sweeping statement."

An explanation by a bankrupt that he had spent $400 in a short time in "car fares," "shoe shines" or "milk for the baby" was called a contemptuous one by the court in the case of In re Lesaius, 163 Fed. 614, 618, 21 Am. Bankr. Rep. 23.

12. PAYMENT TO TRUSTEE.

Where both a bankrupt and the trustee testified that a sum of $113 was paid over by the bankrupt to the trustee, but that the trustee gave no receipt for it, and where the trustee testified that he did not know when or where it was so paid, the court held that the inherent improbabilities of the testimony were so great that it was not to be believed. In re Leslie, 119 Fed. 406, wherein it was said: "A witness may be as thoroughly discredited by the inherent improbabilities of his testimony as by the direct testimony of witnesses. This court is not inclined to believe, and does not believe, on the evidence now produced, that this money was ever turned over by the bankrupt to the trustee. It is satisfied from the evidence now before it that the bankrupt and the trustee were in collusion. . . . It seems incredible that an officer of this court, receiving that amount of money belonging to the creditors of this bankrupt estate, would allow it to lie around loose in his office in the manner described."

13. MISCELLANEOUS.

Testimony as to the bona fides of a sale of the bankrupt's business was held to be so incredible as to refute itself, and the transaction was held to be in fraud of creditors, in the case of Main v. Glen, 7 Biss. 86, 16, 1 Fed. Cas. No. 8,973, wherein it was said: "But I do not wish to rest my decision alone upon the legal presumption. The evidence supports the charge that the sale was made with intent to defraud the bankrupt's creditors. I do not believe the testimony that the defendant paid $13,000 in cash at that time. The evidence of the defendant and the McDonalds on that question is incredible, and cannot be true. The transaction as stated by defendant was substantially this: Siegrist on the 10th of December went to New York to see about making some arrangement about his debts, leaving the defendant in charge of his business at Wausau. He wrote to defendant once while there to send him money to pay his expenses; that he returned on the 27th of January following about noon, and that before tea-time of that day the agreement to sell his entire stock of goods, together with his accounts and all other effects at the price of $13,000 was made; that defendant had $5,000 in cash in his possession at that time, $1,500 of which had been paid to him that day by Mr. Siegrist for gold sold to him while in New York; that before tea he went out and found two young men by the name of McDonald, and borrowed of them $7,000—$4,000 of one and $3,000 of the other; that he also borrowed $1,000 of one Kemp, and that the money was placed in the safe for Siegrist that night. The defendant was a saloon keeper, and his wife kept a small millinery and dressmaking shop. He, in company with another party bought the saloon of the McDonald boys in July previous, for $1,500, and paid down $600 and got time for the balance by giving a chattel mortgage on property as security. He claims that he had then in his possession $5,000, among which there were three $1,000 bills. He says he got in the money borrowed from the McDonald boys, four more $1,000 bills, and that he paid Siegrist seven $1,000 bills, that on the morning of the 28th he had a formal bill of sale prepared by his attorney, and that the parties and his attorney went to another attorney's office where it was executed and witnessed, and the money was handed over in a package said to contain $13,000, but not counted then by anyone, in the presence of this attorney who was used as a witness of the execution of the paper and the passing over the package; that this was before the parties had breakfasted; that the defendant engaged the evening before, at the livery stable, a team to take Siegrist to the railroad at Stevens Point in the morning; that after getting the money Siegrist went away, claiming that he was going to Milwaukee and Chicago to settle his debts, but never returned; that he was owing his clerks and various parties, including his banker, quite a large sum, which he did not pay, and thereupon defendant took possession of the goods; that he did not give the McDonalds any security for the $7,000, nor Kemp for the $1,000, but gave Kemp notes for about $700 against customers and paid him $270 in money the next day, and took up his own note. Now this story is so strange and unusual, not to say absurd, as to effectually refute itself."

In the case of In re Kramer, 210 Fed. 977, the court said, without, however, disclosing the details of the testimony: "A careful examination of the testimony of the two bankrupts taken before the referee shows numerous inconsistencies, evasions, and deliberate falsehood in their explanation of the purposes for which the money was withdrawn and of the disposition made of it. The more the bankrupts attempted to explain the depletion of the firm's assets, the more hopelessly they convicted themselves of intentional falsehood. Under these circumstances their present naked denial that they now have in their possession or control the funds abstracted is unworthy of belief."

III. Testimony Believed.

1. OWNERSHIP OF BUSINESS RUN BY BANKRUPT.

Where an application for discharge is resisted on the ground that the bankrupt has fraudulently concealed his ownership of a corporate business run by him, testimony standing alone, without any further proof of fraud, is not unreasonable and incredible which tends to show that the bankrupt is not the owner of the corporate business, that the shares therein are the property of relatives, who furnished the capital for the purpose of setting the bankrupt up in business but expect to be paid back in full out of the profits of the concern, although suspicion is cast on the transaction by the fact that, although a dividend of fifteen per cent could have been paid out of the earnings of the business none has been paid, no meetings of stockholders have been had, and no accounting has been made to the stockholders. In re Meyers, 96 Fed. 408, wherein the court said: "The principle shareholder was his brother-in-law, who frankly testifies that he furnished the money (some $1,800 or $2,000) to establish this corporation, for the purpose of setting his brother up in business, as a family affair; that the stock was distributed among the relatives for the purpose of having the amount of money repaid to the brother-in-law, or to those shareholders to whom he gave it, whenever the business would justify it. He testified that he expected and hoped, and still expects and hopes, that at some time his brother-in-law, through the profits of the business, would be able to repay the money, but that he and the other relatives are still the bona fide holders of the stock. There is not a particle of evidence to show to the contrary of this statement—such as that it was a mere device, and that the capital stock of the company was really furnished by the bankrupt, directly or indirectly. It is contended by counsel in argument that this was a loan by the brother-in-law to the bankrupt, and that the organization of the corporation was an ingenious device to cover up the real transaction; but this is only an inference, and there is no reason why the brother-in-law who furnished the money might not secure himself in the advances made, in the form of stock in a corporation, as well as in the form of a loan and chattel mortgage on the goods, or in any other way. The only question is whether it is or is not a bona fide transaction, and it does not appear to the court, however suspicious it may seem, that upon the evidence it can be fairly said that it was a device or fraudulent transaction, and not a legitimate and honest way to help a broken-down relative. He is paid a salary of $1,500, and he testifies that the business has been prosperous enough to enable him, if desired, to pay as much as fifteen per cent dividend on the amount of the capital stock; but no dividends have been paid, no meetings of stockholders or directors have been held, and the brother-in-law who made the advances frankly testifies that he has had nothing to do with the business, except in the manner above stated. If there were any proofs tending to show that the money actually came from the bankrupt himself, or that it was an out and out gift to him by his brother-in-law, there would be some foundation for the alleged fraudulent transaction; but it is not even pretended that there is any proof of that kind in this case. . . . There is no denying the force of the fact that this was a family affair, and that he was receiving, through the processes mentioned, the benefits of this business, but it is not at all inconsistent with the most honest intentions and the utmost good faith that a business should be conducted in that way. If a bank, or other capitalist, or other friends than his relatives, had done for him just what his relatives have done, in the absence of any proof to show that it was a simulated transaction and that he was the real owner of the stock or corporate property, there could be no objection taken to the transaction. It would be giving undue weight to the circumstance that those who came to his relief were relatives, to pronounce the whole transaction fraudulent upon that circumstance alone."

Testimony by a bankrupt that the business run by him was not his but was owned by his sister, was held not to be incredible, in the case of In re Miller, 212 Fed. 920, 129 C. C. A. 440, reversing decree 203 Fed. 170. It appeared in that case that the bankrupt had been engaged in a small business of buying up photographers' used plates, cleaning the film off, and selling the glass to frame makers; that he became financially embarrassed and sold the business; and that the bankrupt's sister then put $600 or $700 into a similar business, which the bankrupt ran for her. The court said: "This transaction left Miller without remunerative occupation. He had a sister who had saved $600 to $700. She, we may presume at his suggestion, decided to go into the same sort of business he had been engaged in for several years. She took out a certificate for doing business as the Williamsburg Glass Works and put her money into it, employing him to conduct the business on a salary of $15 a week and another man to clean the plates. There is certainly nothing novel, or startling, or necessarily suspicious about this. Countless men, who have gone broke, have had wives, or mothers or blood relatives who have done the same thing for them. Believing the experience and business enterprise of their relative would make their capital fruitful enough to insure him a living wage and possibly an additional profit for themselves, they have taken the risk. Sometimes, no doubt, the arrangement is merely a cover under which the person thus accommodated himself shares in the profits beyond his salary, but the ostensible arrangement is such a natural one that there must be some proof to indicate that it is a mere cover for something else. It is not sufficient proof of that, as the petitioning creditor seems to contend, that the female does not herself conduct the business about which she knows little or nothing. The vital question is who gets the profits and there is nothing in this record to indicate that during the two years that the 'Williamsburg Glass Works' continued, Miller drew anything from it except his weekly salary."

2. RENEWAL OF STOCK IN TRADE.

Testimony by a bankrupt that $450 which he had been ordered by the referee to pay to the trustee was given by him to his clerk some three weeks before the selling out of the business, while he was sick at home, to be used by the clerk for the renewal of the stock in trade of the business, was held not to be so improbable as to authorize its rejection as a fabrication. In re McCormick, 97 Fed. 566, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 340.

3. GAMBLING OR ROBBERY.

Statements on examination by a bankrupt that he did not have on hand the sums mentioned in reports he had previously made to commercial agencies, that he had expended part thereof in gambling on horse races, and that he had lied in his statements to the commercial agencies as to the amount thereof, have been held not to be so improbable as to be unworthy of belief and to raise the inference that he did actually have the sums in question in his possession. In re Adler, 129 Fed. 502, 12 Am. Bankr. Rep. 19. The court said: "This examination shows substantially what is alleged in the petition—that the bankrupt had made the reports stated to the commercial agencies, and that he had expended the sums of money that were mentioned in the examination, and, according to his statement, other sums not so definitely shown, and in his examination he gave as an excuse for not having more money on hand that he had wasted it in gambling on the horse races by buying pools at the pool room on the other side of the river in Arkansas, kept for the use of those participating in this city in such gambling enterprises. The creditors undertook to prove that the bankrupt had never been seen in this pool room, and, from such facts and circumstances, that this story of losing the money on the races was untrue. In a general way, it may be said that the proof shows that as late as November before the filing of the petition of the bankrupt in January he had on deposit in the banks some $400 in money, and at one time he drew out of the bank as much as $1,400 in money. The bankrupt explains his affairs by saying that the statements that he made to the commercial agencies were untrue, that they were exaggerated for the purpose of making a good showing for his credit, that he kept no books of account except a scratcher to show to whom he had sold goods on a credit, that his accounts with his creditors were simply kept by placing his invoices on a file wire, that he kept only a small store or shop, and that his business did not amount to anything like the sums of money indicated by the creditors. There is no more conclusive proof than this as to the possession of the money, and it is not claimed by counsel that any more conclusive proof is available, but only that it is a necessary implication from these facts that the bankrupt is concealing the money and withholding it from his trustee. The court does not think that this is at all a necessary presumption, and is of the opinion that upon such proof it is not within the powers of the bankruptcy court to direct the bankrupt to pay the money into court under the penalties for contempt."

A story of the loss of assets of the value of $3,000 or more, by burglary, was held not to be so inherently improbable as to necessitate its rejection, in the case of In re Chamelin, 184 Fed. 553, 25 Am. Bankr. Rep. 570, wherein it was said: "The bankrupt had practically nothing to represent this when he was put into bankruptcy, and he is called on, in consequence, to overcome the discrepancy. His explanation is that on the night of December 15, when he and his wife were at a ball, his rooms were broken into and his goods were stolen. This is an easy story to set up, and a difficult one to refute, and the burden is on him to substantiate it. And yet, considering the nature of the goods and the opportunity afforded, it cannot be said to be inherently improbable. It is also sustained by considerable testimony, some of which, at least, is apparently disinterested. It is said to be discredited by the inconsis-encies to be found in it, which have been discussed in argument. I agree, however, with the referee, that they are not enough to do more than arouse a suspicion. It is of no great significance, for instance, that, while the jewelry cases disappeared, the watches of customers were left undisturbed on the workbench. There was some scattering of things around the room, according to the evidence, as though parties had rummaged about in it. But, even if no custom work was taken, the explanation would not be difficult. The watches and jewelry belonging to different individuals would be easy to trace, and no experienced thief would be likely to burden himself with any such means of detection. And whatever may be otherwise said of the story, it has stood this important test: That there is nothing in the circumstances of the bankrupt or his family or friends, following the robbery, to suggest that any of them have profited by it. It is true that $541 turned up, not long afterwards, in his wife's bank account. But $541 falls far short of $3,300. And it is further explained that she borrowed this to meet the possible prosecution of her husband, which was threatened. Besides this, three full years have now elapsed, and abundant opportunity has been given to observe the consequences, which in no wise call in question the bankrupt's conduct. To all appearances he is in the same impecunious condition that he was immediately after the alleged robbery; and the case is thus devoid of those signs of prosperity which sometimes follow a fraudulent failure."

4. MISCELLANEOUS.

Evidence that an illiterate bankrupt, running three stores in different places, was unable to account for large amounts of money which he claimed to have lost through the dissolute habits and lax business methods of his sons who conducted two of the stores, was held to be credible, under the circumstances, in the case of In re Switzer, 140 Fed. 976, 15 Am. Bankr. Rep. 468, wherein it was said: "The bankrupt, it appears, is an illiterate man, speaking the English language with difficulty, and no motion was made for any examination before me. It appears that he kept no books; that his business was loosely conducted; that during the busy season of 1904 he called in a great many additional clerks, selling goods below cost, and expending a good deal of money in advertising; that his son, who was in charge of the Laurens store, was of dissolute habits, addicted to gambling, and that he lost a good deal of money in various ways. The son in charge of the Greenville store was, it appears, also a youth. That a person conducting a mercantile business in three places, as loosely as this business seems to have been conducted, and keeping no book of account, should fail to be able to satisfactorily account for his affairs, was to be expected, and that bankruptcy should follow such methods was natural, and if the bankrupt is to be held to the liability of a trustee liable to account for all the property purchased by him, as though it were trust funds, his failure to keep books and to account satisfactorily for every article of merchandise traced to his possession would make, upon the proofs here, a strong case against him; but I do not conceive that upon this motion I can judge him by that standard. . . . Upon the whole case I am of opinion that the testimony is insufficient to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the bankrupt is now in possession of any money or goods. It shows that the business was very loosely conducted, and there is ground for suspicion from the conduct of the bankrupt during the autumn of 1904 that he was conducting his business in such a way as to convert his stock into cash without regard to the interests of his creditors; but suspicion is not proof, and, in the absence of clear evidence that the bankrupt is now in possession of money or goods belonging to his trustee, I cannot feel justified in committing him to jail."

In the case of In re Walder, 142 Fed. 784, 16 Am. Bankr. Rep. 41, it was held that testimony of the bankrupt as to his disposition of assets, as that testimony was outlined in the opinion, was not so inherently unworthy of belief as to justify its rejection and the issuance of an order to turn over assets. The court said: "The real question, then, is whether or not the bankrupt has accounted for the disappearance of the goods which he has been ordered to return, or, to put it more definitely, whether his explanation leaves the matter in such a shape that the court can find beyond a reasonable doubt that he now has possession or control of the goods, or of the money into which they have been converted. The referee defends the order by saying that he does not believe the bankrupt's explanation, because he has testified to some very bad things which he did, and that, uncorroborated, it is no explanation at all. The inference would seem reasonable that if the bad bankrupt had produced his relatives, and if they had told the same story, the order would not have been issued. The bankrupt testified that he sent $10,500 worth of goods to his brother-in-law in New York, who sold the lot for $5,250, which went as follows: $2,350 retained by his brother-in-law to liquidate an old debt; $1,700 to his sister-in-law to pay an old debt; $1,000 to Yale National Bank to take up notes indorsed by relatives; $200 gone in expenses. The referee apparently accepts the statement that the notes at the bank were paid and that $200 was expended personally. It is probable that he thinks the $2,350 and $1,700 were retained by the New York relatives, but believes that the bankrupt did not owe them that, or, indeed, any amount. Unless he had some such notion, it is not easy to understand how he came at the sum of $4,000, which he has ordered turned over to the trustee. Indeed, at the oral argument before the court, it was conceded by counsel for the trustee that the question all hinges upon the disposition of the $10,500 worth of goods, and is not affected by the matter of other goods let out upon lease, about which uncertainties exist. The referee, then, believes that the goods went back to New York, but disbelieves the rest of the story, and intimates that, if the others had sworn as the bankrupt did, he could not (although he might still have disbelieved the story) have found facts upon which to base the order under review. The court cannot avoid the feeling that, when a bankrupt comes forward and deliberately tells a story so degrading, he is entitled to have it count for something as tending to show what has become of the goods which he owns up to having disposed of so wantonly."

OWENS

v.

MUNDEN.

North Carolina Supreme Court—February 17, 1915.

168 N. Car. 266; 84 S. E. 257.

"Father" — Meaning of Term — Stepfather Not Included.

Under Revisal 1905, § 2088, providing that, where either party to a proposed marriage is under 18 and resides with the father, mother, uncle, etc., the register of deeds shall not issue a license for such marriage until the consent in writing of the relation with whom the infant resides shall be delivered to him, while the consent of the persons named, and in the order named, must be obtained, and where the infant is living with the father and mother the written consent of the father is necessary, where the infant is living with her mother and stepfather, the mother's consent is sufficient, and the stepfather's consent is not required, since the words "father" and "stepfather" are in general use and well understood, the difference in the relationship and the marked distinction between their duties and liabilities are well known, and the word "father" does not include a "stepfather," defined as the husband of one's mother, who is not one's father.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank county: CARTER, Judge.

Action by Joseph G. Owens, plaintiff, against J. W. Munden, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

[266] Action against a register of deeds to recover the penalty for issuing a license for the marriage of a girl under 18 years of age without the written consent required by the statute.

The plaintiff is the stepfather of Julia Irene Jones, formerly Julia Irene Barber, the plaintiff having married her mother in 1903. From the time of said marriage until her own marriage to Jones, with the exception of two very short intervals, Julia Irene lived with the plaintiff and her mother as a member of the family, the plaintiff feeding her, clothing her, and treating her as if she were his own child. Julia Irene was married to Claude Jones in 1913, when only 16 years of age. The license for this marriage was issued by the defendant. It was admitted that prior to the issuance of such license the defendant had been, in writing, notified by plaintiff that said Julia Irene was only 16 years old and forbidden to issue a license for her marriage. It was further admitted that at the time of issuing said license defendant had in his possession the written consent to such marriage of Julia Irene's mother, plaintiff's wife, who also resided with plaintiff. The usual issues were submitted. The judge charged the jury peremptorily to answer the first issue "No" and the second issue "Nothing." Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

P. W. McMullan for appellant.

Ward & Thompson and J. Kenyon Wilson for appellee.

ALLEN, J.—The Revisal, sec. 2088, provides that where either party to a proposed marriage is under 18 years of age and resides with the father, or mother, or uncle, or aunt, or brother, or elder sister, . . . the register of deeds shall not issue a license for such marriage until the consent in writing of the relation with whom such infant resides, or, if he or she resides at a school, of the person by whom the minor was placed at school, "and under whose custody or control he or she is," shall be [267] delivered to him, and the written consent shall be filed and preserved by the register; and it was held in Littleton v. Haar, 158 N. C. 566, that the consent of the persons named in the statute, and in the order named, should be obtained, the effect of the decision being that if the child is living with father and mother, the written consent of the father is necessary, and if with the mother, the father being dead, that her consent is sufficient.

If so, the only question presented by the appeal is whether the word "father" includes the stepfather within the meaning of the statute, and gives the stepfather the right to dispose of the daughter in marriage to the exclusion of the mother.

The two words, "father" and "stepfather," are in general use and well understood, and the difference in the relationship of the two to the child, and the marked distinction between their duties and liabilities, are well known.

If, therefore, we should hold that the stepfather has a prior right to the mother, we would have to insert in the statute a word not used by the General Assembly and having a meaning different from any word in the statute.

A stepfather is defined to be "The husband of one's mother who is not one's father" (31 Cyc. 1275, 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 784, Rapalje and Lawrence L. Dictionary), and this was approved in Thornburg v. American Strawboard Co. 141 Ind. 443, 40 N. E. 1062, 50 Am. St. Rep. 334, where the Court, after quoting the definition, says, in construing a statute giving a right of action to the father if living, and if not, to the mother: "The word 'father,' therefore, does not mean stepfather, nor does the word 'child' mean stepchild, even when the same is used in wills, where the rules of construction are not so strict as those governing the statute in controversy."

In Hennessy v. Bavarian Brewing Co. 145 Mo. 105, 46 S. W. 966, 68 Am. St. Rep. 554, 41 L.R.A. 385, the same question was decided, the Court denying the right of action in the stepfather for the wrongful death of his stepson under a statute conferring the right of action on the father and mother.

We are therefore of opinion that the word "father" used in the statute does not include stepfather, and that the written consent of the mother, the father being dead, authorized the issuing of the license.

No error.

NOTE.

"Father" as Including Stepfather.

It seems to be a general rule of construction that a term referring to parenthood is confined to natural parents and does not include a step-parent. Thus "parent" does not include a stepfather or stepmother (see the note to Coakley's Case, Ann. Cas. 1915A 867) and "mother" does not include a stepmother. See the note to Jones v. Mangan, Ann. Cas.

1914B 59. By a parity of reasoning it is held in the few cases passing on the point that the term "father" does not include a stepfather. Thornburg v. American Strawboard Co. 141 Ind. 443, 40 N. E. 1062, 50 Am. St. Rep. 334; People v. Schoonmaker, 117 Mich. 190, 75 N. W. 439, 72 Am. St. Rep. 560, 5 Detroit Leg. N. 177; Hennessy v. Bavarian Brewing Co. 145 Mo. 105, 46 S. W. 966, 68 Am. St. Rep. 554, 41 L.R.A. 385. And see the reported case. See also Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Cooper, 22 Ind. App. 459, 53 N. E. 1092, 72 Am. St. Rep. 319. Thus in Hennessy v. Bavarian Brewing Co. supra, wherein there was involved a statute providing for the institution of an action on the part of the father and mother for the death of a child by wrongful act, it was held that a stepfather had no right of action for the death of his stepson. The court said: "In this case the father was dead, and the mother as survivor, alone had a right to maintain this action. Her second husband was not the father of the deceased and hence has no right to maintain the action, and her marriage a second time did not sever her relation of mother to her son nor take away from her the right which the statute transmitted to her as mother to recover damages which her son might have recovered if he had survived the injury." In People v. Schoonmaker, 117 Mich. 190, 75 N. W. 439, 72 Am. St. Rep. 560, 5 Detroit Leg. N. 177, the respondent was convicted of statutory rape. The complaining witness was at the time under sixteen years of age. When she was called to the stand she was interrogated by counsel for the respondent as to her competency. From examination it appeared that she had gone through a form of marriage with the respondent before the judge of probate of one of the counties. The evidence showed that the complaining witness was an orphan, and that her stepfather did not give his consent to the marriage. The court held that that fact did not overcome the presumption of the regularity of the marriage, saying that the stepfather was not a natural guardian of the child. In Thornburg v. American Strawboard Co. 141 Ind. 443, 40 N. E. 1062, 50 Am. St. Rep. 334, the action was brought by a man who married the mother of a bastard child to recover for the death of the child under a statute which provided as follows: "A father (or, in case of his death or desertion of his family or imprisonment, the mother) may maintain an action for the injury or death of a child, and a guardian for the injury or death of his ward." Holding that the word "father" did not include a stepfather the court said: "As generally understood, the husband of one's mother by a subsequent marriage is a stepfather, strictly speaking, therefore, a man who marries the mother of a bastard child does not become the stepfather of such child. . . . Applying the principles stated to this case, it is clear that appellant cannot maintain this action. If it were conceded that he was the stepfather of the child named in the complaint, he would not come within the terms of the statute. Indeed, the definition given by Wharton, of the word stepfather would be decisive of the question: 'Stepfather—The husband of one's mother who is not one's father.'

In Hitch v. Wells, 8 Beav. (Eng.) 576, it was held that a notice of an application to appoint a guardian ad litem for infants, whose father was dead, served at the house of their stepfather, with whom they were residing, was sufficient.

HEWSON

v.

SHELLEY.

England—Court of Appeal, Chancery Division—March 14, 1914.

[1914] 2 Ch. 13.

Executors and Administrators — Revocation of Administration by Discovery of Will — Effect.

The discovery of a will after the appointment of an administrator does not make the appointment void ab initio, and accordingly a person purchasing realty from the administrator prior to the discovery of the will takes a good title.

[See note at end of this case.]

[13] Appeal from a decision of Astbury, J. [1913] 2 Ch. 384.

On January 30, 1899, George Francis Hewson, the owner in fee simple of the Ovington Glebe Estate, Southampton, died without issue.

On June 13, 1899, after a diligent but unsuccessful search had been made for a will, general letters of administration were granted to his widow, who applied therefor under a genuine belief that her husband had died intestate.

On May 31, 1900, the estate (less four acres purchased by the administratrix) was offered for sale by auction "by order of the administratrix" subject to certain particulars and conditions of sale.

The property was not sold at the auction, but by a contract [14] dated August 23, 1902, embodying the same particulars and conditions of sale, the administratrix agreed to sell the property to the defendant Sir John Shelley for 3500*l*.

By a conveyance dated October 13, 1902, and made between the administratrix of the one part and the purchaser of the other part, the administratrix "as personal representative of the said George Francis Hewson deceased by virtue of the powers conferred on her by the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and of every other power in this behalf her enabling and also in her individual capacity as to all estates or interests therein (if any) so vested in her" conveyed the estate to the purchaser in fee simple, and the purchaser took possession on the same day.

The administratrix died on September 2, 1911, having by her will, dated November 22, 1910, appointed one Davis to be her executor.

On November 11, 1911, in going through her papers her executor found a holograph will of G. F. Hewson which had slipped down between the back and shelves of certain pigeonholes in a desk or bureau in which G. F. Hewson had apparently placed it.

By this will, dated April 24, 1894, the testator G. F. Hewson bequeathed the Ovington Glebe Estate in trust for his wife for life and after her death to the plaintiff George Hewson on certain conditions therein mentioned. He appointed the plaintiffs, his wife, and another person, who renounced, his executors.

On February 9, 1912, the letters of administration were revoked and probate was granted to the plaintiffs.

On January 14, 1913, the plaintiffs as executors brought this action against the purchaser, his mortgagees, and the tenant of the property for possession and an account of the rents and profits since the widow's death. It was subsequently arranged that the tenant's name should be struck out as a defendant.

The defendants relied on the sale by the de facto administratrix, which they were entitled and indeed bound to assume was made in due course of administration and which they said was in fact so made.

The following additional facts relating to the actual administration of the estate were proved at the trial.

[15] The statutory next of kin of G. F. Hewson were his widow, two nephews, and four nieces, three of the nieces being his coheirresses.

On June 16, 1899, the solicitors of the administratrix wrote on her behalf to each of the three coheirresses stating that at the time of G. F. Hewson's death it was confidently believed that he had made a will. They stated that it was known that at one time such a will was in existence and on his deathbed G. F. Hewson informed his wife that he had left everything to her. Every effort, however, to find any will had so far failed, and though it was possible that it might at some future time be found, the presumption at present was that G. F. Hewson must have destroyed his former will with the intention of making a new one, but that this intention was never carried into effect. In these circumstances and acting on this presumption the widow had taken out administration and was now about to administer unless prior to the actual division a will came to light. They then pointed out that the real estate would devolve on the coheirresses subject to the widow's dower and informed them that it was of the poorest description and untenanted and was being farmed by a bailiff at a considerable loss, and that it was therefore imperative that it should be sold with as little delay as possible, and asking them to sign an enclosed authority for its sale, which was desirable if any advantage was to be derived from it.

The defendants objected that this letter was not evidence against them, but the objection was overruled.

It was also proved that prior to March, 1900, the estate duty, 188*l.*, on the realty was paid mainly out of the proceeds of sale of the four acres, and a small balance, about 15*l.*, out of the shares of personalty to which the widow and the coheirresses were entitled, and that the debts and funeral expenses, which were trifling, had been discharged. The succession duty was also paid out of the shares of personalty.

On March 1, 1900, the real estate still remained subject to six half-yearly instalments of a land improvement charge against which G. F. Hewson had covenanted to indemnify his vendor. The total instalments amounted to 23*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* These [16] instalments were regularly paid by the administratrix in March and September.

On May 31, 1900, the date of the abortive auction, the liability was only 19*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.*

On August 23, 1902, the date of the contract, there was only one instalment left, namely, 3*l.* 19*s.*, which was paid by the administratrix on September 24, 1902, before completion, and on completion on October 13, 1902, the administratrix became entitled to a return of 40*l.* estate duty and 19*l.* succession duty overpaid on the real estate. The administratrix had, however, incurred a liability of 69*l.* 10*s.* to the auctioneers and solicitors for the abortive auction, and certain solicitors' charges, about 45*l.*, for subsequent attempts to sell the property and in connection with the final winding up of the estate, and which were quite independent of the scale fee on the actual purchase.

One-third of the net proceeds of sale was invested in 1394*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* Consols to provide dower for the widow's life, and the residue was divided among the coheirresses. The widow's dower fund was still intact and stood in the name of Davis, her executor, a member of the firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiffs and formerly acting for the widow. The plaintiffs were willing to hand over this fund in exchange for the title deeds.

Upon these facts Astbury, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, on the ground that the title of the executors related back to the death of the testator, and that the grant of letters of administration and all acts done by the administratrix were void and of no effect. He considered that he was bound to come to this conclusion having regard to the authorities of Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, and Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, which were followed by Warrington, J., in Ellis v. Ellis [1905] 1 Ch. 613.

From this decision the defendant, Sir John Shelley, appealed.

Micklem, K. C., W. M. Hunt and H. S. Preston for appellant.

Jenkins, K. C. and Arnold Herbert, K. C. for respondents.

Solicitors: Withall & Withall; Hedges & Davis.

[27] COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This appeal raises an important question as to the operation and effect of letters of administration granted by the Probate Division of the High Court, on the assumption that there was no will, to the widow of the deceased, where afterwards a will was discovered which has been admitted to probate, the letters of administration being recalled. It has been held by Astbury, J., that the executors' title relates back to the death, and that the grant of letters of administration was, and all acts done by the administratrix were, void and of no effect. The question arises upon a conveyance by the administratrix in 1902 of a freehold estate purchased by Sir John Shelley. The will was discovered in November, 1911, and proved in February, 1912. The executors have recovered the property in this action. It is not disputed that there was absolute good faith in all parties concerned. It will be convenient, in the first place, to consider the position if the property sold had been held for a term of years, and, in the second place, to consider what, if any, difference is made by reason of the property being held in fee simple. The learned judge held himself bound by Graysbrook v. Fox, decided in the Common Bench, in the 7th Elizabeth, and reported in 1 Plowd. 275, and Abram v. Cunningham, decided in the King's Bench in the 28th Charles II., which authorities were recently followed by Warrington, J., in Ellis v. Ellis [1905] 1 Ch. 613. It may well be that the learned judge was justified, having regard to these authorities, in deciding as he did. Having had the advantage of very able arguments from counsel and having carefully considered all the authorities which have been called to our attention, I have arrived at the conclusion that the judgment under appeal ought to be discharged.

[28] I have read the judgment Phillimore, L.J., is about to deliver, in which he has fully considered the history of the law and the old authorities. I agree with that judgment. But, having regard to the importance of the case, I think I ought to state generally the line of reasoning by which I have reached the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed.

The earliest authority is in the Year Book 7 Edw. 4, where Littleton, with the concurrence of two other judges, said that where an executor has been appointed unknown to himself he may, when he has become aware, wholly take upon himself the powers of administration "and, Sir, the Ordinary may well grant administration in the mean time as he did here, but by the proving of the will the powers of the administrator are now determined." This authority has been recognized in Fitzherbert's Abridgment, 1577, in Brooke's Abridgment, 1587, in Rolle's Abridgment, in Viner's Abridgment, and, so far as I am aware, in every text-book of authority, including Williams on Executors, 10th ed. p. 199. It was referred to, and not disputed, in Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275. The decision of the majority of the judges in that case is illogical because they admitted that a sale by the administrator for the purpose of paying funeral expenses and debts should not be avoided but should remain indefeasible, a principle which it is impossible to reconcile with the theory that a grant of administration was void ab initio. Side by side with Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, there are a series of authorities establishing that the Ecclesiastical Courts could grant and did grant limited administration even where there was an executor, for example (a) where an executor was a minor (Piggot's Case, 5 Rep. 29a) (b) where there was litigation and it was doubtful whether there was a will at all or which of two wills was valid, and (c) where an executor was out of the country. If there were any serious doubt as to the law before the Statute of Distributions (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10), I think the form of bond provided by the statute in cases of administration goes far to remove it. It contemplates the possibility of there being a will which may subsequently be proved. It imposes an obligation upon the administrator to pay debts and to distribute the surplus. All this could not be done [29] unless the administrator had, by virtue of the grant, the personal property vested in him. The bond under the Probate Act is substantially in the same form.

The contention which prevailed in the Court below leads to startling results. A debtor of the deceased man might pay the administrator and would get a good discharge. If sued by the administrator he would not be allowed to challenge the title of the administrator. A purchaser could not resist a decree for specific performance of a contract for sale by the administrator. In short, it seems to me that the person for the time being clothed by the Court of Probate with the character of legal personal representative is the legal personal representative, and enjoys all the powers of a legal personal representative, unless and until the grant of administration is revoked or has determined. If this view is not right no person could safely deal with, or accept, a title from an administrator, for it is impossible to prove that there may not be a will. The decision of Gorell Barnes, J., in In the Goods of Wright [1893] P. 21, is a direct authority in favour of the view which I have taken. In that case administration was granted until the original will or an authentic copy should be brought into the registry for the very purpose of enabling the sale of leaseholds to be completed and limited to that purpose. In my opinion Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, and Ellis v. Ellis [1905] 1 Ch. 613, must be regarded as no longer law.

It remains to consider the effect of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 2. I think it confers upon the legal personal representative for the time being the same powers with reference to real estate as he would have as to personal estate, subject to some exceptions not material for the present purpose. If, as I hold, the administratrix could have sold and conveyed a leasehold, I think she could convey, as she did, the freehold property to Sir John Shelley. I prefer to base my decision on the general grounds above stated, and not upon any special provisions in the Court of Probate Act, 1857, although I think there is a good deal in that Act which assists the appellant.

There is, however, a separate point under s. 70 of the [30] Conveyancing Act, 1881. It seems to me that the order granting administration to the widow was a judicial act, and even if that grant could be held void on the ground of want of jurisdiction the title of the purchaser would be protected under that section.

In my opinion the appeal succeeds and the action must be dismissed with costs here and below.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—On January 30, 1899, G. F. Hewson died seised. On June 13, 1899, letters of administration were granted to his widow. On October 13, 1902, she as administratrix conveyed the land to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. On September 2, 1911, the widow died. On November 11, 1911, in going through her papers a holograph will of G. F. Hewson was found. It appointed the plaintiffs and two others to be executors. Until that time every one bona fide believed that he had died intestate. On February 9, 1912, the letters of administration were revoked and probate was granted to the plaintiffs. In this action, commenced on January 14, 1913, the plaintiffs have recovered in ejectment against the purchaser. We have to decide (standing as we do in a position in which we are more at liberty than was Astbury, J., to review the law) whether this is right.

If it is right it is difficult to see how any one could ever accept a conveyance from a legal personal representative. The situation is not confined to the case of no will found or believed to exist, nor to that of lost will and letters of administration granted in any such case. If the deceased died leaving a will whereby he appointed executors and they proved and sold, the case would be the same if subsequently a later will came to light by which the former will was revoked. Further, if in any case a purchaser declined to complete and the legal personal representative de facto brought his action for specific performance and recovered judgment, the purchaser would nevertheless be liable to ejectment although in the specific performance action he could not have been heard to deny that the plaintiff was legal personal representative. If an administration action were brought in which an order was made for sale and a vesting order obtained, [31] the purchaser would have no title. Jones v. Barnett [1900] 1 Ch. 370, would not apply to such a case. To take possession and administer without probate or administration within a limited time is a statutory offence visited with a penalty (55 Geo. 3, c. 184, s. 37), but at the same time acts done under letters of administration bona fide taken are according to the argument void. If such be the law it urgently requires to be set right by legislation. We have to consider whether it is the law.

An inquiry which it is convenient to make in the first instance is whether the purchaser under such circumstances has obtained the legal estate. If he has, and if, as is here the case, he is bona fide purchaser for value without notice, is there any ground to take it from him? If the legal estate was in the administratrix it has passed to the purchaser. Was it under s. 1 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, in the administratrix? Upon G. F. Hewson's death leaving a will appointing executors, it is contended and I assume that the legal estate vested in the executors, although no one knew that there were such. This is so unless "executor" in s. 24, sub-s. 2, of the Land Transfer Act means "executor who has proved." It is not so defined in the Act of 1897. The definition is in contrast with that in s. 8, sub-s. 4, of the Conveyancing Act, 1911. For the present purpose I do not find it necessary to decide, but assume, that in the language of the Land Transfer Act an executor is before probate personal representative. But when on June 13, 1899, letters of administration were granted to the widow the legal estate, by virtue of the 1st section, vested in the administratrix if she thereupon became within the section the deceased's personal representative. Did she become such personal representative? The respondents contend that she did not. By their contention as ultimately evolved in the argument I understand them to mean not that the order of the Probate Division and the grant to her were for all purposes void ab initio, but that the effect of the order was that notwithstanding she became administratrix yet no property vested in her. Having regard to ss. 77 and 78 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, they say that for the purposes of those sections the order was a good order. But they add that the order did not operate to [32] pass the property because the property was, they say, in some one else, namely, the unknown executors. I find it difficult to understand an administrator who as regards ownership of the property to be administered is nobody but at the same time is a person owing the duties expressed in the bond, namely, well and truly to administer all the estate which by law devolves to and vests in the personal representative of the deceased, but having no property in that which he has to administer. However, the argument is that there was no jurisdiction in the Court of Probate to make such an order as would reach the property. I shall presently examine the cases to see whether this can be maintained.

There are many cases in which notwithstanding the existence of an executor the Court of Probate may grant administration, for instance durante minore ætate (In re Cope, 16 Ch. D. 49); durante absentia (in which case 38 Geo. 3, c. 87, s. 7, would, I agree, confer such power as would exist in an administrator durante minore ætate): pendente lite even where the lis is touching an executorship (Walker v. Woollaston, 2 P. Wms. 576, 589; Bacon's Abridgement, Executors (G)); until the will (which was in India) can be brought here for probate (In the Goods of Metcalfe, 1 Add. Ecc. 343); or until the will be found (In the Goods of Campbell, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 555; In the Goods of Wright [1893] P. 21); and may clothe the administrator with the office and cast upon him the duties of administrator. Sect. 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), includes amongst other events in which an administrator may be appointed the event of the executor being resident out of the United Kingdom. Such an administrator is and an administrator appointed for a limited time such as above mentioned is, I think, personal representative within s. 1 of the Land Transfer Act. If there be an executor and he has acted (so that he cannot subsequently renounce), but the Court does not know it and grants letters of administration to another, the administration may be revoked, but until revoked is valid according to Doyle v. Blake, 2 Sch. & Lef. 237. Lord Redesdale there observed that "some of the old cases could [33] scarcely be supported on principle, they were decided whilst a great jealousy of the Ecclesiastical Court prevailed," and added that "the administration was void only as a protection to the executor but in no other sense."

In Allen v. Dundas, 3 T. R. 125, 129, 131, a receipt given by the executor of a forged will which had been admitted to probate was held to be a good discharge although the probate was afterwards declared null and administration granted to the next of kin. Ashhurst, J., said: "Every person is bound to pay deference to a judicial act of a Court having competent jurisdiction," and Buller, J., said: "Here there was an executor de facto who had obtained a probate and the defendant neither knew nor could tell whether he was rightful executor or not further than he was informed by the probate which he could not dispute." And again: "Evidence that another and not the plaintiff was executor or that the testator was non compos mentis or that the will was forged could not be admitted, for that would be to falsify the proceedings of the Ordinary in cases of which he was judge."

The appellant says, and I think with justice, that the order of the Court of Probate is within s. 70 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, an order which as against a purchaser is not to be invalidated on the ground of want of jurisdiction. So that even if (as I think is not the case) the Probate Court had not jurisdiction to grant administration, the purchaser is entitled to say that as against him no one can say the order was invalid.

The decision which is said principally to create difficulty is the case of Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275. The dates were: Death on December 27, administration granted to the son on January 15, sale by the administrator at some date before January 27, probate of the will by the son-in-law who was executor on January 27, goods delivered to Fox the purchaser on February 1. In the action the executor recovered from Fox, who had purchased from the administrator. Walsh, J., and Dyer, C.J., held for the plaintiff, Weston, J., for the defendant. Dyer, C.J., says that "the executor takes his commencement by a temporal act namely, by the making of the will of the testator, which is a temporal act, but takes its perfection by a spiritual act, namely, by probate in the [34] spiritual Court, and the executor's authority is over a thing temporal. But the Ordinary or administrator have no authority or interest unless the deceased die intestate" (meaning seemingly die without appointing an executor) (p. 280). Again at p. 281: "At the death the law vests the property in the executor and consequently never vests it in the Ordinary and therefore never through him in the administrator." Dyer, C.J., however, cites Littleton in 7 Edw. 4, 12b: "presently by the probate the power of the administrator is determined." The passage in the Year Book is as follows: "A man may make me his executor unknown to myself, etc., and then when I have become aware of it I may well take upon myself the power of administration disposition, etc., and, Sir, the Ordinary may well grant administration in the meantime as he did here, but by the proving of the will the powers of the administrator are determined unless the executors have at one time refused before the Ordinary, then perchance the law may will otherwise." In Fitzherbert's Abridgment (1577), Administrators (folio 13), and Brooke's Abridgment (1586), Executors, the passage is found in similar terms. If "determined" here means, as I think it does, "brought to an end" and not "declared to be void," the passage is no authority for saying, as Dyer, C.J., said, that the property never has vested in the administrator. That is for the purposes of the Land Transfer Act the material question. Further, in 1 Rolle's Abridgment, p. 907, and in 11 Viner's Abridgment, p. 66, the case is referred to as authority for the proposition that "If a man makes an executor, but it is not known, or concealed, the Ordinary may grant administration, and this shall be good till the other prove the will." In this state of things it seems to me that Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, is not an authority that such an order for administration creates no title in the administrator, and having regard to the passage in Plowden at p. 282 it seems impossible that it can be so. That passage affirms that a sale by the administrator to raise money for funeral expenses or debts is good. How can a sale of goods in which the vendor has no property be good? Either the property is or it is not in the administrator.

If, as Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, affirms, the administrator [35] has the property for some purposes, it must be that the property passes to him although he may be restricted in his power over it, and when probate is granted to the executor that power "is determined." The result of the decision I think is at most that the property does vest in the administrator, but with restrictions upon his power of dealing with it. This view is borne out by such cases as Prince's Case, 5 Rep. 29b, where it was held that the administrator durante minore aetate could sell, but not unless it be of necessity for payment of debts or on the ground of bona peritura, and is I think consistent with all the cases. Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, looks very much like a case in which there was a race between son and son-in-law and the title under the executor was preferred to that derived under the administrator. Upon the facts moreover it appears that the goods only "came to" Fox on February 1 after probate granted. In Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, 2 Mod. 146, Freem. K. B. 445, counsel conceded that Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275 had decided more than I think it did decide, that the court held that administration taken when there was an executor "was void at first and was not made good by the renunciation of the executor." The case is treated, however, as one of concealed will, not of unknown will.

Woolley v. Clark, 5 B. & Al. 744, 7 E. C. L. 249, was again a case of concealed will. The defendants were two, namely, the executor of an earlier will and the auctioneer who sold by his direction, and they had notice of the later will previously to the sale of the goods. The purchaser was no party. Best, J., in giving judgment says that in the case of a judgment irregularly obtained "the sheriff is justified," and applies that illustration by saying that the party who obtained the probate was not justified in selling, "but a creditor who paid a debt while the letters of administration were unrepealed would be protected."

In Boxall v. Boxall, 27 Ch. D. 220, the will contained no appointment of executors, so that the question as between executor de facto and administrator suppressing a will did not arise.

These are the cases relied upon as supporting the proposition [36] that a disposition by the administrator when there is in fact an executor is void. To these is to be added Ellis v. Ellis [1905] 1 Ch. 613, which Astbury, J., in fact followed in the judgment now under appeal.

I do not think that Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, supports the above proposition, and if Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, 2 Mod. 146, Freem. K. B. 445, supports it I think it is wrong. The true view of these cases is I think that the property does pass, that the authority of the administrator is not a void but a determinable authority, and that for certain purposes at any rate he has a power of disposition over the property to be administered. In Packman's Case (1595) 6 Rep. 18b, and Blackborough v. Davis (1701) 1 P. Wms. 41, it was decided that letters of administration granted contrary to the statute (e. g., not to the nearest of kin) when repealed were not void, but all dispositions of goods pending the administration were good. From this it seems to follow that the order of the Ecclesiastical Court is not void ab initio, and that the property does pass to the administrator for the time being.

There is clear authority that payments to as distinguished from dispositions by what is called the "visible administratrix" (Stephens v. Langley, Finch 40, as, e. g., the executor of a forged will Allen v. Dundas, 3 T. R. 125, or the administrator when there existed a will Prosser v. Wagner, 1 C. B. (N. S.) 289, 87 E. C. L. 289) are valid.

I arrive, therefore, at the conclusion that where an administrator has been appointed by an order of the Probate Court the visible administrator, as he is called in Stephens v. Langley, Finch 40, is a person who is within s. 1 of the Land Transfer Act a "personal representative." From this it results that the real estate which was vested in the person of whom he is personal representative vests in him by virtue of the words "become vested in his personal representatives or representative from time to time," and that a purchaser for value without notice from him conveying as administrator obtains a good title.

It follows that this appeal must be allowed.

[37] PHILLIMORE, L.J.—On January 30, 1899, one George Francis Hewson died leaving a widow, no children, three nieces who were his coheirresses at law, and the same three with three other nephews and nieces his next of kin. He appears to have stated to his wife shortly before his death that he had made a will and left everything to her. But after diligent search no will could be found. The widow therefore took out general letters of administration, collected and divided the personal estate, and ultimately on October 13, 1902, sold and conveyed his real estate, being a farm in Hants, to the defendant Sir John Shelley for 3500*l.* A part of the proceeds was retained to secure the widow's dower, and the rest was divided between the coheirresses. The sale was apparently made with the consent of the coheirresses but in exercise of the legal title of the administratrix. It does not distinctly appear whether it would or would not have been necessary for payment of debts.

On September 2, 1911, the widow died. Her executor, looking over and for papers, discovered at the back of a bureau a holograph will of George Francis Hewson. This discovery was made on November 11, 1911. The will had been made on April 24, 1894. By it the testator appointed four executors, one being his wife, and devised his estate to his wife for life with remainder to a relative who was not heir-at-law, nor one of the next of kin. On February 9, 1912, the two surviving executors, one being the devisee of this estate, obtained recall of the letters of administration and probate of the will; and on January 14, 1913, they brought this action against the purchaser, Sir John Shelley, his mortgagees, and the tenant in occupation to recover the estate.

Astbury, J., has decided with reluctance and in obedience to authorities, which were probably binding upon him as a judge of first instance, in favour of the plaintiffs, and it is from this judgment that the present appeal is brought.

The principle upon which the learned judge decided was that this administration, there being in existence though unknown a will appointing an executor, was void—not voidable but void.

Before us the counsel for the respondents have preferred to support the judgment on the ground that the administratrix in the circumstances acquired no title to any property, at any rate [38] not to the real property of Captain Hewson, and having no title could pass none on. The case has been most ably and learnedly and, I might add, courageously argued by counsel on both sides; and it necessitates a research into first principles.

I propose, in the first instance, to deal with the matter apart from the effect of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and to consider the case as if we were dealing with a conveyance of leaseholds, chattels real.

It is said for the respondents that the property of a deceased person vests in the executor immediately upon the death and by the mere effect of the will. In some senses this is true. It is true that an executor can properly act at once, that he can collect his testator's goods, receive and give discharge for debts due, and alien the goods including chattels real in due course of administration, subject always to the condition that he will some time or another satisfy the Court that has jurisdiction over the subject-matter that there is a will and that he is the executor. But till he has proved it or till it has been proved to the Court, till it has become probatum, his title is not certain, and in that way is not complete.

The Statute of Westminster the Second, c. 19 (A. D. 1285) recognizes that the personal property of a person dying intestate passes to the Ordinary, making provision that in future the Ordinary shall be responsible for the deceased's debts so far as the assets extend. Subject to this provision the Ordinary remained as before entitled to dispend the goods of the deceased to such pious uses as he thought fit. Before and after this Act an administrator was the mere bailiff or deputy of the Ordinary whom he selected at his will and pleasure, who had no independent right and could not bring an action any more than a sequestrator appointed by the Ordinary: Harding v. Hall (1842) 10 M. & W. 42; Phillimore on Ecclesiastical Law, 2d ed. p. 375.

The Act 31 Edw. 3, c. 11 (A. D. 1357) restricted the power of selection and gave the administrator, called in the Act the deputy, power to sue as an executor could: see Hensloe's Case, 9 Rep. 40a. The Act 21 Hen. 8, c. 5 (A. D. 1529) further limited the Ordinary in his choice of an administrator.

[39] At some stage in the history of our law (when it is not necessary to determine) the Ordinary became bound to allow a pars rationabilis to the widow and next of kin.

But it was not till the Statute of Distributions (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10, A. D. 1670) that the Ordinary became bound to distribute "the surplusage" (those are the words of the statute) to the widow and next of kin in shares and in an order of succession statutorily defined. By the same Act the Ordinary was directed to take bond with sureties in a form provided by it from the administrator to insure the latter's due administration. The condition of the bond is important for another part of the argument. I rather think that though the word "administration" is used in the Act of Henry VIII. the Act of Charles II. is the first which uses the word "administrator."

From the date of the Act of Charles II. the Ordinary ceases to have any interest in the administration of the estate of an intestate. He has no discretion as to the distribution of the "surplusage." He becomes a mere judicial officer, declaring the intestacy, determining it inter partes if there is a dispute, appointing as administrator the person who is entitled by law to be appointed, determining in what was called "an interest" suit who is the person entitled, if there is a dispute, and taking his established fees of office or Court.

As soon as the temporal Courts had come to appreciate this position their jealousy of the Ordinary ceased, as is stated by Lord Redesdale in Doyle v. Blake (1804) 2 Sch. & Lef. 231. It is perhaps unfortunate that Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, should have come up for decision a year or two before the Act of Charles II.

I will deal with the authorities later on, but before beginning with them in detail, I would observe that in some of them it is put as if the jurisdiction of the Ordinary was conferred upon him by the statute 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, and was restricted by that statute to cases of intestacy. The jurisdiction was not conferred by that statute or even by the earlier one of Westminster the Second. The jurisdiction, or, more properly, the vesting of the estate of an intestate with power to distribute it subject to certain provisions as he thought proper, is recognized by the [40] Statute of Westminster the Second as already existing. The statute of Edward III. requires the Ordinary where the estate has become vested in him to pass it on to an administrator, whereas before the administrator was only his deputy created for his own ease and convenience. Still, however, if a special construction be put upon the word "intestate," there is no objection to saying that it is only in case of an intestacy that the estate vested in the Ordinary, and could be committed or passed on by him to an administrator. That some special meaning must be put upon the word "intestate" is obvious. No one has ever denied the power of the Ordinary to grant administrations cum testamento annexo or de bonis non; and it will appear as I proceed that though administrations lite pendente, durante minore ætate, and durante absentia have been disputed, ultimately the power of the Ordinary to grant them was established, and when I say this I do not mean established by 38 Geo. 3, c. 87, or by the Court of Probate Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77) but by decisions.

The question, therefore, narrows itself down to this, if we look at it from the point of view of jurisdiction, whether a deceased who leaves no known will, or at any rate no known executor, may be treated as intestate. If he may be so treated, in other words, if a general administration may lawfully be granted and not be void, though it appear afterwards that there is a will with a living executor who consents to act, it will be strange if the acts of that administrator validly appointed must be deemed invalid, and if though authorized to administer the estate of the deceased he has no such title to it as to enable him to dispose of it in due course of administration.

Now I come to the cases.

I have read and reread the case of Graybrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, and I think there is no explaining of it away. It was there held on a clean case raised by demurrer that, as against an executor who subsequently obtained probate, the title of a purchaser of goods sold to him by a previous administrator was worthless. And in the case of Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, a title given by an administrator de bonis non was held worthless as against the claim of an administrator to the executor. It is true that in both cases [41] the Court may have well thought that the merits were with the successful party and that this might possibly account for neither case going further on appeal. In the first, the defendant could only allege that he had bought the goods from the administrator a month after death and twelve days after the letters of administration. And in the second case the sale was made after the administrator had been cited to bring in his letters so that they might be revoked, and only two days before they were revoked. But as I have said each case purports to be a clean decision on the point of law. The criticism on the judgment of the majority of the Court in the first case is that they had not the courage of their opinions. They start by saying that the administration was merely void, and yet one of them, Walsh, J., with the concurrence of Dyer, C.J., and with the concurrence of the minority judge, Weston, J., said (p. 282) if the defendant had pleaded that the goods had been sold to him to raise money in discharge of the funeral or of the debts of the deceased, the sale had been good and indefeasible. On what principle it is difficult to see. If the estate of the deceased had been vested in the Ordinary and had been passed by him to the administrator because there was an intestacy in the sense that there was no will, surely the administrator could make a good title, and it would not be for the purchaser to inquire the object of the sale; but if the estate vested by law in the executor immediately on the death without probate and probate is only necessary to perfect the evidence of title, one does not see how the administrator got title or could pass a title for any purpose. Another criticism is that Lord Dyer seems in part to found himself on a case in the Year Book 7 Edw. 4 which is in apparent contradiction to the decision which he gives.

Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, is a more extreme case because there the title was in fact tried between two administrators. However, those cases have found their way into the text-books, and have been recognized as law in comparatively recent times. Kay, J., distinguished the second in Boxall v. Boxall, 27 Ch. D. 220, where there was the fortunate accident that the will appointed no executor. Neville, J., escaped from it by proceeding on the [42] Indian Succession Act, 1865, in Craster v. Thomas [1909] 2 Ch. 348; Woolley v. Clark, 5 B. & Al. 744, 7 E. C. L. 249, is, I think, distinguishable. It was not an action against the purchaser from an administrator, but against the administrator himself, who under an administration cum testamento annexo sold property at his peril at a time when he had notice of a later will which ultimately received probate. Warrington, J., moreover, in Ellis v. Ellis [1905] 1 Ch. 613, purported to follow the two old cases, and added his sanction to their authority.

On the other hand, there has been a current of opinion in an opposite sense. In the Year Book 7 Edw. 4, 12 and 13, Littleton, J., with whom Newton, J., and Danby, J., agreed, held that the Ordinary may well grant administration in the meantime, that is, before the will is known, or it may be even before the executor has come forward and sought for probate, but by the probate of the testament the power of the administrator is determined; and the decision appears to have been to that effect. This means that the administrator gets and can give a good title subject to its being determined by the production of a will with an executor and perhaps also probate. Whether it be necessary, as is the modern practice, first to recall the letters of administration, or whether the power of the administrator ceases ipso facto upon his knowledge that there is a will, is a point immaterial for the present discussion.

The effect of Grayebrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, no doubt is given in Rolle's Abridgment at p. 919, but the doctrine of the Year Book case already cited appears at p. 907. I have mentioned the bond required by the Statute of Distributions. That contemplates that administration may be committed though there be a will, and only requires of the administrator that he should bring in his letters upon knowledge of it. Again the Courts have held that such an administrator or an executor under a forged will can give a good discharge to the deceased's debtors: see Allen v. Dundas, 3 T. R. 125, Woolley v. Clark, 5 B. & Al. 744, 7 E. C. L. 249, and Prosser v. Wagner, 1 C. B. N. S. 289, 87 E. C. L. 289. And then there are the peculiar cases of administrations lite [43] pendente, durante minore aetate, durante absentia, durante animi aut corporis vitio.

As to administration lite pendente, consistently with the view that the Ordinary has no jurisdiction, or, if it be put the other way, no property to vest, where there is an executor, a Court of common law held in the case of Frederick v. Hook, Carth. 153, that such an administration passed no title. But in Walker v. Woollaston, 2 P. Wms. 576, the contrary was decided by the Court of Common Pleas after an able and suggestive argument by Mr. Peere Williams, and has since obtained as law. Sir George Lee, Judge of the Prerogative Court, remarks somewhat drily in Maskeline v. Harrison, 2 Lee Ecc.

258, on the change of view of the Common Law Courts in this matter. Lord Redesdale in Doyle v. Blake, 2 Sch. & Lef. 231, has some pertinent observations to the effect that some of the old cases could scarcely be supported on principle. He appears to have held that an administration was not a mere nullity but only repealable.

As to administration durante minore aetate, no doubt it rested after a time upon the express words of the statute 38 Geo. 3, c. 87. But it had been established before in Piggot's Case, 5 Rep. 29a, with which the next case—Prince's Case, 5 Rep. 29b—when properly considered agrees. See also Sir Finch's Case (1606) 6 Rep. 63a, 67b.

As to administration durante absentia, the case of Webb v. Kirby, 7 DeG. M. & G. 376, was relied upon for the plaintiffs, because there the Court held that a title derived from an administrator durante absentia was not certain enough to be forced upon a purchaser; but the reason given is not that such an administrator had no estate, but that his estate only lasts during the absence and life of the executor, and there could be no constat that the executor was still alive.

As to administration durante animi aut corporis vitio, no direct authority as to its validity or otherwise has been cited; but it is classed with the other special administrations in [44] Oughton's Ordo Judiciorum, titulus 219, note A; and in Burn's Ecclesiastical Law (the edition by the late Sir Robert Phillimore, vol. iv. p. 386), where authorities are cited.

Both administrations durante minore aetate and durante absentia seem to be recognized by the Court of King's Bench in Slaughter v. May (1704) 1 Salk. 42. With regard to administrations durante absentia, there is this remarkable observation, that they were granted concurrently with the practice of giving administration to the attorney of an absent executor: see In the Goods of Earl, L. R. 1 P. & D. 450.

Then there are some isolated and remarkable cases which one may almost call cases of administration quousque: In the Goods of Metcalfe, 1 Add. Ecc. 343; In the Goods of Campbell, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 555, and the more recent case in the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice. In the Goods of Wright [1893] P. 21, which, if sound, must be supported on the principle that administration can be validly granted limited to the time when a will known to have been in existence after the death of the testator is brought in for probate.

How any of these administrations could be other than traps for the unwary if they did not enable the administrator to pass property, how if they do enable an administrator to pass property they are consistent with a theory that the property immediately on death vests in the executor and cannot be divested, even temporarily, by the Ordinary or the Court of Probate, I fail to understand. It seems to me that the true view is that till the Ordinary was concluded by probate he had for the benefit of all those interested, including, at any rate in ancient times, the soul of the deceased for the repose of which masses were to be provided, the power to commit administration and to pass the property thereby, subject to that administration being recalled and the power and title of the administrator determined upon production possibly, upon probate certainly, of a will. No doubt there is much hardship upon legatees who may find that possibly owing to the supineness of an executor, or the fraud of those about the deceased at his death, a will is not proved till the estate has been [45] already dispersed amongst the next of kin. I quite recognize this. I observe that in Oughton in the same place which I have quoted it is said that by the course of the Prerogative Court letters of administration were never granted till at least fourteen days after death, and in one of the authorities I saw it stated that an administrator ought not to distribute among next of kin under a twelve-month, or does so at his peril. Sect. 5 of the Statute of Distributions seems to support this. If this be the law I am well satisfied. To hold otherwise than as we are holding would make all titles of the representatives of dead persons uncertain. It is not only that an administrator may be succeeded by an executor, but the executor under one will may oust the executor of another, and the executor of a will which turns out to be forged may have to give place to an administrator, as in Allen v. Dundas, 3 T. R. 125. It is not as if we were asked to decide that the mere discovery of a will avoided all the acts of the administrator. If the will names no executor, if the executor be dead leaving no executor, if he or his executor if he takes his place refuses to take out probate and accept the executorship, the title of the administrator would, I gather, confessedly prevail. Those who have purchased goods from an administrator may find their title depend on the caprice of an executor or of an executor's executor.

In the Court of Appeal I am not prepared to follow the actual decisions in the cases of Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275 and Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, in spite of the amount of authority and acceptance which they have enjoyed. Because:

(1) The reasoning in the principal case lays down no consistent rule.

(2) It is in conflict with the earlier case in the Year Book.

(3) The two cases were decided at a time of unfortunate jealousy of the Courts Christian.

(4) They are in conflict with the principles established by a body of unquestioned authorities.

(5) So to decide would be to establish that a number of void orders are made as matters of course by the High Court of Justice.

[46] (6) Such a decision would put serious difficulties in the way of the realization of the estates of all deceased persons.

If this, therefore, were a case of chattels real I should hold that the administrator had a valid title and could make a good sale.

It being a case of freehold I have next to consider the Land Transfer Act, 1897, ss. 1, 2, 11 and 24.

It was not to be supposed that this Act would give an executor or administrator a better title to freeholds than he had to leaseholds. But it is to be supposed and is, I think, the case that it gives him the same title. This being so, the Act seems to me of value as supporting the view which I have taken as to the previous state of the law. Freeholds are to vest in the personal representative from time to time. Personal representative is defined to mean executor or administrator. The words are apt for this very state of circumstances. He who for the time is clothed by the Court with authority as personal representative is to have the freeholds vested in him.

I have not thought it necessary to consider the arguments of counsel for the appellant founded on the provisions of the Court of Probate Acts of 1857 and 1868 or upon s. 70 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and that judgment should be entered for the appellant.

NOTE.

Validity of Acts of Administrator Whose Appointment Is Revoked by Subsequent Discovery of Will.

General Rule.

"At one time the rule seems to have been firmly established that if administration was granted on the supposition that no will existed, and it subsequently developed that there was a will, all the proceedings under the administration were void and could be assailed collaterally. And this was true whether the will was suppressed, or its existence was unknown, or it was doubtful who was executor, or he was concealed or abroad at the time administration was granted. Now, however, the rule seems to be firmly established to the contrary. So, in nearly all jurisdictions where letters testamentary or of administration have been revoked or vacated as having been improvidently granted, the acts of the executor or the administrator, done in good faith, are valid. They are binding upon the estate, though his letters are subsequently revoked and it appears that the administration was obtained by fraudulently suppressing a will. Persons dealing with the administrator in good faith prior to the revocation of the letters will be protected. And a similar protection will be extended to rights acquired under a previous grant of administration. In many jurisdictions statutes regulating the matter have been enacted, their general tenor being that the lawful acts of executors and administrators who subsequently are removed, or whose letters are revoked, done in good faith, shall remain valid and effectual. Usually a bona fide payment to an administrator to whom letters have been regularly issued by an authority having jurisdiction to grant letters testamentary or of administration is a legal discharge to the debtor." 11 R. C. L. tit. Executors and Administrators, § 102. So, letters of administration granted as in case of intestacy, where a will is afterwards produced and probated, are held to be voidable only and not void. Jennings v. Moses, 38 Ala. 402; Floyd v. Clayton, 67 Ala. 265; Sands v. Hickey, 135 Ala. 322, 33 So. 827; Clark v. Holt, 16 Ark. 257; Shephard v. Rhodes, 60 Ill. 301; Kittredge v. Folsom, 8 N. H. 98; Schluter v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 117 N. Y. 125, 22 N. E. 572, 15 Am. St. Rep. 494, 5 L.R.A. 541; Bigelow v. Bigelow, 4 Ohio 138, 19 Am. Dec. 591; Patton's Appeal, 31 Pa. St. 465; Foster v. Brown, 1 Bailey L. (S. C.) 221, 19 Am. Dec. 672; Franklin v. Franklin, 91 Tenn. 119, 18 S. W. 61; Perkins v. Owen, 123 Wis. 238, 101 N. W. 415. See also Bradley v. Broughton, 34 Ala. 694, 73 Am. Dec. 474; Morgan v. Dodge, 44 N. H. 255, 82 Am. Dec. 213. And see the reported case.

Therefore, where administration has been granted and proceeded with, before the discovery of a will, the acts of the administrator, in which third persons have an interest, performed before the probate of the will and not in derogation of the provisions thereof, are valid and effectual for the purposes of administration, and cannot be attacked collaterally. 2 Kent Com. 413; *Fidelity, etc. Co. v. The early English decisions on the question of the validity of the acts of an administrator whose appointment is revoked by the subsequent discovery of a will, are in conflict. Thus, it was held that until a will was found, the court had power to grant letters of administration, and that when the will was found and proved, the powers of the administrator ceased, but his acts, done in due course, were valid. That rule was based on the decision in the Year Book (7 Edw. IV, 12b) wherein Littleton, with the concurrence of two other judges, said: "A man may make me his executor unknown to myself, etc., and then when I have become aware of it I may well take upon myself the power of administration, disposition, etc., and, Sir, the ordinary may well grant administration in the meantime as he did here, but by the proving of the will the powers of the administrator are determined unless the executors have at one time refused before the ordinary, then perchance the law may will otherwise." To the same effect, see Fitzherbert's Abridgement, tit. Administrators, fol. 13; Brooke's Abridgement, tit. Executors, fol. 308. The foregoing decision has been referred to as authority for the proposition that "if a man makes an executor, but it is not known, or concealed, the ordinary may grant administration, and this shall be good till the other prove the will." 1 Rolle Abr. tit. Executor, p. 907; 11 Vin. Ab. tit. Executors, p. 66. See also Boxall v. Boxall, 27 Ch. Div. 220, 53 L. J. Ch. 838; Craster v. Thomas [1909] 2 Ch. 348, 78 L. J. Ch. 734, 101 L. T. N. S. 66, 25 Times L. Rep. 659. But, on the contrary, there were decisions to the effect that where administration had been granted, but subsequently a will appointing an executor was found, the probate of the will superseded the administration and rendered it absolutely void ab initio; so that any dispositions made of the assets by the administrator were also void. Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, 75 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 419; Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, 83 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 508, 3 Keb. 725, 84 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 975, T. Jones 72, 84 Eng. Rep. L. 249, 106 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1363; Ellis v. Ellis [1905] 1 Ch. 613, 74 L. J. Ch. 296, 92 L. T. N. S. 727 [1905] W. N. 44, 53 W. R. 617. Under such rule the acts of the administrator could not be made good by the subsequent refusal of the executor to act as such. Abram v. Cunningham, 2 Lev. 182, 83 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 508, 3 Keb. 725, 84 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 975, T. Jones 72, 84 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1152, 1 Vent. 303, 86 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 195, 2 Mod. 146, 86 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 992, Freem. K. B. 445, 89 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 333. In Graysbrook v. Fox, 1 Plowd. 275, 75 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 419, the title of a purchaser to goods sold to him by a previous administrator was held to be worthless as against an executor who subsequently probated a will of the deceased. But in the same case it was said that the alienation by the administrator of the assets in discharge of the funeral expenses or the debts of the deceased, or the necessary expenses of the administrator should not be avoided, but should remain indefeasible as against the subsequent executor. To the same effect, see Woolley v. Clark, 5 B. & Ald. 744, 7 E. C. L. 249, 106 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1363. In Ellis v. Ellis [1905] 1 Ch. 613, 74 L. J. Ch. 296, 92 L. T. N. S. 727 [1905] W. N. 44, 53 W. R. 617, the court held that the essence of the foregoing statement in Graysbrook v. Fox, supra, was that the act in question was one which the administrator was compellable to do, and though as between the administrator and the executor of the will which was suppressed, but subsequently probated, the payment of a debt might well be treated as proper, so as to entitle the former to credit, yet the payment of the mortgage stood on a different footing, being a voluntary act, whereby no title was conferred.

However, by the decision in the reported case, which expressly overrules the holdings in Graysbrook v. Fox, Abram v. Cunningham, and Ellis v. Ellis, supra, the English rule is now declared to be that a grant of letters of administration is not rendered void ab initio by the subsequent discovery and probate of a will appointing executors, and that the acts of the administrator, prior to the revocation of his letters, done in good faith and in the due course of administration, are valid, which is in accord with the rule in the United States.

Application of Rule.

In the reported case it appears that the widow of the deceased was granted letters of administration, no will having been found. Thereunder she sold certain of the real property by virtue of the power conferred on her by the Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65). Later a will was found appointing others as executors, which was probated. It is held that the act of the administratrix was to be deemed valid and that the letters granted her were not void ab initio, so that the purchaser of the lands acquired a good title from her. The court also holds that under the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, § 70), the order granting administration to the widow was a judicial act, and that even if that grant could be held void on the ground of want of jurisdiction, the title of the purchaser would be protected thereunder.

In Zeigler v. Story, 220 Pa. St. 471, 69 Atl. 894, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 878, the court held that a bona fide payment of a debt due to a decedent's estate made to the administrator before the discovery and probate of a will, was valid and discharged the indebtedness. The court said: "This is the rule announced in every jurisdiction, and for the reasons assigned in the numerous cases which we have already cited. The subsequent discovery of a will after the granting of letters of administration will not void or invalidate acts performed by the administrator prior to such discovery. The authority conferred by the letters granted by the register authorizes him to administer the estate, to collect moneys due and disburse them in discharge of the legal indebtedness of his decedent. Those dealing with him in good faith and by virtue of the authority contained in his letters will be fully protected. Our statute requires the register, on being advised of a will, to revoke letters of administration previously granted. . . . But there is nothing in any of our decisions which warrants the conclusion that the acts of the administrator, done in pursuance of the authority granted him, are not of valid and binding force on the executor subsequently appointed and acting under the will. The reason of the rule is that the register in granting the letters of administration acts in a judicial capacity and that his decree cannot be impeached collaterally, but if void or voidable must be attacked directly and in the manner provided in the statute. Unless such conclusiveness is given to the decree of the register and the action of the administrator appointed by it, confusion would result and no person would be safe in dealing with an administrator. A contrary doctrine would result in litigation which would be necessary to protect parties dealing with the administrator."

In Floyd v. Clayton, 67 Ala. 265, the court said: "The creditor here had no knowledge of the existence of the will; he was never put on inquiry whether the decedent died testate or intestate. Upon the records of the court of probate as to the grant of administration, a court of general jurisdiction, its judgments imparting verity and jurisdiction, he found a grant of administration. Until that grant was revoked he could safely deal with the administratrix as the rightful representative, and rely upon its validity. It was his right to make presentment of his claim to her, and the presentment is as operative against the executor subsequently taking probate of the will, and obtaining letters testamentary, as if the administration had been rightful, and he was a succeeding administrator de bonis non. From the administratrix the creditor could rightfully have received payment, and payment by her would have been an extinguishment of the demand as to the estate. Having the right to demand and receive from her payment, he had a corresponding right to make presentment to her, and the presentment saved the bar of the statute of nonclaim, though it was not renewed to the executor. The statute does not contemplate renewed or repeated presentments as often as there may be changes of the administration."

In Schluter v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 117 N. Y. 125, 22 N. E. 572, 15 Am. St. Rep. 494, 5 L.R.A. 541, it was said: "Our attention has been called to no case, and we are confident that none can be found, holding that the subsequent discovery of a will and its admission to probate render the prior appointment of an administrator absolutely void, so as to give no protection to persons who, in dealing with the administrator, have acted on the faith thereof."

In Perkins v. Owen, 123 Wis. 238, 101 N. W. 415, the court said: "If letters of administration be issued on the mistaken idea that no will was left, and a will be afterwards found and proven, the letters of administration will of course be revoked, and all acts of the county court inconsistent with the due administration of the estate under the terms of the will will doubtless be revoked upon motion, but such action will not be based on the idea that all such acts have been void for lack of jurisdiction, but rather on the ground that they have been erroneous. The county court has administered the estate in the wrong way; it has not administered an estate over which it had no jurisdiction. . . . It will be noticed that the statutes of the state (secs. 3815-3817, Stats. 1898) contemplate just such a situation, namely, the situation created by the discovery of a will after the partial administration of the estate as intestate, and these statutes recognize as legal the acts of the administrator done prior to the revocation of his letters, and provide for the continuation of the settlement of the estate from the point at which the administrator leaves it. It seems that these statutes may not have been necessary, but the very fact of their existence is valuable as demonstrating the legislative idea and intention on the subject."

Payment made to an administrator, before the probate of the will, bona fide, operates as a discharge of the debtor; and payment by him of a debt which the deceased owed, would be a valid act, for which he might retain, if the estate was solvent. Kittredge v. Folsom, 8 N. H. 98.

The probate of the will of the decedent in the state of his domicil does not, ipso facto, revoke and annul letters of administration previously granted by a competent court in another state, without any application to the latter court to probate the will there, and for authority to act under it, within that jurisdiction, and enforce its provisions. Clark v. Holt, 16 Ark. 257. In Shepherd v. Rhodes, 60 Ill. 301, it appeared that the deceased died testate in Pennsylvania where his will was proved and recorded, but that, without any knowledge of the existence of the will, letters of administration were granted in Illinois, which were revoked after the discovery of the will. The court held that the letters of administration were voidable and the acts of the administrator thereunder were binding when attacked collaterally.

A sale, by an administrator to whom letters have been granted as in case of intestacy, of the decedent's land under an order of the ordinary authorizing the sale is not rendered ipso facto void by the subsequent propounding and admitting to probate of a will of the decedent. Nor can such an order of sale be attacked by a legatee under the probated will in an action of ejectment, by evidence that both the purchaser and the administrator knew of the existence of the will, and that the latter fraudulently concealed the fact in applying for and obtaining his appointment as in case of intestacy. Martin v. Dix, 134 Ga. 481, 68 S. E. 80. To the same effect, see Foster v. Brown, 1 Bailey L. (S. C.) 221, 19 Am. Dec. 672.

Letters of administration, issued by the probate court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, on proper representations made, must be regarded as a protection to the administrator in a contest between him and the executor of a will offered for probate and rejected prior to his appointment, and which is subsequently and after protracted litigation admitted to probate, as to the bona fides of the acts of the administrator in the discharge of his duties under his letters. Meek v. Allison, 67 Ill. 46; Crocker v. Crocker, 198 Mass. 401, 84 N. E. 476; Barkaloo v. Emerick, 18 Ohio 268; Price v. Nesbit, 1 Hill Eq. (S. C.) 445. And as between the administrator, whose administration is subsequently revoked by the admission to probate of a will, and the executor of the will, the fact that the former buys at his own sale does not render the sale invalid, where there is no fraud. Price v. Nesbit, 1 Hill Eq. (S. C.) 445.

The Illinois statute (R. S. 1845, p. 551, § 71) clearly indicates that letters of administration issued under such circumstances are only voidable, since it provides that the letters shall be revoked and repealed, but does not state that they are declared void, thus necessarily implying by revocation and repeal a previous valid existence for the purposes of the due administration of the estate. Meek v. Allison, 67 Ill. 46.

the owner, claiming subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee against the owner, and seeking to foreclose the security and recover the amount of the debt. It is held that the insurance company could not recover, since by the policy it agreed with the owner to pay a certain designated person, the mortgagee, in case of a loss, but did not agree to pay the owner's debt to the mortgagee as such.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tillamook county: HOLMES, Judge.

Action by Milwaukee Mechanics' Insurance Company, plaintiff, against A. Ramsey et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

MILWAUKEE MECHANICS' INSURANCE COMPANY.

v.

RAMSEY ET AL.

Oregon Supreme Court—June 22, 1915.

76 Oregon 570; 149 Pac. 542.

Fire Insurance — Insurance on Mortgaged Property — Subrogation of Insurer to Rights of Mortgagee.

Where a mortgagee insures the hypothecated property at his own expense, the insurer, paying a loss by fire to such mortgagee to the amount of the debt, is subrogated to the mortgagee's right in such debt, since the insurance contracted and paid for by the mortgagee in effect makes the insurance company a surety to the holder of the mortgage for the payment of the debt.

[See note at end of this case.]

Subrogation to Rights against Tortfeasor.

Where insured property is burned by the tortious act of one not a party to the contract, the insurer, paying the loss, is subrogated pro tanto to the chose in action the payee has against the tortfeasor by reason of his insurable interest.

[See 16 Ann. Cas. 635; 44 Am. St. Rep. 732.]

Subrogation to Rights of Mortgagee.

Realty was insured against fire, the loss being payable to a mortgagee as its interest might appear; otherwise to the insured. Within the term of the policy the property was destroyed by fire, and upon the mortgagee and owner suing the insurance company the mortgagee recovered judgment for the amount of its secured debt, while the owner failed to recover because he had contracted to sell, violating a policy restriction. The insurance company paid the mortgagee's judgment, and demanded that the mortgagee assign to it the owner's note and mortgage, which was refused. Thereupon the company sued the mortgagee and [571] This is an action by the Milwaukee Mechanics' Insurance Company, a corporation, against A. Ramsey, E. U. Wagy, Tillamook County Bank, a corporation, and Tillamook City, a municipal corporation.

The plaintiff, a Wisconsin company engaged in the business of insurance against loss by fire in this state, insured the laundry of the defendant Ramsey in the sum of $2,000, making the loss payable to the Tillamook County Bank, mortgagee, as its interest might appear; otherwise to the insured. The policy contained the usual restrictions rendering it void if the interests of the insured should be other than unconditional and sole ownership, if the subject of insurance were a building upon ground not owned by the insured in fee simple, if any change, other than by the death [572] of the insured, should take place in the interest, title or possession of the subject of insurance, or if other insurance, whether valid or not, should be effected upon the property without the consent of the company. This insurance was in consideration of a premium of $60 paid by Ramsey, and the policy was executed and delivered to him. Afterward, during its period, not being so permitted by the company, Ramsey entered into an agreement in writing with Bailey and Wagy, defendants, whereby he agreed to and did sell to them, and they agreed to purchase from him, all the property described in the policy, together with the land upon which it was situated: they paying $1,000 on account, assuming the mortgage to the bank, and agreeing to pay an additional balance of purchase money. They also subsequently insured the property without the consent of the company. It was provided in the policy issued to Ramsey:

"That if with the consent of the company any interest under the policy shall exist in favor of a mortgagee, . . . the conditions of said policy shall apply in the manner expressed in such provisions and conditions of insurance relating to such interest as shall be written upon, attached to, or appended to the policy."

But there was no such stipulation attached to that instrument. During the term mentioned in the policy the insured property was destroyed by fire, entailing a loss in excess of the amount of insurance. It is disclosed that afterward Ramsey and the Tillamook County Bank, mortgagee, instituted an action against the company to recover the insurance, in which litigation Ramsey failed, and the bank obtained judgment for the amount of its secured debt. The company paid this judgment, and demanded that the bank assign to it the note and mortgage of Ramsey, which was [573] refused. As a consequence the plaintiff brings this suit, claiming that it is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the bank under the note and mortgage against Ramsey, and seeks to foreclose the security and recover the amount of the debt. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the Circuit Court, and, as plaintiff refused to plead further, a decree was entered dismissing the suit at its cost, and it appeals.

Veazie, McCourt & Veazie for appellant.

H. T. Botts and Sidney S. Johnson for respondents.

BURNETT, J. (after stating the facts).—We note at the outset that the insurance was effected by the mortgagor at his own expense under the policy, in which he is designated as the insured, and which insures his property, and appoints the mortgagee as the one to receive payments of the loss to the extent of its interest; otherwise, it is to be paid to Ramsey.

1. It is well settled that if a mortgagee, having, as he does, an interest in preserving the property pledged to him as security, insures the same at his own expense, and a loss by fire occurs, the insurer, paying the loss to the insured mortgagee to the amount of the debt, is subrogated to the means of enforcing payment of the original obligation by the debtor. In such instances the claim is not extinguished until payment by the one primarily liable. All that has happened in [574] that respect, is a change of creditors. The reason is that the insurance contracted and paid for by the mortgagee has the effect of making the insurance company a surety to the holder of the mortgage for the payment of the debt. Having liquidated the same, the insurer is subrogated to the rights of the one to whom payment is made, which is the same as though he had signed as surety and paid the promissory note, for the debt is really what is insured in such cases. In very truth the mortgagee has nothing else to insure, and when the debt is paid his policy lapses. The transaction is an instance of a contract directly between the mortgagee and the insurer, and is worked out like any other surety stipulation, with the resulting subrogation.

2. Again, if insured property is burned by the tortious act of one not a party to the policy, the insurance company, paying the loss to anyone to whom by the terms of the policy payment must be made, is subrogated pro tanto to the chose in action the payee has against the tort-feasor. The reason in such a case is that, but for the wrong resulting in destruction of the property, no liability would have accrued against the insurance company; but as it has neither privity of estate or contract with the incendiary, and is nevertheless compelled by the policy to pay for the result of the tort, its reimbursement is accomplished by subrogation.

3. The transaction described in the complaint, of which a résumé has been given, does not fall within either of these classes. We read in the complaint that the company is empowered to engage in the business of insurance against loss by fire. The policy which appears in the record insures Ramsey, not the plaintiff, against "all direct loss or damage by fire, except as otherwise [575] provided," upon the building and contents described in the instrument. By it the company agrees with Ramsey, and not with another, to pay a certain designated person in case of a loss. It does not agree to pay Ramsey's debt. The application to his obligation of the proceeds of the insurance in case of loss is a matter between Ramsey and the bank. What became of the money is no concern of the plaintiff after it paid the bank. It did not insure the debt. It insured the building. If Ramsey had burned the house, the mortgagee would have had an action against him for the tort, in that he damaged it by depreciating the value of the mortgaged property. Because such burning would have resulted in the company being compelled to pay the loss, it would have been entitled to subrogation to the rights of the bank to recover damages from Ramsey under the second illustration given at the outset. It is not charged in the complaint that Ramsey was in any way to blame for the fire. He incurred no liability on that account to the company or to the bank. The plaintiff did not pay Ramsey's debt, and hence has no privity with that obligation entitling it to subrogation. As Ramsey did not burn the building, there is no transaction of his which entails liability upon the company, either directly or indirectly, and which would give rise to the privity entitling it to subrogation. If there is to be any subrogation, it must be for the reason that the mortgagee has some hold upon the mortgagor to make him perform the duty which the plaintiff was compelled to discharge. The latter was obligated to pay for the fire, but Ramsey was not. Having no power to make Ramsey reimburse it for the burning, the bank could not impart any such authority to the plaintiff by subrogation. [576] Philadelphia F. Assoc. v. Patton, 15 N. M. 304, 107 Pac. 679, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 420.

In brief, for a consideration, the company agreed with Ramsey to pay a loss, and not a mortgage to the bank. We cannot import into the contract a stipulation to the effect that Ramsey should not only pay the premium, but also reimburse the company for the loss. It is not the intention of the parties that Ramsey should thus carry all the risk, besides paying the premium. The plaintiff was paid for assuming the risk, and has only complied with its contract by payment of the loss. It is not entitled to anything beyond its stipulation. We have examined all the authorities cited by the plaintiff to sustain the postulate that where the policy has become void as to the interests of the mortgagor, but remains in force as a protection to the mortgagee alone, the insurer, upon paying the mortgage, is entitled to subrogation. Without exception the adjudicated cases noted in the plaintiff's brief rest upon a separate contract between the mortgagee and the insurer, or the insurance was paid for by the mortgagee, or the policy was assigned to him, and hence became his property the same as though originally made to him. In Carpenter v. Providence-Washington Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 495, 502, 10 U. S. (L. ed.) 1044, cited by plaintiff, Mr. Justice Story says:

"If, then, a mortgagor procures a policy on the property against fire, and he afterward assigns the policy to the mortgagee . . . as collateral security, that assignment operates solely as an equitable transfer of the policy, so as to enable the mortgagee to recover the amount due, in case of loss; but it does not displace the interest of the mortgagor in the premises insured. On the contrary, the insurance is still his insurance, and on his property, and for his account."

[577] There are respectable precedents holding that the stipulation must be indorsed upon or appended to the policy, stating the manner in which the conditions of the instrument will apply to a mortgagee to whom loss is payable, if his right to receive payment is to be in any wise limited by the restrictions imposed upon the insured. Boyd v. Thuringia Ins. Co. 25 Wash. 447, 65 Pac. 785, 55 L.R.A. 165. This seems to be the theory upon which the bank recovered, and Ramsey did not, in their joint action upon the policy. Under this construction of the insurance agreement the company contracted with Ramsey to pay the bank in case of loss as its interest might appear absolutely and without reference to its violation of other terms of the policy. Hence in paying the loss to the bank the company was fulfilling its stipulation with Ramsey. It was complying with that part of its engagement with him which remained impossible of rescission, although he violated other portions thereof already mentioned. The company is before us contending that it has a right to enforce subrogation against Ramsey as an incident of a contract with him under which it says he has no rights. It maintains it was compelled to pay because of the terms of the policy. That feature, however, was a condition favorable to Ramsey, which was not affected by his selling the property. That much of the benefit for which he contracted remained unimpaired. The fallacy of the plaintiff's argument consists in assuming that Ramsey forfeited all his rights, when in truth there remained the one compelling the plaintiff to pay the bank in case of loss.

This action proceeds on the hypothesis that the plaintiff was obliged to pay; but, even so, it was because of its covenant with Ramsey for which he had paid a [578] premium of $60. The payment of the loss was a compliance with the company's engagement to Ramsey, with whom it contracted, but for which no liability of the company would have accrued. The result is not different as to Ramsey's liability in this action, if his sale of the property worked an utter avoidance of the policy in all its terms. There are cases giving such construction to similar policies on the ground that, as the mortgagee must claim under a contract made for his benefit, he cannot occupy a better position than the one who made the contract: that the creditor must take the insurance agreement with its burdens, as well as with its benefits; and that if the maker of the contract, the mortgagor, cannot recover directly, neither can one who claims under him: Delaware Ins. Co. v. Greer, 120 Fed. 916, 57 C. C. A. 188, 61 L.R.A. 137; Brecht v. Law, etc. Ins. Co. 160 Fed. 399, 87 C. C. A. 351, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 197, and note. However this may be, yet if such a meaning should be given to the policy, the company, being exonerated from payment by Ramsey's breach of the contract, was not bound to pay anything, so that its disbursement was voluntary, and not recoverable.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed. Affirmed.

I. Introductory.

The general principle governing the right of an insurer who has paid a fire loss on mortgaged property and thereby extinguished the mortgage debt to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee is that the mortgagor cannot equitably be compelled to pay the premiums on the policy and then reimburse the insurer for its loss. Accordingly where the policy is taken out by or at the expense of the mortgagor there is no right to subrogation. On the other hand if the insurance is paid for by the mortgagee and covers only his interest, the insurer on paying a loss is entitled to subrogation, since by any other rule either the mortgagor would be gratuitously exonerated or the mortgagee would be given a double recovery. By the application of the same principle, if a policy taken out by the mortgagor provides that it shall not be invalidated by his act so far as the interest of the mortgagee is concerned, the insurer is entitled to be subrogated as to the amount paid to the mortgagee when, and only when, an act of the mortgagor has invalidated the policy as to him, so that he has forfeited the benefit of his payment of premiums.

II. Under Policy Issued to or at Expense of Mortgagee.

It is generally held that where a mortgagee insures the mortgaged property at his own expense and for his own benefit and a loss occurs, the insurer on paying the loss to the mortgagee is subrogated, to the extent of the amount thus paid, to the means of enforcing payment of the original obligation by the debtor, the claim not being extinguished until payment by him.

In Nelson v. Bound Brook Mut. F. Ins. Assoc. 43 N. J. Eq. 256, 11 Atl. 681, 3 Am. St. Rep. 308, reversing 41 N. J. Eq. 485, 5 Atl. 590, the reason for this rule was tersely stated as follows: "That insurance by the mortgagee, such as gives the debtor no benefit of money recovered on a loss, would, without subrogation, convert what is designed as a contract of indemnity into a wager policy. The mortgagee could demand payment of the loss to the extent of his mortgage without reducing the mortgage debt. Public policy condemns such contracts."

So in Washington F. Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 421, 3 Am. Rep. 149, it was said: "The mortgagor and mortgagee may each insure his own interest—the first insures the property, which he may do for its full value as the owner thereof; the latter, to the extent of his debt, and no farther. The first, notwithstanding the incumbrance on his property, is entitled to recover the full amount of his loss, within the limits of the insurance; the latter, if the premises are destroyed by fire before the extinguishment of the mortgage, has the right to be paid his debt by the insurers, if not more than the insurance; and the underwriters, in such case, become entitled to the debt, and can recover the same from the mortgagor, and are subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee. 2 Marshall on Ins. 64, ch. 2, p. 789. The payment of the insurance does not discharge the mortgagor from the debt, but the insurers become his creditors, and have the right to an assignment of the debt from the mortgagee. There is no privity in law or fact between the mortgagor and the mortgagee in the contract of insurance, and the mortgagor can take no advantage of the policy of the mortgagee for his debt, for he has no interest whatever therein, but is bound to pay the debt to the insurers where they become his substituted creditors. . . . But the contract of insurance is strictly a contract of indemnity, and the mortgagee is not entitled to recover from the insurers the value of the property lost, and his whole debt besides, from the mortgagor. When his debt is paid, and he is indemnified, it seems more in consonance with the just principle of indemnity, that the insurers should have the right to be substituted in his place and allowed to collect the debt from the mortgagor. The policy of insurance, from its legal effect, according to judicial decision, must receive such reasonable construction as imports with its true character as a contract of indemnity."

In Honore v. Lamar F. Ins. Co. 51 Ill. 409, the facts were stated in the opinion of the court as follows: "The appellant executed his note to Rutter, Endicott & Whitehouse, for $2,146.50, and deposited with them, as collateral security, 74 barrels of whisky. They effected an insurance on the whisky in the Lamar Fire Insurance Company, appellees herein, at their own expense, and in their own name, and without the authority, or even knowledge, of appellant. The whisky was subsequently destroyed by fire, and the company paid the policy to Rutter, Endicott & Whitehouse, first requiring an assignment of appellant's note. The note was accompanied by a power of attorney to confess a judgment, and the company having caused a judgment to be confessed, the appellant filed a bill to enjoin its collection. On the hearing the circuit court dismissed the bill." An appeal was prosecuted on the ground that in all cases where a mortgagee insures the mortgagor's property, the mortgagor is entitled to the benefits of the policy. The appellate court in answering this contention said: "This position is maintainable neither upon principle nor authority. The contract of insurance, it has been often remarked, is one of indemnity merely. Any person having an interest in property may, through an insurance, indemnify himself against loss by fire. Mortgagor and mortgagee have each an insurable interest. The interest of both may be covered in one policy, or each may take out a separate policy. In this case the mortgagees insured at their own cost, without privity with the mortgagor and without his knowledge, and when the company paid the debt due them from the mortgagor, it indemnified them against loss and was entitled to be subrogated to their claim. The mortgagor, having had no connection with the insurance, cannot claim its benefit. As the premium was not paid by him or chargeable to him, as he was not aware even that an insurance had been effected until after the fire, it is difficult to see how such insurance, even when paid, can affect his liability upon his note."

. . . In Concord Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Woodbury, 45 Me. 452, where the assured had voluntarily assigned his claim to the insurance company upon payment by it, as in the present case, the court held the company entitled to recover. The question of the right to subrogation against the will of the mortgagee was not presented in that case, nor is it in this, because the assignment was made by the mortgagee upon payment of the loss. The only question strictly presented here is, whether the mortgagor has been discharged from his debt by the payment of the mortgagee's policy, and on this point there is no disagreement among the authorities. The debt is still in existence, and the strong equity of the insurance company has been united to the legal title."

So in Stuyvesant Ins. Co. v. Reid, 171 N. C. 513, 88 S. E. 779, it appeared that there was a sale of a piano on the installment plan, the purchaser agreeing to bear all loss in case of fire. The piano was insured by the seller and was destroyed by fire before the payments had been completed, whereupon the insurer paid the amount still remaining unpaid and took a receipt from the seller subrogating it to his rights. In an action brought by the insurer to enforce his right of subrogation as to the amount remaining unpaid under the contract, the court said: "As to the piano sold and delivered by the purchaser, the Stieff Company, in the absence of some arrangement growing out of the relationship between them, could only insure the property in reference to their interest in it; that is, against loss or damage by fire to the extent that the same diminished the value of their security. And on the facts in evidence showing that the mortgagee insured on his own account, paying the premiums himself, and without reference to the rights and interests of the mortgagor in the property or any agreement with him concerning it, it must be held that the mortgagor has no claim to the insurance money and no protection from plaintiff's right of subrogation arising by reason of its payment, a position that derives force, we think, from the stipulation also appearing in the contract of sale 'that the purchaser is to bear all loss in case of fire.'"

In Thornton v. Enterprise Ins. Co. 71 Pa. St. 234, it appeared that the policy by which mortgaged property was insured recited that the insurer was to indemnify the mortgagee for damage or loss to the property. It was held that on a payment of a loss to the mortgagee the insurer was entitled to an assignment of the mortgage. But in Baker v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. 79 Cal. 34, 21 Pac. 357, it appeared that the mortgagee of property had a policy of insurance covering the property issued to him as the owner, the insurer having notice of the fact that he was only a mortgagee. After the loss of the property it was agreed between the insurer and the mortgagee that the latter should receive from the insurer the amount due from the mortgagee less what he had already paid, the mortgagee agreeing to transfer all his interest to the insurer. An action to redeem was brought by the mortgagor and it was held that by the payment of the insurance policy the insurer was estopped to rely on a clause in the policy avoiding it in case of untrue representation as to the ownership of the insured property. It was also held that the payment of the insurance to the mortgagee under the agreement between them operated as a payment of the indebtedness of the mortgagor pro tanto and that the latter in a determination of the amount owed by him was to be credited with the amount of the insurance paid.

It seems that the insurer's right of subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee cannot be exercised until a payment of the loss has been made to the latter. Carroll v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 28 Idaho 466, 154 Pac. 985; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Baker, 71 Ind. 102; Morrison v. Tennessee Marine, etc. Ins. Co. 18 Mo. 262, 59 Am. Dec. 299. See also Royal Ins. Co. v. Stinson, 103 U. S. 25, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 473. In Phenix Ins. Co. v. Harrisburg First Nat. Bank, 85 Va. 765, 8 S. E. 719, 17 Am. St. Rep. 101, 2 L.R.A. 667, it was held that an insurer who paid a loss to a mortgagee that covered only a part of the mortgage debt did not acquire as against the mortgagee a right to demand and take from him the evidence of the debt secured to the amount of the loss paid by the insurer, it being obliged to pay the creditor's debt in full before it could take any part of the debt by subrogation.

III. Under Policy Issued at Request or Expense of Mortgagor.

1. IN GENERAL.

Where insurance on mortgaged property has been obtained by the mortgagor, or at his request and expense, the insurer is not entitled to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee on a payment of the loss to him in the absence of a specific provision therefor in the policy. Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 501, 10 U. S. (L. ed.) 1044; Hackett v. Ash (Ala.) 72 So. 52; German Ins. Co. v. Smelker, 38 Kan. 285, 16 Pac. 735; Home Ins. Co. v. Marshall, 48 Kan. 235, 29 Pac. 161; Gardner v. Continental Ins. Co. 75 S. W. 283, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 426; Stinchfield v. Milliken, 71 Me. 567; Graves v. Hampden F. Ins. Co. 10 Allen (Mass.) 281; Pendleton v. Elliott, 67 Mich. 496, 35 N. W. 97; Havens v. Germania Ins. Co. 135 Mo. 649, 37 S. W. 497; Pearman v. Gould, 42 N. J. Eq. 4, 5 Atl. 811; DeWolf v. Capital City Ins. Co. 16 Hun (N. Y.) 116; Robert v. Traders' Ins. Co. 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 631, reversing 9 Wend. 474; Waring v. Loder, 53 N. Y. 581; Excelsior F. Ins. Co. v. Royal Ins. Co. 55 N. Y. 343, 14 Am. Rep. 271; Rockwood First Nat. Bank v. Insurance Co. 2 Tenn. Ch. App. 90; Provincial Ins. Co. v. Reesor, 21 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 296. See also Norwich F. Ins. Co. v. Boomer, 52 Ill. 442, 4 Am. Rep. 618; Concord Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Woodbury, 45 Me. 447; Leyden v. Lawrence, 79 N. J. Eq. 113, 81 Atl. 121, affirmed 80 N. J. Eq. 550, 85 Atl. 1134; Cone v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 60 N. Y. 619. And see also the reported case. Compare Thomas v. Montauk F. Ins. Co. 43 Hun 218, 5 N. Y. St. Rep. 481. Thus in Pendleton v. Elliott, 67 Mich. 496, 35 N. W. 97, it was said: "If, . . . the policy contains no stipulation for subrogation in case of payment to the mortgagee, and there is any arrangement between the mortgagor and mortgagee, either verbal or written, by which the mortgagor becomes liable to pay for the insurance, he is entitled to the benefit thereof, and to have it applied in liquidation of the mortgage debt pro tanto; and his right in this respect does not depend upon the fact that he has paid for the insurance, nor whether the mortgagee procured the insurance intending to look to the mortgagor for reimbursement of the premium, but it depends upon whether he is liable to the mortgagee therefor under any agreement, express or implied. And in such case, if the insurer receives the premium knowing it is paid by the mortgagor, or for him, he will not, in the absence of a stipulation therefor in the policy, be entitled to be substituted to the rights of the mortgagee against the mortgagor."

In Havens v. Germania Ins. Co. 135 Mo. 649, 37 S. W. 497, in discussing the right of subrogation of an insurer to the rights of a mortgagee to whom it had paid a judgment against itself on several policies of insurance, the court said: "By no rule of law with which we are familiar did the payment by the defendant insurance companies of the judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs Havens & Richardson entitle them to be subrogated to the rights of Havens & Richardson's claim as mortgagees, against Sage as mortgagor, or to demand an assignment of said claim of plaintiffs against Sage in whole or to the extent of the amount of the payment to the plaintiffs on their judgment. These policies did not insure the claim of Havens & Richardson against Sage, but insured the mill property only. The policies were upon the mill property, and were for the benefit of Sage, the equitable owner thereof, who paid all the premiums thereon to the company, and only by reason of the agreement made by Sage with Havens & Richardson and the insurance companies were the companies authorized to pay to Havens & Richardson the sum that might at the time of the loss by fire be due from Sage to Havens & Richardson."

The rule denying the subrogation of the insurer to the rights of the mortgagee where the insurance is obtained by the mortgagee or at his request and expense, seems to apply although the insurance is taken in the name of the mortgagee. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Chadbourne, 31 Fed. 300; Honore v. Lamar F. Ins. Co. 51 Ill. 409; Nelson v. Bound Brook Mut. F. Ins. Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 256, 11 Atl. 681, 3 Am. St. Rep. 308, reversing 41 N. J. Eq. 485, 5 Atl. 590; Kernochan v. New York Bowery F. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 428; Reesor v. Provincial Ins. Co. 33 U. C. Q. B. 357. Thus in Nelson v. Bound Brook Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra, it was said: "There is neither reason nor good policy in compelling a mortgagee to assign his security where, through an arrangement between the mortgagor and mortgagee, insurance on the mortgaged premises is effected for their common benefit, although the policy be taken in the name of the mortgagee. Where a policy is so taken out, under the insurance clause in a mortgage, payment of a loss to the mortgagee inures to the benefit of the mortgagor, and it is immaterial under such stipulation in whose name the policy be procured. Waring v. Loder, 53 N. Y. 581, and cases cited. A policy effected under such agreement, in the name of the mortgagee, to secure the mortgaged premises against loss by fire will protect the mortgagor, and payment to the mortgagee, pro tanto, discharges the debt. Such an agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee is not regarded as any infringement upon the rights of the underwriters. The mortgagee becomes bound to give the credit to his mortgage debtor. His right is not to withhold it, and subrogation is only to such rights as he has."

2. ON TRANSFER OF PROPERTY BY MORTGAGOR.

The cases are in conflict as to the right to subrogation in case the mortgagor, by a transfer of the property before loss, leaves the mortgagee as sole beneficiary of the insurance, each case being controlled by its own facts and the terms of the policy in suit. In Matter of Kip, 4 Edw. (N. Y.) 86, it appeared that a mortgagor obtained an insurance policy on the mortgaged property and assigned it to the mortgagee. The mortgagor sold the property, the vendee assuming the mortgage but not taking an assignment of the vendor's interest in the policy. After the destruction of the property it was held that the insurer was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee on the payment of the loss. To the same effect see Ætna F. Ins. Co. v. Tyler, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 385, 30 Am. Dec. 90.

In Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Story, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 124, 35 S. W. 68, in discussing the right of the insurer to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee where there was a transfer of the insured property in violation of a clause in the policy, the court said: "The transfer of the property by the original mortgagors to a vendee who assumed payment of the mortgage debt, with the consent in writing of the insurance company, trustee and the mortgage company, taken in connection with the subsequent receipt by the mortgage company of interest payments from the vendee, and the recognition in this suit, of these transactions by the insurance company in suing the vendee on his contract of assumption, operates to convert the original mortgagors from principals to sureties, not only as between them and their vendee, but also as between them and the trustee, insurance company and mortgage company, and such original mortgagors thereby became entitled to all the rights of sureties. The effect of the transaction was to create a new contract, by which the purchaser who, with the consent of the other parties in interest, assumed the mortgage debt, became the mortgagor within the meaning of the term as used in the subrogation clause in the policy. . . . The proper construction of the subro-gation clause is that a violation of the policy will invalidate it as to the parties at fault, but not as to the parties not at fault, or who could not have foreseen or prevented such violation of the policy. In this regard, the sureties, who had parted with the property, and had no means of knowing or preventing a violation of the policy, stand in principle in the same position as the mortgage company itself."

In Graves v. Hampden F. Ins. Co. 10 Allen (Mass.) 282, the facts were referred to in the opinion of the court as follows: "The present case is to be treated as a policy on the interest of the mortgagor, but payable in case of loss to the mortgagee, qualified by a provision that no sale of the property shall affect the right of the mortgagee to recover in case of a loss. We are then to assume that this policy was procured by the mortgagor and at his cost, and was one which he might cause to be enforced for his benefit, and the avails to be applied, first, to discharge the mortgage debt, and the surplus to his own benefit, unless that right has been lost by alienation of his interest. It is conceded that such alienation has been made. In September, 1863, Plumb, who obtained this policy, parted with all his interest in the property insured, and the same was transferred to Chaffee, Plumb surrendering to his own grantor the unrecorded deed to him by Foster, and Foster thereupon conveying the equity to Chaffee. After the loss, the right in equity was conveyed to Graves the plaintiff. Thus Plumb ceased to have any interest in the property insured. The sale to Chaffee of the equity would not pass this policy to Chaffee. It was a mere personal contract of indemnity made with Plumb for the benefit of himself and the mortgagee Bigelow." It appeared that after the loss of the property the insurer paid the amount of the loss covered by the policy to the mortgagee and took an assignment of his interest, and an action to redeem the property from the mortgage was brought by the vendees of the equity of redemption. The court in granting relief said: "As to the Hampden Fire Insurance Company, they certainly can stand in no better situation than Bigelow, having received the transfer of the mortgage with full knowledge of the existence of the policy, and that a loss had accrued thereon by reason of which he was entitled to receive from them the sum of $2,500 as mortgagee. . . . In the opinion of the court, the money which the mortgagee was thus entitled to receive from the insurance company and as to payment of which no objection intervened, the same having accrued under the circumstances we have stated, should be applied in part payment of the mortgage debt. A bill in equity may properly be maintained in behalf of the plaintiff, and a decree must be entered to the effect that the defendants be required to receive the amount due upon the mortgage over and above the amount due and payable upon the policy of insurance; and thereupon to cancel and discharge the mortgage and execute proper releases thereof."

In Nelson v. Bound Brook Mut. F. Ins. Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 256, 11 Atl. 681, 3 Am. St. Rep. 308, reversing 41 N. J. Eq. 485, 5 Atl. 590, the facts were stated in the opinion of the court as follows: "Mrs. Nelson, the appellant, took out from the respondent company a policy of insurance against a loss by fire on certain buildings on the farm owned and occupied by her at the time. The buildings were burned, and the company paid to her the amount of the loss. Before the destruction of the buildings, the appellant, Mrs. Nelson, by a verbal agreement with her two sons, bargained for a sale to them of the entire property for $3,000, one-half to be paid in cash or its equivalent, the balance to be secured to her by bond and mortgage on the property. It was further stipulated between them that, upon the execution of the conveyance, the vendees should have an assignment of the policy to them as owners, and reassign it to her as collateral security upon her mortgage. In the interim, the policy should remain for their joint protection on the building, the vendees engaging to pay all subsequent assessments on the policy. No time was appointed for concluding the transaction, but the parties chancing to meet at the office of a conveyancer had the deed and mortgage drawn. The deed was signed and acknowledged by the vendor, and left by the parties with the county clerk to be recorded. The mortgage was signed and acknowledged by the vendees and the wife of one of them who was present, and its custody given to the vendor to hold until the absent wife could be brought to sign it, when the balance of the purchase money was to be adjusted and the insurance as arranged for effected in completion of the bargain. Before the parties met again after the execution of the papers the fire occurred. Upon paying the insurance money by the company, an assignment of this mortgage to it was formerly demanded of Mrs. Nelson. She refused to assign it, and the respondents filed a bill praying subrogation to her rights under the mortgage, and that she be decreed to assign it to the company. The court below so decreed, and from that decree the defendants below appealed." In reversing the decree of the lower court the appellate court said: "The contract with Mrs. Nelson on the part of the company was an indemnity against loss in the destruction of the buildings for which the usual premium and obligation required by the company for such insurance was demanded and received. On this policy unchanged in its terms the loss was paid. Now, the respondent claims a different status from that assumed in its contract, and claims its liability to be of a different nature, because of the new attitude which the insured assumed through her contract to sell. Yielding that to the respondent, certainly it must take its new position, not upon a partial view or selected part of her contract. When it puts itself on her agreement, it does and must accept it as a whole, because her rights under that agreement, and those of her vendees, are to be determined on the entire terms of it. Among these, she engaged to hold her policy for the joint protection of herself and her vendees, and the latter assumed to pay all subsequent assessments upon it. She cannot, under her contract with him, refuse to allow the proceeds of the insurance to reduce, pro tanto, her claim against them, and her rights in this regard are the respondent's rights. For these reasons the decree below should be reversed, and the bill be ordered dismissed, with costs."

In the reported case it appears that the mortgagor insured the mortgaged property, making the loss payable to the mortgagee as its interest might appear, otherwise to the insured. The policy was subsequently invalidated as to the mortgagor by his contracting to sell the property in violation of the policy. A loss occurring, and the insurer being compelled to pay the insurance to the mortgagee to the amount of the mortgage, it demanded an assignment of the note and mortgage, which was refused, and it then brought a suit to enforce its demands. But it is held that the insurer was not entitled to subrogation, the court saying that the insurer agreed with the mortgagor to pay a loss and not a mortgage.

IV. Under Policy Providing for Subrogation.

1. IN GENERAL.

A clause in an insurance policy subrogating the insurer to the rights of the mortgagee on a payment of the loss to him to the extent of his debt, will be enforced. Stinchfield v. Milliken, 71 Me. 567; Foster v. Van Reed, 70 N. Y. 19, 26 Am. Rep. 544. See also Dick v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 10 Mo. App. 376, affirmed 81 Mo. 103. In Foster v. Van Reed, supra, it appeared that property was mortgaged by an instrument providing that the property should be insured by the mortgagor and in case of his default in that respect the mortgagee could insure the property and the premiums paid should be deemed to be secured by the mortgage. The mortgagee procured insurance on his interest in the property, the policy containing a clause for the subrogation of the insurer to the rights of the mortgagee on payment of the loss. It was held that the agreement for subrogation could be enforced.

2. UNDER CLAUSE GIVING SUBROGATION ON CLAIM OF NONLIABILITY TO MORTGAGOR.

a. Policy Invalidated as to Mortgagor.

Insurance policies frequently contain so-called mortgage clauses which provide in effect that the policy shall not be invalidated as to the mortgagee by the acts of the mortgagor, and that if the insurer shall make a claim of nonliability as to the mortgagor or owner it shall be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee on a payment of the loss to him to the extent of his debt. Under this clause it is held that where the policy has been invalidated as to the mortgagor, the insurer is entitled to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee on a payment of the loss to him to the extent of his debt.

Thus in Sterling F. Ins. Co. v. Beffrey, 48 Minn. 9, 50 N. W. 922, it was said: "The contract was in explicit terms that, after acts of the mortgagor or owner of the property which invalidated it as to them, the insurance should be exclusively for the indemnity of the mortgagee; that the mortgagor, or those claiming under him, should have no beneficial interest in the policy; that payment to a mortgagee should not discharge the mortgage lien, but subrogate the insurer to the rights of the mortgagee; and, further, that if, instead of paying the amount of the loss to the mortgagee and securing rights through subrogation, the plaintiff company elected so to do, it could pay the entire debt to the mortgagee, and by means of a transfer and assignment thereof, and of the securities, succeed to her claim and interest, without restriction. Allen v. Watertown F. Ins. Co. 132 Mass. 480; Ulster County Sav. Inst. v. Leake, 73 N. Y. 161; Stinchfield v. Milliken, 71 Me. 567. This was the contract between the parties, as found in the policy, and there is no reason why it should not be enforced as made."

In Allen v. Watertown F. Ins. Co. 132 Mass. 482, it was said: "The policy in the case at bar seems to have been drawn expressly to meet the decision in Graves v. Hampden F. Ins. Co. 10 Allen 281. After specifying matters which shall render the policy void, it provides that the insurance, 'as to the interest of the mortgagee only therein,' shall not be invalidated by acts of the mortgagor, and that, when a loss after a forfeiture is paid to the mortgagee, the company shall be subrogated to his rights under the mortgage to the extent of such payment, and may pay the full amount of the debt to the mortgagee and require an assignment of the mortgage. In other words, the policy provides that the amount due for a loss after a forfeiture shall not be a fund for the payment of the mortgage debt, but that, upon payment of the loss, the mortgage shall be a fund for the reimbursement of the defendant. The contract is, that after a forfeiture the insurance shall be exclusively for the benefit of the mortgagee; that the mortgagor and those claiming under him shall have no beneficial interest in the policy, and that payment to the mortgagee shall not discharge the mortgage, but subrogate the defendant to the mortgagee's right in it. It was a contract which the parties were competent to make, and we know no reason that they should not abide by it. The plaintiff cannot redeem the mortgage without paying the full amount of the debt."

So in Insurance Co. of North America v. Martin, 151 Ind. 209, 51 N. E. 361, it appeared that mortgaged property was alienated in violation of the terms of an insurance policy covering the property. The policy contained a mortgage clause. After the destruction of the property the insurer paid the loss to the mortgagee and secured from him an assignment of the debt and mortgage lien. In holding that the denial of liability to the mortgagor was sufficient, the court said: "In answer to the insistence of appellees that the complaint does not disclose that appellant denied its liability to the mortgagor or owner of the property at the time it paid the loss to the mortgagee, it may be said that it is true, as the authorities affirm, that appellant was not entitled to subrogation upon its mere denial of liability, but to entitle it to this right the facts in the case must justify such a denial. It does appear, however, from the averments of the complaint, that after the fire in question the mortgagee, under the policy, demanded of appellant payment for the loss of the house, and that the latter, in accordance with the policy and the provisions of the mortgage clause, paid said loss to the former and took from it an assignment of the debt and mortgage lien, to the extent of the amount paid. These facts, we think, sufficiently show a denial of liability by appellant to the mortgagor or owner of the property."

In Molaka v. American F. Ins. Co. 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 149, the facts were stated in the opinion of the court as follows: "The defendant company issued to George Molaka, the legal plaintiff, a policy of insurance upon a dwelling house of which the latter was the owner. The policy contained a provision that, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon, it should become void 'if the insured now has or shall hereafter make or procure any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy.' The insured, shortly after the policy was issued, executed a mortgage upon the property in favor of Fredericka Klein, the equitable plaintiff, to secure the payment of a loan of $1,000; and, on July 10, 1901, the defendant company noted upon the policy, 'Loss, if any, under this policy first payable to Fredericka Klein, mortgagee, subject to mortgage clause attached,' and at the same time attached the usual mortgage clause. The mortgage clause so attached provided that the insurance as to the interest of the mortgagee only therein should not be invalidated by any act or neglect of the mortgagor or owner of the property; and that 'whenever this company shall pay the mortgagee any sum for loss or damage under this policy and shall claim that, as to the mortgagor or owner, no liability therefor existed, this company shall, to the extent of such payment, be thereupon legally subrogated to all the rights of the party to whom such payment shall be made.' Molaka procured a new policy of insurance upon the building from the Hamburg-Bremen Fire Insurance Company, in a like sum of $1,600. The building was subsequently, on August 25, 1903, destroyed by fire. George Molaka, on August 31, 1903, assigned to Fredericka Klein, the mortgagee, $1,000 of the amount covered by the policy of the Hamburg-Bremen Fire Insurance Company, which assignment was duly indorsed upon the policy and recognized by said company. The Hamburg-Bremen Fire Insurance Company subsequently paid upon said policy the $1,000 which Fredericka Klein was entitled to receive." In discussing the rights of the defendant insurer, the court said: "The liability of the company to the mortgagee arose the moment the loss occurred, but, under the terms of the policy, the defendant was not required to pay until sixty days had expired. While the liability existed and before the day of payment arrived, the mortgagor, the principal debtor, assigned to the mortgagee a security collateral to the mortgage, from the proceeds of which her claim ought to have been fully paid. The collateral security thus placed in her hands was the property of the principal debtor, Molaka, and to it there was no defense either as against the mortgagor or mortgagee. We are not now dealing with a case where a mortgagee has parted with a security collateral to his mortgage before a loss covered by a policy of insurance has occurred; the status of the parties in this case had been fixed. Fredericka Klein was the creditor of Molaka, she had a present claim, which was certain to become due in the near future, against the insurance company for a loss upon the property of Molaka, for which, however, the latter had no valid claim against the company. The fact that the policy of the Hamburg-Bremen Fire Insurance Company was not assigned to the mortgagee until after the fire is immaterial; the defendant company was entitled to the benefit and advantage of every collateral security which she acquired subsequently to the loss down to the day when she could legally call upon it to pay."

In Hare v. Headley, 54 N. J. Eq. 545, 35 Atl. 445, it appeared that after the loss of mortgaged property insured under a policy containing a mortgage clause the mortgagor failed to give notice of the loss and to render proofs as required by the policy. The loss subsequently was adjusted and paid to the mortgagee, and it was held that this was not a waiver of the right of the insurer to a forfeiture of the policy as to the mortgagor, so that the insurer was not defeated of his right of subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee. But in Anderson v. Saugeen Mut. F. Ins. Co. 18 Ont. 355, it was held that the failure of the mortgagee to file proofs of loss and bring an action did not avoid the policy as to the mortgagor but only affected his remedy; so that the mortgagee could recover the amount of the loss due him under the policy without any subrogation to his rights by the insurer.

In New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. v. National L. Ins. Co. 112 Fed. 199, 50 C. C. A. 188, 57 L.R.A. 692, in discussing the right of an insurer to subrogation under a mortgage clause where the mortgagee had made a settlement with other companies who had insured the same property, the court said: "The provision found in the mortgage clause . . . provided, in substance, that when they paid the mortgagee any sum for a loss under the policy, and claimed that they were not liable to the mortgagors, then, and not before, they should be subrogated to the rights of the party to whom payment was made as respects all securities held by such party on the 'property in question' to secure the payment of the debt. This doubtless gave to the appellants the right to pay their proportion of the loss to the mortgagee, and claim subrogation as respects the mortgage existing on the property; but it did not give them the right to contest the payment of their own policies, denying all liability thereon, and at the same time insist that the mortgagee should not make a settlement with other insurers for less than the face of their policies, without their consent. If the appellants desired to avail themselves of the right of subrogation which was reserved to them by the mortgage clause, and to acquire an interest in the mortgage, so as to be able to dictate or control settlements with other insurers, they should first have paid their respective losses. Until they did pay their own losses, the mortgagee was entitled to make any settlement with the other insurers which it deemed fair and just without consulting the wishes of the appellants."

In Palmer v. McFadden (N. J.) 98 Atl. 462, it appeared that a mortgagor procured insurance for the benefit of herself and her mortgagee. As the property was insured in other companies it was provided that the insurer should be liable only for a proportionate share of the loss. The policy also contained a clause providing for the subro-gation of the insurer to the rights of the mortgagee where a claim of nonliability to the mortgagor was made. The property was destroyed and the insurer paid the claim of the mortgagee and took an assignment of his rights, the insurer, however, not making a claim of nonliability as to the mortgagor. In an action brought against the insurer to have the mortgage canceled, the court denied the right of the insurer to subrogation, saying: "From the facts stated it is apparent that neither of the requisites to entitle the insurance company to subrogation, viz., an insurance effected by the mortgagee at his own expense, or a denial of liability to the owner or mortgagor, is present in this case. The insurer by its contention is asking the court in effect to add a provision to the contract of insurance, which it neglected to impose when the mortgagee clause was attached to the policy; that is, it asks that a contribution clause be read into the mortgagee clause, limiting its liability thereunder as a similar clause limits its liability to the owner under the policy. It is a matter of common knowledge that insurance companies issue the standard form of mortgagee clause both with and without the clause for full contribution from other insurers, and limiting liability thereby. In the present case the Niagara Fire Insurance Company saw fit to issue and to attach to complainant's policy the mortgagee clause, without the provision for contribution by other insurers, and without limiting thereby its liability for a greater proportion of any loss or damage sustained than the amount its policy bore to the whole amount of insurance upon the property, whether such insurance was issued to or held by the owner or mortgagee, and it now asks the court by its contention to supply this omission from the mortgagee clause under consideration. This, of course, cannot be done, and as complainant procured the insurance at her own expense, and as the insurance company does not disclaim, but admits liability to her as owner and mortgagor, she is entitled to have the amount paid the mortgagee credited in satisfaction of the mortgage debt."

In Washington F. Ins. Co. v. Cobb (Tex.) 163 S. W. 608, it was held that an insurer was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the holder of a builder's and mechanic's lien on the payment of the loss to him to the extent of his debt, under the mortgage clause, where the policy had been invalidated as to the owner. Compare Philadelphia F. Assoc. v. Patton, 15 N. M. 304, 107 Pac. 679, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 421.

The right of the insurer to subrogation under the mortgage clause on the invalidation of the policy as to the mortgagor and the payment of the loss to the mortgagee to the extent of his debt is not affected by the fact that the premiums are paid by the mortgagor. Washington F. Ins. Co. v. Cobb (Tex.) 163 S. W. 608.

b. Policy Not Invalidated as to Mortgagor.

But the insurer is not entitled to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee under the mortgage clause, where the owner or mortgagor of the property has done no act sufficient to avoid the policy. Moulton v. Globe Mut. Ins. Co. 36 S. D. 339, 154 N. W. 830; Howes v. Dominion F. etc. Ins. Co. 2 Ont. 89; Bull v. North British Canadian Invest. Co. 15 Ont. App. 421, affirming 14 Ont. 322, and affirmed 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 697; Klein v. Union F. Ins. Co. 3 Ont. 234.

Neither is the insurer entitled to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee, where by its acts it has waived its right to invalidate the policy as to the mortgagor. Scottish Union, etc. Ins. Co. v. Colvard, 135 Ga. 188, 68 S. E. 1097; Eliot Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Commercial Assur. Co. 142 Mass. 142, 7 N. E. 550; Amory v. Reliance Ins. Co. 208 Mass. 378, 94 N. E. 677; Prinz v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 80 App. Div. 638, 81 N. Y. S. 141; McKay v. Norwich Union Ins. Co. 27 Ont. 251; Bull v. North British Canadian Invest. Co. 15 Ont. App. 421, affirming 14 Ont. 322, and affirmed 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 697. Thus in Bull v. North British Canadian Invest. Co. supra, it appeared that proofs of loss of the insured property were made by the mortgagees and the insurer paid them the loss without objecting to the sufficiency of the proofs. It was held that this was a waiver of a clause in the policy requiring the mortgagor to make proofs of loss and that consequently the policy was not invalidated as to him, and the insurer was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee. And in Eliot Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Commercial Assur. Co. 142 Mass. 142, 7 N. E. 550, it was held that the right of the insurer of mortgaged property to elect under a provision both in the policy and the statute either to pay the mortgagee the loss, or to pay the full amount secured by the mortgage, and to receive an assignment of the mortgage and debt in case of nonliability to the mortgagor or owner, was a right dependent on the condition of being exercised within a reasonable time. To the same effect see Amory v. Reliance Ins. Co. 208 Mass. 378, 94 N. E. 677.

c. Burden of Proof and Trial of Issue.

The insurer is not entitled to subrogation under the mortgage clause on a mere claim of nonliability to the mortgagor, but must show a state of facts which would entitle it to exemption from liability to the mortgagor.

Sun Ins. Office of London v. Heidener, 44 Cal. 293, 99 Pac. 39; Traders' Ins. Co. v. Race, 142 Ill. 338, 29 N. E. 846, 31 N. E. 392, affirming 31 Ill. App. 625; Insurance Co. of North America v. Martin, 151 Ind. 209, 51 N. E. 361; Loewenstein v. Queen Ins. Co. 227 Mo. 100, 127 S. W. 72; Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. National Union F. Ins. Co. 98 Neb. 446, 153 N. W. 553, L.R.A.1916A 784; Hare v. Headley, 54 N. J. Eq. 545, 35 Atl. 445; O'Neil v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. of Philadelphia, 159 App. Div. 313, 145 N. Y. S. 432.

In Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. National Union F. Ins. Co. supra, the facts were stated in the opinion of the court as follows: "This action was brought by the Aetna Life Insurance Company against the National Union Fire Insurance Company and Ebenezer D. Harris. Harris was the owner of a house on which a policy of insurance for $1,500 had been issued by the National Union Fire Insurance Company, hereinafter termed the insurer. He had borrowed from the Aetna Life Insurance Company, termed the mortgagee, $1,500. A mortgage clause was attached to the policy in the usual form, providing that in case of loss, the policy was payable to the mortgagee 'as its mortgaged interest may appear.' The house burned down, and the insurer refused to pay the loss on the ground that the policy was obtained by fraud and misrepresentation." It was held that the right of subrogation of the insurer depended on the question whether the policy had been procured by fraud and that the mortgagor was entitled to a jury trial to determine that issue.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY

v.

TOWERS ET AL.

Maryland Court of Appeals—April 16, 1915.

126 Md. 59; 94 Atl. 330.

Carriers — Regulation by Public Service Commission — Commutation Rates.

Although the public service commission has no power to make any order except so far as authority is conferred by the legislature, under Code Pub. Civ. Laws, art. 23, § 435, creating the commission, as amended by Acts 1912, c. 162, the commission has full power, so far as the legislature could grant it, to supervise all railroad tariffs and transportation charges within the state, including commutation rates.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The action of the state in establishing, through the public service commission, a single fare rate does not exhaust its power to regulate transportation charges, and, after establishing a single fare rate, it may thereafter make any reasonable regulation affecting mileage or commutation rates, leaving them so as to bring a proper return to the railroad for the specific service, independent of the return to it from other services.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In determining whether the action of the public service commission in fixing a railroad commutation rate was reasonable, the entire net revenue of the road, from whatever character of service derived, is not to be looked to, since the specific service regulated must have its charges so fixed as to return the road a normal profit on such specific branch of the service by itself, to avoid confiscatory action, which would ultimately defeat the end the regulation was intended to accomplish, the promotion of the public good and convenience.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The mere fact that the rate fixed by the public service commission for commutation tickets is discriminatory, is not conclusive of its invalidity.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In fixing railroad charges for any specific class of service, the point of injustice is reached before that of confiscation, and to give the constitutional prohibition against confiscation any beneficial effect, it must be read to prohibit the fixing of rates at a point at which the railroad property will return to its owners enough to pay operating expenses and a fair profit on the investment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Review of Public Service Commission.

Upon application to the court to restrain the execution of an order of the public service commission fixing railroad rates, the power of the court is limited to the determination of the question whether the rates fixed are unreasonable or unlawful, which must be clearly made to appear before the court may restrain the execution of the order, since a court under the guise of exerting judicial power may not usurp administrative functions by setting aside an administrative order upon its own ideas as to whether the administrative power was wisely exercised.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1914D 795.]

Same.

In a suit by a railroad to enjoin enforcement of an order of the public service commission fixing the maximum charge for commutation tickets, evidence is held to be insufficient to show that such rate was unreasonable and confiscatory.

Same.

Where a railroad sought to restrain the enforcement of an order of the public service commission fixing the maximum charge for commutation tickets, and the evidence as to whether such rate was unreasonable and con-fiscatory was unsatisfactory and inconclusive, the rate should be allowed to go into effect to determine by actual experience its character, subject to the right of the road at any future time to seek its abrogation by judicial action for cause shown.

Shirley Carter and John J. Donaldson for appellant.

Wm. Cabell Bruce and Washington Bowie, Jr., for appellee.

[61] STOCKBRIDGE, J.—The Pennsylvania Railroad Company as lessee, operates as a part of its system, the line known as the Northern Central [62] Railway. The Baltimore division of this extends from Baltimore to Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, lying thus in two States. Through traffic over this is accordingly interstate traffic. In addition to this through business, there is also local business, which between Baltimore and Parkton is wholly in the State of Maryland, and this business being intrastate is subject to State control, in so far as it is subject to any control at all in the interest of the public. For some time past there has been a demand on the part of the railroads of this country for an increase of their revenues, on the ground that as the result of a number of contributing causes they were either making no net revenue at all or at best one inadequate to meet the requirements for the upkeep of their roadbed and rolling stock, or extensions rendered desirable by the increase of population or development of new localities, and also yield any adequate return on the capital employed in the enterprise. Among the causes contributing to this condition were the hostile legislation in many States, placing new and additional burdens on such companies, the great increase in wages paid to employees, and the enhanced cost of requisite supplies of all kinds.

As a means to in part overcome the unfavorable condition, there has been throughout the eastern States at least, an increase in the rates for passenger transportation. Such travel may be roughly divided into four general classes, though this will not include all varieties of the passenger transportation, each one of which has its own distinctive characteristics, which clearly differentiate it from the others. These classes are single rate fares, mileage rates, commutation rates and party rates. It is with the third of these, commutation rates, that this case has to deal.

For a number of years there had been in force on the Northern Central Railway commutation rates from Baltimore to points on the line of the railway as far as Parkton. On November 25th, 1914, the railway company filed with the Public Service Commission of this State a proposed tariff of new passenger rates for such commutation service involving [63] an entire revision and increase of the rates over those theretofore charged for such service. This was followed by a "petition and complaint" by a number of those to be affected by the changes, and the question thus came before the Public Service Commission, which heard testimony on behalf both of the petitioners and the railroad, and by its order of December 21st, 1914, granted certain increases, though in no instance to the full extent asked by the railroad company. Then the bill in this case was filed to enjoin the commission from enforcing or attempting to enforce the order of December 21st. It is from the decree dismissing the bill of the railroad company that this appeal is taken.

The question is not now presented whether it is within the power of the Public Service Commission to require the establishment of a schedule of commutation rates by a railway company in a case where no such rates had theretofore existed. Upon that no opinion is now expressed. What the Court is now called to pass upon is the reasonableness of commutation rates, where such a system of rates has long been in operation by the action of the company, and where a modification of those rates was proposed by the railway company and by it submitted to the Commission. Whether commutation rates shall be established at all is a question of policy upon the part of the company, but if such a policy is adopted there will still remain the reasonableness of the manner in which that policy is carried out.

What was endeavored to be done by the railroad with regard to rates, and how far the same was gratified by the order of the Commission will be best understood from the following table:

Rates Prior to Nov. 25, 1914.	Rates as per Schedule Filed Nov. 25, 1914.	Rates under Or- der of P. S. Com., Dec. 23, 1914.
1: Round trip, 10 day, 24c. per M.	Round trip, no limit. 24c. per M.	Round trip, 24c. per M.
2: Exc. 2-10 days, 24c. per M.	Discontinued.	No ruling made.
3: 10-strip ticket, 1 yr., 1 8/10c. per M.	10 trip, 3 mos., 24c. per M.	10 strip, 3 mos., 2c. per M.
4: 60-trip 1 mo., 2c. for first 3 M., 3c. for ea. addl. 1/2 M.	60 trip 1 mo., former rate plus 25c. flat.	60 trip 1 mo., former rate plus 25c.

Rates Prior to Nov. 25, 1914.	Rates as per Schedule Filed Nov. 25, 1915.	Rates under Or- der P. S. Com., Dec. 23, 1915.
5: 100-trip 1 yr. at double 60 trip.	Discontinued.	100 trip 4 mos., former rate, plus $1.
6: 180-trip 3 mos. same as 4, less 10%.	180 trip 3 mos. at 3 times 60 trip.	180 trip 3 mos., former rate, plus 75c.
7: 46-trip School, 1 mo., 46/60 of 60 trip.	46 trip School 1 mo., 46/60 of 60 trip.	46 trip School, 1 mo., 46/60 of 60 trip.

At or about the same time the railroad company made increases in the single rate fares, and also in the mileage ticket, but as both of these forms of transportation involved under the circumstances of this case, interstate rather than intrastate carriage, the jurisdiction over them belonged to a different [65] tribunal, and did not and cannot properly enter into the consideration of this case at all.

The first prayer of the bill is that the action of the Public Service Commission may be declared void and set aside. When couched in so general terms the ground for such a prayer is not clearly evident. A body like the Public Service Commission has of course no power or authority to make any order, except in so far as the authority is distinctly conferred upon it by the Legislature. But the Act creating the Public Service Commission, now codified as sec. 413, etc., or Article 23, when taken in connection with the Amendatory Act, Chapter 162 of the Acts of 1912, clearly confers upon the Commission full power, so far as it was within the province of the Legislature to grant it, to supervise and regulate all tariffs and transportation charges within the State, including by its very terms, commutation rates. Or the contention of the plaintiff may have been in this regard upon a somewhat different theory, namely, that while it might be within the power of the Legislature and therefore, by delegation, within the power of the Public Service Commission, to regulate and establish the single rate fare, yet when it had done so, it had exhausted its power and could not thereafter make any regulation whatever to affect either mileage or commutation rates, and for this claim there is warrant to be found in the language used in the decision of the Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 19 S. Ct. 565, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 858, in which Mr. Justice Peckham elaborately discusses the question of the validity of an Act of the Michigan Legislature, which was intended to regulate the price of 1,000-mile tickets, and holds that in attempting so to do the Michigan Legislature had exceeded its powers. Without citing his argument in full, the following language to be found in the opinion will indicate its trend: "If unhampered by contract, there is no doubt of the power of the State to provide by legislation for maximum rates of charges for railroad companies, subject to the condition that they must be such [66] as will admit of the carrier earning a compensation that under all the circumstances shall be just to it and to the public, and whether they are or not, is a judicial question. If the rates are fixed at an insufficient amount within the meaning of that term as given by the courts, the law would be invalid, as amounting to the taking of the property of the company without due process of law. . . . The question is presented in this case whether the Legislature of a State has also the right after having fixed a maximum rate for the transportation of passengers to still further regulate their affairs and to discriminate and make an exception in favor of certain persons and give them a right of transportation for a less sum than the general rate provided by law. . . . The Act is not a general law upon the subject of rates establishing maximum rates which the company can in no case violate. The Legislature having established such maximum as a general law, now assumes to interfere with the management of the company while conducting its affairs pursuant to and obeying the statute regulating rates and charges, and notwithstanding such rate, it assumes to provide for a discrimination, an exception in favor of those who may desire and are able to purchase tickets at what might be called wholesale rates—a discrimination which operates in favor of the wholesale buyer, leaving the others subject to the general rule. It thus invades the general right of a company to conduct and manage its own affairs, and compels it to give the use of its property for less than the general rate to those who come within the provisions of the statute, and to that extent it would seem that the statute takes the property of a company without due process of law. We speak of the general right of the company to conduct and manage its own affairs, but at the same time it is to be understood that the company is subject to the unquestioned jurisdiction of the Legislature in the exercise of its power to provide for the safety, the health and the convenience of the public, and to prevent improper exactions or extortionate [67] charges from being made by the company. . . . The power of the Legislature to enact general laws regarding a company and its affairs does not include the power to compel it to make an exception in favor of some particular class in the community and to carry the members of that class at a less sum than it has the right to charge for those who are not fortunate enough to be members thereof. This is not reasonable regulation."

The Act was further criticised for the reason that it compelled the company to carry not only those who might purchase the mileage tickets, but also the length of time during which the company should be obliged to honor them, the forfeiture of the ticket under certain conditions and the redemption of any unused portion of it at the expiration of two years. This Act applied in a case with regard to a mileage ticket, and in regard to the same class of ticket the decision above quoted was followed and adopted in Beardsley v. New York, etc. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 230, 56 N. E. 488; State v. Great Northern R. Co. 17 N. D. 370, 116 N. W. 89; State v. Bonneval 128 La. 902, Ann. Cas. 1912C 837, 55 So. 569; Com. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 106 Va. 61, 9 Ann. Cas. 1124, 55 S. E. 572, 117 Am. St. Rep. 983, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1086; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Ketchum, 212 Fed. 986.

It was contended in argument on behalf of the Public Service Commission that, while not in terms overruled, the effect of the decision in the Lake Shore case, supra, had been very much weakened, if not entirely done away with, by other and later decisions. Since the argument of this case, however, the Supreme Court of the United States has rendered opinions in three cases, which clearly show that in the view of that Court the decision in the Lake Shore case is still in full force. The first two of the cases referred to are the Northern Pac. R. Co. v. North Dakota, and the Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. North Dakota, 236 U. S. 585, Ann. Cas. 1916A 1, 35 S. Ct. 429, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 735; the proceedings in each of these cases were instituted by the Atty.-Gen'l. of the State, for a mandatory injunction against the railroads to require them to put into effect an Act of the Legislature of North Dakota, establishing a maximum coal rate [68] in that State. In the case of the Northern Pac. Ry. Co. it was shown that out of a total revenue derived from the carriage of coal of $58,953.07, there was a surplus income over and above expenses of $827.61, and that in the case of the other road the carriage was conducted at an actual loss. In the course of that opinion, Mr. Justice Hughes uses the following language:

"The general principles to be applied are not open to controversy. The railroad property is private property devoted to a public use. As a corporation, the owner is subject to the obligations of its charter. As the holder of special franchises, it is subject to the conditions upon which they were granted. Aside from specific requirements of this sort, the common carrier must discharge the obligations which inhere in the nature of its business. It must supply facilities that are reasonably adequate; it must carry out reasonable terms, and it must serve without unjust discrimination. These duties are properly called public duties, and the State within the limits of its jurisdiction may enforce them. The State may prescribe rules to insure fair remuneration and to prevent extortion, to secure substantial equality of treatment in like cases, and to promote safety, good order and convenience. . . .

"But, broad as is the power of regulation, the State does not enjoy the freedom of an owner. The fact that the property is devoted to a public use on certain terms does not justify the requirement that it shall be devoted to other public purposes, or to the same use on other terms, or the imposition of restrictions that are not reasonably concerned with the proper conduct of the business according to the undertaking which the carrier has expressly or impliedly assumed. If it has held itself out as a carrier of passengers only, it cannot be compelled to carry freight. As a carrier for hire, it cannot be required to carry persons or goods gratuitously. The case would not be altered by the assertion that the public interest demanded such carriage. The public interest [69] cannot be invoked as a justification for demands which pass the limits of reasonable protection and seek to impose upon the carrier and its property burdens that are not incident to its engagement. In such a case, it would be no answer to say that the carrier obtains from its entire intrastate business a return as to the sufficiency of which in the aggregate it is not entitled to complain. . . .

"We have, then, to apply these familiar principles to a case where the State has attempted to fix a rate for the transportation of a commodity under which, taking the results of the business to which the rate is applied, the carrier is compelled to transport the commodity for less than cost or without substantial compensation in addition to cost. We say this, for we entertain no doubt that in determining the cost of the transportation of a particular commodity, all the outlays which pertain to it must be considered. We find no basis for distinguishing in this respect between so-called 'out-of-pocket costs,' or 'actual' expenses, and other outlays which are none the less actually made because they are applicable to all traffic, instead of being exclusively incurred in the traffic in question. Illustrations are found in outlays for maintenance of way and structures, general expenses and taxes. It is not a sufficient reason for excluding such, or other, expenses to say that they would still have been incurred had the particular commodity not been transported. That commodity has been transported; the common carrier is under a duty to carry, and the expenses of its business at a particular time are attributable to what it does carry. The State cannot estimate the cost of carrying coal by throwing the expense incident to the maintenance of the roadbed, and the general expenses, upon the carriage of wheat; or the cost of carrying wheat by throwing the burden of the upkeep of the property upon coal and other commodities. This, of course, does not mean that all commodities are to be treated as carried at the same rate of expense. The outlays that exclusively pertain to a given class of traffic [70] must be assigned to that class, and the other expenses must be fairly apportioned. It may be difficult to make such an apportionment, but when conclusions are based on cost the entire cost must be taken into account. . . . But, while local interests serve as a motive for enforcing reasonable rates, it would be a very different matter to say that the State may compel the carrier to maintain a rate upon a particular commodity that is less than reasonable, or—as might equally well be asserted—to carry gratuitously, in order to build up a local enterprise. That would be to go outside the carrier's undertaking, and outside the field of reasonable supervision of the conduct of its business, and would be equivalent to an appropriation of the property to public uses upon terms to which the carrier had in no way agreed. It does not aid the argument to urge that the State may permit the carrier to make good its loss by charges for other transportation. If other rates are exorbitant, they may be reduced. Certainly, it could not be said that the carrier may be required to charge excessive rates to some in order that others might be served at a rate unreasonably low. . . .

"But a different question arises when the State has segregated a commodity, or a class of traffic, and has attempted to compel the carrier to transport it at a loss or without substantial compensation even though the entire traffic to which the rate is applied is taken into account. On that fact being satisfactorily established, the presumption of reasonableness is rebutted. . . .

"In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Union Pac. R. Co. 222 U. S. 541, 549 [32 S. Ct. 108, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 308, 312] in speaking of the carriers' concession that they were unable to determine the cost of the particular traffic in question and that a former rate had not been 'less than cost,' the Court said: 'Whether the carrier earned dividends or not sheds little light on the question as to whether the rate on a particular article is reasonable. For, if the carrier's total income enables it to declare a dividend, [71] that would not justify an order requiring it to haul one class of goods for nothing, or for less than a reasonable rate. On the other hand, if the carrier earned no dividend, it would not have warranted an order fixing an unreasonably high rate on such article.' . . .

"To repeat and conclude: It is presumed,—but the presumption is a rebuttable one—that the rates which the State fixes for intrastate traffic are reasonable and just. When the question is as to the profitableness of the intrastate business as a whole under a general scheme of rates, the carrier must satisfactorily prove the fair value of the property employed in its intrastate business and show that it has been denied a fair return upon that value. With respect to particular rates, it is recognized that there is a wide field of legislative discretion, permitting variety and classification, and hence the mere details of what appears to be a reasonable scheme of rates, or a tariff or schedule affording substantial compensation, are not subject to judicial review. But this legislative power cannot be regarded as being without limit. The constitutional guaranty protects the carrier from arbitrary action and from the appropriation of its property to public purposes, outside the undertaking assumed; and where it is established that a commodity, or a class of traffic, has been segregated and a rate imposed which would compel the carrier to transport it for less than the proper cost of transportation, or virtually at cost, and thus the carrier would be denied a reasonable reward for its service after taking into account the entire traffic to which the rate applies, it must be concluded that the State has exceeded its authority."

The third case of those recently decided by the Supreme Court was the case of the Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Conley, 236 U. S. 605, 35 S. Ct. 437, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 745, in which the Court had under consideration an Act of the Legislature, of West Virginia, establishing a maximum rate for passengers on railroads at two cents a mile and in that case after reference to the two cases last cited, the Court says:

[72] "The fundamental question presented is, whether the validity of the passenger rate can be determined by its effect upon the passenger business of the company separately considered. It is not necessary that there should be uniform rates or the same percentage of profits on every sort of business; and that there is abundant room for reasonable classification and the adaptation of rates to various groups of services. It was further held that despite this range of permissible action, the State has no arbitrary power over rates; that the devotion of the property of the carrier to public use is qualified by the condition of the carrier's undertaking that its services are to be performed for reasonable reward; and that the State may not select a commodity, or class of traffic, and instead of fixing what may be deemed to be reasonable compensation for its carriage, compel the carrier to transport it either at less than cost or for a compensation that is merely nominal.

"These considerations are controlling here. The passenger traffic is one of the main departments of the company's business; it has its separate equipment, its separate organization and management, and of necessity its own rates. In making a reasonable adjustment of the carrier's charges, the State is under no obligation to secure the same rate of return from each of the two principal departments of business, passenger and freight; but the State may not select either of these departments for arbitrary control. Thus, it would not be contended that the State might require passengers to be carried for nothing, or that it could justify such action by placing upon the shippers of goods the burden of excessive charges in order to supply an adequate return for the carrier's entire service. And, on the same principle, it would also appear to be outside the field of reasonable adjustment that the State should demand the carriage of passengers at a rate so low that it would not defray the cost of their transportation, when the entire traffic under the rate was considered, or would provide only a nominal reward in addition to cost."

From these citations it will be apparent that the limitations placed upon legislative action do not go to the extent [73] of saying that the establishment by State authority of a maximum single rate exhausts the power of State regulation, or that there may not be different rates for different characters of service. In the interest of the public there subsists and must subsist in the State the power to control and prevent exorbitant or extortionate charges for services performed. While at the same time that regulation must be reasonable in its character and so framed as under ordinary or normal conditions to bring about a proper return to the railroad for the service performed independent of the return to the railroad from other and a different character of service.

The contention was made upon the part of the Public Service Commission that in determining the reasonableness of the charge the entire net revenue of a railroad must be looked to, from whatever source derived, whether passenger, freight, express or investments held by the company, and there are undoubtedly cases which tend to support that view, among which may be named Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Smith, 60 Ark. 221, 29 S. W. 752; Pensacola, etc. R. Co. v. State, 25 Fla. 310, 5 So. 833, 3 L.R.A. 661; People v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 176 Ill. 512, 52 N. E. 292, 35 L.R.A. 656. These cases, however, are not in accord with the general trend of decision. In Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Alabama Railroad Commission, 208 Fed. 35, certain passenger rates were complained of, and the evidence tended to show that the operation of the road as a whole was unprofitable. mainly because it was transporting iron and coal at or below cost and it was there held, that the intrastate passenger rate could not be attacked because the entire business of the road did not yield a fair return. In the Board of Railroad Commissioners v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 20 Int. Com. C. Rep. 181, the question arose with regard to certain tolls of the Dunleith & Dubusque Bridge Company, of twenty-five cents per passenger, for local traffic, when the same charge was not made on through tickets, and it was there said that the fact that the net earnings of the carrier may be large does not of itself justify us in fixing a rate at less than is reasonable for the service, all other things being considered. In The Commutation Rate Cases, 21 Int. Com. C. Rep. 428, [74] the Interstate Com. Com. had under consideration the commutation rates of eight railroad companies, running into New York, most of them from points in New Jersey. In the opinion which was filed, Commissioner Harlan said:

"In our judgment, the carriage of a commuter differs in many respects from other passenger traffic and is an independent, special service."

He reviews at length the history of commutation transportation, and shows wherein it differs from transportation by mileage tickets or other forms of carriage, and there holds that for commutation service the carrier is entitled to receive a reasonable compensation, and no more. In that case he found that the commutation rates charged by the New Jersey Central were fair and reasonable, while those charged by the Pennsylvania were not, and accordingly required a reduction in the commutation rates of the latter road; but in so doing no account was taken of the passenger returns from the entire Pennsylvania system, nor of the net revenue derived from the combined receipts of freight, passenger and express business. So in the Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, Ann. Cas. 1916A 18, 33 S. Ct. 729, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1511, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1151, it was held that where a carrier does both interstate and intrastate business, in order to determine whether a scheme of maximum intrastate rates afforded a fair return for the value of the property employed in intrastate business, the rates prescribed must be considered separately, and that the profits and losses on interstate business cannot be offset. And the same principle underlay the decision in the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Union Pac. R. Co. 222 U. S. 541, 32 S. Ct. 108, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 308, and the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 227 U. S. 88, 33 S. Ct. 185, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 431. The same question was before this Court in the case of the Public Service Commission v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 122 Md. 355, 90 Atl. 105, and on page 390. Judge Thomas, speaking for this Court, said: "We cannot adopt the view that common carriers may be required to perform services at rates less than the actual cost of such services, for that would amount to confiscation, and would ultimately defeat the very end they [75] are designed to accomplish, namely, to subserve the public good and public convenience."

One of the grounds upon which the Court was asked to enjoin the enforcement of the order of the Public Service Commission was that it was discriminatory. But it is not all discriminations which are condemned by the law. As illustrating the distinction, it is sufficient to cite the case of State v. Omaha, etc. Ry. etc. Co. 113 Ia. 30, 84 N. W. 983, 86 Am. St. Rep. 357, 52 L.R.A. 315, in which an ordinance of the City of Council Bluffs was held void for this reason, and the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 145 U. S. 263, 12 S. Ct. 844, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 699, commonly known as the Party Rate case, in which a not dissimilar discrimination to that now presented was involved, and yet was held to be a valid act.

When we turn to the testimony offered before the Public Service Commission to determine the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the rates as fixed by the order of the Commission, we encounter serious difficulties. It is conceded that the increase in the straight fare ticket will produce an increase of revenue to the railway, but of what amount or how far it may operate to diminish the present passenger operating ratio, there is no means of determining. As the accounts of the railway company have been kept, there has been an attempt to apportion the receipts and expenditures as between freight and passenger business, both over the entire Northern Central system, and also over the Baltimore Division. But that is as far apparently as the effort at apportionment has gone. In this, 65% of the expenditures has been apparently readily apportioned as between the freight and passenger business, while the remaining 35% has been allocated arbitrarily. In this is included much in the way of expense which pertains to both of these classes of business, such as maintenance of way, bridges, and the like, but, taking the apportionment as made to have been measurably fair, there is this further difficulty remaining—no attempt has been made to subdivide the receipts upon the [76] passenger business of the Baltimore Division, as between the portion which lies within the State of Maryland, and the territory between Parkton and Harrisburg, still less to furnish anything like exact figures of the relative receipts and expenses arising from commutation business. Numerous and elaborate tabulations were offered on behalf of the company, tending to show that the passenger business of the Baltimore Division had been operated at an actual loss for a number of years. Without going into these in detail, the subjoined extract from Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 5 will show the claim of the railway in this regard:

Revenues.	Passenger.	Ratio of Expenses to Revenues.
	Expenses (Inc. Taxes). Passenger.
1908..$ 931,858	$ 985,001	105.70
1909.. 1,012,340	1,045,904	103.32
1910.. 1,089,574	1,319,213	121.08
1911.. 1,096,251	1,363,141	124.35
1912.. 1,160,982	1,244,285	107.18
1913.. 1,265,595	1,387,306	109.62

But in this connection it must be borne in mind that the figures in the expense column and in the column of ratio of expenses to revenue might be materially modified by a slightly different apportionment of the 35% which, as already stated, was necessarily arbitrarily allocated, and might be still further modified if we had absolute figures in regard to that portion of the passenger business of the Baltimore Division conducted over the part of that division lying between Baltimore and Parkton.

From what has already been said the rates charged to the general public must be reasonable, not, however, to the point of being confiscatory. But "the point of injustice is reached long before that of confiscation, and to make the word 'confiscatory' really appropriate it must be read not in the sense of producing actual confiscation, but of having an inevitable [77] tendency thereto." Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Philadelphia County, 220 Pa. St. 100, 68 Atl. 676, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 108. "Public service corporations are entitled to look to a rate of return, if their property will earn it, not less than the legal rate of interest, and a system of charges that yields no more income than is fairly requisite to maintain the plant, pay fixed charges and operating expenses, provide a suitable sinking fund for the payment of debts, and pay a fair profit to the owners of the property, cannot be said to be unreasonable. . . . While the public has certain rights which in case of conflict must prevail, yet it must not be forgotten that even so-called public service corporations are private property, organized and conducted for private, corporate profit. And unless necessary for the fulfillment of their corporate duties they should not be required to do any part of their business in an unbusiness-like way, with a resulting loss. If part is unprofitable, it is neither good business nor justice to make it more so because the loss can be offset by profit on the rest." Ibid.

This plainly follows for the reason stated in Boston, etc. R. Co. v. State, 77 N. H. 437, 93 Atl. 306, 310, where it is said: "Although the plaintiffs are common carriers, engaged in a public service, they are entitled to compensation for the service performed. Authority for requiring them to render service for less than fair compensation, if it exists, must be found in some preceding stipulation of the parties. It must be rested in contract, not upon the police power of the State."

Though less explicit, to the same effect will be found the decision in St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649, 15 S. Ct. 484, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 567.

The general principles applicable to a case of this character have already been stated, and the conclusion to be drawn from the evidence as to what is and what is not proved with regard to the confiscatory effect of the tariffs as embodied in the order of the Public Service Commission. The next step is as to the force and effect which should be given to the findings of the Commission, as contained in the order of December 21st, 1914. Analogy is sought to be drawn from the provision in the Interstate Commerce Act, which [78] provides that the findings of that commission are prima facie correct, and this has been recognized in a number of cases. Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 206 U. S. 142, 27 S. Ct. 648, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 995; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 200 U. S. 441, 27 S. Ct. 700, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 1128.

While this provision of the Interstate Commerce Act has no exact counterpart in the Public Service Commission Act of this State, the function of the courts, when called on to review an order of the Public Service Commission, was clearly and aptly stated by Judge Thomas, in Public Service Commission v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 122 Md. 388, 90 Atl. 105, where he said:

"Upon an application to the Court for an injunction restraining the execution of an order of the commission, the Court has no authority to determine what would be a reasonable rate for the service required, or to establish rates, but its power is limited to the determination of the question whether the rates fixed by the commission are unreasonable or unlawful, and until it is made to appear by clear and satisfactory evidence that the action of the commission is unreasonable or unlawful, the Court is without power to impose any restrictions upon the execution of the commission's order."

And the same view has been adopted in Wisconsin in Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Wisconsin Railroad Commission, 136 Wis. 146, 116 N. W. 905, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 821, and it is there stated that the function of the Court "is not to determine whether a rate or service fixed by it is reasonable and just, but to determine whether the order is unreasonable or unlawful. If the order be found by the Court to be such that reasonable men might well differ as to its correctness, it cannot be said to be unreasonable."

The whole duty, power and function of the Court in such cases was well summed up by Chief Justice White in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 215 U. S. 470, 30 S. Ct. 155, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 288, when he said:

"Beyond controversy, in determining whether an order of the commission shall be suspended or set aside, we must consider, (a) all relevant questions of constitutional power or right; (b) all pertinent questions as to whether the administrative [79] order is within the scope of the delegated authority under which it purports to have been made, and (c) a proposition which we state independently, although in its essence it may be contained in the previous one, viz., whether although the order be in form within the delegated power, nevertheless it must be treated as not embraced therein, because the exertion of authority which is questioned has been manifested in such an unreasonable manner as to cause it in truth to be within the elementary rule, that the substance and not the shadow determines the validity of the exercise of the power. Plain as it is that the powers just stated are of the essence of judicial authority, and which, therefore, may not be curtailed and whose discharge may not be by us in a proper case avoided, it is equally plain that such perennial powers lend no support whatever to the proposition that we may, under the guise of exerting judicial power, usurp merely administrative functions, by setting aside a lawful administrative order upon our conception as to whether the administrative power has been wisely exercised."

As already pointed out the increase in the passenger tariff, including straight fares and the return from commutation and mileage tickets is an uncertain quantity. It is perfectly evident that in the estimation of the railroad accounting officials an increase of revenue was expected to be derived under the tariff as proposed by them on November 25th, and if this estimate is correct, it necessarily follows that the revenue to be derived under the tariffs established by the order of the Public Service Commission of December 21st, must also bring an increase in revenue over that previously received. With the increase in straight fares the Public Service Commission has not attempted to deal, yet some portion of this when received, is properly to be apportioned to the receipts of the Baltimore Division and the effect will necessarily be to produce an increase in revenue derived from passenger traffic beyond that received for the last five years, other conditions remaining normal. The same is true with regard to commutation rates. It may turn out as the result [80] of the revision of these tariffs that there will be more monthly tickets sold and fewer of the one hundred trip tickets, but all of this is to a very considerable degree a matter of conjecture merely. The true test of the effect upon the revenue of the changes made must and can only be the test of time and practical experience. The bill in the present case was filed almost immediately upon the passage of the order by the Public Service Commission, and we are of opinion that before that order is disturbed by the Court it should be given the test of a practical trial. The most that the evidence gives us is the opinion of certain railway experts, and yet their evidence shows that they are far from having such complete data as to enable them to give anything more than an opinion. As was said by Woods, Justice, in Tilley v. Savannah, etc. R. Co. 5 Fed. 641, 662, in a case where the evidence had been conflicting or uncertain as to the probable remunerative effect of a new tariff, "which view is the correct one it is impossible to decide. There is, however, a conclusive way and one only in which this controversy can be settled and that is by experiment. A reduction in railroad charges is not always followed by a reduction of either gross or net income. It can soon be settled which is right, the railroad company's officers or the railroad commission, in their view of the effect of the Commission's tariff of rates by allowing the tariff to go into operation."

This view was cited with approval and adopted in the case of Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Dey, 38 Fed. 656, and again by the Supreme Court of Florida, in Pensacola, etc. R. Co. v. State, 25 Fla. 310, 5 So. 833, 3 L.R.A. 661; again in the case of Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co. 212 U. S. 1, 29 S. Ct. 148, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 371; Mr. Justice Moody concludes the opinion as follows: "The Courts in clear cases ought not to hesitate to arrest the operation of a confiscatory law, but they ought to refrain from interfering in cases of any other kind. If hereafter it shall appear under the actual operation of this ordinance (an ordinance fixing maximum water rates for the City of Knoxville) that the return allowed by it operates as a confiscation of property nothing in this judgment will prevent [81] another application to the Court, but as the case now stands there is no such certainty that the rates will necessarily have the effect of denying to the company such a return as would avoid confiscation." And in the case of Willecox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 19, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034, 29 S. Ct. 192, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1134, Mr. Justice Peckham, uses this language: "Where the rate complained of shows in any event a very narrow line of division between possible confiscation and proper regulation, a Court of Equity ought not to interfere by injunction before a fair trial has been made of continuing the business under that rate, and thus eliminating as far as is possible the doubt arising from opinions as opposed to facts."

In the case in which this opinion was rendered just as in the case now under consideration, the Court was asked to intervene before there had been any actual experience of the practical result of the rates established.

So in the present case the test of experience will soon make it clear whether the rate imposed by the order of the Public Service Commission can in any proper sense be termed confiscatory or compensatory; if the latter, no injunction ought to issue, while if not compensatory, beyond any doubt an injunction should be granted.

It was suggested in the argument that the effect of putting into operation the tariff established by the Commission would be to require a lowering of interstate tariffs as well; but this by no means follows, because the two services are radically different, and the one is by no means a conclusive measure for the other, and among the points decided by the Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, Ann. Cas. 1916A 18, 33 S. Ct. 729, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1511, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1151, were the following: 1st. That Congress has not by the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission sought to establish a unified control over interstate and intrastate rates; 2nd, that the fixing of reasonable rates for intrastate transportation was left with the States, and the agencies created by the States to deal with; and 3rd, that the inter-blending of operations in the conduct of interstate and local business, and the exigencies that are said to arise with respect to the maintenance of interstate rates by [82] reason of their relation to intrastate rates are considerations for the practical judgment of Congress. And in connection with this last point, it is to be observed that up to the present time Congress has not undertaken or seen fit to attempt to regulate or interfere with the establishment, maintenance or exercise of supervision over intrastate rates.

It was perhaps unfortunate that the Public Service Commission in its order used the following language: "That its said order of December 21st, 1914, shall continue in force for a period of ten years unless earlier modified or abrogated by the said commission." It certainly will not require ten years' time of practical experience under the tariff adopted by the commission to demonstrate whether the rates fixed are confiscatory or compensatory. And while it is true that the order expressly reserves the right to modify or abrogate the order of December 21st prior to the expiration of ten years, it would have been far better to have avoided even the impression of determining in advance the effect of a new scheme of rates for a definite period of time. Therefore, in affirming the decree of the Circuit Court, it will be with a reservation of the right of the railroad company, after the lapse of a reasonable time, to apply to the commission for a rescission or modification of its order, if experience shall demonstrate that the revenue derived under the tariff as established by the commission is not properly compensatory for the service performed.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

NOTE.

Validity of Order by Public Service Commission Regulating Commutation Rates.

The reported case sustains the power of a public service commission to establish a rate for commutation tickets different from and lower than that charged for regular single trip transportation. While no other case seems to have passed directly on the point, there is a considerable line of authority which seems to be inconsistent in principle with the reported case, maintaining the rule that a state legislature has no power to require the sale of mileage books at a reduced rate. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 19 S. Ct. 565, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 858, followed practically without discussion, in the following cases: State v. Bonneval, 128 La. 902, Ann. Cas. 1912C 837, 55 So. 569; Beardsley v. New York, etc. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 230, 56 N. E. 488; State v. Great Northern R. Co. 17 N. D. 370, 116 N. W. 89; Com. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 106 Va. 61, 9 Ann. Cas. 1124, 55 S. E. 572, 117 Am. St. Rep. 983, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1086. The case first cited is commented on at length in the reported case and its inconsistency with later holdings of the same court is pointed out. See to the same effect Reeder on Rate Regulation, p. 327.

In Sprigg v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 8 Int. Com. Rep. 443, the interstate commerce commission held that it was without power to compel the granting of commutation rates, the decision being however rendered before the enactment of the Hepburn Act (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 265) by which the rate-making power was given to the commission. The commissioners said: "The prayer of the petition in effect is that the carriers be directed to make special contract arrangements with certain residents of Baltimore and Washington, which shall secure to them, because they travel daily between those cities, very much lower rates than are paid by other passengers having less frequent occasion to make the same journey. The commission has no power to impose such a requirement. It would be beyond our jurisdiction to make the order asked for in this proceeding, even if satisfied of the justice and equity of complainants' demands. The theory and purpose of the law are opposed to privileges not enjoyed by all persons alike, and we have no authority to attempt the enforcement of special agreements for the benefits of a particular class. Under the provision in the 22d section above quoted, carriers are allowed to issue mileage, excursion and commutation tickets, but ordinarily they cannot be compelled to do so. The permission does not create an obligation. To the extent necessary for their use, tickets of the description named are exempt from the general rules of the statute. Compliance with those rules may be directed by us, but requiring exceptions there-to is not within our province; and this applies as well to the restoration of such tickets where they have been withdrawn as to the refusal to furnish them where their introduction has been requested." In Field v. Southern R. Co. 13 Int. Com. Rep. 298, the foregoing decision was followed. See in this connection, 8 Columbia Law Rev. 636, wherein the general subject of commutation tickets and rate regulation is discussed.

In the Commutation Rate Cases, 21 Int. Com. C. Rep. 428, however, it was held that the requirement of reasonableness applied to commutation rates, and that rates of that character stood on a distinct footing with respect to the conditions affecting their reasonableness. The commissioners said: "But it will not do to say that as section 1 cannot be enforced with respect to excursion and mileage book tickets it therefore has no application to commutation tickets. Nor does it follow, because the act provides that nothing therein shall prevent the issuance of commutation tickets, 'that no other provision of the act applies to such tickets, and that we are without power under section 1 to regulate the reasonableness of the fares demanded for such a service. Necessarily that must depend somewhat upon the character of the service. Unlike excursion traffic, commutation traffic is neither occasional nor sporadic, but on the contrary is characterized by an unusual regularity in volume; it may be accurately measured and provided for more readily than in the case of any other kind of passenger traffic. It is ordinarily constant, except as it may gradually grow in volume. Its stability is established by the juxtaposition of a community of homes and a community of workshops; and this separation of the place of residence from the place of work is in many cases the direct result of the efforts of the carrier. It has been encouraged, developed, and fostered by the carriers, and large and numerous suburban communities have grown up in the belief, not that some fare less than the normal full passenger fare would be demanded in the future, but in the belief, as heretofore stated, that no more than a just and reasonable fare would at any time be exacted, considering the special character of the traffic and of the service and the conditions that differentiate both the traffic and the service so completely and absolutely from all other kinds of passenger traffic and service. That it has been regarded as a different class of traffic conducted under entirely different conditions and a different kind of service is shown not only by the origin of commutation and the subsequent traditions that have accumulated with its growth but by the general recognition of it by the carriers themselves as an independent and a special service. Suburban communities have grown into existence on the theory voluntarily accepted by the carriers as well as by the public that one who makes daily use of an agency of transportation between his place of business and his home must necessarily be accorded a special and a low rate. This theory is firmly fixed in the history and traditions of transportation by rail and must therefore be regarded as embraced in the law under which such transportation is regulated." In Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Ketchum, 212 Fed. 986, it was said, obiter, in reference to the foregoing opinion: "This opinion has never been passed upon by the courts, but the reasoning of Mr. Commissioner Harlan is quite cogent and persuasive." See also Commutation Rate Case, 21 Int. Com. C. Rep. 428.

In Delaware, etc. R. Co. v. Board of Public Utilities Com'rs, 84 N. J. L. 619, 87 Atl. 801, a regulation respecting an existing commutation rate was sustained, the court saying: "It is further contended that the order before us is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution because it requires carriers to establish special rates for the service therein referred to, and, further, is invalid because it interferes with interstate commerce. But this contention is based upon a manifest misunderstanding of the scope of the order. It deals with existing conditions, viz., an existing commutation service and an existing special rate service. It does not require the carriers affected by it to establish special rates for a commutation service, or any other service, but merely requires the publication of the rates which are being charged for such service, and the filing of schedules thereof with the commission. If, after this is done, the respondent board shall attempt to regulate those rates, the question of its power to do so, which is the matter discussed by counsel for the appellant under this point, will become a living one, but until then it is merely academic."

HOCKING VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY

v.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION OF OHIO ET AL.

Ohio Supreme Court—March 16, 1915.

92 Ohio St. 9; 110 N. E. 521.

Carriers — Regulation by Public Service Commission — Requiring Particular Class of Service.

A provision, whether made by statute or order of a commission, which fixes rates for the carriage of passengers or freight by a railroad company is to be distinguished from an order which requires it to furnish a particular facility or perform a duty imposed by reason of the exercise of rights and franchises which it has acquired from the state; the fact that some loss would result from compliance with the latter does not in and of itself conclusively establish the unreasonableness of the order, but is an important element to be considered with all the other facts bearing on that question.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In a proceeding before the public utilities commission to compel a railroad company to continue, on a portion of its road, an interurban service which it has voluntarily established and maintained for many years, during which the personal and business relations of the people of the communities served, relying on the continuance of such service, have become adjusted thereto, the burden of showing a state of facts which justify the discontinuance of the service is on the company.

[See note at end of this case.]

Regulatory Power in General.

The franchises, rights and privileges of a railroad company are granted because of the public nature of the business carried on by it; the resulting benefits to the public constitute the consideration of the grant, and the company while exercising such rights and franchises is subject as to its state business to state regulation, either by direct statutory provision or by an administrative body authorized to act.

Requiring Particular Class of Service.

An order of the public utilities commission requiring a railroad company to continue an interurban service on a portion of its road, under the circumstances of this case, is not unlawful or unreasonable and is not a denial of due process of law or the equal protection of the laws or a taking of property without compensation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Review of Public Service Commission.

In the consideration of a petition in error filed in this court to reverse, vacate or modify an order of the public utilities commission on the ground that it is unlawful or unreasonable, the court will examine the entire record to determine whether a finding of facts made by the commission is so involved with and dependent on questions of law as to be in effect a decision of the latter.

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to Public Utilities Commission.

Complaint filed before Public Utilities Commission, by John E. Hayes et al., plaintiffs, against Hocking Valley Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. AFFIRMED.

[10] John E. Hayes and certain other citizens residing in the vicinity of Jackson and Wellston, in Jackson County, Ohio, filed their complaint before the public utilities commission. The petition sets forth in detail the interests and lines of business in which the different complainants respectively are engaged, each showing that his business is of such a character as to be closely related to and dependent upon the transportation facilities referred to thereafter in the complaint.

It is alleged that the defendant in the year 1896 established a line of railway between Hamden, in Vinton county, through the city of Wellston and the villages of Glen Roy and Coalton to the city of Jackson, in Jackson county, a distance of about fifteen miles, and placed in operation upon said line of railroad electric cars propelled by electric motor; that certain franchises were given by Wellston and Jackson to operate said cars over certain streets in said cities and that from about 1896 the company continued to operate electric cars between the points above referred to up to the time of the filing of the complaint, and was then doing [11] so; that said electric-car service is used by the complainants and the traveling public in general for means of transportation to and from their residences and places of business in said cities and villages and at numerous points at and near the line of service so established; that at all times since the date of establishment the company has maintained and operated a line of railway and the electric-car service, and that the general public, recognizing such service and with the full expectation and understanding that the same would be continued, has established residences and business places and occupations at various points along said line of electric-car service and expended large sums of money in establishing the same, and that the workmen employed in and about such places of business so established use the electric cars for transportation to and from their work.

It is alleged that the defendant had a schedule in operating electric cars on the railroad, that the company had given notice of its intention to discontinue the operation of electric cars and that if the service is discontinued it will leave the traveling public in the cities of Wellston and Jackson and in the villages of Glen Roy, Coalton and Hamden without sufficient and adequate service for the purpose of reaching their various places of business and residences.

In the answer it is admitted that the defendant has for some time maintained electric-car service for the transportation of persons and property; that on said line of railway, from Hamden through the towns named to Jackson, the defendant has [12] heretofore operated electric cars and that said electric car service has been used by the complainant and other persons; that the schedule set forth in the petition is the one upon which the cars were operated; that the defendant intends to discontinue the operation of said electric cars and the supplying of electricity for light and power purposes.

Further answering, it is alleged that in the spring of 1896 what was known as the Wellston and Jackson Belt Railway was completed and came under the supervision of the defendant. The defendant since said time has provided steam service on said road for handling freight and certain through passenger-train service between Jackson, Dundas and Logan, where connections were made with the main lines. At about said time electric service was introduced for the handling of local passenger traffic between Jackson and Wellston and was later extended to Hamden. About the year 1910 a marked falling off in the number of passengers carried on the electric lines was noticeable, due to the almost complete exhaustion of coal in the several mines adjacent to said line. Said decrease in patronage continued throughout the subsequent years and was augmented by the removal from Jackson county of large numbers of men formerly employed about the mines, and said electric service is operated solely for the convenience of a few commercial travelers or other people making trips to and from Wellston and Jackson; that steam service on said road will answer all requirements of the traffic; that the board of directors of defendant had resolved to discontinue the use of electric-car service [13] and to install a service of cars operated by steam to furnish facilities equal to that provided by the defendant on any other of its lines within the state; that the operation of said electric-car service for the last three or four years has resulted in a loss, and that electric service is not necessary and steam service is all that is required.

The cause was heard upon evidence by the commission and on June 24, 1914, the commission, after a finding of facts hereinafter set out, made the following order:

It is, therefore, ordered that defendant be and it is hereby notified, directed and required to establish and furnish the same interurban passenger service for the benefit and use of the public on its leased properties between Jackson and Hamden on the schedule for such service that was in effect at the time of the filing of this complaint, or upon some other schedule equally efficient.

These proceedings are brought to reverse this order of the commission.

Wilson & Rector for plaintiff in error.

Timothy S. Hogan, Joseph McGhee, Clarence D. Laylin, E. E. Eubanks and A. E. Jacobs for defendants in error.

JOHNSON, J.—The judicial article of the constitution, as recently amended, after defining the original and the appellate jurisdiction of this court, provides that it shall have “such revisory jurisdiction [14] of the proceedings of administrative officers as may be conferred by law.”

Section 33 of the act of April 18, 1913 (103 O. L. 804), to create the public utilities commission, provides in effect that such jurisdiction may be invoked by petition in error, and that a final order of the commission shall be reversed, vacated or modified if the court is of opinion that the order was unlawful and unreasonable. In order to give full validity to the proceedings and orders of the utilities commission, it was necessary that some adequate provision for their judicial review should be made; because if an administrative order results in the taking of property, such as the company claims results in this case, the defendant must not be denied the right to show that as matter of law the order was so arbitrary, unjust or unreasonable as to amount to a deprivation of property in violation of the constitution. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 10 S. Ct. 462, 702, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 970.

The legislature is not required to confine such revisory jurisdiction to this court, but would be authorized by Section 4 of Article IV. of the Constitution to confer it on the courts of common pleas. By the provisions of the public utilities act all of the powers of the public service commission are conferred on its successor. Full provision is made in Section 524 et seq. General Code, for notice to the defendant of the filing of the complaint and of the time and place of hearing. Full opportunity is given it to be heard and to show that the order asked for is unlawful or unreasonable. It has the benefit of compulsory process to [15] require the attendance of witnesses to testify under oath and to secure the production of documents. Provision is made for the taking of depositions and for a certified transcript of all the evidence, findings and orders. On petition in error here it leaves for consideration the contention that the record shows that the order of the commission was unlawful or unreasonable.

The court in Washington v. Fairchild, 224 U. S. 510, 528, 32 S. Ct. 535, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 863, 869, where a similar administrative order was under consideration, say: “This necessitates an examination of the evidence not for the purpose of passing on conflicts in the testimony or of dealing upon pure questions of fact, but, as said in Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. C. H. Albers Commission Co. 223 U. S. 573, 32 S. Ct. 316, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 556, from an inspection of the ‘entire record, including the evidence, if properly incorporated therein, to determine whether what purports to be a finding upon questions of fact is so involved with and dependent upon such questions of law as to be in substance and effect a decision of the latter.’”

Various grounds are set out in the petition in error in this case on which it is claimed that the orders complained of are unlawful and unreasonable. They are comprised in the contentions of the company hereinafter referred to. It is urged that the findings and orders are against the manifest weight of the evidence. The findings, as shown by the entry of the commission, are: That the defendant has, since 1896, operated electrically propelled cars and furnished an interurban passenger service to the public over its leased properties between [16] Jackson and Hamden, Ohio, a distance of about fifteen miles, and at the time of the filing of the complaint said service was being rendered substantially on the schedule set out therein; that by reason of the establishment and maintenance of said service by defendant large numbers of individuals, firms and corporation were influenced in the establishment, location, maintenance and operation of their business enterprises, and the personal and business relations of the various communities, individually and with each other, were and have become and are now adjusted to and in accordance with the service so furnished; that public convenience, welfare and necessity require that defendant continue to furnish the service; that the defendant has not shown that the furnishing of the service would entail any financial loss upon it or that the service has not been, or will not be, remunerative.

We have carefully examined all of the evidence and considered it in the light of the conflicting claims of the parties with reference to it, and we are not able to say that the findings of the commission are against the evidence.

It is clearly shown that during the eighteen years while the service was continued, the personal and business relations of the communities served became adjusted in the manner set forth.

It is conceded by counsel on both sides that the order made by the commission does not require that the interurban service be maintained by means of electricity. No particular motive power is made the criterion of compliance by the defendant with [17] the order of the commission. The question of motive power is thus left for the determination of the defendant itself. Therefore, the only question left relates to the validity of the order requiring the company to furnish interurban service. The defendant contends that the regular steam-train schedule between the points named will supply all the needs of the community and that to operate interurban service would be a source of constant and increasing financial loss to it. Its position is that it will have performed its duty when it shall install a service of cars which will furnish transportation facilities equal to that provided by it on any other of its lines in the state, and that the order of the commission requires the defendant to discriminate unlawfully and unreasonably in favor of the points named.

As to the sufficiency of the proposed substitute service, the witness Sellers, whose testimony disclosed that he was well acquainted with the entire situation, testified that it would depend on the nature of the service and whether the substituted service would make stops of the character that were made by the already established service. To the same effect was other evidence in the case.

It is important that an adequate conception should be had of the meaning of the term "interurban service." It is obvious that the commission used the term as meaning a service consisting of cars or trains which are run more frequently than any through steam-passenger service, and also a service in which frequent stops are made, so that [18] patrons need not walk far along the line to arrive at the nearest stopping place. Such a service is to be distinguished from the ordinary passenger trains of steam railroads in that the latter do not stop except at regular stations located in cities or villages, which are at intervals much greater than the stops which the evidence shows were made by the defendant on the portion of its line involved in this proceeding. The question is, therefore, presented whether, in view of the fact that the personal and business relations of these communities had become adjusted to the kind of transportation service known as interurban service as distinguished from ordinary steam service, all of which had been done by residents in those communities, who had relied upon the fact that the defendant had voluntarily entered the field and had offered to furnish and had furnished the particular service referred to, the defendant can now withdraw or discontinue the service, while still retaining its corporate franchises and rights, without itself assuming the burden of making a showing of facts which justify the withdrawal or discontinuance. It is a matter of common knowledge that the business and personal relations of the people of the country necessarily become adjusted to its transportation facilities, and that these constitute a very important factor in determining the direction and scope of the development of particular sections.

It is not shown that there is any special franchise provision or any contract by which the defendant expressly agreed to render the service in question. Therefore, the order of the commission must find [19] its validity, if at all, by reason of the fact that the defendant is a public utility, incorporated and organized under the laws of the state, and that while exercising the rights and privileges accruing to it as such, it has by its acts and conduct created the situation found by the commission to exist; and that from this situation a duty is imposed upon it which it cannot disregard in the absence of such a showing on its part as above indicated.

It is well established that the benefits which result to the public constitute the consideration for the grant by the state of the franchises, rights and privileges held and exercised by a railroad company, and that their acceptance by the company imposes on it the obligation to operate the railroad which it was incorporated to construct, when constructed, and of doing so in the manner and for the purposes contemplated in its charter. One of the obligations thus imposed is to so operate its trains that they will reasonably serve the needs of the public.

The court in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, 206 U. S. 1, 11 Ann. Cas. 398, 27 S. Ct. 585, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 933, said: "The elementary proposition that railroads from the public nature of the business by them carried on and the interest which the public have in their operation are subject, as to their state business, to state regulation, which may be exerted either directly by the legislative authority or by administrative bodies endowed with power to that end, is not and could not be successfully questioned in view of the long line of authorities sustaining that doctrine."

[20] In Gates v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 53 Conn. 342, 5 Atl. 695, it is said: "It is true that the charter is permissive in its terms, and properly no obligation rests upon the corporation to construct the railroad . . . when that option has been made, and the corporation . . . has commenced to operate the road under the granted powers, thereby inducing the public to rely, in their personal and business relations, upon that state of affairs; by so accepting and acting upon the chartered powers a contract exists to carry into full effect the objects of the charter. . . . Having exercised these powers the corporation has no right against the will of the state to abandon the enterprise."

The defendant, however, contends substantially that in spite of the state of facts shown in the record, as to the adjustment of the community relations to the service, the conditions in the communities had so changed at the time the complaint was filed that the present needs do not require that the service be maintained; that electric service, considered as a separate operation, is conducted at a loss and that the enforced continuance of the service would be a discrimination against other communities served by the defendant which would not enjoy similar advantages. Defendant offered testimony tending to show that it would be necessary to install new equipment at considerable expense, which could be operated only at a loss if it is required to continue the electric service.

So far as the matter of the electric service is concerned, that is eliminated by the concessions of [21] counsel on both sides that such service is not required by the order of the commission. So far as the changed conditions and the lessening demands are concerned, the witness Connors, called by the defendant, testified that there had been a decrease in the number of passengers, but was not able to give the extent to which this had gone. He stated that it was true, in a general way, but said "I haven't the figures, but if estimates will answer I can give an estimate, if not I will get the figures." It was then suggested by a member of the commission, which suggestion was agreed to by the witness, that a detailed statement showing the condition in relation to the traffic, which would disclose the facts with reference to the matter testified to by the witness, should be produced. Counsel for the commission state in their brief and at the bar that the statement was never furnished and that the general statement by Mr. Connors was all the testimony touching the subject, and we find no denial of that statement in the brief of opposite counsel. We have not found in the record anything to contradict this claim.

It is undoubtedly true that the question whether or not the interurban service is a paying service should be considered with respect to its bearing on the question whether the public necessities require such service. The presumption is that where there is such a condition and such demand for the service as to amount to public necessity, the rendering of the service would not result in loss. The finding of the commission was that the defendant had not shown that the furnishing of the service will entail [22] loss upon it, and the finding was that the public convenience, welfare and necessity require the continuance of the service.

Much testimony was offered touching this question, and, as already indicated, we are not able to say from an analysis of it that the finding of the commission was not sustained by the evidence.

Under the state of facts shown by the testimony and found by the commission the presumption is that there is a present necessity for the continuance of the service which has been in existence for about eighteen years, in the absence of a showing by the defendant to the contrary.

In Colorado, etc. R. Co. v. State R. Commission, 54 Colo. 64, 120 Pac. 506, the company discontinued the service over a certain division, about sixteen miles in length, on the ground that because of heavy grades and curves operation of trains was attended with severe loss. On the other hand, it appeared that deprivation of this service inflicted greater loss on the people of the community affected. On this point the court say: "At the time it purchased the South Park System it purchased other lines. . . . It has not surrendered its franchise, and continues in the enjoyment of all its corporate rights. It does not claim that the service ordered [by the commission] is more than sufficient to accommodate the traffic between Denver and Leadville. In such circumstances, the question of loss must be considered in connection with its duties and the productiveness of its corporate business as a whole." At page 94 of the opinion it is [23] said: "Of course, that a service ordered will entail a loss is a circumstance to consider in determining the reasonableness of the order; but a common carrier cannot successfully complain that a loss will thus be occasioned when it appears that the ordered service requires nothing more than necessary transportation facilities."

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, supra, the carrier was ordered by the commission to arrange its schedule so that one of its passenger trains would make connections with a certain passenger train on another line at a given point. The company contended that on account of other connections made by the train in question that train could not be operated so as to make the required connection, and that thus the order would require the operation of an additional train. The company objected to this on the ground that the public convenience did not require the additional facility and, second, that it would entail a daily pecuniary loss.

It will be observed that in that case the requirement was that facilities additional to those already in existence be furnished, while here the order requires the maintenance of existing service or its equivalent. The court sustained the commission and held that its order was not inherently unjust and unreasonable because the running of such train would impose some pecuniary loss on the company.

Mr. Justice White said: "This proposition is based on the hypothesis that the order, by necessary [24] intendment, directed the Coast Line to operate an additional train, although such train could not be operated without a daily pecuniary loss. . . . The contention is that the fact that some loss would result from the requirement that the extra train be operated, in and of itself, conclusively establishes the unreasonableness of the order."

After conceding that if a scheme of maximum rates was imposed by state authority, as a whole adequately remunerative, and yet that some of such rates were so unequal as to exceed the flexible limit of judgment which belongs to the power to fix rates, that is, transcended the limits of just classification and amounted to the creation of favored class or classes whom the carrier was compelled to serve at a loss, to the detriment of other class or classes upon whom the burden of such loss would fall, such legislation would be so inherently unreasonable as to constitute a violation of the due-process and equal-protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment, the court further say: "Let it also be conceded that a like repugnancy to the constitution of the United States would arise from an order made in the exercise of the power to fix a rate when the result of the enforcement of such order would be to compel a carrier to serve for a wholly inadequate compensation a class or classes selected for legislative favor even if, considering rates as a whole a reasonable return from the operation of its road might be received by the carrier. Neither of these concessions, however, can control the case in hand, since it does not directly [25] involve any question whatever of the power to fix rates . . . but is concerned solely with an order directing a carrier to furnish a facility which it is a part of its general duty to furnish for the public convenience. The distinction between an order relating to such a subject and an order fixing rates . . . is apparent. This is so because as the primal duty of a carrier is to furnish adequate facilities to the public, that duty may well be compelled, although by doing so as an incident some pecuniary loss from rendering such service may result. It follows, therefore, that the mere incurring of a loss from the performance of such a duty does not in and of itself necessarily give rise to the conclusion of unreasonableness. . . . Of course, the fact that the furnishing of a necessary facility ordered may occasion an incidental pecuniary loss is an important criteria to be taken into view in determining the reasonableness of the order, but it is not the only one. As the duty to furnish necessary facilities is coterminous with the powers of the corporation, the obligation to discharge that duty must be considered in connection with the nature and productiveness of the corporate business as a whole, the character of the services required, and the public need for its performance."

In Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 30 S. Ct. 330, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 472, the principle announced in the Atlantic Coast Line case was reaffirmed. The Missouri Pacific case involved an order which directed the railroad company to run a regular passenger [26] train over its line instead of a mixed passenger and freight train. The company objected that the service could not be rendered without a loss. The court say: "When the controversy here presented is properly analyzed, the first and pivotal question arising is whether the order complained of did anything more than command the railroad company to perform a service which it was incumbent upon it to perform as the necessary result of the possession and enjoyment of its charter powers." It was also held that the order was not, even if such train is run at a loss, a deprivation of property without due process of law or a taking of property for public use without compensation, nor was such an order an unreasonable exercise of governmental control.

It must not be overlooked that a requirement, whether made by a statute or by the order of a commission, which denies a railroad company proper compensation for the carriage of passengers or freight, is entirely different from an order which compels the railroad company to perform duties to the public which are imposed upon it by reason of its exercise of the franchise, rights and privileges which it has acquired from the state.

We think it must be conceded that in a case of this character it would not be necessary for the defendant, in order to justify a withdrawal of the service, to show that such a service entails a pecuniary loss upon its railroad operated as a whole. There is a distinction between withdrawal from a service of this character and from such a [27] service as is offered to all other communities served by the carrier. Where there is a special service, such as the interurban service involved in this case, the loss, if it were shown on the particular operation, is entitled to consideration in the manner above indicated.

We are not constrained to think, however, that this rule should have conclusive effect in connection with the facts shown in this case. Here the public needs were created and grew up in view of the voluntary action of the defendant itself. The finding of the commission is that the public necessity still exists. An unusual and abnormal situation was developed under the lead of the defendant. The moving by the people away from central points to places scattered along the line of the defendant, and all of the things pointed out in the testimony and the findings, being done while the people relied upon the continuance of the voluntary service by the defendant, present a situation which clearly estops it from invoking the rule above stated.

Counsel for the railroad company urge that the case of Delaware, etc. R. Co. v. Van Santwood, 216 Fed. 252, declares the principles which should rule this case. It was there held that where a railroad company discontinued two trains a day each way and was ordered by the service commission to restore them, and it appeared that the people residing in the terminal cities were amply served without it, the question of the right of the commission to order the trains restored depended on whether the convenience and [28] necessities of the residents of certain small intervening towns demanded the restoration and operation of the trains in question, and that where two steam trains a day each way were run, which reasonably served the convenience and supplied the reasonable necessities of four small intervening points, the residents of which also had the convenience of a through interurban trolley line, complainant would be considered as having performed its whole duty to the public and could not be compelled by the public service commission to operate two trains over the road each way per day at a net loss of over $3,000 per annum. After showing that a number of trains were run each day between the points named in the complaint, the gross receipts of each day and the existence of a trolley line between some of the points, the court recites the gross revenues of the defendant prior to the existence of the trolley line. It is said in the opinion: "It seems to me that when steam trains enough are run between the city of Oswego and the city of Syracuse to accommodate and serve the necessities of the people of those cities and the intervening city of Fulton, and two steam trains per day each way are run which reasonably serve the convenience and supply the reasonable necessities of the four small intervening points, and these people also have the convenience of the trolley line as described, the complainant has performed its whole duty to the public."

We think that the situation in this case is so substantially different from the situation described [29] by the court in the case referred to as to clearly distinguish it.

The order complained of will be affirmed.

Order affirmed.

NOTE.

Power of Public Service Commission to Compel Carrier to Furnish Particular Class of Service.

It is thoroughly established that a state may, either directly by legislative action or by a public service commission to which the power is delegated, compel a railroad to furnish service reasonably adequate to the needs of the portion of the public residing in the territory adjacent to its line. To that end the furnishing of needed facilities may be required and the character and extent of the service may be regulated. Thus the maintenance of depots may be required (see Southern R. Co. v. State, Ann. Cas. 1912A 225) and their location prescribed (see the note to Vicksburg, etc. R. Co. v. Louisiana Railroad Commission, Ann. Cas. 1914C 1168). Two railroad companies may be required to make a physical connection of their tracks (see the note to Pacific Telephone, etc. Co. v. Esheleman, Ann. Cas. 1915C 822), and to make train connections at meeting points (see the note to Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, 11 Ann. Cas. 398). The running time of trains may be regulated (see the note to Northern R. Co. v. Laird, Ann. Cas. 1916D 1030) and the stopping places within the limits of a municipality prescribed (see the notes to Excelsior v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 17 Ann. Cas. 350, and Camden v. Public Service R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914D 1090). The extent of the train service which shall be rendered to a particular station is likewise a proper subject of regulation. See the note In re Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. reported, post, this volume, at page 1217.

The reported case presents a somewhat unique application of this established regulatory power, holding that a railroad company may be compelled to continue an interurban service if such a service is reasonably necessary to the welfare of a community which has been built up in part by reason of the facility of travel thus afforded. In a similar case at the same term, Adena R. Co. v. Ohio Public Service Commission, 92 Ohio St. 1, 110 N. E. 631, another unique application of the same principle was made, the court holding that a railroad engaged wholly in freight traffic could be compelled to provide passenger service if the needs of the community required such a service. The principle applied in that case was well stated in Colorado, etc. R. Co. v. State R. Commission, 54 Colo. 64, 129 Pac. 506, wherein an order requiring the restoration of train service on a branch on which service had been abandoned, was sustained, the court saying: "The consideration for the franchise, rights and privileges granted a railroad company by a state is the resulting benefits to the public, and the acceptance by the company, generally speaking, imposes upon it the obligation to operate, when constructed, the railroad it was incorporated to construct, and of doing so in the manner and for the purpose contemplated by its charter." In Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 30 S. Ct. 330, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 472, in sustaining an order requiring a passenger service on a certain railroad branch in lieu of a previous mixed train service, the court said: "It may not be doubted that the road by virtue of the charter under which the branch was built was obliged to carry passengers and freight, and therefore as long as it enjoyed its charter rights was under the inherent obligation to afford a service for the carrying of passengers. In substance this was all the order commanded, since it was confined to directing that the road put on a train for passenger service. True it is that the road was carrying passengers in a mixed train, that is, by attaching a passenger coach to one of its freight trains. Testing the alleged unreasonableness of the order in the light of the inherent duty resting upon the corporation, it follows that the contention must rest upon the assumption that the discharge of the corporate duty to carry passengers was so completely performed by carrying them on a mixed train as to cause an order directing the running of a passenger train to be so arbitrary and unreasonable as to deprive of rights protected by the Constitution of the United States. But when the necessary result of the contention is thus defined its want of merit is, we think, self-evident, unless it can be said as a matter of law that there is such an identity as to public convenience, comfort and safety between travel on a passenger service train and travel on a mixed train—that is, a train composed of freight cars with a passenger car attached—as to cause any exertion of legislative authority for the public welfare based on a distinction between the two to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The demonstration as to the want of foundation for such a contention might well be left to the consensus of opinion of mankind to the contrary." See to the same effect People v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 176 Ill. 512, 52 N. E. 292, 35 L.R.A. 656.

In Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 75 W. Va. 100, 83 S. E. 286, it appeared that a railroad company having constructed a branch line operated it for freight traffic only. Sustaining an order requiring the establishment of passenger service the court said: "Evidently, the branch line was constructed under the provisions of § 2983, Code 1913, authorizing the building of lateral lines. The company intended the line to Ansted chiefly for the haulage of freight, and not for the transportation of passengers. But the purpose then contemplated avails not as an excuse for avoiding duties imposed by law upon common carriers. When built, the line became an integral part of the extensive Chesapeake & Ohio system, and must be treated and controlled as such, and not merely as a segregated part of it; for ch. 9, Acts 1913, clearly evinces an intention on the part of the legislature, through the commission, to control both main and lateral lines, whether operated under the same or different management or ownership. What, then, did the legislature intend when it required the establishment and maintenance of adequate and suitable facilities and the performance of reasonable, safe and sufficient railroad service? Surely, one important purpose was to secure adequate facilities and conveniences for serving the public. Failure or refusal of the company to perform any service, or to provide the facilities therefor, cannot be deemed adequate, reasonable or sufficient. To be adequate, the service and facilities must be commensurate with the duties to be performed, the extent of the demand for transportation, the cost and returns of the additional service when properly ascertained and found to be consonant with the various other circumstances and conditions under which performance is required. That such conditions exist, necessitating the additional service, is obvious."

While the service which a railroad company may be compelled to furnish is coextensive with its duty as a common carrier it does not extend beyond the limits of that duty. Hence a railroad company may not be required to establish at its stations a commercial telegraph service for the accommodation of the public. Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. State, 18 Ann. Cas. 102, and note. See also Moody v. Denver, etc. R. Co. 17 N. M. 686, 132 Pac. 250, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 974.

BOWEN

v.

DAUGHERTY ET AL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—February 17, 1915.

168 N. Car. 242; 84 S. E. 265.

Husband and Wife — Liability of Husband for Wife's Funeral Expenses.

At common law a husband is liable for the funeral expenses of his deceased wife and for necessities furnished to her during their married life, including the cost of clothing, food, ordinary household supplies, medical attendance, expenses of sickness, and articles of comfort suitable to the condition and style in which the parties were accustomed to live.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

At common law neither a wife nor her estate is liable for necessities furnished to her or for her funeral expenses, though courts at times enforce such claims against her estate on equitable principles.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Laws 1911, c. 109, authorizing a married woman to contract as if she were unmarried, a married woman or her estate after her death is liable for her express contract, or in the common counts in assumpsit when goods are furnished on her credit, but where there is no express promise by a wife or circumstances showing that the expenses of her last sickness and her funeral expenses were furnished on her credit, or that of her estate, the husband is primarily liable therefor, and the estate of the wife cannot be charged with claims for such expenses if they can be collected from the husband.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Revisal 1905, § 87, providing for the order of the payment of claims against the estate of a decedent, was designed only to fix the order of such payment, and does not render a married woman's estate liable for necessities furnished during her last sickness and for her funeral expenses, which otherwise would be a debt of the husband.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington county: BOND, Judge.

Action by G. W. Bowen, administrator of Deborah Stocks, plaintiff, against E. L. Daugherty et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. REVERSED.

[242] Petition to sell land for assets, instituted before the clerk Superior Court and transferred to civil-issue docket on denial of any and all indebtedness.

[243] On the hearing it was properly made to appear that Mrs. Deborah Stocks, formerly the wife of John Stocks, died intestate, December, 1913, leaving a tract of land and very little or no personal property, and the petitioner, G. W. Bowen, duly qualified as administrator and instituted present proceedings to sell her land for assets to pay debts; that claims had been presented amounting to more than $300, consisting of funeral and burial expenses, tombstone, doctor's bills and nursing during her last illness, the latter part of 1913, from September to 31 December.

"Third. That all of the said accounts were made since an act was passed giving married women the right to contract and were made between September, 1913, and 31 December, 1913, the period covered by the last illness of the said Mrs. Stocks.

"Fourth. That at the time of the death of Mrs. Stocks and during the time that said accounts were contracted the said Mrs. Stocks and her husband were living together as man and wife, and the said Mrs. Stocks was at home during said period.

"Fifth. John Stocks, husband of Deborah Stocks, died shortly after the death of Deborah Stocks, leaving a last will and testament by which he devised and bequeathed all of his property to Mrs. Kitty Brown (one of the claimants) for life, and after her death to the children of Mrs. Kitty Brown, and appointed Mrs. Kittie Brown executrix, and that the said Mrs. Kitty Brown had duly qualified as executrix of said will.

"Sixth. That Mrs. Deborah Stocks did not leave sufficient personal property to pay the claims above referred to, but did leave sufficient real estate, if her estate is liable therefor.

"Seventh. That John Stocks, her husband, left sufficient property to pay all of the above claims, if they are properly chargeable against his estate, in addition to all other debts of his estate.

"Eighth. That all of the items in all of the above claims were necessary to the comfort, the proper care and proper apparel of the deceased lady, and the amount due the two Mrs. Browns, if anything, for nursing, were also necessary for the comfort and proper care of the said Mrs. Stocks during her illness.

"Ninth. That Mrs. Deborah Stocks left no children, but did leave sisters, nephews, and nieces, all of whom have been properly made parties defendant to this proceeding.

"Tenth. That there was no evidence of any express contract on the part of Mrs. Stocks for any of the supplies, etc., or medical attention, etc., nursing, etc., represented by the claims filed."

On these facts, the court below being of opinion that the real estate of the deceased wife was liable, there was verdict establishing indebtedness and judgment directing that the clerk proceed accordingly in the proper administration of the estate.

Defendants, having duly excepted, appealed.

Rouse & Land and E. R. Wooten for appellants.

Louis W. Gaylord for appellee.

[244] HOKE, J. (after stating the case).— At common law the husband was liable for the funeral expenses of his deceased wife and for "necessaries" during their married life; the term including "the cost of clothing, food, ordinary household supplies, medical attendance, expenses of sickness, etc., as well as articles of comfort suitable to the condition and style in which the parties were accustomed to live." Smyley v. Rees, 53 Ala. 89, 25 Am. Rep. 598; Ketterer v. Nelson, 146 Ky. 7, 141 S. W. 409, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 754; Waesch's Estate, 166 Pa. St. 204, 30 Atl. 1124; Cunningham v. Irwin, 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 247, 10 Am. Dec. 458; Sears v. Giddey, 41 Mich. 590, 2 N. W. 917, 32 Am. Rep. 168; Stonesifer v. Shriver, 100 Md. 24, 59 Atl. 139, 21 Cyc. pp. 1219-1224.

As a general rule, neither the wife nor her estate was legally liable for such claims, though courts, empowered to administer her estate on equitable principles, have enforced them in certain instances (In re McMyn, 33 Ch. D. (Eng.) 575), a position which has been allowed to obtain, in this country, where the husband has failed to pay and, being insolvent, payment from him or his estate could not be enforced. Carpenter v. Hazelrigg, 103 Ky. 538, 45 S. W. 666; Gould v. Moulahan, 53 N. J. Eq. 341, 33 Atl. 483; Fogg v. Holbrook, 88 Me. 169, 33 Atl. 792, 33 L.R.A. 660 and note.

This being the law formerly existent here, the Legislature enacted the statute known as the Martin act (ch. 109, Laws 1911) and which provided, in effect, that except in conveyances of her real estate and in case of contracts with her husband, a married woman was authorized to contract and deal as if she were unmarried; and it is chiefly contended that, under and by virtue of the provision of this statute, the wife and her estate have become absolutely and primarily liable for the claims filed in this proceeding.

The law having removed the inability of married women, in ordinary instances, to bind themselves by contract, they can be held liable under their express agreement and when the goods are sold to them on their credit. This was held in Lipinsky v. Revell, 167 N. C. 508, 83 S. E. 820, and undoubtedly in proper instances married women may now be held liable in the common counts in assumpsit. Hinkson v. Williams, 41 N. J. L. 35; Ackley v. Westervelt, 86 N. Y. 448; Stewart on Husband and Wife, secs. 375 and 381. But, in the absence of such express promise and of any evidence tending to show that credit was given to her or of any facts or circumstances to make her exclusively or primarily liable under the general equitable principles of indebitatus assumpsit, we see no reason, before or since the statute, why a debt of the husband should be imputed to the wife. True, the general rule is that when goods are supplied or services rendered by one person for another, the law implies [245] a promise to pay what they are reasonably worth: but the principle, in our opinion, should not control when the goods were acquired or services rendered under circumstances which created a recognized liability in some one else. In such case there should be additional proof showing an express promise, or, as stated, facts and circumstances bringing the demand under the equitable principles of indebitatus assumpsit. This, we think, is the correct view as to the effect of the statute in such cases, and the position is in accord with authoritative decisions on the subject in other States. Moore v. Copley, 165 Pa. St. 294, 30 Atl. 829, 44 Am. St. Rep. 664; Nelson v. Spaulding, 11 Ind. App. 453, 39 N. E. 168; Nelson v. O'Neal, 11 Ind. App. 296, 39 N. E. 207; Wilson v. Herbert, 41 N. J. L. 454, 32 Am. Rep. 243.

We are aware of a number of decisions, and by courts of eminent ability and learning, to the effect that the estate of the deceased wife is primarily liable on claims of this kind by reason of their statutes as to the proper administration of estates, and which provide, in differing terms, that debts for funeral expenses, medical bills, and services within a stated period, etc., shall be paid, etc. In re Skillman, 146 Ia. 601, 125 N. W. 343, 140 Am. St. Rep. 295; Schneider v. Breier, 129 Wis. 446, 109 N. W. 99, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 917; Constantinides v. Walsh, 146 Mass. 281, 15 N. E. 631, 4 Am. St. Rep. 311; McClellan v. Filson, 44 Ohio St. 184, 5 N. E. 861, 58 Am. Rep. 814.

It may be that, owing to special phraseology of these statutes, a position of that kind can be upheld, but, so far as our own enactment is concerned (Revisal 1905, sec. 87), we do not hesitate to hold that the statute is only designed to recognize priorities and to establish the order of payment as between claimants who have valid debts against the estate, and was never intended by the law-makers to create a liability which did not otherwise exist.

As heretofore stated, if the husband, liable for indebtedness of this kind, should fail to pay, or, his estate being insolvent, payment could not be enforced, authority is to the effect that an equity might arise to the creditor enabling him to collect from the wife's estate; but otherwise, and except under conditions formerly referred to, the debt is and continues to be that of the husband and enforceable against him or his estate.

From the case on appeal it appears that all of these claims are for funeral expenses or for necessities, and that these last were supplied to the wife when she was living with her husband and without any express promise on her part to pay for same, and, further, that the husband died shortly after the wife, leaving an estate sufficient to pay all of his debts, including those involved in this proceeding, and that he devised his property to Kitty Brown for life and, after her death, to her children, she being one of the principle claimants against the wife's estate. Applying the principles, as above stated, we are of opinion that there was error in holding the wife's estate liable, and the judgment to that effect must be

Reversed.

[246] CLARK, C. J. (concurring).—The statute, ch. 109, Laws, 1911, known as the "Martin act," in no wise enlarges or restricts the common-law liability of the husband for the support of his wife.

While that statute authorizes a married woman to contract and deal as if she were unmarried, and while chapter 13, Laws 1913, authorizes her to receive and collect her earnings and damages for wrongs done her, either to her person or property, neither of these acts relieves her husband of his common-law liability for her support nor renders her liable therefor except in such cases as she shall have contracted obligations upon her own responsibility.

The husband does not become liable as surety for his wife's contracts, nor responsible for debts contracted by her, except for her support, as above stated. And she is not made responsible for articles bought for such support except where by contract, express or by her conduct she leads the seller reasonably to understand that she is assuming individual responsibility. In the latter case the husband would still remain liable, and the seller can recover against either or both.

Brown, J., did not participate in the decision of this case.

Liability of Husband for Wife's Funeral Expenses.

Introductory, 1164.

General Rule, 1164.

Modification of Rule, 1166.

Introductory.

With the disappearance of the common-law conception of the merger of husband and wife into one legal entity, the relative rights and liabilities of husband and wife have in many instances undergone a change. This is to some extent true of the common-law doctrine that the husband is liable for the payment of his wife's funeral expenses. Some jurisdictions have adhered to this doctrine without change, while others have departed from it in varying degrees. The present note purports to review the recent cases passing on the question. For a collection of earlier cases on the same subject see the notes to Kenyon

v. Brightwell, 1 Ann. Cas. 172, and Wana-maker v. Weaver, 98 Am. St. Rep. 621, 639.

The closely related subject of the liability of the estate of a deceased married woman for a tombstone or monument erected over her grave is treated in the note to Matter of Estate of Lester, reported, ante, this volume, at page 267.

General Rule.

The reported case follows the common-law rule that a husband is liable for his wife's funeral expenses. To substantially the same effect see the following cases:

England.—Ambrose v. Kerrison, 10 C. B. 776, 70 E. C. L. 776, 20 L. J. C. Pl. 135.

Indiana.—Scott v. Carothers, 17 Ind. App. 673, 47 N. E. 389.

Kentucky.—Brand v. Brand, 109 Ky. 721, 60 S. W. 704, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1366; Ketterer v. Nelson, 146 Ky. 7, 141 S. W. 409, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 754; Long v. Beard, 48 S. W. 158, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1036. Compare Towery v. McGaw, 56 S. W. 727, 982, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 155; Carpenter v. Hazelrigg, 103 Ky. 538, 45 S. W. 666, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 231.

Maryland.—Stonesifer v. Shriver, 100 Md. 24, 59 Atl. 139.

Michigan.—Stone v. Tyack, 164 Mich. 550, 129 N. W. 694.

New Jersey.—Gould v. Moulahan, 53 N. J. Eq. 341, 33 Atl. 483.

Ohio.—Humphrey v. Huff, 35 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 117.

In Stonesifer v. Shriver, 100 Md. 24, 59 Atl. 139, the court said: "But we must also indicate to the orphans' court our views upon the chief subject of contention, being the allowance to the husband as executor for the sums paid by him for his wife's medical attendance, funeral expenses, and tombstone. In overruling the objections to these allowances, the court was in error. The question in this state is not an open one, this court having decided in Willis v. Jones, 57 Md. 368, that 'the husband is chargeable with funeral expenses of the wife, and is bound to pay them, but they constitute no charge upon her separate estate.' At common law the legal existence and identity of the wife was merged in that of the husband who became entitled to hold and to reduce into his possession all her personal estate, and as a consequence the law cast upon him the duty of supplying her with necessities suitable to their station in life. The duty of a husband to bury his wife in a suitable manner is involved in the obligation to maintain her while living, and rests also upon a due regard for the decencies of life, and the health of the public. It has been generally held where the subject has been considered by the courts of this country that statutes creating the wife's statutory estate do not absolve the husband from his common-law obligation to provide suitable burial for the wife, and that he is not entitled to any credit on the settlement of his administration of her estate for such expenditures. Smyley v. Reese, 53 Ala. 89; Sears v. Giddey, 41 Mich. 590; Staples Appeal, 52 Conn. 425; In re Weringer, 100 Cal. 345. Rhode Island and Ohio, upon a verbal construction of the language of their respective statutes, hold that a husband who administers upon his wife's estate is entitled to be allowed for reasonable funeral expenses. Moulton v. Smith, 16 R. I. 126; McClellan v. Filson, 44 Ohio St. 184. The present Massachusetts statute, carefully framed, expressly declares the husband to be so entitled. Constantinides v. Walsh, 146 Mass. 281. But before that enactment, an earlier case, Cunningham v. Reardon, 98 Mass. 538, held otherwise. In Gregory v. Lockyer, 6 Madd. (Eng.) 90, such an allowance was made, but that decision does not seem to have been followed in England, nor to have been accepted in this country except in Rhode Island and Ohio. Our own Code, art. 45, § 20, provides that 'nothing in that article shall be construed to relieve the husband from liability for necessities for the wife, or for his or their children, but that as to all such cases, his liability shall be or continue as at common law,' and this reservation we think forbids us to question the decision in Willis v. Jones, supra. If a tombstone be regarded as part of a suitable burial, according to the station of the parties in life, it comes directly within the principle of necessities as applicable to ordinary funeral expenses. If it cannot be so regarded, the husband in providing it does so at the risk of objection by her distributees, and in such a case, not being a debt of the wife's, nor in any manner a charge upon her estate, it can only be regarded as a tribute, or gift, by him to her memory."

In the case of Re Sea, 11 British Columbia 324, that court emphatically affirmed the liability of the husband to pay the wife's funeral expenses and his inability to claim reimbursement from his wife's estate. In that case it was said: "The husband's duty to bury his dead wife at his own charge is neither based upon nor incidental to his marital proprietary right. It is founded in the marital relation itself. Its true correlative is his right to nominate the place of his wife's burial and to prescribe the manner of her obsequies. The Married Woman's Property Acts do not expressly or by necessary implication deal with this obligation; nor do they affect the marriage status. I am therefore unable to agree with the view tentatively advanced by Mr. Lush in his book on 'Husband and Wife' (which is also the view held by so distinguished a jurist as Mr. Justice Holmes respecting the effect of the paralled legislation of the state of Massachusetts), that the reduction of the jus mariti effected by these acts involves the relief of the husband from the burden of this last act of piety and charity. Such an interpretation would, in my judgment, be legislative in its character. With respect to the weighty authority of Mr. Justice Holmes' opinion—one may observe that eminent American judges, in the application of legislative enactments, do permit themselves a latitude of interpretation which a Canadian court would not feel itself free to exercise. It is equally clear that there is no right of indemnity out of the wife's estate." To the same effect see Re Montgomery, 20 Manitoba 444, 17 West L. Rep. 77.

In Ketterer v. Nelson, 146 Ky. 7, 141 S. W. 409, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 754, the rule was laid down that the husband was primarily liable for the funeral expenses of his deceased wife, the court at the same time reviewing and reconciling the other decisions in Kentucky previously passing on this question. The court said: "Appellant's claim to be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the property for the wife's physician and nurse bills and burial expenses cannot be sustained, these items being demands in the nature of necessities for the wife for which he was primarily liable. We do not think the case of Carpenter v. Hazelrigg, 103 Ky. 538, relied on by appellant militates against this conclusion. It is true the wife's physician's bill and funeral expenses were in that case ordered to be paid out of the proceeds of her land, but it was because the husband had failed to pay them. In the opinion it is said: 'Whilst the husband is bound in law to pay the necessary physician's bill for his wife and her funeral expenses, yet if the husband fail to pay them, her estate is liable therefor. The husband seems to have failed to pay them and it was not error for the court to order the land sold subject to the husband's curtesy right to pay these expenses. If the land is sold to pay them, the husband can be compelled by appropriate proceedings to reimburse those to whom her estate descends.' Appellant also relies upon the case of Towery v. McGaw, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 155, in which it was held that the wife's personality should first be subjected to the payment of funeral expenses, but also held that medical services and the care of the wife were necessities within the meaning of the statute providing that the husband shall be liable for necessities furnished the wife. The holding that the wife's personality should be subjected to the payment of funeral expenses seems to have been based upon the ground that the bills for medical services and care of the wife had not in fact been paid by the husband, the claims therefor being asserted by the creditors directly against the wife's estate. These facts seem to distinguish Towery v. McGaw from Carpenter v. Hazelrigg, supra, with which it is apparently in conflict, and also distinguishes it from the case at bar. In Long v. Beard, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1036, it was held that the husband is bound in law for the physician's bill and burial expenses of his deceased wife as these are obligations for which he is primarily liable. In Brand v. Brand, 116 Ky. 785, it was held that the share of the husband in the wife's estate may be charged with the funeral expenses and physician's bills of the wife, as he is primarily liable for debts contracted by her, for necessities, after marriage. The opinion in Brand v. Brand is the last decision of this court on the question under consideration, and we adhere to the conclusion therein expressed."

In Stone v. Tyack, 164 Mich. 550, 552, 129 N. W. 694, it was declared that the liability of the husband for the wife's funeral expenses was not altered by the fact that they were living apart, the court saying: "That the husband is primarily legally liable for the ordinary funeral expenses of his wife is not open to question. Sears v. Giddey, 41 Mich. 590, 2 N. W. 917, 32 Am. Rep. 168; Gallaway v. McPherson, 67 Mich. 546, 35 N. W. 114, 11 Am. St. Rep. 596; Gleason v. Warner, 78 Minn. 405, 81 N. W. 206; 21 Cyc. p. 1233, and cases cited; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) p. 880. . . . The liability of the husband, in the case at bar, is not altered by the fact that at the time of his wife's death they were living apart. Cunningham v. Reardon, 98 Mass. 538, 96 Am. Dec. 670; Ambrose v. Kerrison, 10 C. B. 776, 70 E. C. L. 776, 20 L. J. C. Pl. 135."

However in Beck's Estate, 19 Pa. Dist. 620, wherein it appeared that a wife made provision for the payment of her funeral expenses out of her own estate, it was held that although a husband is ordinarily liable for his wife's funeral expenses, he may be relieved by the will of his wife, and such a provision in her will should be construed as a legacy to the husband. The court said: "There is no doubt as to the liability of a husband for the funeral expenses of his wife, but she may (the rights of her creditors not being affected) relieve him of this liability by will and the relief given will be treated as a legacy to the husband. Wheeler's Estate, 4 Pa. Dist. 265."

In Watkins v. Brown, 89 App. Div. 193, 85 N. Y. S. 820, wherein it appeared that the deceased wife left no separate estate, the court held the husband liable to a third person who had properly incurred the expenses of burial. The court said: "A surviving husband is under a legal obligation to bury the corpse of his wife, being allowed to reimburse himself from the separate estate of his deceased wife if she has left any such estate.

Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574; McCue v. Garvey, 14 Hun 562; Freeman v. Coit, 27 Hun 447. If the husband fails to perform this duty he is liable to an action to recover the reasonable value of its performance by any person who, on account of his absence or neglect, has properly incurred the expense of the necessary burial. This rule applies to the present case."

Modification of Rule.

Some jurisdictions have held that the separate estate of a wife is liable for her funeral expenses, even though her husband first pays them, he being entitled to reimbursement from her estate. In re Van De Walker, 79 Misc. 661, 141 N. Y. S. 325; Matter of Stadtmuller, 110 App. Div. 76, 96 N. Y. S. 1101; Re Gibbons 31 Ont. 252. See also Morrissey v. Mulhern, 168 Mass. 412, 47 N. E. 407, 60 Am. St. Rep. 404; Hatton v. Cunningham, 162 N. Y. S. 1008. Compare Cunningham v. Reardon, 98 Mass. 538, 96 Am. Dec. 670.

The rule that the wife's separate estate is primarily liable for her funeral expenses was emphatically laid down in the case of In re Skillman, 146 Ia. 601, 609, 125 N. W. 343, 140 Am. St. Rep. 295, wherein the court, in reviewing some of the earlier decisions touching the question, said: "While in England the law cast on the husband the duty of burying his deceased wife, this was not always at his own expense. In re MoMyn, 33 Ch. D. 575, the wife was engaged in a separate business, and by the will left her husband a legacy and named him as executor, but made no provision for funeral expenses. The court, speaking through Chitty, J., said that 'in most cases, the husband takes all his wife's personal property by reducing it into possession during his lifetime. To call upon him out of his own moneys in a case like the present, where the wife exercised the power of appointment and made the fund general assets for her creditors, but has omitted to mention her funeral expenses, would be too hard. I think therefore the husband is entitled to retain the sums expended for her funeral.' This would seem to hold that the interest of the husband in the wife's property may have had something to do in fixing the husband's liability, but in Gould v. Moulahan, 53 N. J. Eq. 341, 33 Atl. 483, wherein the court held the wife's estate liable for funeral expenses where the husband was unable to pay, said: 'His liability for the expense of the interment does not arise in virtue of any interest he may have in the wife's property, but from the personal advantage it is to himself to have those personae conjunctae with him, his wife and lawful children, properly maintained during life and suitably buried at death.' In Moulton v. Smith, 16 R. I. 126, 12 Atl. 891, 27 Am. St. Rep. 728, the husband was administrator of his deceased wife's estate, and as such paid the expenses of funeral and last sickness. Upon his death, the administrator of his estate presented a claim therefor and expenses of administration, and the court held that though the husband was entitled to settle the estate as if no such relation existed, and if he so elected to pay therefor from the funds of the estate, but as she might not contract a debt, being covert, for physician's services, claim therefor was held not allowable. In Towery v. McGaw (Ky.) 56 S. W. 727, the husband as administrator was allowed a credit for moneys paid out of his wife's estate for funeral expenses, but the hospital expenses of her last sickness were held to be 'necessaries' within the statute of the state for which he was liable and not a proper credit. These decisions were independent of statutory provisions like those of this state but in Constantinides v. Walsh, 146 Mass. 281, 15 N. E. 631, 4 Am. St. Rep. 311, the precise question before us was under consideration. The wife had died possessed of a separate estate and left a will naming her son executor. The husband without knowing this paid for her necessary funeral expenses, and, his claim against her estate therefor was allowed. The statutes of Massachusetts, though in different language, are in substance like those of this state in directing that 'when a person dies possessed of personal estate, the necessary expenses of his funeral and last sickness and charges of administration' be first paid, and the court, speaking through Holmes, J., said: 'The funeral expenses of the testatrix were a preferred charge upon her estate. Public Statute, ch. 135, § 3; ch. 137, § 1; Statutes 1892, ch. 141. Under these statutes, those establishing the independent position of married women with regard to their property, we think, as between the estate of a married woman leaving property and her husband, the liability of the estate must be regarded as primary, and that it would be unreasonable to charge the husband for the funeral expenses, in all events as necessities, irrespective of any fault on his part. If, then, it was still, as formerly, the plaintiff's legal duty to see that his wife was buried, but her estate was primarily liable, he is entitled to recover his reasonable expenditures, as in other cases when a person has paid, in pursuance of a legal duty, what, as between himself and another, that other was bound to pay. There is no technical difficulty in a husband's imposing a liability upon his wife's executor after her death. It was the plaintiff's legal duty to do what he did, nevertheless, we are of opinion that he stood on no worse ground than a stranger would have done.

A stranger could have recovered against the estate of a man, if he was justified in intermeddling. . . . The legislative design in enacting the statute quoted was to assure to every person care in his last sickness and appropriate burial by declaring the charges therefor preferred claims and exacting their payment as soon as funds enough to satisfy them come into the possession of his personal representative. It is mandatory in form. It contains no discrimination as between creditors to whom such charges may be owing and the duty to pay is declared independently of any obligation which may exist on the part of others. Its language obviates the inference otherwise to be drawn that it was intended merely to declare a preference as between claims against the estate. As seen, it may be deemed the basis for the allowance of such expenses, and we are of the opinion that the legislative intent was to impose on the estate of every deceased person a primary liability for the charges of the last sickness and funeral. If so, the obligation of either husband or wife therefor is secondary thereto in character, and, in event of payment by either, such charges may be established as claims against the estates of the deceased. This construction is not only reasonable, but is well calculated, in a case like this, where both husband and wife are dead, and each has left an ample estate, to protect the property of one against the unseemly efforts of the heirs or devisees of the other to evade the satisfaction of the reasonable charges of the last sickness and funeral from the state of the decedent under whom they take."

In Matter of Stadtmuller, 110 App. Div. 76, 96 N. Y. S. 1101, it was said: "There is little dispute as to the facts. George Lee and Catherine T. Lee were husband and wife, and resided together. On the 29th day of July, 1902, the wife died, and the husband, who was then ill, followed her three weeks later. Both left estates. The will of the wife directed that all her just debts and funeral expenses be paid. A short time after the death of his wife Mr. Lee sent for several parties who had claims and requested them to present their bills. They were paid on the 15th of August, 1902. George Lee paid the physician who attended his wife during her last illness the sum of $248.50, one Maxiner for flowers furnished at her funeral $80.50, and one Collier, an undertaker who had charge of her funeral, $281. The administratrix with the will annexed, etc., of George Lee, claims to recover these sums from the estate of his wife. The surrogate, however, rejected these claims, and the administratrix of the husband's estate appeals from the decree. That the items paid Collier and Maxiner are legitimate funeral expenses cannot be doubted. In McCue v. Garvey, 14 Hun 562, there were allowed, in addition to the undertaker's bill, disbursements for a wake and a priest. A reasonable charge for tombstone is part of funeral expense (section 2749, Code Civ. Proc; Matter of Shipman, 82 Hun 108, 116, 31 N. Y. S. 571), as are carriages for the funeral, flowers, music, and other incidental expenses. Matter of Ogden, 41 Misc. 158, 83 N. Y. S. 977. It is equally clear that, where the wife leaves a separate estate, although a surviving husband is under a legal obligation to bury the body of his wife, her estate is liable to the charge. It has been held that where expenditures of this sort have actually been made by the husband, his wife's separate estate, if she had one, should reimburse him. . . . The point made by the respondents that because George Lee assumed these claims without the expectation of being reimbursed from the estate of his deceased wife can have no force. Unless he did some positive act indicative of an intent to make a gift of such moneys to the estate, or actually released the wife's estate, no legal impediment existed to prevent his claiming reimbursement in case, for one reason or another, he changed his mind about filing a claim."

United States Supreme Court—January 15, 1917.

Statutes — Aids to Construction — Name Given to Statute.

The name given to a congressional enactment by way of designation or description in the act or the report of the committee accompanying the introduction of the bill into the House of Representatives cannot change the plain implication of the words of the statute.

White Slave Traffic Act — Scope of Act.

Transportation of a woman in interstate commerce in order that she may be debauched or become a mistress or concubine, although unaccompanied by the expectation of pecuniary gain, is condemned by the provisions of the White Slave Traffic Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 825, chap. 395, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 419), making it an offense knowingly to transport or cause to be transported in interstate commerce any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose, or with the intent or purpose to induce such woman or girl to become a prostitute, or to give herself up to debauchery, or engage in any other immoral practice.

[See note at end of this case.]

Validity of Act.

Construing as applicable to transportation, unaccompanied by the expectation of pecuniary gain, the provisions of the White Slave Traffic Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 825, chap. 395, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 419), making criminal the transportation or the causing to be transported, or the obtaining, aiding, or assisting in the transportation in interstate commerce of women or girls for the purpose of prostitution, debauchery, or other immoral purposes, does not render the statute invalid as in excess of the constitutional power of Congress over interstate commerce.

[See note at end of this case.]

Criminal Law — Instructions — Comment on Scope of Testimony of Accused.

An accused who takes the stand in his own behalf and voluntarily testifies for himself may not stop short in his testimony by omitting and failing to explain incriminating circumstances and events already in evidence in which he participated, and concerning which he is fully informed, without subjecting his silence to the inferences naturally to be drawn from it, and justifying comment by the court in his charge to the effect that the jury may take this omission into consideration in reaching a verdict.

Failure to Give Cautionary Instructions — Accomplice Testimony.

A conviction under the White Slave Traffic Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 825, chap. 395, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 419), making criminal the transportation or the causing to be transported, or the obtaining, aiding, or assisting in the transportation in interstate commerce of women or girls for the purpose of prostitution, debauchery, or other immoral purposes, will not be reversed because of the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury that the testimony of the women was that of accomplices, and was to be received with great caution, and to be believed only when corroborated by other testimony.

Harry O. Glasser for petitioner Hays.
Assistant Attorney General Wallace for United States.

[482] DAY, J.—These three cases were argued together, and may be disposed of in a single opinion. In each of the cases there was a conviction and sentence for violation of the so-called White Slave Traffic Act of June 25, 1910, 36 Stat. 825 (Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 419), the judgments were affirmed by the Circuit Courts of Appeals, and writs of certiorari bring the cases here.

In the Caminetti case, the petitioner was indicted in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, upon the sixth day of May, 1913, for alleged violations of the act. The indictment was in four counts, the first of which charged him with transporting and causing to be transported and aiding and assisting in [483] obtaining transportation for a certain woman from Sacramento, California, to Reno, Nevada, in interstate commerce for the purpose of debauchery, and for an immoral purpose, to wit, that the aforesaid woman should be and become his mistress and concubine. A verdict of not guilty was returned as to the other three counts of this indictment. As to the first count defendant was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment for eighteen months and to pay a fine of $1,500.00. Upon writ of error to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, that judgment was affirmed. 220 Fed. 545, 136 C. C. A. 147.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—74.

Diggs was indicted at the same time as was Caminetti, upon six counts, with only four of which are we concerned, inasmuch as there was no verdict upon the last two. The first count charged the defendant with transporting and causing to be transported and aiding and assisting in obtaining transportation for a certain woman from Sacramento, California, to Reno, Nevada, for the purpose of debauchery, and for an immoral purpose, to wit, that the aforesaid woman should be and become his concubine and mistress. The second count charged him with a like offense as to another woman (the companion of Caminetti) in transportation, etc., from Sacramento to Reno that she might become the mistress and concubine of Caminetti. The third count charged him (Diggs) with procuring a ticket for the first mentioned woman from Sacramento to Reno in interstate commerce, with the intent that she should become his concubine and mistress. The fourth count made a like charge as to the girl companion of Caminetti. Upon trial and verdict of guilty on these four counts, he was sentenced to imprisonment for two years and to pay a fine of $2,000.00. As in the Caminetti case, that judgment was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. 220 Fed. 545, 136 C. C. A. 147.

In the Hays case, upon June 26th, 1914, an indictment [484] was returned in the United States District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma against Hays and another, charging violations of the act. The first count charged the said defendants with having, on March 17th, 1914, persuaded, induced, enticed and coerced a certain woman, unmarried and under the age of eighteen years, from Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, to the City of Wichita, Kansas, in interstate commerce and travel, for the purpose and with intent then and there to induce and coerce the said woman, and intending that she should be induced and coerced to engage in prostitution, debauchery and other immoral practices, and did then and there, in furtherance of such purposes, procure and furnish a railway ticket entitling her to passage over a line of railway, to wit, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railway, and did then and there and thereby knowingly entice, and cause the said woman to go and to be carried and transported as a passenger in interstate commerce upon said line of railway. The second count charged that on the same date the defendants persuaded, induced, enticed and coerced the same woman to be transported from Oklahoma City to Wichita, Kansas, with the purpose and intent to induce and coerce her to engage in prostitution, debauchery and other immoral practices at and within the State of Kansas, and that they enticed her and caused her to go and be carried and transported as a passenger in interstate commerce from Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, to Wichita, Kansas, upon a line and route of a common carrier, to wit, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railway. Defendants were found guilty by a jury upon both counts, and Hays was sentenced to imprisonment for eighteen months. Upon writ of error to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, judgment was affirmed. 231 Fed. 106, 145 C. C. A. 294.

It is contended that the act of Congress is intended to reach only "commercialized vice," or the traffic in women [485] for gain, and that the conduct for which the several petitioners were indicted and convicted, however reprehensible in morals, is not within the purview of the statute when properly construed in the light of its history and the purposes intended to be accomplished by its enactment. In none of the cases was it charged or proved that the transportation was for gain or for the purpose of furnishing women for prostitution for hire, and it is insisted that, such being the case, the acts charged and proved, upon which convicted was had, do not come within the statute.

It is elementary that the meaning of a statute must, in the first instance, be sought in the language in which the act is framed, and if that is plain, and if the law is within the constitutional authority of the law-making body which passed it, the sole function of the court is to enforce it according to its terms. Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 662, 670, 671, 9 S. Ct. 651, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 1060; Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Sulzberger, 167 U. S. 1, 33, 15 S. Ct. 508, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 601, 610; U. S. v. Lexington Mill, etc. Co. 232 U. S. 399, 409, 34 S. Ct. 337, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 658, 662, L.R.A.1915B 774; U. S. v. Detroit First Nat. Bank, 234 U. S. 245, 258, 34 S. Ct. 846, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1298, 1304.

Where the language is plain and admits of no more than one meaning the duty of interpretation does not arise and the rules which are to aid doubtful meanings need no discussion. Hamilton v. Rathbone, 175 U. S. 414, 421, 20 S. Ct. 155, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 219, 222. There is no ambiguity in the terms of this act. It is specifically made an offense to knowingly transport or cause to be transported, etc., in interstate commerce, any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for "any other immoral purpose," or with the intent and purpose to induce any such woman or girl to become a prostitute or to give herself up to debauchery, or to engage in any other immoral practice.

Statutory words are uniformly presumed, unless the contrary appears, to be used in their ordinary and usual sense, and with the meaning commonly attributed to [486] them. To cause a woman or girl to be transported for the purposes of debauchery, and for an immoral purpose, to wit, becoming a concubine or mistress, for which Caminetti and Diggs were convicted; or to transport an unmarried woman, under eighteen years of age, with the intent to induce her to engage in prostitution, debauchery and other immoral practices, for which Hays was convicted, would seem by the very statement of the facts to embrace transportation for purposes denounced by the act, and therefore fairly within its meaning.

While such immoral purpose would be more culpable in morals and attributed to baser motives if accompanied with the expectation of pecuniary gain, such considerations do not prevent the lesser offense against morals of furnishing transportation in order that a woman may be debauched, or become a mistress or a concubine from being the execution of purposes within the meaning of this law. To say the contrary would shock the common understanding of what constitutes an immoral purpose when those terms are applied, as here, to sexual relations.

In U. S. v. Bitty, 208 U. S. 393, 28 S. Ct. 396, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 543, it was held that the act of Congress against the importation of alien women and girls for the purpose of prostitution "and any other immoral purpose" included the importation of an alien woman to live in concubinage with the person importing her. In that case this court said:

"All will admit that full effect must be given to the intention of Congress as gathered from the words of the statute. There can be no doubt as to what class was aimed at by the clause forbidding the importation of alien women for purposes of 'prostitution.' It refers to women who for hire or without hire offer their bodies to indiscriminate intercourse with men. The lives and example of such persons are in hostility to 'the idea of the family, as consisting in and springing from the union for life of one [487] man and one woman in the holy estate of matrimony; the sure foundation of all that is stable and noble in our civilization; the best guaranty of that reverent morality which is the source of all beneficent progress in social and political improvement.' Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U. S. 15, 45, 5 S. Ct. 747, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 47, 58. . . . Now the addition in the last statute of the words, 'or for any other immoral purpose,' after the word 'prostitution,' must have been made for some practical object. Those added words show beyond question that Congress had in view the protection of society against another class of alien women other than those who might be brought here merely for purposes of 'prostitution.' In forbidding the importation of alien women 'for any other immoral purpose,' Congress evidently thought that there were purposes in connection with the importations of alien women which, as in the case of importations for prostitution, were to be deemed immoral. It may be admitted that in accordance with the familiar rule of ejusdem generis, the immoral purpose referred to by the words 'any other immoral purpose,' must be one of the same general class or kind as the particular purpose of 'prostitution' specified in the same clause of the statute. 2 Lewis' Sutherland Stat. Const. § 423, and authorities cited. But that rule cannot avail the accused in this case; for, the immoral purpose charged in the indictment is of the same general class or kind as the one that controls in the importation of an alien woman for the purpose strictly of prostitution. The prostitute may, in the popular sense, be more degraded in character than the concubine, but the latter none the less must be held to lead an immoral life, if any regard whatever be had to the views that are almost universally held in this country as to the relations which may rightfully, from the standpoint of morality, exist between man and woman in the matter of sexual intercourse."

This definition of an immoral purpose was given prior to the enactment of the act now under consideration, and [488] must be presumed to have been known to Congress when it enacted the law here involved. (See the sections of the act¹ set forth in the margin.)

[489] But it is contended that though the words are so plain that they cannot be misapprehended when given their usual and ordinary interpretation, and although the sections in which they appear do not in terms limit the offense defined and punished to acts of "commercialized vice," or the furnishing or procuring of transportation of women for debauchery, prostitution or immoral practices for hire, such limited purpose is to be attributed to Congress and engrafted upon the act in view of the language of § 8 and the report which accompanied the law upon its introduction into and subsequent passage by the House of Representatives.

In this connection, it may be observed that while the title of an act cannot overcome the meaning of plain and unambiguous words used in its body, U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch

"Sec. 2. That any person who shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or assist in obtaining transportation for, or in transporting, in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or in the District of Columbia, any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose, or with the intent and purpose to induce, entice, or compel such woman or girl to become a prostitute or to give herself up to debauchery, or to engage in any other immoral practice; or who shall knowingly procure or obtain, or cause to be procured or obtained, or aid or assist in procuring or obtaining, any ticket or tickets, or any form of transportation or evidence of the right thereto, to be used by any woman or girl in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or the District of Columbia, in going to any place for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose, or with the intent or purpose on the part of such person to induce, entice, or compel her to give herself up to the practice of prostitution, or to give herself up to debauchery, or any other immoral practice, whereby any such woman or girl shall be transported in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 3. That any person who shall knowingly persuade, induce, entice, or coerce, or cause to be persuaded, induced, enticed, or coerced, or aid or assist in persuading, inducing, enticing, or coercing any woman or girl to go from one place to another in interstate or foreign commerce, or in any Territory or the District of Columbia, for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose, or with the intent and purpose on the part of such person that such woman or girl shall engage in the practice of prostitution or debauchery, or any other immoral practice, whether with or without her consent, and who shall thereby knowingly cause or aid or assist in causing such woman or girl to go and to be carried or transported as a passenger upon the line or route of any common carrier or carriers in interstate or foreign commerce, or any Territory or the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 4. That any person who shall knowingly persuade, induce, entice, or coerce any woman or girl under the age of eighteen years, from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, with the purpose and intent to induce or coerce her, or that she shall be induced or coerced to engage in prostitution or debauchery, or any other immoral practice, and shall in furtherance of such purpose knowingly induce or cause her to go and to be carried or transported as a passenger in interstate commerce upon the line or route of any common carrier or carriers, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

358, 386, 2 U. S. (L. ed.) 304, 313; Goodlett v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 122 U. S. 391, 408, 7 S. Ct. 1254, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 1230, 1233; Patterson v. The British Bark Eudora, 190 U. S. 169, 172, 23 S. Ct. 821, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 1002, 1005; Cornell v. Coyne, 192 U. S. 418, 430, 24 S. Ct. 383, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 504, 509; Lapina v. Williams, 232 U. S. 78, 92, 34 S. Ct. 196, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 515, 520, the title of this act embraces the regulation of interstate commerce "by prohibiting the transportation therein for immoral purposes, of women and girls, and for other purposes." It is true that [490] § 8 of the act provides that it shall be known and referred to as the "White-slave Traffic Act," and the report accompanying the introduction of the same into the House of Representatives set forth the fact that a material portion of the legislation suggested was to meet conditions which had arisen in the past few years, and that the legislation was needed to put a stop to a villianous interstate and international traffic in women and girls. Still, the name given to an act by way of designation or description, or the report which accompanies it, cannot change the plain import of its words. If the words are plain, they give meaning to the act, and it is neither the duty nor the privilege of the courts to enter speculative fields in search of a different meaning.

Reports to Congress accompanying the introduction of proposed laws may aid the courts in reaching the true meaning of the legislature in cases of doubtful intpretation Blake v. National City Bank, 23 Wall. 307, 319, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 119, 121; Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Sulzberger, 157 U. S. 1, 42, 15 S. Ct. 508, 39 U. S. L. ed. 601, 613; Chesapeake, etc. Telephone Co. v. Manning 186 U. S. 238, 246, 22 S. Ct. 881, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 1144, 1148; Binns v. U. S. 194 U. S. 486, 495, 24 S. Ct. 816, 48 U. S. L. ed. 1087, 1091. But, as we have already said, and it has been so often affirmed as to become a recognized rule, when words are free from doubt they must be taken as the final expression of the legislative intent, and are not to be added to or subtracted from by considerations drawn from titles or designating names or reports accompanying their introduction, or from any extraneous source. In other words, the language being plain, and not leading to absurd or wholly impracticable consequences, it is the sole evidence of the ultimate legislative intent. See MacKenzie v. Hare, 239 U. S. 299, 308, Ann. Cas. 1916E 645, 36 S. Ct. 106, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 297, 300.

The fact, if it be so, that the act as it is written opens the door to blackmailing operations upon a large scale, is no reason why the courts should refuse to enforce it according to its terms, if within the constitutional authority of Congress. Such considerations are more appropriately [491] addressed to the legislative branch of the government, which alone had authority to enact and may if it sees fit amend the law. Lake County v. Rollins, supra, p. 673.

It is further insisted that a different construction of the act than is to be gathered from reading it is necessary in order to save it from constitutional objections, fatal to its validity. The act has its constitutional sanction in the power of Congress over interstate commerce. The broad character of that authority was declared once for all in the judgment pronounced by this court, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Odgen, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 U. S. (L. ed.) 23, and has since been steadily adhered to and applied to a variety of new conditions as they have arisen.

It may be conceded, for the purpose of the argument, that Congress has no power to punish one who travels in interstate commerce merely because he has the intention of committing an illegal or immoral act at the conclusion of the journey. But this act is not concerned with such instances. It seeks to reach and punish the movement in interstate commerce of women and girls with a view to the accomplishment of the unlawful purposes prohibited.

The transportation of passengers in interstate commerce, it has long been settled, is within the regulatory power of Congress, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and the authority of Congress to keep the channels of interstate commerce free from immoral and injurious uses has been frequently sustained, and is no longer open to question.

Moreover, this act has been sustained against objections affecting its constitutionality of the character now urged. Hoke v. U. S. 227 U. S. 308, Ann. Cas. 1913E 905, 33 S. Ct. 281, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 523, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906; Athanasaw v. U. S. 227 U. S. 326, Ann. Cas. 1913E 911, 33 S. Ct. 285, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 528; Wilson v. U. S. 232 U. S. 563, 34 S. Ct. 347, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 728. In the Hoke Case, the constitutional objections were given consideration and denied upon grounds fully stated in the opinion (pp. 308 et seq.). It is true that the particular case arose from a prosecution of one charged with [492] transporting a woman for the purposes of prostitution in violation of the act. But, holding as we do, that the purposes and practices for which the transportation in these cases was procured are equally within the denunciation of the act, what was said in the Hoke Case as to the power of Congress over the subject is as applicable now as it was then.

After reviewing the Lottery Case, 188 U. S. 321, 357, 23 S. Ct. 321, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 492, 502, and other cases in this court decided since the decision of that case, it was said in the Hoke Case (p. 323):

"The principle established by the cases is the simple one, when rid of confusing and distracting considerations, that Congress has power over transportation 'among the several States;' that the power is complete in itself, and that Congress, as an incident to it, may adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, and the means may have the quality of police regulations. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 215, 5 S. Ct. 826, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 158, 166; Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed. 356. We have no hesitation, therefore, in pronouncing the Act of June, 25, 1910, a legal exercise of the power of Congress."

Notwithstanding this disposition of the questions concerning the construction and constitutionality of the act, certain of the questions made are of sufficient gravity to require further consideration.

In the Diggs case, after referring to the fact that the defendant had taken the stand in his own behalf and that his testimony differed somewhat from that of the girls who had testified in the case, and instructing the jury that it was their province to ascertain the truth of the matter, the court further said: "After testifying to the relations between himself and Caminetti and these girls down to the Sunday night on which the evidence of the Government tends to show the trip to Reno was taken, he stops short and has given none of the details or incidents of that trip nor any direct statement of the intent or purpose with [493] which that trip was taken, contenting himself with merely referring to it as having been taken, and by testifying to his state of mind for some days previous to the taking of that trip. Now this was the defendant's privilege, and, being a defendant, he could not be required to say more if he did not desire to do so; nor could he be cross-examined as to matters not covered by his direct testimony. But in passing upon the evidence in the case for the purpose of finding the facts you have a right to take this omission of the defendant into consideration. A defendant is not required under the law to take the witness-stand. He cannot be compelled to testify at all, and if he fails to do so no inference unfavorable to him may be drawn from that fact, nor is the prosecution permitted in that case to comment unfavorably upon the defendant's silence; but where a defendant elects to go upon the witness-stand and testify, he then subjects himself to the same rule as that applying to any other witness, and if he has failed to deny or explain acts of an incriminating nature that the evidence of the prosecution tends to establish against him, such failure may not only be commented upon, but may be considered by the jury with all the other circumstances in reaching their conclusion as to his guilt or innocence; since it is a legitimate inference that, could he have truthfully denied or explained the incriminating evidence against him, he would have done so."

This instruction, it is contended, was error in that it permitted the jury to draw inferences against the accused from failure to explain incriminating circumstances when it was within his power to do so, and thus operated to his prejudice and virtually made him a witness against himself in derogation of rights secured by the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

There is a difference of opinion expressed in the cases upon this subject, the Circuit Court of Appeals in the Eighth Circuit holding a contrary view, as also did the [494] Circuit Court of Appeals in the First Circuit. See Balliet v. U. S. 129 Fed. 689, 64 C. C. A. 201; Myrick v. U. S. 219 Fed. 1, 134 C. C. A. 619. We think the better reasoning supports the view sustained in the Court of Appeals in this case, which is that where the accused takes the stand in his own behalf and voluntarily testifies for himself (Act of March 16, 1878, c. 37, 20 Stat. 30; 7 Fed. St. Ann. 1120), he may not stop short in his testimony by omitting and failing to explain incriminating circumstances and events already in evidence, in which he participated and concerning which he is fully informed, without subjecting his silence to the inferences to be naturally drawn from it.

The accused of all persons had it within his power to meet, by his own account of the facts, the incriminating testimony of the girls. When he took the witness stand in his own behalf he voluntarily relinquished his privilege of silence, and ought not to be heard to speak alone of those things deemed to be for his interest and be silent where he or his counsel regarded it for his interest to remain so, without the fair inference which would naturally spring from his speaking only of those things which would exculpate him and refraining to speak upon matters within his knowledge which might incriminate him. The instruction to the jury concerning the failure of the accused to explain acts of an incriminating nature which the evidence for the prosecution tended to establish against him, and the inference to be drawn from his silence must be read in connection with the statement made in this part of the charge which clearly shows that the court was speaking with reference to the defendant's silence as to the trip to Reno with the girls named in the indictment, and as to the facts, circumstances and intent with which that trip was taken, and the jury was told that it had a right to take into consideration that omission.

The court did not put upon the defendant the burden [495] of explaining every inculpatory fact shown or claimed to be established by the prosecution. The inference was to be drawn from the failure of the accused to meet evidence as to these matters within his own knowledge and as to events in which he was an active participant and fully able to speak when he voluntarily took the stand in his own behalf. We agree with the Circuit Court of Appeals that it was the privilege of the trial court to call the attention of the jury in such manner as it did to this omission of the accused when he took the stand in his own behalf.

See in this connection Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 597, 16 S. Ct. 644, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 819; Sawyer v. U. S. 202 U. S. 150, 165, 6 Ann. Cas. 269, 26 S. Ct. 575, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 972; Powers v. U. S. 223 U. S. 303, 314, 32 S. Ct. 281, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 448.

It is urged as a further ground of reversal of the judgments below that the trial court did not instruct the jury that the testimony of the two girls was that of accomplices, and to be received with great caution and believed only when corroborated by other testimony adduced in the case. We agree with the Circuit Court of Appeals that the requests in the form made should not have been given. In Holmgren v. U. S. 217 U. S. 509, 19 Ann. Cas. 778, 30 S. Ct. 588, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 861, this court refused to reverse a judgment for failure to give an instruction of this general character, while saying that it was the better practice for courts to caution juries against too much reliance upon the testimony of accomplices and to require corroborating testimony before giving credence to such evidence. While this is so, there is no absolute rule of law preventing convictions on the testimony of accomplices if juries believe them. 1 Bishop's Criminal Procedure, 2nd ed. § 1081, and cases cited in the note.

Much is said about the character of the testimony adduced and as to certain facts tending to establish the guilt or innocence of the accused. This court does not weigh the evidence in a proceeding of this character, and it is enough to say that there was substantial testimony tending to support the verdicts rendered in the trial [496] courts. Other objections are urged upon our attention, but we find in none of them a sufficient reason for reversing the judgments of the Circuit Courts of Appeals in these cases.

The judgment in each of the cases is Affirmed.

McReynolds, J., took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

McKENNA, J. (dissenting).—Undoubtedly in the investigation of the meaning of a statute we resort first to its words, and when clear they are decisive. The principle has attractive and seemingly disposing simplicity, but that it is not easy of application or, at least, encounters other principles, many cases demonstrate. The words of a statute may be uncertain in their significance or in their application. If the words be ambiguous, the problem they present is to be resolved by their definition; the subject-matter and the lexicons become our guides. But here, even, we are not exempt from putting ourselves in the place of the legislators. If the words be clear in meaning but the objects to which they are addressed be uncertain, the problem then is to determine the uncertainty. And for this a realization of conditions that provoked the statute must inform our judgment. Let us apply these observations to the present case.

The transportation which is made unlawful is of a woman or girl "to become a prostitute or to give herself up to debauchery, or to engage in any other immoral practice." Our present concern is with the words "any other immoral practice," which, it is asserted, have a special office. The words are clear enough as general descriptions; they fail in particular designation; they are class words, not specifications. Are they controlled by those which [497] precede them? If not, they are broader in generalization and include those that precede them, making them unnecessary and confusing. To what conclusion would this lead us? "Immoral" is a very comprehensive word. It means a dereliction of morals. In such sense it covers every form of vice, every form of conduct that is contrary to good order. It will hardly be contended that in this sweeping sense it is used in the statute. But if not used in such sense, to what is it limited and by what limited? If it be admitted that it is limited at all, that ends the imperative effect assigned to it in the opinion of the court. But not insisting quite on that, we ask again, By what is it limited? By its context, necessarily, and the purpose of the statute.

For the context I must refer to the statute; of the purpose of the statute Congress itself has given us illumination. It devotes a section to the declaration that the "Act shall be known and referred to as the 'White-slave traffic Act.'" And its prominence gives it prevalence in the construction of the statute. It cannot be pushed aside or subordinated by indefinite words in other sentences, limited even there by the context. It is a peremptory rule of construction that all parts of a statute must be taken into account in ascertaining its meaning, and it cannot be said that § 8 has no object. Even if it gives only a title to the act it has especial weight. U. S. v. Union Pacific R. Co. 91 U. S. 72, 82, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 224. But it gives more than a title; it makes distinctive the purpose of the statute. The designation "White-slave traffic" has the sufficiency of an axiom. If apprehended, there is no uncertainty as to the conduct it describes. It is commercialized vice, immoralities having a mercenary purpose, and this is confirmed by other circumstances.

The author of the bill was Mr. Mann, and in reporting it from the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce he declared for the Committee that it was not [498] the purpose of the bill to interfere with or usurp in any way the police power of the States, and further that it was not the intention of the bill to regulate prostitution or the places where prostitution or immorality was practiced, which were said to be matters wholly within the power of the States and over which the federal government had no jurisdiction. And further explaining the bill, it was said that the sections of the act had been "so drawn that they are limited to cases in which there is the act of transportation in interstate commerce of women for purposes of prostitution." And again:

"The White Slave Trade. A material portion of the legislation suggested and proposed is necessary to meet conditions which have arisen within the past few years. The legislation is needed to put a stop to a villainous interstate and international traffic in women and girls. The legislation is not needed or intended as an aid to the States in the exercise of their police powers in the suppression or regulation of immorality in general. It does not attempt to regulate the practice of voluntary prostitution, but aims solely to prevent panders and procurers from compelling thousands of women and girls against their will and desire to enter and continue in a life of prostitution." House Report No. 47, 61st Cong. 2d sess. pp. 9, 10.

In other words, it is vice as a business at which the law is directed, using interstate commerce as a facility to procure or distribute its victims.

In 1912 the sense of the Department of Justice was taken of the act in a case where a woman of 24 years went from Illinois, where she lived, to Minnesota at the solicitation and expense of a man. She was there met by him and engaged with him in immoral practices like those for which petitioners were convicted. The district attorney forwarded her statement to the Attorney General, with the comment that the element of traffic was absent from the [499] transaction and that therefore, in his opinion, it was not "within the spirit and intent of the Mann Act."¹ Replying, the Attorney General expressed his concurrence in the view of his subordinate.²

Of course, neither the declarations of the report of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the House nor the opinion of the Attorney General are conclusive of the meaning of the law, but they are highly persuasive. The opinion was by one skilled in the rules and methods employed in the interpretation or construction of laws, and informed besides of the conditions to which the act was addressed. The report was by the committee charged with the duty of investigating the necessity for the act and to inform the House of the results of that investigation, both of evil and remedy. The report of the committee has, therefore, a higher quality than debates on the floor of the House. The representations of the latter may indeed be ascribed to the exaggerations of advocacy or opposition. The report of a committee is the execution of a duty and has the sanction of duty. There is a presumption, therefore, that the measure it recommends has the purpose it declares and will accomplish it as declared.

[500] This being the purpose, the words of the statute should be construed to execute it, and they may be so construed even if their literal meaning be otherwise. In Holy Trinity Church v. U. S. 143 U. S. 457, 12 S. Ct. 511, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 226, there came to this court for construction an act of Congress which made it unlawful for any one in any of the United States "to prepay the transportation, or in any way assist or encourage the importation or migration of any alien or aliens, any foreigner or foreigners, into the United States . . . under contract or agreement . . . to perform the terms 'slave' and 'traffic' as indicative of its purpose to suppress certain forms of abominable practice connected with the degradation of women for gain."

¹ "Careful consideration of the facts and circumstances as related by Miss Cox fails to convince me that her case came within the spirit and intent of the Mann Act. The element of traffic is entirely absent from this transaction. It is not a case of prostitution or debauchery and the general words 'or other immoral practice' should be qualified by the particular preceding words and be read in the light of the rule of Ejusdem Generis. This view of the statute is the more reasonable when considered in connection with Section 8 where Congress employs

² "I agree with your conclusion that the facts and circumstances set forth in your letter and its enclosure do not bring the matter within the true intent of the White Slave Traffic Act, and that no prosecution against Edwards should be instituted in the federal courts unless other and different facts are presented to you."

labor or service of any kind [italics mine] in the United States, its Territories or the District of Columbia." The Trinity Church made a contract with one E. W. Warren, a resident of England, to remove to the City of New York and enter its service as rector and pastor. The church was proceeded against under the act and the Circuit Court held that it applied and rendered judgment accordingly. 36 Fed. Rep. 303.

It will be observed that the language of the statute is very comprehensive, fully as much so as the language of the act under review, having no limitation whatever from the context; and the Circuit Court, in submission to what the court considered its imperative quality, rendered judgment against the church. This court reversed the judgment, and, in an elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer, declared that "It is a familiar rule, that a thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit, nor within the intention of its makers." And the learned Justice further said: "This has been often asserted, and the reports are full of cases illustrating its application."

It is hardly necessary to say that the application of the rule does not depend upon the objects of the legislation, to be applied or not applied as it may exclude or include good things or bad things. Its principle is the simple one that the words of a statute will be extended or restricted to execute its purpose.

[501] Another pertinent illustration of the rule is Reiche v. Smythe, 13 Wall. 162, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 566, in which the court declared that if at times it was its duty to regard the words of a statute, at times it was also its duty to disregard them, limit or extend them, in order to execute the purpose of the statute. And applying the principle, it decided that in a tariff act the provision that a duty should be imposed on horses, etc., and other live animals imported from foreign countries should not include canary birds, ignoring the classification of nature. And so again in Silver v. Ladd, 7 Wall. 219, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 138, where the benefit of the Oregon Donation Act was extended by making the words "single man" used in the statute mean an unmarried woman, disregarding a difference of genders clearly expressed in the law.

The rule that these cases illustrate is a valuable one and in varying degrees has daily practice. It not only rescues legislation from absurdity (so far the opinion of the court admits its application), but it often rescues it from invalidity, a useful result in our dual form of governments and conflicting jurisdictions. It is the dictate of common sense. Language, even when most masterfully used, may miss sufficiency and give room for dispute. Is it a wonder therefore, that when used in the haste of legislation, in view of conditions perhaps only partly seen or not seen at all, the consequences, it may be, beyond present foresight, it often becomes necessary to apply the rule? And it is a rule of prudence and highest sense. It rescues from crudities, excesses and deficiencies, making legislation adequate to its special purpose, rendering unnecessary repeated qualifications and leaving the simple and best exposition of a law the mischief it was intended to redress. Nor is this judicial legislation. It is seeking and enforcing the true sense of a law notwithstanding its imperfection or generality of expression.

There is much in the present case to tempt to a violation of the rule. Any measure that protects the purity of [502] women from assault or enticement to degradation finds an instant advocate in our best emotions; but the judicial function cannot yield to emotion—it must, with poise of mind, consider and decide. It should not shut its eyes to the facts of the world and assume not to know what everybody else knows. And everybody knows that there is a difference between the occasional immoralities of men and women and that systematized and mercenary immorality epitomized in the statute's graphic phrase "White-slave traffic." And it was such immorality that was in the legislative mind and not the other. The other is occasional, not habitual—inconspicuous—does not offensively obtrude upon public notice. Interstate commerce is not its instrument as it is of the other, nor is prostitution its object or its end. It may, indeed, in instances, find a convenience in crossing state lines, but this is its accident, not its aid.

There is danger in extending a statute beyond its purpose, even if justified by a strict adherence to its words. The purpose is studied, all effects measured, not left at random—one evil practice prevented, opportunity given to another. The present case warns against ascribing such improvidence to the statute under review. Blackmailers of both sexes have arisen, using the terrors of the construction now sanctioned by this court as a help—indeed, the means—for their brigandage. The result is grave and should give us pause. It certainly will not be denied that legal authority justifies the rejection of a construction which leads to mischievous consequences, if the statute be susceptible of another construction.

U. S. v. Bitty, 208 U. S. 393, 28 S. Ct. 396, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 543, is not in opposition. The statute passed upon was a prohibition against the importation of alien women or girls, a statute, therefore, of broader purpose than the one under review. Besides, the statute finally passed upon was an amendment to a prior statute and the words construed were an addition to the [503] prior statute and necessarily, therefore, had an added effect. The first statute prohibited the importation of any alien woman or girl into the United States "for the purposes of prostitution." The second statute repeated the words and added "or for any other immoral purpose" (italics mine). Necessarily there was an enlargement of purpose, and besides the act was directed against the importation of foreign corruption and was construed accordingly. The case, therefore, does not contradict the rule; it is an example of it.

For these reasons I dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court, expressing no opinion of the other propositions in the cases.

I am authorized to say that the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Clarke concur in this dissent.

NOTE.

In the reported case the Federal Supreme Court reaffirms the validity of the "White Slave Traffic Act" (Act June 25, 1910, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 419) and holds that the act is not confined to "commercialized vice" or the traffic in women for pecuniary gain, but inhibits as well the interstate transportation of a woman for the purpose of concubinage. The validity of the "White Slave Traffic Act" is discussed in the note to Hoke v. U. S. Ann. Cas. 1913E 905, its construction in the note to Athanasaw v. U. S. Ann. Cas. 1913E 911, and its effect on state legislation in the note to State v. Harper, Ann. Cas. 1916D 1017.

SCANDINAVIAN AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

v.

KNEELAND.

Manitoba Court of Appeal—March 16, 1914.

Conflict of Laws — Discharge of Surety.

The effect of acts of the creditor to discharge a surety is to be determined by the law of the place where the contract of suretyship is made.

Suretyship — Discharge — Effect of Release of Cosurety.

By the law of Minnesota the release of a surety by the creditor does not discharge a cosurety.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from judgment of CURRAN, Judge.

Action by Scandinavian American National Bank, plaintiff, against E. M. Kneeland, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. APPEAL ALLOWED.

[169] The plaintiff was a National Bank, incorporated under the United States banking laws, doing a general banking business at the City of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, one of the United States of America.

The defendant was manager of an elevator company and resided at the City of Winnipeg, and had so resided for the past six years.

The plaintiff sued the defendant upon a guaranty in writing given by the defendant and three others in respect of an indebtedness of the T. M. Roberts Co-operative Supply Company to the Bank. This guaranty was in the words and figures following:

Minneapolis, Minn., Sept. 27th, 1909.

In consideration of the T. M. Roberts Co-operative Supply Company having obtained credit with the Scandinavian American National Bank of Minneapolis, Minnesota, and is now indebted to said Bank for money borrowed, and in consideration of said Bank extending the time for payment of said money so borrowed and giving additional credit to said Company.

The undersigned do hereby guarantee, each one to the extent of the amount set opposite his signature below, the payment at maturity or at such time or date to which such payment may be by the Bank extended (the Bank to be at liberty to extend such time without the consent of the undersigned), of any and all sums of money now, or which may hereafter be owing to the said Bank of said Company.

This guaranty shall be binding on each of the undersigned until he shall revoke the same in writing.

Witness: Chas. J. Hedwall.

E. W. Kneeland $40,000

Witness: C. L. Grandin.

H. H. Berge $10,000

Witness: C. L. Grandin.

H. K. Richardson $65,000

Chas. J. Hedwall $5,000

The action was tried before Curran, J., who dismissed same.

Plaintiff appealed.

C. P. Wilson, K. C., and O. H. Clark, K. C., for appellant.

H. Phillipps and C. S. A. Rogers for ap-pellee.

[170] HOWELL, C. J. M.—The twenty-first paragraph of the statement of defence is that the plaintiff represented to the defendant that one Chase was to be one of the guarantors and this representation induced the defendant to sign the agreement.

The learned trial Judge has not found this fact. He merely found that the defendant believed Chase was to be a party and in this respect he does not find that the plaintiff wronged or deceived the defendant, unless by finding that Hedwall, the president of the company, was really acting for the Bank, and the evidence is overwhelming against this finding. The defendant, according to his evidence, had forgotten about this alleged representation, first when he wrote two letters to the banker, again when he instructed his solicitor to put in his defence and again on his examination for discovery. This defence was apparently discovered long after this suit began and the defendant's memory of it was apparently refreshed by reading the defence of one of the guarantors filed in the Minnesota Court. The defendant is contradicted clearly and the weight of evidence is overwhelming against him. The contract is complete on its face, and it is sought to answer it by the vague memory of the defendant as to facts which occurred years before without the support of other witnesses or by any written documents. I think it unsafe to set aside a written document upon such testimony and especially as the learned Judge had a poor opinion of the defendant's [171] memory during the course of the trial. I think the defendant should not succeed on this branch of the case.

The learned Judge has found as a fact that there was an agreement for further advances by the Bank. If there was any evidence to support this allegation the promise was that, after the Bank had increased its capital and was legally in a position to make a further advance, this would be done. There is no evidence of a demand for further advances after this increase of capital that I can find in the evidence.

It is difficult to see how or why parol evidence was got in to vary the express terms "giving additional credit" in the written contract; but, if this alleged parol promise varying the written agreement is admitted in evidence, it can only be got in as a collateral verbal independent agreement arising out of and not a part of the written agreement, as in Byers v. McMillan, 15 Can. Sup. Ct. 194, and to be enforced as a separate agreement. Even if the evidence supports the finding of the fact, I cannot see how the breach of this contract to do something in the future for the benefit of the company can be a defence to this action.

In the construction of the contract of guaranty much can be urged in favor of it being construed as several and not joint and several. It was complete on its face with many signatures or one signature; it contemplated different amounts of liability and, although it was a continuing liability, any one by notice might terminate it. See Tyser v. Shipowners Syndicate [1896] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 135; Ex p. Harding, 12 Ch. D. (Eng.) 564; Collins v. Prosser, 1 B. & C. 682, 8 E. C. L. 287. And, if several, the discharge of one surety will not discharge the co-sureties: Ward v. National Bank, 8 A. C. (Eng.) 755. However, without deciding this point, I think the statute law of Minnesota referred to by the learned trial Judge applies to his contract.

[172] With deference, I think the cases relied on by the learned trial Judge do not apply to the facts in this case. The contract was made in Minnesota to be performed there and the release of the co-surety given there and this act performed there did not affect the contract there. In other words, they entered into a contract there whereby it was agreed, amongst other things, that the plaintiff might release one of the sureties and not thereby release the others. The law of the contract was that a liability existed and was to continue, although the plaintiff might thereafter discharge one of the sureties so far as the plaintiff was concerned. I have had the advantage of reading the opinion on this branch of the case of my brother Cameron, and I concur with him as to the law.

No doubt, if the defendant had been prejudiced by the plaintiff's disposition of the assets, he must be protected to that extent and this involves some careful consideration. After much reflection I agree with the disposition of the case set out in the judgment of Mr. Justice Perdue.

RICHARDS, J. A.—The learned trial Judge found, as a fact, that the defendant executed the instrument sued on, under an agreement with the plaintiffs that it was not to become operative until signed by certain other parties, including Mr. C. L. Chase.

The evidence, as it appears in type, is not as clear on this point as could be wished. But there was evidence upon which he could find as he did. It is patent that he gave the matter most careful consideration. As he saw and heard the witnesses, he was in a better position than this Court can be, to decide the weight to be given to their respective testimony, and to draw conclusions of fact. I do not think that there is against his view such a weight of probability as would justify us in reversing it.

[173] Mr. Chase did not sign the instrument. Therefore, following the learned Judge's conclusion of fact, it never became operative.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

PERDUE, J. A.—The defendant, amongst other defences, sets up (paragraph 21 of amended statement of defence) that the guaranty, if entered into by him, was entered into upon the representation of the plaintiff that one Chase would become a coguarantor with him, Kneeland, and would execute the same and, if the defendant did execute the guaranty, he executed it upon faith in the said representation and not otherwise, and that the plaintiff in breach of its said agreement neglected to secure the signature and execution of the guaranty by said Chase.

If the facts above alleged were established by the evidence, it would afford a complete defence to the action; Bonser v. Cox, 4 Beav. (Eng.) 379; Ward v. National Bank, 8 A. C. (Eng.) 755, 764. The learned trial Judge finds that Kneeland was allowed to sign the guaranty under the bona fide belief that Chase would sign also, and that, if the truth had been disclosed as to Chase's refusal to sign, Kneeland would, in the trial Judge's opinion, have refused to sign the guaranty at all. The finding does not appear to me to go the length of establishing that the representation that Chase would also sign was made by the plaintiff and that the plaintiff suppressed the fact of Chase's refusal to sign. With respect, I am not at all satisfied that the defence raised by paragraph 21 has been established. The evidence upon this point is contradictory and the defendant's own statements as to what occurred at the time, taken along with his subsequent conduct, do not appear to me to prove this defence with the clearness that would be expected and required.

The guaranty in question, which is set out in full in [174] the trial Judge's reasons for judgment, was the subject of much discussion on the argument, it being claimed on behalf of the plaintiff to be a several undertaking on the part of each of the persons signing it, while it is argued for the defendant that it is a joint guaranty or, at the most, joint and several.

If the document be interpreted according to the law of this Province, I am of opinion that it constitutes a joint liability. The document in effect says:

"We, the undersigned, do hereby guarantee . . . the payment at maturity of any and all sums of money owing, etc., to the said Bank by the said company."

In White v. Tyndall, 13 A. C. (Eng.) 263, Lord Halsbury, L. C., dealing with the question of construction of a covenant, as to whether it was joint or several, said as follows:

"The late Mr. Platt, on page 117 of his work on Covenants, published more than half a century ago, puts the proposition in words that have never been questioned, as far as I am aware, since his time. With respect to the form, he says: 'No particular words are necessary to constitute a covenant of either kind (that is to say either joint or several). If two covenant generally for themselves, without any word of severance, or that they or one of them shall do such a thing, a joint charge is created; which shows the necessity of adding words of severalty where the covenantor's liability is to be confined to his own acts.'"

In the present case the parties signing the instrument guarantee payment of certain indebtedness to the Bank. The undertaking is joint but each one limits his liability to a certain amount. This limitation does not imply that each severally guarantees to the extent of the sum set opposite his name, but that, when he has contributed towards the joint liability the amount set opposite his signature, he is not to be called upon for more. The last clause provides that the guaranty shall be binding [175] on each of the undersigned until he shall revoke the same in writing. The effect of this clause, it appears to me, is to leave the undertaking joint as to all until one withdraws. The party withdrawing would be jointly liable with the others up to the withdrawal, and after that the others would remain jointly bound as between themselves.

Examples of joint and several guaranties with different limits of liability fixed for each of the guarantors, and the manner of working out the same amongst them, are found in Ellis v. Emmanuel, 1 Ex. D. (Eng.) 157, 34 L. T. N. S. 553, and Ellesmere Brewery Co. v. Cooper [1896] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 75, and in the cases there referred to.

In an action upon the guaranty in this Province the formal validity and interpretation of the contract should be determined in accordance with the laws of Minnesota, the country where it was made and was to be performed: Dacey, Conflict of Laws, 2d ed. pp. 540, 556. By the laws of Minnesota (section 4282 of the Revised Laws of Minnesota, 1905), it is declared that parties to a joint obligation shall be severally liable and may be sued either jointly, or separate actions may be brought against each, and judgment rendered in each, without barring an action against one not included in the judgment, or releasing those not sued: provided that the Court may require the plaintiff to bring in as defendants all parties jointly liable.

The plaintiff in 1910 commenced a suit on the guaranty against Berge, one of the guarantors, in the State of Minnesota, and afterwards released him in consideration of a payment of $3,000. This release was given under the plaintiff's seal, and contained no reservation of rights against the cosureties. The defendant claims that the effect of this release was to discharge the cosureties of Berge, on the ground that the contract of suretyship was joint, or joint and several, and that a [176] discharge of one by the principle creditor operated as a discharge of all, the joint obligation of the others being part of the consideration of the contract of each; relying upon Ward v. National Bank, 8 A. C. (Eng.) 755, 764; Mercantile Bank v. Taylor [1893] A. C. (Eng.) 317. This contention turns altogether upon the question whether the contract is to be regarded as joint, joint and several, or several only. If it is several only, the defendant's contention cannot apply. Now, if the contract is to be interpreted according to the laws of Minnesota, the parties, even if the contract is joint in form, shall be severally liable and separate actions may be brought against each without releasing the others. Also, by section 4283 of the same Revised Laws, a creditor may discharge one of several joint obligors without impairing his right to recover the residue from the others.

In the provisions of the Minnesota Laws above referred to, there is much relating to procedure only, which is closely involved with the portions relating to interpretation and the declaration of substantive legal rights. In fact, much may be said in favor of holding these sections to be procedure only and therefore not to be applicable in this Province. I have, however, come to the conclusion, after much doubt, that we must take the meaning placed upon the contract in question by the proper law of the contract which must be presumed to be that of the State of Minnesota. In this view the contract must be regarded as several and the release of one of the co-sureties will not operate as a release of the others or of any one of them.

In the year 1910 the plaintiff took from Hedwall a promissory note made by him for $5,000 in payment of his liability on the guaranty. At the same time the plaintiff delivered to Hedwall two promissory notes made by the principal debtor, the T. M. Roberts [177] Company, and Richardson, one for Company. The amount of these two notes, with the interest upon them, should be deducted from the plaintiff's claim.

I think the appeal should be allowed with costs and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the amount due after deducting the notes delivered to Hedwall. An account of the amount due to the plaintiff should, if necessary, be taken by the Registrar of the Court and the amount entered in the judgment. The plaintiff will be entitled to the ordinary costs of suit in the Court of King's Bench.

CAMERON, J. A.—This is an action on a guaranty given to the plaintiff Bank by the defendant and three others, directors and shareholders of the T. M. Roberts Co-operative Supply Company, a corporation doing business in the City of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota. The Bank is incorporated under the laws of the United States as a National Bank and carries on its business in the same city.

The action was tried before Mr. Justice Curren, who, in his judgment, sets forth the instrument sued upon and the facts and circumstances connected with its signing and delivery to the plaintiff Bank. The learned trial Judge dismissed the plaintiff's action.

The guaranty in question was signed by the defendant, September 27, 1909. The T. M. Roberts Company, for [178] whose benefit it was given, was adjudicated insolvent on April 8, 1910. The action was commenced May 21, 1912. The defendant was examined November 9, 1912. The case was brought on for trial January 10, 1913. A few days before the trial certain amendments to the defence were made, amongst them that set out in paragraph 21, stating in effect that there was an agreement between the defendant and the Bank that one Chase should be a co-guarantor with the defendant, that the defendant signed the guaranty upon the faith of that agreement and that the Bank failed to secure the signature of the said Chase. This statement was treated throughout the trial as equivalent to a defence setting forth that it was agreed between the Bank and the defendant that all the parties mentioned, including the defendant, Berge, Richardson, anty was given, and where the defendant was guarantor to the extent of $40,000 or of the instrument, was advised of the Action was brought in May, 1912, the defendant was examined in November and brought on for trial the following. Yet it was not until the near approach of trial, within a few days before it came, that this defence of the most material importance was placed on the record.

Two important letters written by the defendant shortly [179] after the incorporation of the company were placed in evidence. The first, dated May 14, 1910, written in a letter from the Vice-President of the company, urging payment, contains not one word referring to this important matter. That that is apparently made most prominent in this letter is the defendant's liability at the time of writing, but no mention is made of Chase.

In the second letter, dated June 1, 1910, the only reference to Chase is in the following passage:

"Furthermore, we signed the guaranty with the understanding that Mr. Chase would become a guarantor, and he agreed to sign the contract or guaranty that afternoon. We are informed that the reason he refused to make good his word and sign the guaranty was on account of the fact that you refused to increase the line up to $50,000 and to the original understanding."

Now, it is possible to read this extract by supplying the words "with the Bank" after the word "understanding" where it first appears. But that cannot fairly be done as I cannot find it in the original extract. To my mind it means this: We, who signed the guaranty, signed it with the understanding that we, with Chase, had agreed to sign it with the original understanding that you would increase the line of credit up to $50,000, which you refused to do and it was on account of this that Chase refused to sign."

There is here no direct statement that there was an agreement with the Bank that the defendant signed the guaranty, together with Chase, should sign before the agreement should become operative. The grievance, as I understand it, is that the Bank had failed to implement its promise to increase the company's credit to $50,000.

I have read the portions of the defendant's examination put in at the trial and it is impossible to discover therein any clear and definite statement that the Bank had agreed to procure the signatures of all the defendants mentioned to the guaranty before it became [180] effective, as is alleged by the defendant in his evidence at the trial. In one place in his examination he says, with reference to such an alleged agreement:

"The Bank must have taken it into consideration. I do not recall it."

under the plaintiff's seal, and contained no reservation of rights against the cosureties. The defendant claims that the effect of this release was to discharge the cosureties of Berge, on the ground that the contract of suretyship was joint, or joint and several, and that a [176] discharge of one by the principle creditor operated as a discharge of all, the joint obligation of the others being part of the consideration of the contract of each; relying upon Ward v. National Bank, 8 A. C. (Eng.) 755, 764; Mercantile Bank v. Taylor [1893] A. C. (Eng.) 317. This contention turns altogether upon the question whether the contract is to be regarded as joint, joint and several, or several only. If it is several only, the defendant's contention cannot apply. Now, if the contract is to be interpreted according to the laws of Minnesota, the parties, even if the contract is joint in form, shall be severally liable and separate actions may be brought against each without releasing the others. Also, by section 4283 of the same Revised Laws, a creditor may discharge one of several joint obligors without impairing his right to recover the residue from the others.

In the provisions of the Minnesota Laws above referred to, there is much relating to procedure only, which is closely involved with the portions relating to interpretation and the declaration of substantive legal rights. In fact, much may be said in favor of holding these sections to be procedure only and therefore not to be applicable in this Province. I have, however, come to the conclusion, after much doubt, that we must take the meaning placed upon the contract in question by the proper law of the contract which must be presumed to be that of the State of Minnesota. In this view the contract must be regarded as several and the release of one of the co-sureties will not operate as a release of the others or of any one of them.

In the year 1910 the plaintiff took from Hedwall a promissory note made by him for $5,000 in payment of his liability on the guaranty. At the same time the plaintiff delivered to Hedwall two promissory notes made by the principal debtor, the T. M. Roberts [177] Company, and Richardson, one for $2,000 and the other for $3,000. Hedwall proved for that amount against the estate of the principal debtor and received dividends as a creditor from the assignee. The notes which were so delivered to Hedwall are two of the notes now sued upon in this action. It is quite clear that, when this action was commenced, the plaintiff had parted with these notes for value, was not the holder of them, and was not entitled to sue upon a guaranty given to the plaintiff to secure payment to the plaintiff of all sums of money owing to the plaintiff by the T. M. Roberts

Company. The amount of these two notes, with the interest upon them, should be deducted from the plaintiff's claim.

I think the appeal should be allowed with costs and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the amount due after deducting the notes delivered to Hedwall. An account of the amount due to the plaintiff should, if necessary, be taken by the Registrar of the Court and the amount entered in the judgment. The plaintiff will be entitled to the ordinary costs of suit in the Court of King's Bench.

CAMERON, J. A.—This is an action on a guaranty given to the plaintiff Bank by the defendant and three others, directors and shareholders of the T. M. Roberts Co-operative Supply Company, a corporation doing business in the City of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota. The Bank is incorporated under the laws of the United States as a National Bank and carries on its business in the same city.

The action was tried before Mr. Justice Curren, who, in his judgment, 'sets forth the instrument sued upon and the facts and circumstances connected with its signing and delivery to the plaintiff Bank. The learned trial Judge dismissed the plaintiff's action.

The guaranty in question was signed by the defendant, September 27, 1909. The T. M. Roberts Company, for [178] whose benefit it was given, was adjudicated insolvent on April 8, 1910. The action was commenced May 21, 1912. The defendant was examined November 9, 1912. The case was brought on for trial January 10, 1913. A few days before the trial certain amendments to the defence were made, amongst them that set out in paragraph 21, stating in effect that there was an agreement between the defendant and the Bank that one Chase should be a co-guarantor with the defendant, that the defendant signed the guaranty upon the faith of that agreement and that the Bank failed to secure the signature of the said Chase. This statement was treated throughout the trial as equivalent to a defence setting forth that it was agreed between the Bank and the defendant that all the parties mentioned, including the defendant, Berge, Richardson, Hedwall and Chase, should sign the guaranty, otherwise, it was further agreed, the said guaranty should be wholly ineffective and void. The evidence on this issue was gone into at length before the learned trial Judge, who found in favor of the defendant.

Here we have a transaction where a banking instrument was formally signed by the parties and delivered by them to the plaintiff Bank in September, 1909, and was acted on by the Bank (there can be no dispute as to that); where the principal debtor became in default within a short time after the guaranty was given, and where the defendant, a guarantor to the extent of $40,000 on the face of the instrument, was advised of the facts. Action was brought in May, 1912, the defendant was examined in November and the cause brought on for trial the following January. Yet it was not until the near approach of the trial, within a few days before it commenced, that this defence of the most material importance was placed on the record.

Two important letters written by the defendant shortly [179] after the insolvency of the company were placed in evidence. The first, dated May 14, 1910, written in reply to a letter from the Vice-President of the Bank, urging payment, contains not one word referring to this important matter. The point that is apparently made most prominent in this letter is the defendant's liability to pay at the time of writing, but no mention is made of Chase.

In the second letter, dated June 5, 1910, the only reference to Chase is in the following passage:

"Furthermore, we signed the guaranty with the understanding that Mr. Chase was to become a guarantor, and he agreed to sign the contract or guaranty that afternoon, and we are informed that the reason he refused to make good his word and sign the guaranty was on account of the fact that you refused to increase the line up to $50,000 according to the original understanding."

Now, it is possible to read this extract, supplying the words "with the Bank" after the word "understanding" where it first occurs. But that cannot fairly be done as I read the extract. To my mind it means this: "We, who signed the guaranty, signed it because we, with Chase, had agreed to sign it on the original understanding that you were to increase the line of credit up to $50,000, which you refused to do and it was on account of this that Chase refused to sign."

There is here no direct statement that there was an agreement with the Bank that all who signed the guaranty, together with Chase, should sign before the agreement should become operative. The grievance, is, rather, that the Bank had failed to implement its promise to increase the company's line of credit to $50,000.

I have read the portions of the defendant's examination put in at the trial and I find it impossible to discover therein any positive and definite statement that the Bank agreed to procure the signatures of all the parties mentioned to the guaranty before it became [180] effective, as is alleged by the defendant in his evidence at the trial. In one part of his examination he says, with reference to such an alleged agreement:

"The Bank must have taken into consideration. I do not recall it."

His subsequent answer (Q. No. 257) "I went down there to the Bank and I said 'I will go on this guaranty if the others do,' and the others said they would," must be contrasted with the above answer and with his statements as set out in the notes of evidence at pp. 289, 290, and following.

The defendant says in his evidence at the trial that he did not become aware that Chase had not signed until after the bankruptcy of the company, April 6, 1910, but it was certainly some time before his letter of June 6, 1910.

In view of the foregoing and of other considerations that arise on a perusal of the evidence, we must surely call for clear and convincing evidence before we give effect to this defence. Had it been put forward from the first, and referred to throughout in the correspondence, interviews and pleadings, then the position might be wholly different. And it cannot be denied that it is quite possible that the facts were as stated by the defendant, and that, in the press of business matters, they were overlooked and did not recur to memory until the trial was imminent. But, as I have said, we are here dealing with a document, one of a class common in banking transactions, delivered to a bank in circumstances such as not infrequently call for a document of its character, and acted upon in due course by the Bank. Yet the very existence of that document is for the first time challenged by a pleading, and by evidence in support of that pleading, brought forward at the trial more than three years after it had been signed and delivered.

[181] On the other hand, Hedwall declares he knew of no agreement with the defendant making the signing of one contingent upon the signing of all, p. 430. Hedwall witnessed the defendant's signature, but knew of no such statement by the defendant on this matter to Grandin as was alleged at the trial. Grandin also enters a positive denial. He says he never took a guaranty from any one in his life under those conditions. I refer to his evidence, p. 154, and at p. 491, when recalled.

Upon my best consideration of the matters involved, I feel compelled to hold that the defendant has not satisfactorily discharged the onus placed upon him by reason of the circumstances constituting and surrounding this case in so far as this particular defence is considered. I must add that it is not without some degree of hesitancy that I thus undertake to differ from the view taken by the learned trial Judge.

As for the defence that the guaranty was signed on the understanding that the company's line of credit was to be extended to $50,000, it is to be said that that is not in accordance with the written document. Moreover, the defendant's evidence at pp. 309, 310 is at variance with his statement in the letter of June 6, that the line of credit was to be increased "as soon as you had increased your capital stock."

The defendant in his evidence at the trial states that, at the meeting in the T. M. Roberts Co.'s store on the morning of September 27th, it was represented by Hedwall that the Bank "would advance up to $50,000," and that nobody stated in his presence that this advance was conditional on the Bank's increase of capital. Now the explicit provisions on this subject of the National Banking Law of the United States must necessarily be familiar to bank officials and directors in that country as well as to those, or to a large proportion of those, having dealings with them. It involves a matter that [182] must be coming before them continually. It is difficult to imagine that an unconditional promise that an advance would be given to a customer, beyond the sum allowed by law, could or would be made in any circumstances whatever with the authority of the Bank, or by any official of the Bank. The probabilities are strongly against anything of the kind and, to support the defendant's evidence on this branch as given at the trial, we must seek for corroboration. But, in point of fact, so far from corroboration being available, his evidence at the trial on this point is positively contradicted by that of Hedwall, Grandin and Chase and differs from the statement in his letter of June 6, as I have pointed out above.

This defence also was not originally set up but only at the latest possible stage, and the considerations which apply to the defence with which I have already dealt apply substantially to this; and, with reference to it, I have come to the same conclusion. Even if the defence were established, it would appear to me that it is not a matter that goes to the consideration; it would rather be a matter constituting a breach of contract for which the Bank might be liable. But in such an action it would strike me as impossible for the defendant to succeed.

This contract was made in the State of Minnesota and was to be performed there. That being so, the rights and obligations of the parties are to be determined in accordance with the laws of Minnesota, which must be taken to be the laws by which the parties intended the contract to be governed. See Dicey, Conflict of Laws, p. 556, where the general rule is thus stated:

"The interpretation of a contract and the rights and obligations under it of the parties thereto are to be determined in accordance with the proper law of the contract." ("Proper law" is defined at p. 529).

"The rights of the parties to a contract are to be [183] judged of by that law by which they intended (to bind) or rather by which they may justly be presumed to have bound themselves." Lloyd v. Guibert, L. R. 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 115, 123. And see the other cases cited by Dicey, p. 557.

"You must have regard to the law of the contract, by which I mean the law which the contract itself imports is to be the law governing the contract," per Lord Halsbury, In re Missouri Steamship Co. 42 Ch. D. (Eng.) 321, 336.

"The essential validity of a contract (as distinguished from its formal validity) as well as its interpretation and effect and the rights and obligations of the parties to it are governed (with certain exceptions) by the law which the parties have agreed or intended shall govern it, or which they may be presumed to have intended. This law is generally known as the proper law of the contract." Halsbury, Laws of England, VI. 238.

Wharton on the Conflict of Laws has this at p. 936:

"It has been held that the question as to what acts or omissions will release the surety pertains to the remedy, and is therefore governed by the law of the forum; but the better view seems to be that the matter relates to the substance of the contract, rather than to the remedy, and is therefore to be governed by the law of the place where the contract is made and performable, rather than the law of the forum."

I consider the judgment of the Court in Tenant v. Tenant, 110 Pa. St. 485, 1 Atl. 532, as sound and in point here.

The case of Leroux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801, 74 E. C. L. 801, holding that section 4 of the Statute of Frauds relates to procedure has been subjected to criticism. See Williams v. Wheeler, 8 C. B. N. S. 299, 98 E. C. L. 299, per Willes, J., and Piggott on Foreign Judgments, p. 82.

The law is stated and the cases cited by Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady in British South Africa Co. v. DeBeers [1910] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 381.

I quote also from Brandt on Suretyship, section 162:

"As a general rule, the liability of sureties and guarantors depends upon and is governed by the law of the place of their contract. Thus, in an action against a [184] surety on a note in New Hampshire, the note having been executed and made payable in Vermont, the law relating to sureties in the latter State is to be applied and by that law they are governed."

The non-discharge of one joint surety by reason of the discharge of another is not merely a matter relating to the remedy but is part of the law relating to the substance of the contract and therefore part of the contract. The section of the Minnesota statutes quoted is an alteration of the Common Law, making the obligation of each joint obligor absolute irrespective of the release or discharge by the creditor of any other. It is a different matter from the defences involved in the Statutes of Limitations and the Statute of Frauds prohibiting the use of the process of the courts after a certain period, or without compliance with certain conditions. The right of a creditor to hold one of several joint sureties notwithstanding the discharge of another or others of them is a matter affecting the obligation of the contract, altering it in one of its essential elements, and such right must therefore be ascertained and determined in accordance with the law of the place of the contract.

The above considerations apply if the contract in question be taken as joint. If it be taken as several the defence is inapplicable. Either may I consider the plaintiff Bank entitled to recover on the notes sued on, excepting the two notes, No. 1957 for $2,000 and No. 2142 for $3,000 (referred to in Mr. Grandin's evidence at p. 166-168), transferred by the plaintiff Bank to Hedwall. It appears from the evidence of Hedwall, p. 482-485, that he proved in bankruptcy against the Roberts Co. on these notes, received dividends on his claim and, according to his evidence, held the notes all the time of the trial. The notes appear to have been endorsed by the plaintiff Bank "without recourse." There is no plausible reason advanced to show why these [185] notes were included in the plaintiff's claim, filed as Exhibit "B," stated as correct by Judge Neland, p. 194. On these two notes I think the plaintiff must fail. Otherwise I hold the appeal must be allowed and the judgment entered for the plaintiff as set forth in the judgment of Mr. Justice Perdue.

GENERALLY.

The present state of the law respecting the effect of a discharge of a surety on the liability of a cosurety results from a historical development whereby the ancient strictness of the common law was by the interposition of equity so modified as to grant a release from liability only to the extent to which actual prejudice was suffered. That equitable doctrine has been generally accepted and is now the established rule of law in most jurisdictions. By the common law, which regarded the liability of a surety as strictissimi juris and released him in case of the slightest change in his obligation, the release by a creditor of one surety discharged his cosureties. Cheetham v. Ward, 1 B. & P. (Eng.) 630; Nicholson v. Revill, 4 Ad. & El. 675, 31 E. C. C. 166; Thompson v. Lack, 3 C. B. 540, 54 E. C. L. 540; Done v. Walley, 2 Exch. (Eng.) 198; Evans v. Bremridge, 2 Kay & J. (Eng.) 174, 25 L. J. Ch. 102, 2 Jur. (N. S.) 311, 4 W. R. 161 affirmed in 8 De G. M. & G. 100, 44 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 327, 2 Jur. (N. S.) 311, 25 L. J. Ch. 334, 4 W. R. 350; Hodgson v. Hodgson, 2 Keen (Eng.) 704, 7 L. J. Ch. 5; Ex p. Slater, 6 Ves. Jr. (Eng.) 146; Mercantile Bank v. Taylor [1893] A. C. (Eng.) 317; Gold Medal Furniture Co. v. Stephenson, 23 Manitoba 159; Stockton v. Stockton, 40 Ind. 225; Hunter v. Ft. Wayne First Nat. Bank, 172 Ind. 62, 87 N. E. 734; Frederick v. Moore, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 470; Sulphur Deposit Bank v. Peak, 110 Ky. 579, 62 S. W. 268, 96 Am. St. Rep. 466, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 19; Smith v. State, 46 Md. 617; McKim v. Demmon, 130 Mass. 404; Wright v. Stockton, 5 Leigh (Va.) 153. Compare Ex p. Gifford, 6 Ves. Jr. (Eng.) 805, 6 Rev. Rep. 53; State v. Van Pelt, 1 Ind. 304. In Cheetham v. Ward, supra, the court said: "The very point in issue was however decided in the year-book: and Brian there gives a satisfactory reason for the decision. In fact there is but one duty extending to both obligors; and it was therefore pointedly put that a discharge of one, or satisfaction made by one, is a discharge of both. This puts an end to the argument that the action is not necessarily suspended as to both; for it is the effect of the suspension as to one that releases, discharges, and distinguishes the action as to both. This case, therefore, must be decided by the year-book, and the principle there laid down, which has never been doubted since, whether founded in reason or not." So in Smith v. State, 46 Md. 617, the court stated the rule as follows: "It seems . . . to be well settled that the release of one or more sureties without the assent of the cosureties will operate at law to discharge the latter, because it is a cardinal principle of suretyship that the surety has the right to stand by the very terms of the contract, and the creditor will not be permitted to change or alter the contract without concurrence of all the parties to it."

It was however recognized by the common-law courts that the only prejudice suffered by a surety from the release of a cosurety was the loss of his right of contribution from the cosurety for any sum in excess of his aliquot part which he was compelled to pay. Ward v. National Bank, 8 App. Cas. (Eng.) 755, 52 L. J. P. C. 65, 49 L. T. N. S. 315. Basing their holdings on that consideration, the courts of equity discharged the cosurety only to the extent of his damage, holding him liable for his proportion of the liability but exonerating him to the extent to which he could have claimed contribution from his cosurety had the latter not been released. State Bank v. Bozeman, 13 Ark. 631; Garey v. Hignutt, 32 Md. 552; Smith v. State, 46 Md. 617; Thompson v. Adams, 1 Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 225; Routon v. Lacy, 17 Mo. 399; State v. Matson, 44 Mo. 305; Wright v. Stockton, 5 Leigh (Va.) 153; Trabing v. Albany County, 1 Wyo. 301. See also Jones v. Whitehead, 4 Ga. 397; Morgan v. Smith, 70 N. Y. 537. In Smith v. State, supra, the court said: "It seems to be well settled that the release of one or more sureties without the assent of the cosureties will operate at law to discharge the latter, because it is a cardinal principle of suretyship that the surety has the right to stand by the very terms of the contract, and the creditor will not be permitted to change or alter the contract without concurrence of all the parties to it. In equity, however, the rule is different, and the release of one or more sureties will not be construed to have this effect, unless it subjects the cosureties to an increased risk or liability. Accordingly, it has been held that where the creditor releases one surety, reserving his remedy against the others, the effect of such release operates only to discharge the cosureties from the ratable proportion which the surety thus released ought to have contributed, and such further proportion as he ought to have borne arising from the insolvency of any of the other sureties. It is difficult to imagine on what principle it can be maintained in equity, that the mere release of one surety discharges the other sureties from liability. As between themselves, the sureties are liable only for their proportion of the debt, and the right of contribution does not exist unless they have paid an amount exceeding this proportion. If, then, the release of one surety discharges the other from the payment of the proportion of the debt, which such surety ought to have contributed, and discharges them also from the proportion which he ought to bear in the loss arising from the insolvency of any of the other sureties, it is clear that such release can in no manner prejudice or subject the cosureties to an increased risk. It follows then from what we have said, that the payment of Payne's proportion of the judgment, and in the subsequent entry of satisfaction as against his executors, could not in any manner affect the rights of the cosureties, or subject them to an increased liability. The effect of that entry so far as they are concerned is to release them from the payment of Payne's proportion of the judgment, and should any of the cosureties prove insolvent, to release them from the payment of Payne's proportion of the loss arising from such insolvency."

The modern rule is in accord with the doctrine of the equity courts that the release of a surety discharges his cosureties from liability only to the extent of the proportion for which the discharged surety could have been held to contribute to them. Jemison v. Governor, 47 Ala. 390; Saint v. Wheeler, etc. Mfg. Co. 95 Ala. 362, 10 So. 539, 30 Am. St. Rep. 210; Gordon v. Moore, 44 Ark. 349, 51 Am. Rep. 606; Thomason v. Clark, 31 Ill. App. 140, 100 S. W. 210; Lane v. Moon, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 625, 103 S. W. 211; Carlton v. Krueger, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 48, 115 S. W. 619, 1178; Ware v. Milligan (Tex.) 30 S. W. 728; Sorrel v. Gifford (Tex.) 100 S. W. 212; Seeligson v. Gifford (Tex.) 100 S. W. 213; Munoz v. Brasel (Tex.) 108 S. W. 417; Hallock v. Yankcy, 102 Wis. 41, 78 N. W. 156, 72 Am. St. Rep. 861.

The reasons underlying the foregoing rule were well stated in Gordon v. Moore, 44 Ark. 349, 51 Am. Rep. 606, wherein the court said: "The right of a surety compelled to pay a debt as against his cosurety is not exoneration of the burden. It is his as much as his fellow's. It is the right of contribution, the right to recover from his cosurety just so much as will make both equal in the loss. It is obvious that by the discharge of one surety the others are injured (or would be) just to the extent of their right of contribution. . . . This mode of adjustment injures no one. Its plain, common sense equity commends itself to every man's sense of right, and is harmonious with the well-settled rule, that the release of the principal discharges the surety altogether, because it takes away the right to exoneration. When the relief goes beyond the injury it becomes technical and arbitrary."

So in Schock v. Miller, 10 Pa. St. 402, it was said: "Whatever, then, may be the effect of a release at law, it, in equity (and equity is part of our law), is a discharge pro tanto. And why should the law be otherwise? For this, no rational reason has or can be given. In this case it is clear that the act of the creditor, so far from being an injury, is a benefit to the cosurety, for it relieves him from the payment of a moiety of the debt, the whole of which he might otherwise be compelled to pay. If it be a prejudice to anyone, it is the creditor; but of this, surely, the cosurety has no right to complain. Why the creditor agreed to release one of the sureties upon payment of his share of the debt, we are not informed; nor is it material, as we are satisfied he had the right without the consent, or against the consent, of the cosurety, to do so, without affecting or impairing his claim, except to the extent of one moiety of the debt. The executors of Hertzler cannot be compelled to pay more than they are equitably bound to pay on the solvency of the principal debtor, viz., a moiety of the debt. To that extent, and to that extent only, have they a defense to the action."

In Deering v. Moore, 86 Me. 181, 29 Atl. 988, 31 Am. St. Rep. 534, the court said: "Did the discharge of two sureties release the defendant, another surety? No. The defendant was one of six sureties, who bound themselves severally and not jointly, each in the sum of $5,000. Their relations to each other are precisely the same as if each one had executed a separate bond. They are neither necessarily joint debtors nor joint sureties. Had the principal executed the bond, he would have bound himself in the sum of $30,000. The sureties, instead of standing in jointly for that amount, divided it equally among them, and each one became severally bound for his aliquot share. . . . In the case at bar, the attempted discharge of some of the sureties is not pretended to have been by a sealed instrument. Had it been, it would have worked a discharge of all the sureties, for they stand in the relation to each other of joint debtors, being cosureties for the payment of the same debt. Nor does it pretend to have discharged the whole debt, as provided for by statute. It simply presumes to discharge some sureties from a liability or debt that was to remain outstanding, and, therefore, not being upon sufficient consideration that would have paid the debt, or so much of it as they had engaged to pay by their covenant, nor evidenced by a sealed instrument, it was ineffectual to discharge any one."

UNDER STATUTE.

The California statute was stated and applied in Wristen v. Curtiss, 76 Cal. 6, 18 Pac. 81, wherein the court said: "The code provides that 'a release of one of two or more joint debtors does not extinguish the obligation of any of the others unless they are mere guarantors; nor does it affect their right to contribution from him.' (Civ. Code, sec. 1543.) That the plaintiff, Harris, and Forman were, upon the face of the notes which they executed to the defendant, joint debtors is too clear to admit of doubt, and unless the plaintiff was a mere guarantor, his obligation was not extinguished by the release of Forman. But the court, by request of plaintiff, instructed the jury that 'a release of one of two or more sureties without the consent of the other cosureties is a release of all the sureties.' This is clearly contrary to the provision of the code relating to the same subject, and 'the code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates.'" Compare Spencer v. Houghton, 68 Cal. 82, 8 Pac. 679 (decided prior to statute). An early statute in California relating to the release of sureties on official bonds (Woods Digest, art. 232, § 6) provided that the release of a surety thereunder should not affect the previously accrued liability of the other sureties. People v. Buster, 11 Cal. 215. Under a later statute (Pol. Code, sec. 977) the release or discharge of a surety on an official bond "does not affect the bond as to the remaining sureties thereon or alter or change their liability in any respect." People v. Otto, 77 Cal. 45, 18 Pac. 869.

In Georgia a statute (Civ. Code 1910, § 3542) provides that "the release of or compounding with one surety discharges a cosurety." Williams-Thompson Co. v. Williams, 10 Ga. App. 251, 63 S. E. 409; Wilkinson v. Conley, 133 Ga. 518, 66 S. E. 372. Compare Lewis v. Armstrong, 80 Ga. 402, 7 S. E. 114 (decided prior to statute). It has been held that a failure to prove the claim against the bankrupt estate of a surety does not discharge a cosurety. Armstrong v. Citizen's etc. Bank, 145 Ga. 861, 90 S. E. 44. Prior to the statute it was held that a failure to sue the principal on demand of one surety discharged all the sureties. Jones v. Whitehead, 4 Ga. 397. See also, infra, the subdivision Failure to Sue Principal.

The Missouri statute was stated and applied in Schneider v. Maney, 242 Mo. 36, 145 S. W. 823, wherein the court said: "It is immaterial, however, so far as the plaintiff's right of action against this defendant is concerned, whether the other sureties were released or not, because by force of our statute, section 2769, Revised Statutes 1909, contracts that were by common law joint are joint and several and under section 2772 the creditor may sue any one or more of the joint obligors. Defendant would be liable, therefore, for the balance due on those judgments after deducting the amounts paid by the other sureties for their release." In Singleton v. Shep- herd (Mo.) 183 S. W. 1077, it was said: "Plaintiff places reliance on section 2777, R. S. 1909, which authorizes a creditor of two or more debtors, joint or several, to compound with either for such sum as he may see fit, and release him 'without impairing his right to demand and collect the balance of such indebtedness from the other debtors not so released: Provided, that no such release shall impair the right of any debtor of such indebtedness, not so released, to have contribution from his codebtors, as is by law now secured to him.' The creditor's act, releasing defendant, released plaintiff also in so far as he was liable as a joint obligor for defendant's part, but left him still liable for his own part, and when he settled that part, he did not pay 'more than his due portion of the original demand;' he merely settled his own single obligation and paid nothing in 'excess' of his own debt." In Routon v. Lacy, 17 Mo. 399, decided prior to the statute the rule in equity as stated in the preceding subdivision of this note was declared and applied. See also Dodd v. Winn, 27 Mo. 501; State v. Atherton, 40 Mo. 209; State v. Hatson, 44 Mo. 305.

The Montana statutes were stated in Lay v. Nixon, 14 Mont. 64, 35 Pac. 458, as follows: "By virtue of the statute of this state (Comp. Stats. div. 5, c. 76), one joint debtor, or more, may make a compromise or composition with the creditor of the joint debtors, and such compromise or composition shall be a full and effectual discharge to the debtor, or debtors, making the same, and to them only, of all liability to the creditor. Such compromise or composition with one joint debtor, or more, shall not discharge the other debtor or debtors, but shall be deemed to be a payment to the creditor, equal to the proportionate interest of the joint debtor or debtors so discharged; but the provisions of that chapter do not apply to any 'debtor or debtors who, by the express terms of the contract upon which the indebtedness exists or arose, was the principal debtor while the other joint debtor or debtors were sureties.' (Comp. Stats. div. 5, c. 76, § 1292.) The following section then provides 'that upon the rendition of any judgment in any court in this state, if it shall be shown that one or more of the defendants against whom the judgment is to be rendered are principal debtors, and others of the said defendant are sureties of such principal debtor or debtors, the court may order the judgment so to state, and upon the issuance of an execution upon such judgment it shall direct the sheriff to make the amount due thereon out of the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of the principal debtor or debtors, or if sufficient thereof cannot be found within his county to satisfy the same, then that he levy and make the same out of the property, personal or real, of the judgment debtor who was surety.' (Comp. Stats. sec 1293.)"

In Ohio the court held in Walsh v. Miller, 51 Ohio St. 462, 38 N. E. 381, that a statute providing that a compromise with and release of one of several joint debtors does not release the others, applies to sureties. In that case it was said: "It was urged in argument, that the term 'joint debtors' in the statute, must be limited to principal debtors, because it is used in such connection with the word 'partners,' as shows that intention. We do not think so. A surety, as well as a principal, may be a debtor, although a right of action on the obligation has not matured; and the phrase 'other joint debtors' is broad enough to embrace all persons who are jointly indebted, except partners with respect to whom special provision is made by the preceding sections. We find nothing in the statute indicating an intention to deprive sureties of the benefit of its provisions."

In Vermont a statute providing that the discharge of one joint debtor shall not release the others has been held to be applicable to sureties. Alford v. Baxter, 36 Vt. 158.

FAILURE TO SUE PRINCIPAL.

It is provided by statute in many jurisdictions that where an obligation for which another is bound as surety is due and owing the surety may by notice require the creditor to sue the principal debtor therefor, and if he does not do so within a reasonable time the surety is discharged. By the weight of authority such a discharge of a surety does not discharge his co-sureties. Wilson v. Tebbetts, 29 Ark. 579, 21 Am. Rep. 165; School Trustees v. Southard, 31 Ill. App. 359; Cochran v. Orr, 94 Ind. 433; Martin v. Orr, 96 Ind. 491; Letcher v. Yantis, 3 Dana (Ky.) 160; Ruff v. Montgomery, 83 Miss. 185, 36 So. 67; Routon v. Lacy, 17 Mo. 399; Klingensmith v. Klingensmith, 31 Pa. St. 460. Compare Towns v. Riddle, 2 Ala. 694; Wright v. Stockton, 5 Leigh (Va.) 153. And see Jones v. Whitehead, 4 Ga. 397, cited, supra, in the subdivision Under Statute.

In Ramey v. Purvis, 38 Miss. 499, it was said: "The statute authorizes 'any surety' to give the notice, and provides that if the creditors shall fail to bring suit as required 'the surety who shall have given such notice shall be discharged from liability, and the creditor shall be barred of all recovery against him.' It appears to be plain, from this phraseology, that the notice was intended to be a privilege to the surety who might see fit to give it, and to operate to his sole benefit. The rule established by the statute is, that a surety desiring and requiring suit to be brought should be discharged upon the failure of the creditor to sue accordingly. This might be the case with one of two cosureties, while the other might desire that suit should not be brought. The reason as well as the language of the statute applies to the former case, but not to the latter; and there is nothing in it which can be justly construed to compel a creditor to sue a surety, under penalty of losing his debt against him, unless he desires to be sued, and gives accordingly. But it is contended that the discharge of one surety must work a discharge of the other, because the claim for contribution which the latter, in case of payment of the debt by him, had against the former, by virtue of the original obligation, is thereby destroyed. If this be conceded to be true, it does not show that the surety, failing to avail himself of the privilege authorized by the statute, is discharged by the act of his cosurety. For the statute provides how one surety may be discharged. It authorizes the discharge of one surety in a particular manner, and is silent as to the liability of others; and it is, in respect to the objection under consideration tantamount to authority given to the creditor to release one of two sureties in a specified mode. It was, then, a part of the law in relation to the rights of sureties, and the contract of suretyship must be considered as having been entered into with reference to it, and the rights of the parties to it be governed by it; for the statute incorporated into the Revised Code, and which thereby appears to be subsequent date to this note, is in substance but a re-enactment of the Statute of 1864, ch. 27. Hence, if the effect of the discharge of the surety Thompson, be to leave his cosurety, who is not discharged from the plaintiff's claim, without remedy for contribution against him, it is a result produced by the statute, allowing one surety to be discharged without affecting the creditor's claim against his cosurety. The contract of the sureties was entered into subject to the rule established by the statute, which governs both their liabilities and their rights; and the statute cannot be held to prejudice the rights of the creditor further than its positive provisions require."

In Wilson v. Tebbetts, 20 Ark. 570, 21 Am. Rep. 165, it was held that the discharge of one surety where the creditor had failed to bring suit within thirty days after notice, the time prescribed by the statute, did not affect the liabilities of the cosureties. The court said: "The question now to be considered is, Does the discharge of one of the sureties who gives the required notice, also discharge those who have not given notice? The counsel for Tebbetts contend that such is the effect of the discharge of one surety who has given notice, upon the liabilities of the cosureties who failed to do so, and to sustain them in this position, have cited several adjudicated cases. That most strongly in point, and which would seem most fully to sustain them, is the case of Wright v. Stockton, 5 Leigh (Va.) 153. Under a statute of Virginia, substantially like our own, three out of four sureties gave notice to the creditor to sue; suit was brought upon the bond and the three were discharged. Suit was then brought against the estate of Wright, the surety who had not given notice. When considering the case thus presented, Carr, J., said: 'In this case the creditor was required to sue by three of the sureties, and delayed to do so for an unreasonable time, in consequence of which delay the three sureties who joined in the requisition have been discharged by a judgment from all liability. It is contended that this does not discharge the defendant, because his intestate did not join in the requisition to sue. If we take the statute literally, it would seem to require that when there were more sureties than one, all shall join in the requisition, for the words are: "Where any person or persons are the surety or sureties in a bond, etc., it shall be lawful for such surety or sureties to give notice etc." Yet this construction would in a great measure defeat the remedy, as it would put it out of the power of one, where there are many sureties, to prevent the notice by refusing to join. If we look at the reason and object of the law, it would seem that a notice to sue by a part of the sureties would be as effectual as one given by them all . . . Again, we know that there is a principle of the common law attaching to all joint obligations by which a discharge of one obligor is a discharge of all.' It is upon this construction of the statute and upon the announcement of a common-law principle with regard to joint obligations, which can have no application in this case, because we have a statute which makes all contracts joint and several, that the court in that case held a notice by one surety who gave notice, to be a discharge of all. With due respect for the conclusions which the court seemed to have reached, we think that neither the intent of the legislature nor the language of the statute sustains the court in its decision. Certainly it would not be a fair construction of a statute, such as ours, which says: 'Any person bound as security, etc., may by notice require suit to be commenced, etc., and that if suit is brought, such security shall be exonerated.' Thus we see the right is given to 'any surety to give notice to sue,' and if suit is not brought, it discharges the surety who gives it. By the first section the right to give such notice is given to any person bound as surety, and it clearly gives the right to give notice to one or more who may feel themselves insecure by reason of the failing circumstances of the principal debtor, whilst the right to be discharged is clearly limited to such surety as has given the notice. Thus considering this decision and the course of reasoning upon which it was reached, we can give it no controlling influence in the consideration of the case before us."

So in Klingensmith v. Klingensmith, 31 Pa. St. 460, the court said: "The action is against one of two sureties. The other had been discharged, by the neglect of the plaintiff to sue the principal after due notice. This does not discharge both, where by law a several action may be brought. The surety not discharged may be sued for his proportion of the amount."

In Martin v. Orr, 98 Ind. 491, wherein it appeared that a creditor did not take out execution for some time after judgment on notice from a surety requiring him to institute action, it was held that such conduct discharged the surety giving notice but not the other. The court said: "A surety, bound in writing for the payment of money or the performance of any contract, may, when the right of action accrues, require by notice in writing the creditor or obligee forthwith to institute an action upon the contract. And if the creditor or obligee does not, within a reasonable time after such notice, bring his action upon such contract and prosecute the same to judgment and execution, the surety will be discharged from all liability. . . . Each paragraph of Martin's answer alleged that he was surety on the note on which the judgment was rendered; that he gave the creditor notice as required by the statute; and that the creditor after prosecuting his action to judgment did not take out an execution for fifty-two days thereafter. Many decisions of this court make it obvious that the delay in taking out execution after the rendition of the judgment was unreasonable."

The act of the creditor in allowing his claim against one surety to become barred by the statute of limitations does not release the other sureties. Montgomery v. Boyd (Tex.) 171 S. W. 273. In Davis v. Auxier, 41 S. W. 767, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 719, it was said: "It is . . . contended that Davis ought to be released because appellee allowed the action to become barred as to the other surety, Kelley. As to the latter contention, it is sufficient to say that, if Davis or his administrator desired to hold Kelley bound for contribution, the same could have been done by the payment of the note before the same was barred by the statute."

On the same principle a failure to present a claim against the estate of a deceased surety does not release cosureties. Clark v. Douglas, 58 Neb. 571, 79 N. W. 158; Camp v. Bostwick, 20 Ohio St. 337, 5 Am. Rep. 609.

SURETIES BOUND BY SEPARATE INSTRUMENTS.

Where sureties are bound by separate instruments a release of one will not discharge the other. Clymer v. State, 59 Ind. App. 364, 109 N. E. 431; Wanamaker v. Powers, 102 App. Div. 485, 93 N. Y. S. 19, affirmed 186 N. Y. 562, 79 N. E. 1118; Jamison v. Cosby, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 273. See also Poor v. Merrill, 68 Ia. 436, 27 N. W. 367; Com. v. Berry, 95 Ky. 443, 26 S. W. 7, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 833; McCloskey v. Wingfield, 32 La. Ann. 38; London Corp. v. Citizens Ins. Co. 13 Ont. 713. In Clymer v. State, supra, it was said: "It is further argued that the release of Ziba F. Little, as surety on the original bond, as shown in the special finding, operated as a release of this appellant from the bond being considered, upon the theory that they were cosureties, and the release of one discharged all cosureties. Appellant's contention would have much force if the parties had signed the same bond, but since they did not, the discharge of Little did not release appellant." In Poor v. Merrill, supra, the court said: "It is averred in the amendment that in January, 1882, Merrill, with other sureties, filed a bond as security for deposits which should be made by the county treasurer; that deposits were made, and that, while Merrill owed the same, the bond in suit was given as an additional bond; that the first bond was surrendered and canceled, and that the cancellation of that bond had the effect to release the bond in suit, because it deprived these sureties of the right to look to the sureties upon the first bond for contribution. But the bond in suit does not purport to be an additional bond, and there is no averment in the amendment demurred to which shows that it was ever regarded as an additional security for the deposit in question. The deposit secured by the first bond was paid, and the makers of the bond had a right then, and before another deposit was made, to take it up."

Release by Judicial Order or by Operation of Law.

The distinction between a release of a surety by operation of law and one by the act of the creditor, with respect to the effect on the liability of a cosurety, was pointed out in Staples v. Gokey, 34 Hun (N. Y.) 289, wherein the court said: "When, by operation of law, one of the sureties becomes released from that obligation, the burden rests upon the remainder. (Comins v. Pottle, 22 Hun 287; Davis v. Van Buren, 72 N. Y. 587; Risley v. Brown, 67 N. Y. 160; Randall v. Sackett, 77 N. Y. 480; Wood v. Fisk, 63 N. Y. 245.) It is plain that when two persons become surety for a third, the right of contribution may be lost to one by the death or bankruptcy of the other, or by the statute of limitations running as to one and not as to the other, and this contingency must be presumed to be present to the minds of the sureties when they assume their obligation. The creditor has nothing to do with the right of the sureties to contribution among themselves, except that he must not affirmatively do any act tending to impair it. In other words, he must not, by his action, destroy or impair the rights of the sureties as between themselves. If he does, to the extent that he impairs the right of any one surety, to that extent he diminishes the amount of his recovery against him."

If an official bond is so informally taken that some of the sureties are not bound, the others are thereby released on the ground that the nature of the obligation which they agreed to assume has been changed. Com. v. Berry, 95 Ky. 443, 26 S. W. 7, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 833; Wilson v. Linville, 96 Ky. 50, 27 S. W. 857. On the same principle in State v. McGonigle, 101 Mo. 353, 13 S. W. 758, 20 Am. St. Rep. 609, 8 L.R.A. 735, it was held that the discharge of a surety because of the erasure of his name from the bond released every other surety thereon. See also Canada Furniture Co. v. Stephenson, 19 Manitoba 618; Fairhaven v. Cowgill, 8 Wash. 686, 36 Pac. 1093, 24 L.R.A. 795. Compare Cass County v. American Exch. State Bank, 11 N. D. 238, 91 N. W. 59. And in Hess v. Schaffner (Tex.) 139 S. W. 1024, the court said: "If appellee had notice, before taking the note and parting with the consideration, that Damek's name had been erased without the consent of Viereck, and that he was not to be bound, unless Damek was, he would be released. If Koy and Roesler signed after the name of Damek had been erased, such erasure would not of itself affect their liability; but if the effect of such erasure under the principles above stated was to release Viereck, and it was agreed that Koy and Roesler would only be bound at all on condition that Viereck remained, and appellee had notice of this fact, at or before it took the paper and parted with the consideration, then such release of Viereck also operated to release Koy and Roesler." So in Mitchell v. Burton, 2 Head (Tenn.) 613, it was held that though the discharge of a surety an account of the erasure of his name from the bond without the knowledge or consent of cosureties discharged them from liability, it did not discharge other sureties who signed the bond after such erasure although ignorant of the same. Compare Metcalf County v. Scott, 1 Ky. L. Rep. (abstract) 422. In Hilleboe v. Warner, 17 N. D. 594, 118 N. W. 1047, the court said: "It is not seriously disputed by the appellant on this appeal that the erasure of the name of Woods from the bond is a complete defense to the other sureties who signed the bond after said Woods had signed the same and before his name was erased."

The distinction between the mere release of a surety and a change in the obligation was pointed out in Ide v. Churchill, 14 Ohio St. 386, wherein the court said: "Where the agreement to which the surety acceded has been changed, his obligation is annihilated and gone, and there is no power, either in courts of law or in equity, to revive it against him, or to make him a party to the substituted agreement concluded between the principal parties; and in such case, his entire discharge necessarily ensues. But where no such change has been made, and he remains bound to his original stipulations, and has been injured by the act of the creditor only in respect to the means of satisfying the debt, or of reimbursing himself after making payment, he is entitled to have deducted from the debt an amount equal to his injury, and no more." See to the same effect Schock v. Miller, 10 Pa. St. 402.

A discharge of a surety on an official bond by order of court does not release the other sureties. State v. Bongard, 89 Minn. 426, 94 N. W. 1093, wherein it was said: "No question is here made by either party as to the authority of the court to make the order as to the release of the three sureties before any action on the recognizance had been commenced, and we assume, for the purposes of this decision, that the jurisdiction of the court in the premises was the same as it would have been if the action had been pending. Now, it appears from the allegations of the complaint that the court did not assume to remit the whole of the penalty of the bond in excess of $842.47. On the contrary, its order deals with the three sureties personally, and provides for their release from further liability on the recognizance upon the payment of the sum named, and expressly provided that their release should not affect the right of the state to recover from the defendant one-fourth of the amount of the recognizance; that is, his proportionate share thereof as between him and his cosureties. The case stands, then, as to the defendant, precisely as if the state had released his cosureties on payment of three-fourths of the amount due on the recognizance, and had brought this action to recover his proportionate share of the original amount of the recognizance. We therefore hold that the release of the defendant's cosureties did not affect his liability for such proportionate share."

So in Frederick v. Moore, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 470, it was said: "The Act of 1791 (1 Stat. Laws, 766) authorized any surety of a guardian, who might apprehend danger of suffering by his suretyship, to petition the court before whom he was bound, to be relieved. Authority is given to the court to relieve none except those who apply. None except Kellar did apply for relief, and none except him apprehended danger from aught that appears in the record. The sureties with Kellar in the first bond are not, as we have seen, released by operation of law, and not having been released by the county court through any order applicable to them, they are still responsible upon their bond. The sureties in the first bond have no right to complain that one from whom they could have claimed contribution has been released while they are held bound, because they ought to have known when they entered into the bond that such might be the result, as any one of them had the right by law to apply to be discharged; and because they might have availed themselves of the same privilege."

However in McKim v. Demmon, 130 Mass. 404, the court said: "It being agreed in the case stated that Lowry, one of the sureties upon the bond sued on, was discharged from all further responsibility thereon by a decree of the probate court made pursuant to the provisions of the statute, it must be assumed that the decree was made after due notice to all persons interested, as required by the St. of 1843, c. 56, § 1; and, if such notice was given, the validity of the decree is not affected by the defendant's having had no actual knowledge of it. But the legal effect of that decree was to discharge Lowry's cosureties as well as himself. This is evident from the concluding provision of section 1, which does not speak of an additional bond or additional sureties, but requires the principal to 'give a new bond, with such surety or sureties as the court shall judge sufficient,' as well as from the provision of section 3, that, 'when a new bond shall be required, as above provided, the sureties' (not merely the surety who has been discharged) 'in the prior bond shall nevertheless be liable for all breaches of the condition committed before the new bond shall be approved by the judge of probate'—clearly implying that none of the sureties upon the first bond shall be responsible for any breach of trust committed after the second bond has been given and approved."

That one surety is competent by reason of coverture does not discharge the others. Warren v. Louisville Leaf Tobacco Exch. (Ky.) 55 S. W. 912.

Where an action has been commenced against all the sureties, a dismissal as to some for want of jurisdiction does not release the others. Monroe v. Richmond, Man. Unrep. Cas. (La.) 278.

The discharge of a surety in insolvency proceedings does not discharge his cosureties. Sacramento County v. Bird, 31 Cal. 66.

In Myers v. Farmer, 52 Ia. 20, 2 N. W. 572, wherein it appeared that judgment had been taken against a surety, the court said that he was discharged from liability by the successful termination of an appeal in the same matter by his cosurety.

In Roberson v. Tonn, 76 Tex. 535, 13 S. W. 385, wherein it appeared that a surety became subsequently a coprincipal, it was held that his cosurety was released from liability. The court said: "B. H. Bassett became primarily liable to the ward—as to his cosurety a principal—having through the firm of which he was a member borrowed and had the benefit of the ward's money, for which both sureties were liable. Having thus become a principal debtor, if he has been released, then his cosurety is as clearly released as would he be had appellee in some way voluntarily released the guardian whose sureties both were."

And in Britnell v. Smith, 189 Ala. 440, 66 So. 569, wherein it appeared that two of three sureties on a note transferred to them, assigned the same to a third person without recourse on them either in law or equity it was held that the third surety was discharged. The court said: "The effect of their indorsement was, . . . to destroy their liability on the note, and, when they so indorsed it, they also released their cosurety Yarbrough from liability on the note. Yarbrough was entitled to the right, upon the payment of the note by him, against his cosureties to contribution. The right of contribution was destroyed when the transfer was made without recourse. The character of the obligation, in so far as Yarbrough is concerned, was materially changed, and, upon every principle of law, Yarbrough was discharged."

v.

STUDEBAKER CORPORATION OF AMERICA.

Oregon Supreme Court—March 9, 1915.

75 Oregon 519; 146 Pac. 825;
147 Pac. 525.

Damages — Breach of Contract — Loss of Profits.

Recovery may be had for loss of profits occasioned by breach of contract, where the business of which plaintiff was deprived was contemplated or can reasonably be presumed to have been contemplated by parties when the contract was made, and it is reasonably certain that gain or profit would have been derived therefrom, although the amount of such gain may be uncertain.

[See 8 R. C. L. tit. Damages, p. 501 et seq.]

Agency — Breach of Contract — Recovery for Loss of Profits.

In an action for the breach of a contract, in which plaintiff acted as sales agent for defendant's automobiles on commission, but which gave no exclusive agency for a definite period, the profits derived by the plaintiff from such sales were clearly contemplated by the parties; but where the only proof of damage was that defendant discharged plaintiff before he could consummate sales to his prospective customers, and there was nothing to show that sales were made or could have been made to more than four customers, a verdict for plaintiff for commissions on the amount of sales to all the prospective customers is properly set aside by the trial court.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Alleged loss of opportunity to sell to prospective purchasers listed by plaintiff is held to be the pith of his complaint for termination of his employment to sell defendant's automobiles on commission.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah county: DAVIS, Judge.

Action by F. E. McGinnis, administrator, plaintiff, against Studebaker Corporation of America, defendant. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

[519] This is an action by Clinton D. Phelps against the Studebaker Corporation of America, in which F. E. McGinnis, administrator, was substituted as plaintiff after the death of the original plaintiff.

The defendant, an automobile manufacturer, maintained a retail sales department in Portland, Oregon. The plaintiff was employed by defendant on January [520] 21, 1913, as a retail salesman. Thereafter the defendant transferred its retail business to the Oregon Motor Car Company, and for that reason on April 8, 1913, the employment of plaintiff was terminated. Claiming that his services had been engaged until December 31, 1913, and that defendant had agreed to pay a commission of 5 per cent on each car sold, the plaintiff commenced this action for the recovery of damages and obtained a verdict of $1,200. The jury awarded $300, of the amount recovered, as damages suffered between January 21, 1913, and April 8th following, on account of the failure of defendant to comply with its agreement to keep a sufficient number of cars to demonstrate with; and, after deducting earnings received while in the employ of others, plaintiff was allowed $900 on account of the loss of commissions, which he would have earned on the sale of cars between April 8th and December 31st, if defendant had not terminated the employment. On the motion of defendant, a new trial was granted, and the plaintiff appeals.

Arthur I. Moulton for appellant.

Veazie, McCourt & Veazie for respondent.

HARRIS, J. (after stating the facts).—In substance the complaint alleged that plaintiff could have sold more cars between January 21, 1913, and April 8th, if defendant had provided cars for demonstrating [521] purposes; that it was agreed that the early portion of the year for which plaintiff was employed should be devoted by plaintiff to securing lists of prospective purchasers and interesting them in the cars sold by defendant; that plaintiff did devote about ten weeks of his time securing names of prospective purchasers, and by April 8th had turned over to defendant a large list of prospective purchasers, which list defendant delivered to other parties, who then negotiated with the persons, whose names appeared on such list; and that, if plaintiff had been permitted to continue in his employment, he would have made sales to the persons listed and other prospective purchasers sufficient to have brought him $1,600 in commissions.

The defendant manufactured three types of automobiles, which were priced at $1,650, $1,290, and $885. When the plaintiff entered the service of defendant, he was without experience in the sale of automobiles. He sold eight cars between January 21st and April 8th. The company employed three or more salesmen, whose compensation and duties were the same as plaintiff's. It was the duty of each salesman to make a daily report showing the names of persons who might become interested in the purchase of an automobile, and the persons thus reported were known as "prospects." The plaintiff had seen five or six of his "prospects" driving Studebaker cars after April 8th, and for that reason assumed that these cars had been purchased. The plaintiff testified that he had worked up a lot of cases, so that a demonstration was all that was necessary to effect a sale, because he had been led to believe that purchases would be made if the car was demonstrated and proved to be satisfactory. There was no evidence tending to show that any of plaintiff's "prospects" purchased a Studebaker car, except W. W. Graybeal [522] and John P. Miller, each of whom purchased a $1,290 car, and except Harvey O'Brien and W. W. Graves, who bought $885 cars. The Oregon Motor Car Company received from the defendant a list of plaintiff's "prospects." It appears also from the evidence that names of persons on the Studebaker prospect list might also be on the prospect list of concerns selling other makes of automobiles.

The pith of plaintiff's complaint is that the termination of his employment deprived him of the opportunity of selling to the prospective purchasers listed by him, and the evidence is largely directed to that phase of the case.

1. The theory of the law is to award compensation for gains prevented and for losses sustained when a contract is broken; and a person breaking a contract is liable for the direct, natural and proximate result of his act. The party damaged is not precluded from recovering anticipated profits merely because they are such, since the loss of anticipated profits is a damage that should be compensated for just as much as is the destruction of property. Repeated decisions of this court, as well as the announcements made by courts in other jurisdictions, have firmly established the doctrine that if the business of which the complaining party was deprived was contemplated or could reasonably be presumed to have been contemplated by the parties at the time of making the contract, and if it is reasonably certain that a gain or benefit would have been derived, then damages may be recovered. Uncertainty as to the amount of damages does not prevent recovery, but uncertainty as to whether any benefit or gain would have been derived at all does bar a claim for damages. If it is reasonably certain that a gain or benefit has been prevented, then plaintiff is entitled to damages for the [523] amount of that gain or benefit: Blagen v. Thompson, 23 Ore. 239, 31 Pac. 647, 18 L.R.A. 315; Hoskins v. Scott, 52 Ore. 271, 96 Pac. 1112; Bredemeier v. Pacific Supply Co. 64 Ore. 576, 131 Pac. 312; Fields v. Western Union Tel. Co. 68 Ore. 217, 137 Pac. 200; Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718; Hichhorn v. Bradley, 117 Ia. 130, 90 N. W. 592; Wakeman v. Wheeler, etc. Mfg. Co. 101 N. Y. 205, 4 N. E. 264, 54 Am. Rep. 676; Wells v. National L. Assoc. 99 Fed. 222, 39 C. C. A. 476, 53 L.R.A. 34; Emerson v. Pacific Coast, etc. Packing Co. 96 Minn. 1, 104 N. W. 573, 113 Am. St. Rep. 603, 6 Ann. Cas. 973, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 445; Schumaker v. Heinemann, 99 Wis. 251, 74 N. W. 785; Rice v. Caudle, 71 Ga. 605; Cranmer v. Kohn, 7 S. D. 247, 64 N. W. 125; Goldman v. Wolff, 6 Mo. App. 490.

2. It will be observed that the rule as stated embraces two elements: (1) The business or benefit of which the complaining party was deprived must have been contemplated by the parties, or reasonably presumed to have been contemplated; and (2) it must be reasonably certain that a gain or benefit was prevented. The very nature of the agreement between the parties supplies the first element, because it was the commission on each sale, and therefore the benefit and profit which plaintiff contracted for. The second essential of the rule has produced much perplexity and led to some confusion; but the difficulty lies not so much in a statement of the rule of law as in the application of the governing principle: Hichhorn v. Bradley, 117 Ia. 130, 90 N. W. 592; Emerson v. Pacific Coast, etc. Packing Co. 96 Minn. 1, 104 N. W. 573, 113 Am. St. Rep. 603, 6 Ann. Cas. 973, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 445. If reasonable certainty is not attained, and if it is speculative or doubtful whether a benefit would have been derived, [524] then a complaining party must fail because adequate proof is lacking: Wakeman v. Wheeler, etc. Co. 101 N. Y. 205, 4 N. E. 264, 54 Am. Rep. 676. It should be remembered that the instant case is not analogous to that class of cases where there was an exclusive agency for a definite period, or where the agency covered a certain percentage of the entire output, because in such cases subsequent events generally afford an opportunity of knowing whether sales would have been made: Emerson v. Pacific Coast, etc. Packing Co. 96 Minn. 1, 104 N. W. 573, 113 Am. St. Rep. 603, 6 Ann. Cas. 973, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 445; Rice v. Caudle, 71 Ga. 605; Goldman v. Wolff, 6 Mo. App. 490; Hichhorn v. Bradley, 117 Ia. 130, 90 N. W. 592; Wakeman v. Wheeler, etc. Mfg. Co. 101 N. Y. 205, 4 N. E. 264; Bredemeier v. Pacific Supply Co. 64 Ore. 576, 131 Pac. 312; Gregory v. Spieker, 110 Cal. 150, 42 Pac. 576, 52 Am. St. Rep. 70; Carlson v. Stone-Ordean-Wells Co. 40 Mont. 437, 107 Pac. 419. The facts also easily differentiate Cranmer v. Kohn, 7 S. D. 247, 64 N. W. 125, where the salesman had for two years sold the goods of his employer; nor does a parallel exist between the case at bar and Fields v. Western Union Tel. Co. 68 Ore. 217, 137 Pac. 200.

The grievance emphasized by Phelps is that he was damaged by reason of the refusal of the defendant to permit him to consummate sales to his list of "prospects." Aside from the four "prospects" mentioned, it is pure speculation as to whether a sale would have been made to any of the "prospects." Whether any of the persons listed by plaintiff would have purchased a Studebaker automobile or even a car of any make is conjectural and doubtful: Hoskins v. Scott, 52 Ore. 271, 96 Pac. 1112.

[525] "Mere expectations, doubtful offers, or other vague or indefinite assurances of intention to purchase, without expression of quantity or value, must be classed as speculative, and hence not recoverable." Beck v. West, 87 Ala. 213, 6 So. 70.

See also Brigham v. Carlisle, 78 Ala. 243 (56 Am. Rep. 28).

Regardless of the reasons assigned in the motion for a new trial, the court was empowered to grant a new trial and properly exercised his authority: Smith, etc. Type-writer Co. v. McGeorge, 72 Ore. 523, 143 Pac. 905; Frederick v. Bard, 74 Ore. 457, 145 Pac. 671; Pullen v. Eugene, 77 Ore. 320, 146 Pac. 822, 147 Pac. 768, 1191, 151 Pac. 474.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed. Affirmed.

ON PETITION FOR REHEARING.

(April 6, 1915.)

HARRIS, J.—The plaintiff has filed a petition for a rehearing, and he contends that the court misapprehended the issue presented by the pleadings. We made the statement, advisedly, that:

"The pith of plaintiff's complaint is that the termination of his employment deprived him of the opportunity of selling to the prospective purchasers listed by him, and the evidence is largely directed to that phase of the case."

[526] The complaint alleges that:

"It is understood and agreed that the early portion of said year for which plaintiff was employed should be by plaintiff devoted to securing lists of prospective purchasers of said cars and in interesting prospective purchasers thereof in the types and models of cars manufactured by defendant, and said defendant therein and thereby agreed not to terminate plaintiff's said employment until the end of said year, and to give plaintiff a reasonable opportunity to consummate sales to all such persons whose names were put on said list as might be desirous of purchasing any of the types of automobiles manufactured by defendant; that, in consideration of plaintiff's services in securing purchasers of said output of defendant, said defendant promised and agreed to pay plaintiff 5 per cent of the factory list price of all automobiles for which plaintiff should secure orders and which plaintiff should sell from the output of said defendant, including automobiles manufactured by other firms and corporations, and which were acquired and offered for sale by defendant."

"That plaintiff, on or about the said 21st day of January, 1913, began work under said employment, and for a period of about ten weeks thereafter devoted his time exclusively to securing lists of prospective purchasers of the various types and models of automobiles offered for sale by defendant, and to demonstrating such automobiles to said purchasers, and inducing said prospective purchasers to purchase automobiles of and from defendant; that, in violation of the contract and agreement aforesaid, said defendant during the said ten weeks failed and neglected to supply plaintiff with or keep on hand for plaintiff's use any automobiles of the aforesaid types, known as Studebaker 35 and Studebaker 6, and plaintiff was thereby wholly prevented from making any demonstrations of said classes, although plaintiff had secured names of and entered into negotiations with many prospective purchasers, said persons being named in Schedule A annexed hereto."

[527] And then plaintiff details his grievance on account of the failure to supply sufficient cars for demonstrating purposes. Continuing the complaint asserts:

"That on or about the 8th day of April, 1913, plaintiff had secured and turned over to defendant, for the purpose of permitting defendant to keep a record thereof, a large list of the names of prospective purchasers of the various types of automobiles offered for sale by defendant, which list is hereto annexed and marked Schedule A, and plaintiff had expended a great deal of time and labor in securing said lists and in negotiating with said purchasers for the sale of each thereof of the various types of automobiles manufactured by defendant, and, had plaintiff been permitted to continue in his said employment for defendant, and had defendant kept and performed the said agreement of employment on its part, and supplied plaintiff with a sufficient number of demonstrating cars to enable plaintiff to demonstrate the merits thereof to the persons named in said lists and other prospective purchasers of automobiles, and supplied plaintiff with a sufficient number of automobiles to enable him to consummate sales to said prospective purchasers, plaintiff would have been able to realize as his commission under said contract on sales to be made by him during said year of his employment and from and after the said 8th day of April, 1913, the sum of $1,500."

The remainder of the complaint, as we find it in the printed abstract, occupies about three pages, and, with the exception of the three clauses "or to any other persons," "or to anyone," "to any persons," the listed prospective purchasers constitute the subject matter of such remainder of the complaint.

The alleged loss of opportunity to sell to prospective purchasers listed by plaintiff is the pith of the complaint [528] as plaintiff has told the story of his grievance in his written pleading.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

Affirmed. Rehearing denied.

NOTE.Recovery of Profits as Damages for Breach of Contract to Sell on Commission.

Profits from Sales Anticipated in Future, 1194.

Profits from Sales in Process of Negotiation, 1197.

Profits from Sales Perfected, 1197.

Profits from Sales Anticipated in Future.

The reported case recognizes the general principle laid down in Emerson v. Pacific Coast, etc. Packing Co. 96 Minn. 1, 6 Ann. Cas. 973, that the loss of profits reasonably supposed to be within the contemplation of the parties to a contract to sell on commission is a proximate and natural consequence of the breach of such a contract, and that such profits are recoverable as damages though uncertainty may exist as to the amount thereof. To the same effect are the following recent cases: Bredemeier v. Pacific Supply Co. 64 Ore. 576, 131 Pac. 312; Oklahoma F. Ins. Co. v. Ross (Tex.) 170 S. W. 1062. See also Church v. Wilkeson-Tripp Co. 58 Wash. 262, 108 Pac. 596, 109 Pac. 113, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1059, wherein the court said: "When the direct purpose of the contract is to enable one of the parties to earn commissions or profits, he is entitled to recover profits actually lost as his damages for the breach of the contract by the other party. As a condition precedent to a recovery of damages for loss of contemplated profits, it must, as a general rule, appear that such loss was reasonably certain and not a fictitious or imaginary one; that fact being established, the damages are to be ascertained by the jury, although not always capable of being precisely measured by exact methods of computation."

However in other of the recent decisions a view is taken in accord with that expressed in Wilson v. Wernwag, 217 Pa. St. 82, 10 Ann. Cas. 649, that while it is necessary to show with reasonable certainty that damage from loss of prospective profits had resulted from a breach of a contract to sell on commission, there must in addition be evidence forming a fairly safe and reliable basis on which to estimate the amount of damages in order to permit a recovery. In other words it seems that more room for speculation and conjecture is allowed in the one class of cases than in the other. See U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Ridge (Mo.) 179 S. W. 791; Laishley v. Goold Bicycle Co. 6 Ont. L. Rep. 319. See also Schiffman v. Peerless Motor Car Co. 13 Cal. App. 600, 110 Pac. 460.

Data as to the amount of the commissions actually earned during the time a contract or agreement was in force and being carried out, or for the executed term of a like contract are generally looked on as a safe and reliable basis on which to calculate future profits. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Ridge (Mo.) 179 S. W. 791. See also Randall v. Peerless Motor Car Co. 212 Mass. 352, 99 N. E. 221; Isbell v. Anderson Carriage Co. 170 Mich. 304, 136 N. W. 457; Richey v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 140 Wis. 486, 122 N. W. 1030.

The general rules heretofore stated are of slight value in determining the right to recover in a particular case for loss of profits, each case depending largely on its own facts. In a number of recent cases, a recovery has been allowed. Thus, in Blumenthal v. Bridges, 91 Ark. 212, 120 S. W. 974, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 279, it appeared that a real estate broker was given the right for a definite period to sell a tract of land, and to be paid as commissions all he received over two dollars an acre. The property in question having been sold by the owner before the termination of the time for which the agreement was to run, the broker brought an action for damages based upon lost profits. In holding that the trial court's instruction, that the broker could recover only on offering proof that he had found a purchaser and tendered the price to the owner before revocation, was not correct, the court said: "Even if he had not produced a purchaser before the revocation, he would have been entitled to recover by proving by competent testimony that he could, within the remaining time of the contract, have sold the land at an advance over the price named in the contract. This he might have shown by proving that the lands were of sufficient value in the market, and that his opportunities for finding a purchaser were such that he could have found a purchaser at an advanced price if he had been permitted to do so."

In Schiffman v. Peerless Motor Car Co. 13 Cal. App. 600, 110 Pac. 460, the profits that an agent would have derived from sales of automobiles and supplies made by his principal contrary to the terms of a contract not to sell in the territory given to an agent were held to be recoverable as damages by the agent. The court therein said: "The profits which plaintiff here complains that he was deprived of are those which he would have made from the sale of these machines had the defendant either refused to invade the exclusive territory granted to him or have referred the inquiries of the purchasers to him, as it agreed to do in the contract. There is nothing speculative or uncertain as to the amount of profits of which plaintiff was thus deprived, and their loss is so closely connected with the breach of the obligation by defendant, that it is difficult to see any ground upon which it can be said that plaintiff's injury is too remote either in nature or origin."

It was held in Meglemry v. Gebhardt Chili Powder Co. 187 Ill. App. 14, that where an agent, employed for a specified term to introduce food products in a certain territory, who was to pay his own expenses, maintain an office, employ men and receive his compensation from commissions on goods sold, was wrongfully prevented from carrying out his contract, future profits which he might have earned during the unexpired term of the contract were recoverable as damages.

In U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Ridge (Mo.) 179 S. W. 791, it was held that expected profits were recoverable on the wrongful termination of an insurance agency, for such damages "were not too remote, since there were actual data upon which a reasonable estimate could be based." While just what was intended by the "actual data" referred to is not expressly stated it seems that the plaintiff having been the defendant's agent for some years before, the court had in mind the amount of the past commissions. The court in Oklahoma F. Ins. Co. v. Ross (Tex.) 710 S. W. 1062, in holding that an agent of an insurance company could recover as damages the profits which he would have realized from commissions on premiums under a contract, for the breach of which he was suing, said: "In the very nature of things, the amount of such profits is, to a considerable extent, speculative, but the authorities hold that that fact will not prevent a recovery. In this case it was shown that after the insurance company had discharged the plaintiff it ceased to do business in Texas on the ground that it was not profitable so to do. But there was testimony tending to show that Ross and Beasley were building up a business at the time the former was discharged; that it was largely through his efforts that the business referred to had been obtained, and we cannot say that the jury was not justified in reaching the conclusion that, if the plaintiff had not been discharged, the business would probably have been successful and attained such proportions as that during the remaining four years the plaintiff would have earned as commissions the amount awarded him as actual damages."

It was held in Richey v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 140 Wis. 486, 122 N. W. 1030, that future profits were properly allowed as damages for the breach of a ten-year contract to solicit insurance and to collect premiums on all insurance effected, where there was evidence showing "the amount of business respondent did during the first two years of the contract period; that he had organized it with a view to enlarging and increasing it for the eight remaining years, and to this end he invested his money in the business; that he was very successful as an insurance solicitor and business promoter; that the prospects for doing a future business, with the enterprise so established, were favorable; that in all reasonable probability he would do an increased business; and that he was prevented from reaping the benefits therefrom only by appellant's termination of his agency."

In Bredemeier v. Pacific Supply Co. 64 Ore. 576, 131 Pac. 312, a recovery of future profits was had for the breach of a contract by the terms of which the plaintiffs were to have the exclusive agency in the state of Oregon for a period of ten years of a certain washing compound to be furnished in any quantity at a stipulated price, which contract the defendants broke after the plaintiffs had begun to carry it out by placing demonstrators in stores, by placing salesmen and advertising men on the road, and by making sales thereunder.

In Randall v. Peerless Motor Car Co. 212 Mass. 352, 99 N. E. 221, the plaintiff was allowed prospective profits as damages for the breach of a contract by the terms of which it was provided that he was to be the exclusive agent on a commission basis for the sale of the defendant's automobile in the New England states for the period of one year. He showed that the contract was broken during the first month of its existence; that he was to pay practically all expenses of the agency; that the business of selling automobiles though then somewhat new was not uncertain since he had sold four Peerless cars the previous year; that he was intimately acquainted with that branch of the trade; that he had subagents working or ready to work in soliciting orders; and that the defendant had sold thirty-seven cars during that year.

In Laishley v. Goold Bicycle Co. 6 Ont. L. Rep. 319, it appearing that the plaintiff's three-year agency for the sale of bicycles in an exclusive territory was broken after he had served for almost two-thirds of the period, it was held that his anticipated profits for the remaining period should be allowed him as damages, the court saying that the evidence of the past earnings under the agreement and of the amount of business done in the continuation of the business for the remaining period that the contract would have run constituted a sufficiently safe basis of calculation.

In Merrimac Mfg. Co. v. Bibb, 119 Ark. 443, 178 S. W. 403, a traveling salesman selling on commission was not allowed to recover future profits as damages for the reason that previous to the breaking of the contract by his employer by failing to make payments as specified he had himself violated the agreement. But it was said that had he been free from fault: he might have treated the refusal of the defendants to pay him the commissions provided for in the contract as a manifestation of an intention on their part not to perform the contract according to its terms, and sued, not only for the commissions already earned by him under the contract, but also for such commissions as he would have earned thereafter."

In Carlson v. Stone-Ordean-Wells Co. 40 Mont. 434, 107 Pac. 419, wherein the action was for the breach of a contract giving the exclusive right to sell a certain brand of matches in specified territory, it was said: "It is urged that the evidence is insufficient to show that the plaintiff would have sold the 823 cases of matches if the defendant had not done so. There is some evidence in the record tending to prove that prior to March, 1908, plaintiff, at considerable trouble and expense to himself, had built up an extensive and profitable business in these matches in Butte in selling the same to the retail trade; that when Draper and Casey, agents for the defendant company, came to Butte in March, 1908, and called upon plaintiff to solicit a further carload order from him, they found plaintiff with a quantity of the goods on hand, and, in order to assist in disposing of the goods then in stock that the new order might be received, these agents of the defendant proposed to assist the plaintiff's salesman in soliciting orders from the merchants in Butte, and plaintiff sent his salesman with these agents among the plaintiff's customers and others; and the result of the work was the sale of 200 or more cases of matches which the plaintiff had on hand, and also the sale of 823 cases of matches of the 'Tip Toe' and 'Stay Lit' brands. The plaintiff having demanded that he be allowed his commission on the sale of these 823 cases, and his demand having been refused, a controversy arose, resulting in the defendant company distributing these matches, when they arrived in Butte, through another merchant there. There is some evidence that with one exception, or possibly two exceptions, the persons to whom these 823 cases were sold had been customers of plaintiff theretofore, and were such thereafter; that, as soon as these 823 cases were received and distributed among the retail dealers in Butte, plaintiff's business in the sale of matches was practically suspended for some six months, until those matches had been sold and consumed, when his business was again restored. While it may have been impossible to prove that the plaintiff would have sold precisely 823 cases of these matches if defendant had not done so, still, in view of the fact that plaintiff was in equally as good position to make the sales as the agents of the defendant, who were strangers in Butte, apparently, and in view of the further fact that plaintiff did contribute to make these sales, to the extent at least that his own salesman assisted them by going with them and introducing them to the Butte merchants; and in view of the further fact that the amount of the sales actually made by defendant is not in dispute, and that the jury had before them the percentage of profit which plaintiff was making upon his sales of matches—we think there is in this record sufficient evidence upon which the jury could estimate with reasonable certainty the damages which the plaintiff sustained by the wrongful act of the defendant, basing such damages upon the profits which he lost on the sale of the goods which it is reasonably certain he would have made, but for the sale by the defendant."

However, in other recent cases, future profits have not been allowed to be recovered as damages. Thus, in Crawford v. Cicotte, 186 Mich. 269, 152 N. W. 1065, the plaintiff sought to recover the profits he would have made under a contract giving him, for a valuable consideration, an option to sell real estate which provided the price which the property should bring and the commissions to be paid. The evidence showed that the property had been sold by the owner before the expiration of the contract. It was held that since the contract specified that compensation was to be paid only on the making of a sale, and up to the time the sale was made no purchaser willing to pay the price had been secured, it was entirely problematical whether the broker would have been able to secure such a purchaser within the time limit, and no recovery could be had.

In Isbell v. Anderson Carriage Co. 176 Mich. 304, 136 N. W. 457, prospective profits as damages for the breach of a five-year contract of agency for automobiles manufactured by the defendant were held to have been improperly allowed. It was shown that the car proposed to be sold, being new and untried, had no market at the beginning of the term of the agency, and that none had been established at the time of the breach. The court said too much conjecture was involved in allowing the jury to say that the plaintiffs would have worked as zealously to effect sales as the defendant did after the breach, and that the defendant would not have availed itself of its right provided by the contract to terminate the contract on sixty days' notice.

In Church v. Wilkeson Tripp Co. 58 Wash. 282, 108 Pac. 596, 109 Pac. 113, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1059, it appearing that the plaintiffs had entered into an agreement with the de-defendant to sell on commission bonds to the amount of $300,000, the only security for which was property valued at and bought for $65,000, which agreement was broken, only damages on sales actually made were allowed to be recovered, since, the court said, to assume that investors would have purchased all or any considerable portion of the bonds under the conditions stated involved "considerable credulity."

In Oberfelder v. J. G. Mattingly Co. (Ky.) 120 S. W. 352, it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant had entered into a contract making the plaintiff the exclusive agent to sell on commission certain liquors in the New England states and New York city for a period of one year. It was further provided that if the first year sales exceeded a specified amount the contract should continue for five years with the defendant having the option to terminate it at the end of any year. The agreement having been wrongfully terminated before the end of the first year it was held that in addition to recovering profits on sales already made, profits on all sales made by the defendant or anyone else in the specified territory subsequent to the breach and before the end of the year should be allowed, but any damages for sales made after that time would be too remote.

Profits from Sales in Process of Negotiation.

Since the authority of an agent engaged to sell on commission, even though not for a definite term, cannot be revoked in bad faith in the midst of negotiations for a sale in order to escape the payment of commissions, it has been held in several cases, in the majority of which the agency was for the sale of real estate, that the profits or commissions that would have been derived from the sale were recoverable as damages for the wrongful termination of the contract. Green-span v. Miller, 111 Ark. 190, 163 S. W. 776 (agency for phonographs); Howard v. Street, 125 Md. 289, 93 Atl. 923; O'Connell v. Casey, 206 Mass. 520, 92 N. E. 804; Weisels-Gerhart Real Estate Co. v. Epstein, 157 Mo. App. 101, 137 S. W. 326; Dodge v. Childers, 167 Mo. App. 448, 151 S. W. 749; Anderson v. Crow (Tex.) 151 S. W. 1080. See also Handley v. Shaffer, 177 Ala. 636, 59 So. 286; Laux v. Hogl, 45 Mont. 445, 123 Pac. 949 (agency for sale of stock in brewing company, and real estate); Newton v. Conness (Tex.) 106 S. W. 892; Schnack v. Montano, 16 Hawaii 805. "But if the [seller] acts in good faith, not seeking to escape the payment of commissions, but moved fairly by a view of his own interest, he has the absolute right before a bargain is made while negotiations remain unsuccessful, before commissions are earned, to revoke the broker's authority, and the latter cannot thereafter claim compensation for a sale made by the principal, even though it be to a customer with whom the broker unsuccessfully negotiated, and even though, to some extent, the seller might justly be said to have availed himself of the fruits of the broker's labor." Cadigan v. Crabtree, 186 Mass. 7, 70 N. E. 1033, 104 Am. St. Rep. 543, 66 L.R.A. 982.

In Eastern Motor Sales Corp. v. Apperson-Lee Motor Co. 117 Va. 495, 85 S. E. 479, it appeared that an exclusive agency for a certain automobile truck had been given by a contract which could be terminated on ten days' notice. The employer before any notice of termination was given negotiated the sale of a truck to a person within the agent's territory whom the agent had originally interested in the truck. Subsequently the employer having given notice of the termination of the contract delivered the truck to the purchaser before the expiration of the ten-day period. It was held that the agent was entitled to the commission he would have realized from the sale, the trial court properly charging the jury that if the letter notifying the agent of the termination of the contract was solely for the purpose of depriving him of his commission on the sale of the truck he should have a recovery.

But in J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Decatur First Nat. Bank (Tex.) 160 S. W. 662, wherein it appeared that an agent engaged in a certain county under an agreement, apparently not exclusive in character, to sell farm machinery on commission "to be calculated and allowed only on the basis of the list price" sought to recover a commission on machinery sold by his principal for less than the list price to a person whom he had interested therein, it was held that proof that the customer would have purchased at the list price was essential to a recovery of the profits he might have derived from the sale.

Profits from Sales Perfected.

The self-evident rule that a person employed for a definite period to sell on commission on being wrongfully prohibited from carrying out his contract is entitled to recover the profits on sales completed at the time of the breach, is supported by the following recent cases: Oberfelder v. J. G. Mattingly Co. (Ky.) 120 S. W. 352; Church v. Wilkeson-Tripp Co. 58 Wash. 262, 108 Pac. 596, 109 Pac. 113, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1059. See also Merrimac Mfg. Co. v. Bibb, 119 Ark. 443, 178 S. W. 403.

IN RE BAILEY.

Montana Supreme Court—March 1, 1915.

50 Mont. 365; 146 Pac. 1101.

Attorneys — Unauthorized Practice as Contempt.

Under Rev. Codes, § 6388, providing that if any person practice law in any court, except a justice's court or a police court, without having received a license as attorney, he is guilty of a contempt of court, where respondent advised clients as to legal matters pending or to be brought before courts of record, and prepared pleadings and proceedings for use in such courts, and appeared before courts of record by his partner, he "practices law" in such a sense as to render him guilty of contempt when without a license.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Rev. Codes, § 7309, subd. 6, providing that assuming to be an officer, attorney, or counsel of a court, and acting as such without authorization, shall constitute contempt of court, where respondent employed all customary methods to advertise himself as an attorney, when without a license, he is guilty of contempt.

[See note at end of this case.]

Right to Practice — Nature of Right.

The practice of law is not an inherent right, but a privilege subject entirely to state control.

[See 2 R. C. L. tit. Attorneys at Law, p. 942.]

Original contempt proceeding against Wendell Bailey for practicing law without license. The facts are stated in the opinion. RESPONDENT ADJUDGED GUILTY.

C. B. Nolan for respondent.

D. M. Kelly, J. H. Alvord and F. P. Leiper for State.

[365] SANNER, J.—On January 19, 1915, the attorney general of this state filed in this court an accusation charging one Wendell Bailey, of Sidney, Richland county, Montana, with a contempt of this [366] court, in that said Bailey "is holding himself out as an attorney at law, by advertisement and otherwise, and is practicing the profession of an attorney and counselor at law in courts of record in the said town and county, without having first been admitted so to do by this court." Upon this accusation, which was supported in detail by the affidavit of F. J. Matoushek, Herbert H. Hoar and Carl L. Brattin, all regularly licensed attorneys residing at Sidney, a citation was issued requiring the respondent to appear and show cause why he should not be punished. He appeared and entered his plea of not guilty and filed a detailed answer consisting of denials, admissions and matters in avoidance. A hearing was duly had before this court, testimony being taken both in support of and against said accusation, and thereafter the matter was duly submitted for judgment and decision.

No good purpose would be served by reciting the evidence at length. Suffice it to say, the following facts were made to appear without substantial contradiction: The respondent has never been admitted to practice law in this state; but on February 16, 1914, he opened a law office at Sidney, from which time and until June 1, 1914, he maintained and conducted said office in his individual name, displayed at the entrance thereof a sign reading, "Wendell Bailey, Attorney at Law," caused a card to be published in the telephone directory commonly used at Sidney, and in four newspapers of general circulation in Richland county, to the effect that he was an "attorney and counselor at law," procured and used stationery proclaiming him to be an "attorney and counselor at law," received, advised and acted for clients in legal matters pending in court and otherwise, represented them in proceedings cognizable only by the courts of record of this state, and charged and accepted compensation for such services; that on or about June 1, 1914, he associated himself in partnership with one R. O. Lunke, a licensed attorney of this court, said partnership being formed for the general practice of law, including practice in the courts of record of this state, particularly the district courts of Richland and Dawson counties; that said partnership continued in existence up [367] to the time of the hearing herein, proclaimed itself by signs, cards, stationery and indorsements upon pleadings as a firm of attorneys at law, prepared, signed and filed pleadings as such in the district court of Richland county, received, advised and acted for clients in legal matters pending in court and otherwise, appeared for clients in proceedings before said court, and charged and accepted compensation for services in that behalf; that the respondent actively participated in the business and operations of said firm, and prior to October 28, 1914, appeared in person before the district court of Richland county as a member of said firm, claiming to represent and representing parties to actions or proceedings before said court; that after October 28, 1914, and up to the time of the hearing herein, he prepared, signed and filed pleadings in said court for and on behalf of said firm and as a member thereof, formulated briefs, advised clients touching legal matters, consulted with his associate concerning the business intrusted by clients to said firm, and claimed a share in the revenues derived from its professional activities.

It is not contested that the foregoing acts, if they constitute contempt at all, are a contempt of this court. Indeed, this could scarcely be questioned, in view of the provisions of Title V, Part I, Code of Civil Procedure, whereby the authority to admit attorneys to the practice is vested solely in this court. The contention is that these acts do not constitute contempt at all under any statutory provision of this state.

The Revised Codes (section 6388) provide: "If any person practice law in any court, except a justice's court or a police court, without having received a license as attorney and counselor, he is guilty of a contempt of court." The distinguished counsel for respondent seeks the exoneration of his client upon the ground that the record does not show that respondent practiced law in any court other than a justice or police court. We cannot assent to this. A person who makes it his business to act and who does act for and by the warrant of others in legal formalities, negotiations or proceedings, practices law (National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 621; In re Duncan, 83 [368] S. C. 186, 18 Ann. Cas. 657, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 750, 65 S. E. 210; and when his acts consist in advising clients touching legal matters pending or to be brought before a court of record, or in preparing pleadings or proceedings for use in a court of record, or in appearing before a court of record, either directly or by a partner or proxy, he is practicing law in a court of record. (Chautauqua County Bank v. Risley, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 375; Abercrombie v. Jordan, 8 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 187; In re Simmons, 15 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 348.) The respondent seems to think that, so far as his activities prior to October 28, 1914, are concerned, a plenary absolution was granted him at that time by two of the members of this court—one of them being the writer—on condition that he refrain thereafter from practicing in the district court. No such thing occurred; but, had it occurred, the condition assumed was not observed. After October 28, 1914, the respondent continued as a member of the firm of Lunke & Bailey to do all the things which constitute practice in the district court, save only the personal conduct of causes therein, which was confided to Mr. Lunke.

But section 6388 is not the only statutory provision applicable to the conduct of the respondent. Subdivision 6 of section 7309 provides: "The following acts or omissions, in respect to a court of justice, or proceedings therein, are contempts of the authority of the court: . . . Assuming to be an officer, attorney or counsel of a court, and acting as such without authority." From February 16 to June 1, 1914, the respondent employed all the customary methods to advertise himself as an attorney and counselor at law, capable and authorized to do any business in any court which a duly licensed attorney might do; and from June 1, 1914, up to the time of the hearing herein, he and his associate, as the firm of Lunke & Bailey, presented themselves to the public in a similar manner and aspect. As to this there was no ostensible change after October 28, 1914. The only attorneys and counselors known to the law of this state are attorneys and counselors of this court, licensed and authorized as such to practice law within this state; and, if by his conduct the respondent did not assume to be an [369] attorney and counselor of this court, then such an assumption is impossible, and subdivision 6 of section 7309 has no meaning at all. (State v. Richardson, 125 La. 645, 51 So. 673; People v. Erbaugh, 42 Colo. 480, 94 Pac. 349; Edmonson v. Davis, 4 Esp. (Eng.) 14; Abercrombie v. Jordan, supra.)

When we consider the relationship of attorney and client and its consequences to the client, as well as to his possible adversary, it becomes manifest that insistence upon due authorization of the persons acting as attorneys is of vital importance. People do not ordinarily demand an inspection of the license of one who proclaims himself an attorney at law; they take it for granted, as they may do, that he is what he assumes to be. The law says who may and who may not practice as an attorney, who may and who may not assume to be such. The people have a right to presume that the law in this respect is being enforced; if it is not enforced, such persons as intrust their business to an unchallenged pretender are permitted, in matters of life, of liberty and of property, to lean upon a broken reed. For this reason it is universally held that the practice of law is not an inherent right but a privilege, subject entirely to state control.

From the evidence presented we find that the respondent, Wendell Bailey, is guilty of contempt, as charged in the accusation of the attorney general; and it is ordered and adjudged that for such contempt he pay a fine of $250, or stand committed to the custody of the sheriff of Lewis and Clark county, Montana, until the same be paid.

Holloway, J., concurs.

BRANTLY, C. J.—I was not present at the hearing, and therefore did not observe the witness who testified thereat. But having informed myself by an examination of the stenographic report made at the time, and having found that there is no substantial conflict in the evidence, I feel that I may with propriety concur in the result reached by Mr. Justice Sanner.

NOTE.Practising Law without License as Contempt of Court.

It would seem on general principles that the act of an unlicensed person in assuming to act as an attorney with respect to actual litigation would constitute such an interference with the administration of justice as to be a common-law contempt, but the question has apparently never been passed on. In some jurisdictions it is provided by statute that the unauthorized practice of law shall constitute a contempt of court, and in a few cases those statutes have been applied. In re Ainsworth [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 103, 74 L. J. K. B. 462, 92 L. T. N. S. 462, 53 W. R. 533; People v. Erbaugh, 42 Colo. 480, 94 Pac. 349; People v. Ellis, 44 Colo. 176, 96 Pac. 783; People v. Taylor, 56 Colo. 441, 138 Pac. 762. And see the reported case. See also Incorporated Law Soc. 5 Rep. (Eng.) 525, 69 L. T. N. S. 385; Davies v. Davies, 57 Sol. J. (Eng.) 534, 29 Times L. Rep. 513; Abercrombie v. Jordan, 8 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 187; Anderson v. Coolin, 27 Idaho 334, 149 Pac. 286. Thus in Davies v. Davies, supra, wherein it appeared that an unqualified person acted in obtaining a decree nisi for divorce made absolute, and asked for and obtained from the petitioner a larger sum than was really payable as the necessary fee, the court holding that he had been guilty of contempt made an order that he should be committed to prison for six weeks and pay the costs of the proceedings against him.

In People v. Taylor, 56 Colo. 441, 138 Pac. 762, an information was filed against the respondent, alleging that he was advertising and holding himself out to the public as an attorney, when as a matter of fact he was not licensed to practice law in the state, and asking that he be judged guilty of contempt. The respondent admitted that he had not been licensed by the court to practice law and that he had advertised as being a lawyer but contended that the statute did not apply to him for the reason that he had only advertised as a "lawyer," and that the statute only embraced those who advertised, represented, or held themselves out as an "attorney, attorney at law, or counselor at law." Holding that these terms were synonymous and that the respondent was guilty of contempt the court said: "Chapter 9 of the Revised Statutes of 1908 provides in substance that no person shall be permitted to practice as an attorney, or commence, defend, or conduct any action in which he is not a party concerned in any court of record within this state, without having previously obtained a license for that purpose from the supreme court, which license shall constitute the person receiving the same an attorney at law, and shall authorize him to appear in all courts of record in this state, and there to practice in that capacity during his good behavior. It further provides that he shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation that he will support the Constitution of the United States and of the state of Colorado, and that he will faithfully execute the duties of an attorney and counselor at law according to the best of his understanding and abilities. It also provides that no person, with certain exceptions not involved in this case, shall be entitled to receive a license to practice as an attorney until the supreme court is satisfied by an examination, either in open court or by members of the bar to be designated by the court, that the applicant is of good moral character, and possesses the requisite education and knowledge of the law to justify his admission to the bar. By virtue of these provisions this court has adopted rules providing for a committee of law examiners, the period which applicants must have studied, either in the office of a practicing attorney or attendance at a law school approved by the committee, and other general educational qualifications of applicants for admission to the bar, that they must be of good moral character, and that such applicants must pass an approved examination by the committee, and satisfy the committee that their moral character is good, before they will be admitted to practice law in this state. These rules are in effect an order of this court that no person shall practice law in this state except upon a compliance with such rules and the laws governing the admission of attorneys, the main purpose of which is to protect the public from being damaged through intrusting their legal business to incompetent and improper persons claiming to be licensed attorneys who in fact are not. Any person engaging in the practice of the law in this state is bound to take notice of this order, and, if he violates it by failure to comply with the prescribed requirements which must be complied with before he is entitled to hold himself out to the public as licensed to engage in the general practice of the law, he is guilty of contempt, the same as any other person violating an order of court of which he is bound to take notice."

In the case of In re Ainsworth [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 103, 74 L. J. K. B. 462, 92 L. T. N. S. 462, 53 W. R. 533, a motion was made on behalf of the incorporated law society for a writ of attachment against the respondent for contempt of court in having acted as a solicitor without being duly qualified so to act, contrary to the provisions of the Solicitors Act. Lord Alverstone, C.J., saying that an offense had been committed, although it might be little more than a technical one and that under the circumstances it would be sufficient to accept the respondent's expression of regret, holding him to pay the costs of the application, said: "The rule clearly contemplates that giving notice of appearance shall be a step in the action. The document sent as a notice of appearance by Mr. Ainsworth to the plaintiff's solicitors states that he, Henry Ainsworth, has this day entered an appearance for the defendant Greenhalgh, and that he requires delivery of a statement of claim, and the document is signed by Henry Ainsworth, 'agent for Joseph Greenhalgh.' I am of opinion that it was intended by rule 9 that the notice should be given either by the defendant himself or by his solicitor, and the intervention of a third person acting for the defendant, and purporting to do that which is taking a step in the action—a step which, where the defendant does not take it himself, could properly only be taken by a solicitor—is, in my view, a contravention of the statute."

In People v. Ellis, 44 Colo. 176, 96 Pac. 783, the information charged that the respondent, notwithstanding he had no license or authority to practice law in Colorado, had been advertising, representing and holding himself out as an attorney, appearing in courts of record to conduct suits, actions and proceedings for other persons, as an attorney, and had practiced law in violation of the statutes of the state; and prayed that the respondent should be brought before the court and punished for contempt, as provided by the statute (Sessions Laws 1905, p. 157). The respondent admitted that he had practiced law in Colorado, notwithstanding the prohibition of the statute, but disclaimed any intentional violation of the law. He pleaded guilty to the charge preferred in the information, and set forth in mitigation of the offense that he was admitted to practice in the courts of Kentucky in the year 1881, and continued in the active practice of law in that state for a period of more than twenty years; that he was admitted to practice before the courts of the territory of New Mexico in January, 1905, and was admitted to practice before the department of the interior in the year 1907; that no charges had ever been preferred against him, and that he was now entitled to practice law in the state of Kentucky, the territory of New Mexico, and before the interior department; that he removed to Montezuma county, in Colorado, for the purpose of locating there, and secured from the clerk of the court a copy of the rules, and attempted to comply therewith, made application to practice, and provided and forwarded to the proper authority certificates of his admission to practice in New Mexico, and, being unable to find his certificate, made affidavit that he was admitted to practice in the state of Kentucky; that believing he had done all that was required to entitle him to practice, he accepted employment as an attorney at law, but before doing so advised with the district judge of the district wherein he resided as to his right to appear in a court of record, and was informed by the judge that, under the circumstances, he should be allowed to appear in court; that expecting daily to receive his license to practice, he accepted other employment; that on different occasions he had furnished the board of law examiners further credentials, and had sent the board his certificate of admission to practice in Kentucky, and letters from prominent members of the bar of that state and from officers of the district wherein he resided recommending his admission to the bar; that the board of law examiners had requested letters certifying to his good moral character from citizens of the place of his last residence in New Mexico, and that he had written for such letters and expected to be able to furnish them: that he did not know of the law of 1905 until he learned through the public press that information had been filed against him, and that he immediately on receiving a copy of the information stopped all manner of practice; and he stated that he would immediately advise his clients that he was not entitled to practice, and that he would no longer hold himself out as an attorney at law. He further stated that no charge could be truthfully made against his honor and integrity as an attorney and as a man. The court said that the statements in his answer not having been controverted they would accept them as truthful, and although the respondent had violated the statute they thought he had not done so intentionally, and under the circumstances disclosed, their duty did not require his punishment and they would discharge him.

v.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Minnesota Supreme Court—June 11, 1915.

130 Minn. 57; 153 N. W. 247.

Public Service Commissions — Reasonableness of Order — Judicial Review.

The question whether an order of the state railroad and warehouse commission is reasonable is a judicial question.

Same.

Under our statute the district court on appeal from an order of the commission does not put itself in the place of the commission and substitute its findings for those of the commission, nor does it set aside such an order on its own conception of its wisdom. The court reviews the order only so far as to determine whether or not it is unlawful and unreasonable.

Test of Reasonableness of Order.

There is no test of reasonableness that will fit all cases, but an order is unreasonable if contrary to federal or state constitution or laws, or if beyond the power of the commission, or if based on mistake of law, or if without evidence to support it, or if so arbitrary as to be beyond the exercise of reasonable discretion and judgment.

Same.

Pecuniary loss or profit to the carrier is important, but not the only criterion. The question of reasonableness is to be determined by a consideration of the interests both of the carrier and of the public.

Railroads — Order Requiring Sunday Train Service — Validity.

The order of the commission reviewed in this case is an order compelling the operation of a Sunday local day passenger train. The trial court declined to pass upon the question of pecuniary loss or profit. The order of the commission being by statute prima facie reasonable, and the burden being on the appellant upon all issues raised by the appeal, we are obliged to assume that the order did not impose a financial burden, but, the compulsion of Sunday labor and of the operation of Sunday local passenger trains is contrary to the legislative policy of the state, and while under some circumstances the operation of Sunday trains may be made compulsory, under the facts of this case the judgment of the trial court holding this order to be unreasonable and void must be sustained.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Ramsey county: DICKSON, Judge.

Matter of appeal of Great Northern Railway Company from order of State Railroad and Warehouse Commission. From judgment rendered, State appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Lyndon A. Smith and Alonzo J. Edgerton for appellant.

M. L. Countryman and A. L. Janes for respondent.

[58] HALLAM, J.—For some years past the defendant railroad company has operated a line of railroad between Grand Forks, North Dakota, and Duluth, Minnesota. Up to November 22, 1914, it operated upon that line, daily including Sunday, two trains each way, one a day train and the other a night train. On the day last mentioned the defendant discontinued the operation of its Sunday day trains on this line, leaving all week day trains and the Sunday night trains operated as theretofore. The state Railroad and Warehouse Commission, after hearing, ordered the Sunday day trains restored. Defendant appealed to the district court. That court, after trial, found that the order of the commission restoring the Sunday trains was "unlawful and unreasonable and not justified by public necessity or convenience," and adjudged that the same be vacated and set aside. The state appeals.

The statute provides that:

"Whenever, in the judgment of the commission . . . any . . . change (by a common carrier) in the mode of operating its road or conducting its business, will promote the security or convenience of the public, the commission, by a written order . . . shall require . . . the making of such . . . change." G. S. 1913, § 4178.

The statute further provides for an appeal from the order of the commission to the district court. G. S. 1913, § 4191. The appeal [59] is "tried . . . according to the rules relating to the trial of civil actions, so far as the same are applicable." Upon such trial the commission's "findings of fact" are "prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated," and the order is "prima facie reasonable, and the burden of proof upon all issues raised by the appeal" is upon the appellant. If the court determines "that the order appealed from is lawful and reasonable," it is affirmed. If it determines "that the order is unlawful or unreasonable" it is "vacated and set aside." G. S. 1913, § 4192.

1. The statute in terms makes the reasonableness of the order of the commission a question for the court to determine on appeal. This is a valid statutory provision. The reasonableness of the order is properly a judicial question. Argument of that proposition was foreclosed by the decision of the Federal Supreme Court more than a quarter of a century ago. In the first case decided by that court involving the powers of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of this state, it was held that "the question of the reasonableness of a rate of charge for transportation by a railroad company, involving as it does the element of reasonableness both as regards the company and as regards the public, is eminently a question for judicial investigation, requiring due process of law for its determination." Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 458, 10 S. Ct. 462, 467, 702, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 970, 982.

2. The principles on which the court acts in determining whether or not an order of the commission is reasonable, have been the subject of much controversy, but the law on that subject is now pretty well settled. The legislature never intended that the court should put itself in the place of the commission, try the matter anew as an administrative body, substituting its findings for those of the commission. A statute which so provided would be unconstitutional as a delegation to the judiciary of nonjudicial powers. Steenerson v. Great Northern R. Co. 69 Minn. 353, 375, 72 N. W. 713; Prentiss v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 211 U. S. 210, 226, 29 S. Ct. 67, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 150, 159; Washington v. Fairchild, 224 U. S. 510, 527, 32 S. Ct. 535, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 863, 869; Bacon v. Rutland R. Co. 232 U. S. 134, 34 S. Ct. 283, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 538; Detroit, etc. R. Co. v. [60] Michigan R. Commission, 235 U. S. 402, 35 S. Ct. 126, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 288. The making of regulations which require a carrier to afford proper transportation facilities to the public, is legislative or administrative and not judicial in its nature. State v. Great Northern R. Co. 123 Minn. 463, 144 N. W. 155. The courts must not usurp legislative or administrative functions by setting aside a legislative or administrative order on their own conception of its wisdom. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 215 U. S. 452, 470, 30 S. Ct. 155, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 280, 288. In Steenerson v. Great Northern R. Co. 69 Minn. 353, 375, 72 N. W. 713, 716, a rate case, this court, in construing the statute then in force, which was broader than the one now in force, held that it was the intention of the legislature that the court on appeal should "review the findings of the commission in the same manner as the appellate court reviews the findings of the jury on a trial in the court below. And for this purpose the court may 'examine the whole matter in controversy, including matters of fact, as well as questions of law,'" but that the district court can review the findings of the commission only so far as to determine whether or not the rates fixed by the commission are reasonable. This presents a situation somewhat anomalous in that the court may receive evidence in order to determine whether findings of fact are sustainable, but we can conceive of no other fair construction of this statute that will at the same time confine the court within its constitutional powers. The court, on appeal from the order of the commission, must distinguish, then, between the legislative power to establish regulations and the judicial power to determine upon the reasonableness of regulations already established.

3. We address ourselves, then, to this question: Can the decision of the trial court that the order of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission was unreasonable be sustained? No court or commentator has yet undertaken to lay down a rule which shall furnish a test of what is reasonable that will fit every case. "Indeed," as said by Brewer, J., in Ames v. Union Pac. Ry. Co. 64 Fed. 165, 177, "it is doubtful whether any single rule can be laid down, applicable to all cases." 2 Elliott, Railroads, § 692. Some things, however, are [61] definitely settled. The order may be vacated as unreasonable if it is contrary to some provision of the Federal or state constitution or laws, or if it is beyond the power granted to the commission, or if it is based on some mistake of law, or if there is no evidence to support it, or if, having regard to the interest of both the public and the carrier, it is so arbitrary as to be beyond the exercise of a reasonable discretion and judgment. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Union Pac. R. Co. 222 U. S. 541, 547, 32 S. Ct. 108, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 308, 311; State v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 76 Minn. 469, 79 N. W. 510.

4. The pecuniary loss or profit to the carrier in executing the particular order is an important criterion in determining the reasonableness of the order, but it is not the only one. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, 206 U. S. 1, 26, 27, 27 S. Ct. 585, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 933, 945, 11 Ann. Cas. 398; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 279, 30 S. Ct. 330, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 472, 480. The question of reasonableness is to be determined by a consideration of the interests both of the carrier and of the public. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 458, 10 S. Ct. 462, 702, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 970, 982; Wisconsin, etc. R. Co. v. Jacobson, 179 U. S. 287, 296, 21 S. Ct. 115, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 194, 199.

5. In this case there is no finding upon the question whether the order of the commission imposed a financial burden upon the defendant. The court declined to consider that question, apparently deeming it unnecessary in view of his opinion upon the question of public necessity. The statute having provided that the order of the commission is prima facie reasonable, and having imposed upon the appellant "the burden of proof upon all issues raised by the appeal" (G. S. 1913, § 4192), the burden to show the order of the commission unreasonable, was on the defendant carrier at every stage of the trial, in respect to all matters affecting the reasonableness and validity of the order. State v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 80 Minn. 191, 197, 83 N. W. 60, 89 Am. St. Rep. 514. We are accordingly obliged to assume that the order of the commission imposes no pecuniary burden on defendant.

6. The finding of the commission is not explicit upon the subject of public necessity of this service. The most that is found is that [62] "the public as well as business institutions have come to depend upon the passenger service which has been given it by these trains upon Sunday . . . [and] that the removal of said trains . . . leaves the communities along said line . . . without necessary Sunday day service." The evidence shows that the Sunday day passenger traffic was mostly a traffic of pleasure or convenience, with few instances of necessary travel and that it rendered the incidental service of distribution of Sunday newspapers.

Still the showing is such that, if this were a week day train, we should have trouble in sustaining the decision of the court setting aside the order of the commission. But it is not a week day train. It is a Sunday train and in the last analysis this case really involves the question of the reasonableness of an order of the commission compelling the operation of a Sunday local day train where no particular necessity therefor exists save the convenience of travelers desiring to travel for the most part for pleasure, and when for business then not in most cases for business of any urgent character, coupled with the performance of the incidental service of distribution of news. So far as we can find no such question has ever before arisen. No case has been called to our attention where the railroad commission of any state has ever before sought to compel the operation of ordinary local day passenger trains on Sunday. In one reported case in Missouri the state legislature by statute imposed such a duty and the statute was sustained by a divided court (State v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 239 Mo. 196, 143 S. W. 785), three out of seven of the judges participating being of the opinion that the legislature had no constitutional power to compel such Sunday operation, and this although no specific provision is found in the Missouri Constitution purporting to forbid it.

We have not before us an act of the legislature. We have an order of an administrative commission. Whatever may be the powers of that commission they are surely circumscribed by the laws of the state and the public policy of the state as manifested by its laws. Our statutes forbid Sunday labor except in cases of necessity or charity. G. S. 1913, § 8753. Under some statutes not dissimilar to ours it has been held that the operation of passenger trains on Sunday is [63] unlawful. Schenectady First Baptist Church v. Schenectady, etc. R. Co. 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 79; Read v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 140 Mass. 199, 4 N. E. 227. We need not adopt that extreme view. The defendant in this case does not urge it, and after operating trains on this line for Sunday for many years it is in no position to urge it. It may be conceded that the operation of these Sunday trains would not be unlawful. Clear it is, however, that the public policy of this state, as manifested by its statutes extending over its whole history as a state, has been in the direction of the restriction and against the compulsion of Sunday activities. Sunday is recognized as a day of rest. Many public activities, as well as work and labor not necessary, are forbidden. No statute of the state has ever commanded Sunday labor or Sunday activities of any sort. The operation of Sunday local passenger trains is the exception in Minnesota. Some roads operate no local Sunday trains at all on any of their lines. No statute has ever required it. There might arise a state of facts that would justify an order making compulsory the operation of a Sunday passenger train. The trial court was of the opinion that the facts do not make this such a case. The court's decision involved the determination of questions both of law and fact. To the extent that it involved questions of fact it must, like any other determination of fact by a trial court, be sustained, unless clearly and palpably wrong. We are of the opinion that the judgment of the trial court must be sustained. Walsh v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 42 Wis. 23, 24 Am. Rep. 376, decided before the days of railroad commissions, tends to sustain this position. In that case it was held that a common carrier is bound to transport passengers upon being paid a reasonable rate of fare, unless it has a valid excuse for not performing that duty, but that the Sunday labor laws of that state, which are substantially the same as ours, furnished to the defendant "a perfectly valid excuse for not running its passenger trains on Sunday."

Judgment affirmed.

On June 28, 1915, the following opinion was filed:

PER CURIAM.—The opinion in this case contains the statement that "the finding [64] of the commission is not explicit upon the subject of public necessity of this service," and the opinion quotes one section of the commission's order as containing all that the order contains on that subject. The above statement is erroneous. A section other than the one quoted is explicit upon this subject. This fact could not, however, change the result. We did not wish to be understood as saying that the language of the order of the commission does not constitute a finding on the subject of public necessity. The opinion clearly assumes that it does, for it expressly states that on the trial of the appeal in district court the burden was on the defendant "at every stage of the trial in respect to all matters affecting the reasonableness and validity of the order."

We see no occasion for a reargument of this case, and the motion for reargument is denied.

NOTE.Validity of Order of Public Service Commission Requiring Running of Sunday Train.

As a matter of practical railroad operation there is ordinarily less passenger travel on Sunday than on week days, and carriers are habitually desirous of reducing the train service on that day because the service is less profitable. It is well settled that the fact that a particular train service must be rendered at a loss to the carrier does not prevent a public service commission from requiring it, if it is demanded by the reasonable needs of the community. See the note to the case of In re Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. reported immediately following this note. But since a Sunday train service necessarily involves labor on the part of a number of railroad employees, a few cases have discussed the validity of such an order with respect to its conflict with a state policy contemplating the observance of Sunday as a day of rest. In the reported case an order is held to be unreasonable which requires the operation of a Sunday local day train where no particular necessity therefor exists save the convenience of persons desiring to travel for the most part for pleasure, and, even when for business, in most cases not for business of any urgent character, coupled with the performance of the incidental service of the distribution of news. In Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Miller, 28 Okla. 109, 114 Pac. 1104, the contrary view was maintained. Upholding an order of the public service commission requiring the operation of at least one passenger train each way on every day of the week the court said: "It is suggested in the brief of counsel for appellant that it is the general policy of the state, as expressed in article 4, chapter 25 of the Compiled Laws of 1909, sections 2049 to 2073, inclusive, that Sunday labor be performed only when required by necessity or charity. That is true, and if that rule would justify the appellant in not operating at least one passenger train on said line of railroad on Sundays, it would also prevent appellant from operating passenger trains on its other lines in the state on Sundays. This, we apprehend, they would not accede to be the policy of the law. The fact that the railway is operated during the week days and is depended on during such periods by the patronizing public for transportation for means of necessity and charity, as well as the other affairs of life, on Sundays the public would also depend on it for transportation for means of necessity or charity. It would be unreasonable to say that, under the charter provisions granted by sovereignty, the railroad company could perform this transportation for matters of necessity and charity, as well as matters of business, on week days, but as to Sundays the patronizing public must make other arrangements. If this order commanded the installing of a second Sunday train, the question might be different."

In Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Assoc. v. Board of Public Utility Com'rs, 82 N. J. L. 309, 92 Atl. 306, the court, while not passing on the power to order a Sunday train service, held that if a train is run on that day its stopping places are subject to regulation by a public service commission. In that case it was said: "The camp meeting association rests its objection upon the Vice and Immorality Act, which forbids the running of more than one train on Sunday, but this order does not compel the running of any trains on Sundays. It simply orders that if trains are run on Sunday no discrimination shall be made between stations of similar importance, in the matter of stopping trains. It is not the stopping of trains at any given station that is forbidden, but the running of trains, and that this order does not direct. If the company runs but one train on Sunday an order that it stop at the main station in Asbury Park would hardly be questioned, and if more trains are run on Sunday than the law permits, that can be dealt with in a proper proceeding having that object in view. The order complained of is, not that trains must be run, but that such trains as are run shall stop at the main station in Asbury Park."

In State v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 239 Mo. 196, 143 S. W. 785, in an exhaustive discussion of the entire question of the relation of the operation of a railroad to state Sunday laws a statute requiring the operation of Sunday trains was sustained.

IN RE APPEAL OF MINNEAPOLIS, ST. PAUL, AND SAULT STE. MARIE RAILROAD COMPANY.

North Dakota Supreme Court—April 23, 1915.

30 N. Dak. 221; 152 N. W. 513.

Public Service Commissions — Appeal from Order.

The board of commissioners of railroads of this state ordered a separate daily passenger service to be installed on the Ambrose-Flaxton branch of the appellant railway company, which appealed to the district court where the board's decision was affirmed, and it appeals to this court, alleging that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment of the district court. The board's order was a denial of the railroad's application to be relieved under chap. 200, Sess. Laws 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795, from running a daily passenger service, which had been ordered by the board. The board denies the right of the railroad to appeal, asserting that its order is final and that a statute granting a right of appeal would be unconstitutional because administrative, instead of judicial, functions are concerned. Since the decision below was made, this branch line has been extended into Montana. Both parties request a decision on the merits and that the case not be treated as moot. Held:—Though chap. 200, Sess. Laws 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795, did not expressly grant an appeal to the courts, yet as it is in pari materia with similar earlier statutes in themselves granting and contemplating generally a right of appeal from decisions of the board to the courts, a right of appeal exists as to the matters embraced in the statute in question.

Same.

That the subject-matter is legislative or administrative does not render a statute unconstitutional authorizing a review of the action of the board in the courts on an appeal to them.

Same.

That the right of the railroad to apply to the commission to be relieved from maintaining a separate daily passenger service (by installation of a daily mixed passenger and freight service on branch lines) is permissive in language, and not a positive direction to the board, and vests in it a discretion, does not negative a right of appeal.

Regulation of Railroad by Commission — Extent of Train Service.

In determining whether such relief shall be granted, the earnings and cost of operation of branch line service must be determined as near as possible, and where it plainly appears that the cost of operating the branch line with separate daily passenger service installed greatly exceeds the railroad's earnings and revenues derivable from the operation of such branch line, the carrier is prima facie within the statutory exception, and prima facie is entitled to be permitted to operate a daily mixed passenger and freight train.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The statute granting such relief has particular application to branch lines, and the revenues from service and cost of branch line service only must be considered. The petitioner cannot be compelled to operate a separate daily passenger service on this branch line at a great loss, and be compelled to make up such loss from its main line revenues. The intent of the statute is that the revenues from branch lines shall justify a daily passenger service independent of whether the railroad as a whole within the state is returning a fair dividend on its investment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The proof discloses that the G. N. Crosby-Berthold line furnishes ample passenger service for four-fifths of the length of this Soo branch line. A separate passenger service should not be forced for the convenience alone of the town of Ambrose and vicinity, when to do so will cause an additional annual expenditure of $14,000, added to a loss already sustained under mixed train service, the revenues being inadequate to meet even the expenses of a mixed train service.

[See note at end of this case.]

Order of Commission Reversed.

The order and judgment appealed from are reversed. Since trial, this line has been extended into Montana, and questions of interstate commerce may now be involved, which conditions will be taken into consideration in future proceedings had herein.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Burke county:
FISK, Judge.

Matter of appeal of Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie Railroad Company, from order of State Board of Railway Commissioners. From judgment rendered, Railroad Company appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Palda, Aaker & Greene, John L. Erdall and Alfred H. Bright for appellant.

W. H. Stutsman and Henry J. Linde for respondents.

[223] Goss, J.—This appeal is from the decision of the district court, wherein trial was had on testimony taken relating to an application by the railroad company to the State Board of Railway Commissioners, made under chap. 200 of Sess. Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795. Mixed train service was given on the Ambrose-Flaxton Soo branch line. In November, 1910, residents of Ambrose petitioned the Board of Railway Commissioners to order installation of separate daily passenger and freight service. On hearing had the petition was granted. The railroad immediately applied to be relieved therefrom, and upon a second hearing had the application of the railroad was denied and an order was entered June 24, 1911, directing installation of a separate daily passenger service. From this order the railroad appealed to the district court of Burke county. The matter came on [224] for trial as an issue of fact and law on May 30, 1912, and a decision was rendered adverse to the railroad company. It appeals, assigning as error that the evidence is insufficient to justify certain findings entered, and that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment rendered.

This opinion is written after a rehearing had. Prior to rehearing it was held that the order made by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and upon which the appeal was taken to the district court, was nonappealable in that it was merely an order denying the carrier's application to be relieved from the general statutory requirement to run a daily passenger train, instead of an order directing or compelling action in the matter; and for the further reason that no right of appeal was considered as granted by chap. 200 of the Session Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795, concerning the matters there mentioned, and that the intent of that particular statute was to leave the Board vested with a discretion as to said matters, uncontrolled by resort to the courts by appeal. It was also mentioned in said opinion that the case was moot, inasmuch as this Ambrose branch had been extended into Montana, pending the appeal, and now accommodates a much greater territory.

Undoubtedly this case might be disposed of as moot and the decision be within the law. However, the Board and the corporation desire a decision as precedent for future action.

The legislature has seen fit to declare that both a daily passenger and daily freight train shall be run each way over every railroad within this state, "provided, however, that, if any railroad corporation shall make it appear to the Board of Railroad Commissioners of this state that the business on any line of its road will not justify its operating both the passenger and freight train herein provided for, and said Board shall so order, said company may operate one mixed train on such line each way on every business day in the year for such time as said Board may direct." The order made is appealable, and a review of the action of the Board may be had in the courts and in this court on appeal. Whether the order be merely negative, or on the contrary affirmative action, does not affect the right of appeal. To hold otherwise would allow the right to an appeal to be dependent on the caprice of the Board in the framing of its order. The right is [225] absolute if granted by the statute, and it is plainly apparent from the codification of the laws pertaining to the powers and duties of the Railroad Commissioners, as codified in chap. 115 of the Session Laws of 1897, that it was the legislative intent that as to all enactments, past and future, unless the contrary was clearly apparent from the future act itself, a right of appeal, retrial, and review should be allowed from the decision of that body to the courts. As nothing contained in chapter 200 of the Session Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795, manifests a contrary intention, it must be taken as in pari materia with similar existing enactment and as having been enacted subject to an understood and generally applicable right of appeal in this as in all other similar and related matters. Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. §§ 443-448; 36 Cyc. 1147.

The Board of Railroad Commissioners urges that it is a part of the executive department of the state, with functions purely administrative; that the courts have universally established and maintained a sharp distinction between purely administrative acts and those which are purely judicial, relegating one to the executive and the other as belonging to the judicial departments of government respectively. It urges that such distinction here exists pertaining to the acts under review, and that "the judicial department is powerless to control or review the executive department so long as it does not exceed its legal authority;" that if its acts are reviewable at all by the courts, it is only when they are in palpable excess of jurisdiction or power, and that then they are reviewable only on certiorari if at all; and if the power to review by appeal has been granted, the statute attempting to confer it is unconstitutional "for the reason that the courts have no power over a commission belonging to the executive department acting within the scope of its authority." It next contends that certiorari will not lie for a mere excess of jurisdiction exercised, and finally arrives at the conclusion that its acts, because administrative and it constituting a branch of the executive arm of government, are practically wholly beyond judicial review.

The powers and duties of this constitutional Board are not prescribed by the Constitution, but are left to the legislature to create and define. Section 83 of the state Constitution declares that they "shall be as prescribed by law." As well observed in Kermott v. Bagley, 19 N. D. [226] 345, 124 N. W. 397, the powers of government, although divided generally into three distinct departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, are otherwise undistributed. In other words, our Constitution contains no distributing clause specifically apportioning the three different classes of governmental power. Merely because the duty is administrative, strictly speaking, and nonjudicial in the broad sense of the term, does not bar the legislature from requiring its exercise, nevertheless, by a district court, the constitutional court of general original jurisdiction. Kermott v. Bagley, supra, following Com. v. Collier, 213 Pa. St. 138, 62 Atl. 567. The Constitution does not prevent the legislature (upon which it has imposed the duty of prescribing the powers and duties of the Railroad Commission) from saying that such powers or duties even though administrative in character, may be reviewable in the district court on appeal, and in which tribunal a trial de novo of even administrative issues may be had.

It is immaterial whether the duties of the Board of Railroad Commissioners may be technically legislative or judicial. There is nothing in the Federal Constitution to hinder a state from uniting "legislative and judicial powers in a single hand." Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. 211 U. S. 210-225, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 150-158, 29 S. Ct. 67; Dreyer v. Illinois, 187 U. S. 71-84, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 79-85, 23 S. Ct. 28, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 253; Winchester, etc. R. Co. v. Com. 106 Va. 264-268, 55 S. E. 692; 6 R. C. L. 147; and though in our state Constitution the three departments of government, executive, legislative, and judicial, are primarily separately invested with powers to be so classified respectively, "it is not meant to affirm that they must be kept wholly and entirely separate and distinct, and have no common link of connection or dependence, the one upon the other, in the slightest degree. The true meaning is that the whole power of one of these departments should not be exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of either of the other departments." Story, Const. 5th ed. 393. "Again, 'indeed, there is not a single Constitution of any state in the Union which does not practically embrace some acknowledgment of the maxim [separation of the powers of government to be administered by the three arms of government separately], and at the same time some admixture of powers constituting an exception to it.' [227] Story, Const. 395." Winchester, etc. R. Co. v. Com. 106 Va. 264-270, 55 S. E. 692.

The duties of this Board relative to granting permission to discontinue operation of this daily train are legislative. 6 R. C. L. 159. The order made will be prospective in operation, and relate not to past, but to future, matters. It is analogous to the establishing of rates. The inquiry preliminary to determining the rule to be made concerning it is but such as might, with propriety, have been made by a legislative committee. That the inquiry may be reviewed on appeal in court proceedings matters not, as "that question depends not upon the character of the body, but upon the character of the proceedings." Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339-348, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 678-680, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 547; also Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. 211 U. S. 210-232, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 150-161, 29 S. Ct. 67, wherein it is held that the fact that an appeal is taken from the Commission to the courts, and a decision given confirming a rate, does not render such decision judicial, instead of legislative, in character. "A state may permit appeals to its courts from the rate-making orders of its Railroad Commission, and upon the review of such orders, it may expressly authorize its judicial tribunals to investigate and decide questions which otherwise would not belong to them, or even to act legislatively." Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Garrett, 231 U. S. 298, 314, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 229, 243, 34 S. Ct. 48, citing Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. 211 U. S. 210-227, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 150-159, 29 S. Ct. 67. Conceding the premise of the Commission, that its acts may be either legislative or administrative, it does not follow that an appeal to the courts from its decisions in such matters cannot constitutionally be granted. Kermott v. Bagley, 19 N. D. 345-350, 124 N. W. 397; Com. v. Collier, 213 Pa. St. 138, 62 Atl. 567. The original exercise of the power is left with the Commission for its administration, and until the appeal the whole legislative power is there, which suffices the test prescribed by constitutional provisions distributing generally the three powers of government to the three arms of government. Winchester, etc. R. Co. v. Com. 106 Va. 264, 55 S. E. 692. While duties cannot be imposed upon this court except such as are judicial, under § 96 of the state Constitution, the limitation does not apply to district court original jurisdiction (Kermott v. Bagley, supra); and it is true that the character of the act, as being [228] legislative or judicial, is determined by the nature of the final act under consideration, yet this proceeding on appeal is but an exercise of appellate jurisdiction, even though concerning administrative subject-matter. Though practically a retrial may be had in this court on the appeal, it does alter the fact that the jurisdiction exercised is appellate, and the trial in that manner is but one method of exercise of strictly appellate jurisdiction. Christianson v. Farmers' Warehouse Assoc. 5 N. D. 438, 32 L.R.A. 730, 67 N. W. 300; In re Peterson, 22 N. D. 480, 505, 134 N. W. 751. The legislature having the authority to vest the courts of general trial jurisdiction with the appellate jurisdiction of the subject-matter, though administrative or legislative in kind, could prescribe a further appellate jurisdiction therefor and vest this court therewith. The constitutional limitation on the supreme court is not on subject-matter, but instead is that the jurisdiction exercised or conferred shall be appellate jurisdiction only; except, of course, the instance prescribed by §§ 86, 87 of the state Constitution conferring original jurisdiction on this court. The question is rather one of the power the legislature to grant the right of trial and an appeal therefrom.

Along with nearly every power granted, this board is provided a right of appeal to the courts. It is declared that "the district courts of this state shall have jurisdiction to enforce, by proper decrees, injunctions, and orders" its "reasonable rulings, orders, and regulations, affecting public right." Comp. Laws, § 4732. Section 4736 not only grants the right of appeal to the district courts, but gives them general power to try and determine all issues, whether of a judicial, administrative, or legislative nature. "The district court shall, upon the hearing of such appeal, receive and consider such evidence as may be adduced by either party, and shall rescind, modify, or alter said order appealed from in such manner as may be equitable and just." Consult also §§ 4744, 4745, a part of the general scheme of review in the courts of such orders.

The weight of the finding of the Board originally made in the matter is a question different from that concerning the power of the courts over the issue on which such findings are offered as evidence. No doubt cases may arise where the findings of the Commission, as is said in Puget Sound Electric Ry. v. Washington R. Commission, 65 Wash. 75, 117 Pac. 739, Ann. Cas. 1913B 763, reiterated in State [229] v. Public Service Commission, 76 Wash. 625, 137 Pac. 132, 136, may necessarily be of an expert character and because thereof entitled to great weight, yet the same is not true in the instant case. Courts can satisfactorily determine the issue presented by the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the order made in the light of all the circumstances.

It may be conceded that the legislature could have passed this statute without the proviso, and required daily passenger train service. It had the power to declare such to be the public policy. But it also had the power to declare an exception to be the public policy to be observed, and has done so. Had no exception been made, but a daily train been required, it would not only have been within the power but it would have been the duty, of the Commission to compel a daily service. With the exception made, however, it is the duty of the Commission to likewise comply with the law and observe the exception. What the Commission might have done had the statute not contained the proviso can furnish no basis for disregard of the proviso, nor make it any less the statute. That the exception is granted in permissive, rather than in mandatory, language, is immaterial, as it does not signify that it is not its declared policy that, when the facts bring the carrier within the exception, it should enjoy its benefits; nor because it is framed in permissive language does it place the ruling of the Commission beyond appeal and court review.

Now as to merits. The branch line from Flaxton to Ambrose was 51 miles long. Tabulations of receipts and expenditures made, allotted, or apportioned to this line for the three years ending respectively June 30, 1909, 1910, and 1911 are in evidence. During this period mixed train service was given. From freight, passenger, mail, and express, apportioned on a mileage basis, the earnings of this branch show $50,030, $51,818, and $49,147 per year respectively. It is urged that the apportionment made of these earnings is improper, and does not truly reflect the benefit of the branch to the railroad system as a whole. But of all known methods of apportionment, that on the mileage basis seems most equitable, and has met generally with the approval of the courts. Against these earnings must be charged approximately $22,000 per year for strictly transportation expenses alone, an expense unquestionably disbursed on the branch line in producing its earnings. To this [230] there must necessarily be added $14,000 per year for taxes of this branch line, another expense equally certain, making a total definite expense from these two items alone of $36,000, which includes no overhead charge, such as maintenance of way and structures, maintenance of equipment, traffic, and general expenses of the general railway system, a proper proportion of all of which upon an equitable basis must be allotted to or charged against this branch line under the holding in Northern Pac. R. Co. v. North Dakota, 236 U. S. 585, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 735, Ann. Cas. 1916A 1, 35 S. Ct. 429, just decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, or what is commonly known as the North Dakota Lignite Coal Rate Cases. The Federal court reversed this court partially upon the very proposition now under consideration. Our holding was that "out of pocket costs" in effect constituted the real and actual cost of transportation of the particular commodity in fixing a commodity rate, inasmuch the overhead charges would continue regardless of any or all business done. The Federal Supreme Court, however, has announced the rule applicable to a commodity (and necessarily applicable as well to the total earnings of a branch line), that in calculating the cost of carriage there must be a proper allocation or apportionment of all overhead charge made and added to the out of pocket costs. The portion of such general overhead charge to this branch line is in excess of $20,000 per year, or about the amount of the local branch line operating expense. This may be, and probably is, somewhat excessive, as ordinarily the ratio of operating "out of pocket" expense to overhead charge is as 60 to 40. Figured on this basis the total expense apportionable to this branch line, exclusive of taxes, will reach between $37,000 and $38,000 per year. When taxes are added in the sum of $14,000 per annum, the total expense exceeds by approximately $2,000

the total revenues of the branch. And these figures are the result of a three-year test, during all of which time mixed passenger and freight service only was given. The testimony is that the addition of daily passenger service, as ordered installed by the Commission, will increase the yearly operating expense $14,000. This would increase the actual deficit or expenses over receipts to about $16,000 per annum. These are our deductions. The railroad's figures are that the deficit will be much greater, approximately $40,000 annually. It is apparent that, if the train service [231] ordered be installed, it will be at an actual outlay in expense over receipts of at least $1,000 a month. There can be no escape from this fact, any more than there can be any from the further conclusion that the people, the patrons of the road elsewhere, must make good this needless deficit if the order is enforced. And the carrier's property right to a reasonable rate of return on its money invested has been wholly omitted from the foregoing calculations. It has been held that, in prescribing the carrier's duties to the public, a matter that the public may to an extent control, the public may compel a daily passenger service to be rendered wholly independent of expense to the company. This requirement is held valid on the basis of it being a requirement concerning the public service, and a mere incident to the railroad business as a whole. However, the statute in question contains a proviso in effect excusing the company from operating a separate daily passenger and freight service when it "shall make it appear to the Board that the business on any link of its road will not justify its operating both the passenger and freight train herein provided for." The statute has reference to a portion, i. e., branch lines, and not the entire railroad system. Whether any particular part of the main line of the system may be segregated and come within the statute is unnecessary to determine. It is certain that the statute has particular reference to branch line service. The portion of this road to be taken in this case for the purpose of placing total earnings against total cost of earnings, to determine whether the traffic will or "will not justify its operating both passenger and freight" service, must be this branch line only. In other words, the statute speaks of the business on branch lines, and hence as to this case contemplates that this branch as the one in question shall be considered separate and independent from the receipts and disbursements necessary elsewhere on the system. When the receipts will not "justify its operating both the passenger and the freight train" daily, mixed trains may be run. The receipts must justify, in a business way, the disbursements occasioned by a daily service. It was but another way of stating that the receipts must be sufficient or nearly so to bear the expense of a daily service. Necessarily some reasonable latitude for judgment and discretion on the part of the Board must be allowed. And such is allowed by the language used. The measure is the "business" done on the particular line. The railroad cannot, as [232] a matter of strict legal right, refuse to install daily passenger service on the sole ground that to do so would run the total expense above the total income from the branch, as the element of public service which the road is chartered to perform enters into consideration. But in the absence of some strong reason to the contrary, proof that the necessary expense is in excess of total receipts should control the situation, and authorize the conclusion being drawn that the business will not justify such daily service. On proof of these facts the company prima facie justified its failure to install a separate daily passenger service or exonerate itself from so doing.

Of course, this court, like the Board of Railroad Commissioners, has the right to take judicial notice of and consider with the evidence many outside matters throwing light upon the situation. In so doing it is to be observed that, shortly after this branch was built to Ambrose, a rival and competing branch of the Great Northern Railroad was built from Crosby to Berthold. This Flaxton-Ambrose branch parallels the international boundary, running east and west from 3 to 10 miles south of it. For about four fifths of its entire length, or from Crosby down, it is closely paralleled on the south by the Great Northern Berthold branch line. The only territory left solely tributary to this Soo line is that portion between Crosby and Ambrose, and not exceeding 9 miles. A daily passenger service from Crosby to Minot and return via Berthold has been maintained, affording all residents in this territory very convenient passenger service on the Great Northern, the only way to meet which by the Soo would necessitate installing a similar return service from Ambrose to Minot and return. The receipts from this branch show that such competition could but result in added useless expense under conditions as they were when this trial was had. The long and short of the whole proposition is that in a territory capable of sustaining but one line of railroad two have been built, and one or both must suffer the consequences of competition for territory. The reason for the deficit then on this branch is as self-evident as is the fact that the branch will sustain or justify but a mixed freight and passenger service. And the fact, too, that the public as a result of such competitive service is having its wants supplied by the Berthold branch is also inconsistent with any claim of justification that might otherwise be urged for a daily Soo passenger service. This does not apply to Ambrose or the territory [233] immediately tributary thereto. But it would be unjust to say that an unprofitable passenger service over 50 miles of branch line railroad should be compelled merely to suit the convenience of a town of 500 people and surrounding community, at the most not exceeding in the aggregate 1,000 people, while all other towns on the line are otherwise adequately served, and then, too, when the particular town complaining has the benefits already of a mixed passenger and freight service. To enforce the order made would be to compel an additional expenditure of $14,000 per annum over receipts, where the traffic now will not return the expense it causes, all to suit the convenience of a single small community. Such an order is not "justified," to use the statutory term.

It is easy to understand how the opposite conclusion was reached by the Board of Railway Commissioners and the district court. It is explained by the fifth finding of fact, wherein the court found that the entire mileage of this railroad company in this state is 1,110 miles, producing annual earnings of $4,000,000, and that "there is no evidence that the total mileage of the company in the state is operated at a loss as a whole, or that the earnings of that portion of the mileage of the company within this state are not sufficient to pay a reasonable income upon the sum of money invested in the property and rolling stock of the company within the state." The only purpose of such finding was to allow the court to reason along lines parallel with those heretofore followed by this court in the Lignite Coal Rate Cases, but as this reasoning was recently condemned by the Federal Supreme Court when applied to a commodity or a classification, it must be equally untenable when used as a basis for determining whether or not the income of a branch line is to be treated with reference to the earnings of the whole system within the state. The Federal Supreme Court negatives any such conclusion, and by analogous reasoning we must determine the question as one of receipts and expenditures of the branch line alone. To quote from the recent Federal decision, "The public interest cannot be invoked as a justification for demands which pass the limits of reasonable protection, and seek to impose upon the carrier and its property burdens that are not incident to its engagement. In such a case it would be no answer to say that the carrier obtains from its entire intrastate business a return, as to the sufficiency of which in the aggregate it is not entitled to complain." In the West Virginia rate case, [234] Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Conley, 236 U. S. 605, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 745, 35 S. Ct. 437, decided at the same time as the North Dakota Lignite Coal Rate Cases, Northern Pac. R. Co. v. North Dakota, 236 U. S. 585, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 735, Ann. Cas. 1916A 1, 35 S. Ct. 429, the same principle was enforced as to different classes of traffic and freight. By analogy the precedent applies. This branch should not be compelled to operate in a particular manner at a great increase of loss over present cost of operation, because forsooth the railroad can afford to suffer this loss by recouping itself from increased rates of revenue obtained elsewhere, or on its other lines within the state. Nor is such the intent of the statute, as has been observed, it providing that the character of the branch service to be given shall be determined from the proceeds of that branch line, and not from the proceeds of all of the system within the state.

Judicial notice is taken of the fact that this branch has been extended into Montana, and present conditions may warrant a daily passenger service. Questions of interstate commerce may now arise. Suitable allowance will be made for possible changed conditions in any judgment and order to be entered herein. The judgment appealed from is ordered vacated, and the District Court will direct the Board of Railway Commissioners of this state to vacate its order of June 24, 1911, as an order erroneously made, and also direct that said Board may either dismiss these proceedings, or may enter such further order, after full hearing afforded the railway company, as present conditions may in its judgment require and the law permit in the matter herein litigated.

Christianson, J., did not participate; Burr, District Judge, sitting in his stead.

BRUCE, J. (dissenting).—I am compelled to dissent from the opinion of the majority. The province of this court, as I understand it, is to construe the law, and not to administer it, nor to legislate. This court has no right to ignore the plain and unequivocal language of a valid legislative enactment.

The legislature of North Dakota has ordered (as it had a right to do, and with the wisdom of the enactment we are not concerned) that [235] daily passenger trains shall be run on the branch as well as on the main lines of the railroads within the state, "provided, however, that if any railroad corporation shall make it appear to the Board of Railroad Commissioners of this state that the business on any line of its road will not justify its operating both the passenger and freight train herein provided for, and said Board shall so order, such company may operate one mixed train on such line each way on every business day in the year for such time as said Board may direct." Laws of 1907, chap. 200, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795. The statute expressly provides that such train shall be run and that the running of daily passenger trains shall be the uniform public policy of the state unless the Board of Railroad Commissioners (which is an administrative agency intrusted with the general supervision of railroad matters in North Dakota) shall order otherwise. But the majority of this court holds that it, and not the Board of Railroad Commissioners, may issue such order or grant such excuse. The statute expressly provides that such general policy of daily passenger trains shall prevail unless the railroad corporation "shall make it appear to the Board of Railroad Commissioners of this state that the business on any line of its road will not justify its operating both the passenger and freight train herein provided for." The majority, however, holds that if a railroad company makes it appear, not to the Board of Railroad Commissioners, but to the district court, upon a trial de novo and upon evidence totally different from that produced before the commissioners, that such district court must grant the excuse. It holds in short that, where the legislature says that a matter shall be made to appear to the Board of Railroad Commissioners, it means that it shall be made to appear to the district court upon a trial de novo and upon totally different evidence.

Not only this, but it holds that in case the district court happens to be of the same opinion as the Board of Railroad Commissioners, an appeal even can be taken from its decision, and that if it shall be made to appear to the supreme court that such excuse from the operation of daily passenger trains should be granted, the supreme court may grant the same. It holds in short that when the legislature provides that a fact or condition must be made to appear to the Board of Railroad Commissioners, it really means that this fact or condition must be made [236] to appear to the supreme court. It would be hard, indeed, to find any other case where a clear legislative enactment has been so distorted and perverted.

The only excuse for the holding of the majority is that an act, which was passed in 1897, and ten years before the enactment of the statute now under consideration, provided for an appeal from orders of the Board of Railroad Commissioners issued under "the act." The majority, however, absolutely ignores the fact that this prior act of 1897 nowhere made any provision for the running of passenger trains. It related almost entirely to the regulation of railroad rates and to the orders of the Board of Railroad Commissioners in relation thereto. It made it the duty, it is true, of the Railroad Commissioners to see that the railroads obeyed the laws of the state. It nowhere, however, provided that either the railroads or the Board of Railroad Commissioners could overrule the positive mandates of a future act, nor can it be contended that when it provided for an appeal from orders regulating rates it tied the hands of subsequent legislatures, and prevented them from establishing a public policy of daily passenger trains, and vesting the responsibility of its carrying out in the discretion of the Board of Railroad Commissioners.

The provision of the act of 1897 (chapter 115) which relates to appeals, is expressly limited in its application. It (§ 32) provides that "any railroad, railroad corporation, or common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, or any other person interested in the order made by the Commissioner of Railroads, may appeal to the district court of the proper county in the judicial district of this state from which the complaint arose, and which is the subject and basis of the order made by the Commissioners of Railroads regulating or fixing its tariffs or rates, fares, charges, or classification, or by any other order made by said Commissioners under the provisions of this act." This limited clause, and in a statute which says nothing about the running of passenger trains and which is interested solely in tariff classifications and rates, and in the general details of railroad operation in relation thereto, is construed by the majority opinion to apply to a statute which is passed ten years later, which provides for a general policy of passenger service, and which provides that the only person or body which can grant an excuse from an observance of such policy is the Board of Railroad [237] Commissioners. See Robinson v. Sunderland [1899] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 751, 68 L. J. Q. B. 330, 80 L. T. N. S. 262, 63 J. P. 341, 19 Cox C. C. 245, 15 Times L. Rep. 195.

When the discretion of granting such an excuse is, by chapter 200 of the Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795, vested exclusively in the Board of Railroad Commissioners, and then only in case certain facts are made to appear to them, can it be said that it was the intention of the legislature that new evidence should be introduced in the district court, and that that court should be vested with the power to hold that that was made to appear to the Board of Commissioners, which did not in fact appear to them, and that in case of a holding of that court which was adverse to the railroad company an appeal could again be taken to this tribunal and that we could say the same thing? Is it not clear that the general policy of the state, as announced by chapter

200 of the Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795, was a policy of daily passenger service, unless the Board of Railroad Commissioners (which is an administrative branch of the government and which is intrusted with the duty of subserving the interests of all parties concerned) should be satisfied that the business of the branch line did not justify the expense, and that in that event an excuse should be granted for a limited time? Does this court, we may now ask, assume the power to fix the limits of that time? Is it not also clear that the writer and subscribers to the majority opinion have confused the rights of the railway company which arise under statutes which regulate rates with those which arise under statutes which merely relate to the method of the operation of its lines? Are they not influenced in their decision by a feeling that the operation of a passenger train on the line in question would be an unprofitable venture, and that the railway company should by some means be protected against loss? Do they not absolutely ignore the fact that the railway company has its remedies, and that, even if it had not, they have no right to themselves usurp legislative functions? "There is," says the Supreme Court of the United States in Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 472, 30 S. Ct. 330, "a difference between the exertion of the legislative power to establish rates in such a manner as to confiscate the property of a public service corporation by fixing them below a remunerative standard and one compelling the corporation to render a [238] service which it is essentially its duty to perform; and an order directing a railroad company to run a regular passenger train over its line, instead of a mixed passenger and freight train, is not, even if such train is run at a loss, a deprivation of property without due process of law, or a taking of private property for public use without compensation; nor is such an order an unreasonable exercise of governmental control."

The reason for this rule is that the charter of every railroad corporation must be deemed to have been granted upon the theory of public service, and that the road will really serve the public. On no other theory, indeed, can the right of eminent domain, which is universally conceded to railroad companies, be justified. It lies also in the fact that the railroad corporation has a remedy against confiscation in the right and power to charge rates that will compensate it and guarantee to it a reasonable profit after meeting all of the requirements of the state in regard to service. Having this power to insist upon an adequate compensation, and to demand rates which will be commensurate to the duties imposed, it cannot complain if the public, for reasons of basic convenience or of public safety, demands passenger, rather than mixed, trains.

Independently of statute and under its charter, it is the duty of the railroad company to carry passengers, as well as freight. Having this duty, and even in the absence of a statute, it is its duty to furnish reasonable conveniences and a reasonably safe method of transportation for such passengers. "It cannot be said that the carrier of passengers in a car attached to a freight train is a suitable and proper operation of a railroad, as far as the carriage of passengers is concerned. The transportation of passengers on a freight train, or on a mixed train, is subordinate to the transportation of freight, a mere incident to the business of carrying freight. To furnish such cars as are necessary for the suitable and proper carriage of passengers involves the necessity of adopting that mode of carrying passengers which is best adapted to secure their safety and convenience. This can be accomplished better by operating a separate passenger train than by operating a mixed train." People v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 176 Ill. 512, 35 L.R.A. 656, 52 N. E. 292.

This must be universally conceded. In fact it needs no evidence to [239] show that from the standpoint of public safety, to say nothing of speed or convenience, there is no parallel between a freight or mixed train and a strictly passenger train. Is not this the clear policy which is announced by the legislature? It is a self-evident fact that the interests of the railway companies and of the public are one. We have adopted the theory of quasi public corporations. We have given to the railway companies extraordinary rights, such as eminent domain. They are also essentially businesses which are "clothed with a public interest," which are to a greater or lesser extent monopolies, and which are, therefore, subject, even under the common law, to legislative control. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 77.

On the other hand, the constitutional provisions which forbid a deprivation of property without due process of law and the general spirit of fair play in the community, as well as the economic fact that no man or corporation can, for a long period of time, be induced or compelled to operate at a loss, have given rise to the rule that they can in all cases insist upon a fair return for the capital which is reasonably invested and on the reasonably economical administration of their property, and that this right cannot be taken from them by the legislature. This rule, of course, implies that, though the public may impose duties upon the railway company, and may insist that its needs be reasonably served, yet that when these requirements impose an additional cost upon the corporation, it may reimburse itself in the form of added rates, so that the total result will be a reasonable profit on its enterprise. On this theory and as a last analysis, the public themselves pay for insisting upon added requirements or upon an obedience to the duties imposed in the first place by the charter of the company; for it is perfectly clear that every new expense which is imposed upon the railroad company, whether in the form of adequate service or in the form of taxes, is ultimately paid by the traveling and freight consuming public, as such expenses only tend to elevate the point which divides loss and profit, and to raise the point where a reasonable profit is exceeded and the public may insist upon a reduction of rates. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Richland County, 28 N. D. 172, Ann. Cas. 1916E 574, L.R.A.1915A 129, 148 N. W. 545. The Board of Railroad Commissioners, therefore, are intrusted with the duties of subserving the interests of both the railroad companies and of the public. Among those duties (and imposed by chapter 200 of the [240] Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795) is the duty to determine whether the business of a branch line really justifies the imposing upon the railway company, as well as upon the public, the increased cost of passenger service, or rather whether or not the loss is so apparent that they should excuse the railway company for a limited period of time from complying with the provisions of the general law, which require the running of such trains and the incurring of such expense. This is purely an administrative function, and is clearly made so by the act of 1907, and there is no justification nor excuse for attempting to limit that act by claiming that there is an appeal from the discretion of such Commission, which appeal is not provided for in the act in question, and which is sought to be based on the provisions of a statute which was passed ten years before and which has no connection whatever with the statute under consideration.

The plaintiff railway company is, as a matter of fact, entitled to but little consideration in this particular controversy, though of course, as the rule which is announced by the decision is far reaching, it and the general public are entitled to the fullest consideration of the questions involved. It at no time has complied with the provisions of the statute, and much of the confusion which is apparent in the record, and in the opinion of the majority, I believe is due to this fact. It has delayed for many years a decision in a matter which long ago should have been settled. The act of 1907 provides for a general policy of passenger service. It provides that passenger trains shall be run unless an excuse is granted, and then that that excuse shall only be "for such time as said Board may direct." It presupposes the institution of that service in the first instance. I do not say that the railway company should necessarily have immediately instituted the service after the law became operative and applicable to it, but I do say that, if it did not do so, it should have immediately applied to the Board of Railroad Commissioners for the excuse. Instead of doing this, the railway company, however, has never attempted to comply with the statute, and it made no application to the Board of Railroad Commissioners to be excused from such compliance until the road had been in operation for some years and until the Board of Railroad Commissioners had been compelled to issue an order requiring it to comply with the provisions of the statute. It now seeks to avoid the provisions of the statute which vests the exclusive discretion [241] as to the granting of such permission or excuse in the Board of Railroad Commissioners by appealing from the order which requires it to obey the law, and which necessarily must be valid unless, in the first instance, it had obtained such excuse. It may be that such order is appealable, but on such appeal it can only be shown that the railway company was not actually within the state and subject to the jurisdiction of the Board, or that, as a matter of fact, the passenger train was in operation, or that the Board of Railroad Commissioners had, for some other reason, acted outside of its jurisdiction.

The railway company cannot, by appealing from such order, accomplish the same results as if it had appealed, and an appeal had been allowed by the statute, from the refusal of the Commissioners to grant the excuse. It, it is true, tried the two matters together, and the record is greatly confused, but the fundamental fact still remains that the only defense to the order was the alleged fact that the Board of Railroad Commissioners did not grant the excuse and should have done so. But this decision was not reviewable in the district court, and is not reviewable here.

I fully agree with the conclusion of the majority that it was the intention of the legislature that it was the business of the branch line, and not of the railway company as a whole within the state, that should justify the operation of the passenger train. In other words, that it was this criterion that should be adopted by the Board of Railroad Commissioners. The matter, however, with this general rule or criterion as a guide, was left to their discretion. I should also add that there is serious doubt in my mind as to whether the evidence offered by the railway company was in any way competent and controlling. When I say that, in my opinion, it was the business of the branch line that should justify the incurring of the expense of the daily passenger service, I do not mean that in every instance a branch line should show a profit on the basis of its mileage, for in many instances a branch line is but a feeder, and though but a few miles in length may be the origin of hundreds of miles of long distance freight or passenger transportation, and become in this way the source of a large revenue, which is entirely disproportionate to its length. The proof of the railway company was defective in this respect. Instead of showing what the branch line really furnished in the way of business, it apportioned its receipts [242] to the branch line on the basis of the mileage of that line. If this theory be adopted, I believe I am safe in saying that there is hardly a paying branch line in North Dakota. It must, however, be clear to all that a branch line, though short in its mileage, may open up a pocket of grain or of coal, or other freight or passenger traffic. That grain or coal is carried for a few miles over the branch line and then is carried for many hundreds of miles over the main line for which service the company is compensated. A branch line, in short, may be a feeder and the basis of a large revenue, not because of its mileage, but because it furnishes the material for hundreds and even thousands of miles of through transportation. There is hardly a carload of wheat, for instance, that stops at the end of the branch line and does not go on to Duluth or to Minneapolis, or even to Chicago. In any view of the case the Railroad Commissioners can hardly be said to have abused their discretion when they failed to grant the excuse upon the proof that was furnished. It can hardly be said that it must have satisfactorily appeared to them that the branch line was not a paying line. I am of the opinion that the judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

BURR, D. J. (dissenting).—I reach the same conclusion as Justice Bruce. The issue involved is this: Has the railway company the right of appeal from the action of the Board of Railroad Commissioners in refusing permission to be relieved from the observance of the provisions of § 4789 of the Compiled Laws of 1913? The Board of Railroad Commissioners is a part of the executive department of this government; free from the control of the judiciary, unless such control is given by the Constitution and the law. It is true the powers and duties of the Board "shall be as prescribed by law" (Const. § 83); but this does not presuppose appeal to the courts. The right of appeal must be clearly defined,—there is no presumption in its favor,—and unless jurisdiction to revise these acts is given to the courts, it does not exist. As Justice Bruce has pointed out, the section relied on as granting appeals from orders of the Board is not applicable. In addition to the fact that the matter involved here was not in the contemplation of the legislature when § 4736 was enacted, there is this feature,—the evidence of the action of the Board of Railroad Commissioners is not an order in that sense. The fact that an order is in the negative is not the question,—[243] there is no order here within the meaning contemplated, simply a refusal to grant permission. It is immaterial what it may be called. The Board is not requiring the railway company to do or not to do a certain thing,—the law requires the company to run the passenger trains. It is the duty of the company to do so. The legislature recognized that this may entail expense and loss which could only be compensated by an increase in rates, and made provision whereby one part of the executive department may waive compliance with this section, provided the railway company "makes it appear to the Board" that the business does not justify this expenditure and the said Board shall so order. There is no analogy between the provisions of this section and the control of rates. Primarily the carrier controls the rates. It is its road and its business. Only to prevent injustice does the state interfere. The so-called "Lignite Cases," in the United States Supreme Court, show this. But the requirement to run trains is an entirely different matter. It is conceded the state has the right, from the very first, to insist on this action, and has placed with the administrative department the power of waiving compliance. The duties prescribed and orders made pursuant to the provisions of § 4736 have no relation to this matter. This section is part of chap. 115 of the Session Laws of 1897, and is entitled, "An Act to Regulate the Transportation of Passengers and Property by Common Carriers; . . . to Provide for the Control thereof, in the Matter of Rates to be Charged for Such Transportation and the Manner thereof, to Define the Powers and Duties of the Commissioners of Railroads." The right to appeal, as given by the provisions of this chapter, is the right to appeal from any order "regulating or fixing tariffs of rates, fares, charges, or classifications, or from any other order made by said Commissioners under the provisions of this act." Section 4789 is part of chapter 200 of the Session Laws of 1907, entitled: "An Act to Regulate the Operation of Passenger and Freight Trains of Railway Lines in This State." This act in form is not an amendment to chapter 115 of the Session Laws of 1897, nor does it refer to such a chapter or to the act therein stated. It is a separate and distinct act, and so far as the first section is concerned (§ 4789 of the Compiled Laws) it is an entirely different matter. The last paragraph of this new act of 1907 says: "Nothing in this act contained shall in any manner be construed as repealing or in any manner altering any other act, or part of act, heretofore [244] adopted by the legislature of this state, but the remedies herein provided shall be cumulative to all other remedies now existing." It is clear from this § 7 that chapter 200 is intended to be additional to chapter 115 of the Session Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, § 8729, and any control given therein, or declaration made, is additional to chapter 115 of the Session Laws of 1897. Therefore, the provisions of chapter 115 of 1897 Laws, with reference to appeals from the orders of the Commissioners, should not be extended to chapter 200 of Session Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, §§ 4789-4795, unless the nature of the subject-matter treated is so connected with chapter 115 of the Session Laws of 1907, Comp. Laws 1913, § 8729, as to be construed an amendment. The judicial does not control the other departments of the government, unless the power is given explicitly,—not by implication.

Then again the expression "made to appear to the Board of Railroad Commissioners" is broader than judicial discretion—it is analogous to personal satisfaction. The Board alone can say whether it is made to appear to the Board. The Legislature desired the opinion and judgment of the Board on the question whether it would be better in certain cases to permit a waiver of what the state has a right to insist on, or have the company raise its rates. It is not a question of arbitrary power, although this is always involved, even in the decision of cases. The number of times the question may be reviewed does tend to justice; but the final determination must be somewhere. The legislature has seen fit to confide to the Board the power of saying whether the state will waive its right to insist on running of daily passenger trains. It is a matter of grace on the part of the state, not a matter of right to which the road is entitled when it brings itself within the limit. The railway may present a strong showing why it should be permitted to substitute a mixed train, and I believe it has, but the Board may, in its judgment, think it better to require this service to the public even though it merely suits the convenience of a town of 500 inhabitants. This is a matter which appeals to the legislature, and it is the judgment of the Board the legislature desires. It must be made to appear to the Board, and not to the courts. It may be asked, What is to be done in case the Board acts arbitrarily? The answer is found in Worman v. Hagan, 78 Md. 152, 21 L.R.A. 720, 27 Atl. 616, where the court says: "It would not be becoming in this court to suppose that such a contingency would [245] ever happen. The courtesy due to the executive department forbids us to entertain such conjecture. But if, unhappily, in future times, it ever should occur, assuredly a sufficient remedy will be found. The resources of a free government are ample and will always be found adequate to punish and redress offenses against its sovereignty." But the company is not injured in any way. The law does not compel the road to do business at a loss, and the facts and figures set forth appear to be beside the question, except so far as they appeal to the judgment of the Board in determining whether it be better to substitute mixed trains for a time and thus save expense, or have a readjustment of schedules with all of the attendant trouble and delay. This matter can be adjusted readily. Primarily, the carrier fixes its own rates. Laws fixing too low rates are frequently declared confiscatory, and therefore this element of hardship and injustice is not involved. As Justice Bruce has pointed out the state, as an incident to its sovereignty, has a right to require the service, and the company must accede. The company has the right to fix remunerative rates, however, and if the state, in insisting on its rights of adequate service to the public, requires action which increases expense, the added rate will not be controlled unless it is unreasonable. The legislature has seen it to place this power with the Board, and, as after noted, did not contemplate appeal therefrom.

There are special features involved here. The railway company is asking a review of the judgment of the Board of Railroad Commissioners, but the review is based on matters not before the Board, if the contention of appellant be correct. How can it be said that the railroad "makes it to appear to the Board" when the Board denies the request on the showing before it? The courts may have new evidence regarding rates,—this is a matter where the state cannot interfere unless the railroad is guilty of injustice and the interference is aimed to secure justice. In this situation cited the Board is the first agency, and appeal to the courts is given; but the question at issue in that case is one where the company has the primary right to fix its own rates. In the case at bar we are concerned with a matter where the state has the absolute right to require the service. The company claims conditions have so changed, through the extension of the road, etc., that now the Board should relieve it. This contention comes with very poor grace. The [246] law was passed in 1907. Con-cededly, it has never been complied with. The state has a right to require the service, and it is the duty of the company to obey. The company, without any attempt to comply and after years of violation, at a time when action was being taken to compel its compliance, asked to be excused. The Board of Railroad Commissioners in its wisdom, denied the request, and now, having extended its line and changed conditions, the appellant says the judgment of the Board should be overruled and permission given because the conditions existing at the time the Board acted have changed.

In Robinson v. Sunderland [1899] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 751, the question before the court involved the judgment or decision of a local authority in regard to matters where the statute authorized such local authority to do certain things if it appeared too such authority necessary, and in that case, Channell, J. says: "The words, 'appear to such authority,' are obviously put in for the purpose of making the local authority the judges on the question. . . . It depends upon the opinion of the local authority, not upon the fact of sufficiency or insufficiency. It cannot possibly be a matter for the justices to decide; they can only inquire in this respect whether [or not] in the opinion of the local authority, there is a sufficient. . . . They may also inquire, I think, whether the local authority have taken the proper procedure—whether they have done everything which is made by the statute a condition precedent to the right to enter."

And in the same case, Lawrence, J., says: "The decision of that question rests with the local authority. When they have arrived at the conclusion that the premises are not in a proper condition, the justices have no power to interfere with it." It seems to me clear, therefore, that where the personal judgment of the Commission is involved, there can be no appeal therefrom, and this must have been the legislative intention.

The matter is far reaching. If the district courts and the supreme court may review the action of the Board in denying or granting requests to substitute mixed trains for passenger trains for such seasons as may be desired, then the statute involved is rendered practically nugatory. The long process to be used before final determination becomes, in effect, a bar. Of course, if this be the method prescribed by law, then the courts must give effect to it; but such a construction should not [247] be placed on this section unless it clearly appears to be the only proper one. The nature of the acts suggests this. The law contemplates merely a temporary suspension, speedily granted and speedily rescinded as the season of the year may justify, and the suspension must be for a definite time. From time to time the legislature prescribes the duties and powers of the Board, and states whether appeal to the courts lies. In enacting § 4789 the legislature could have readily provided for appeal. The fact that no appeal is provided for in this act is presumptive that none was intended, particularly when we view the nature and scope of the power vested in the Board. Had not power to relieve from the duties been vested in the Board, the company would be compelled to operate the trains in question, and would have no recourse to the courts in this matter. Why there should be appeal, in the absence of express provision, when the state says we will give the Board power to waive our rights when certain conditions are made to appear to the Board, does not appear clear, especially when we view the temporary nature of the permission to be granted. The construction given by the majority opinion will greatly cripple the effectiveness of the Board, and as the conditions which would guide the Board in granting or refusing permission are changeable and variable in their nature, by the time the courts have finally determined the judicial discretion of the Board in such requests, the judgment of the Board might vary the action first contemplated, and thus by appeals to the courts such delay may be occasioned that the very conditions justifying the Board in refusing permission may have so changed by the time the courts are through taking testimony that the Board itself, on a new application, may come to a different conclusion. The law recognizes the element of changing conditions, and places finally with the Board the power of adjusting the requirements to the conditions, in order that the public may be served and the company be uninjured. It may be claimed that this is one of the powers of the Board, and the powers are subject to review by virtue of the provisions of § 4736. Section 4789 is not a part of the article included in the language of § 4736, and the language of § 4736 should not be construed so as to control the acts of the administration, unless the legislature has explicitly shown such construction to be intended, and I respectfully suggest that this has not been done. I therefore believe the judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

Regulatory Power in General.

It is unquestioned that a state may, either by direct legislative action or by the delegation of power to a public service commission, require any railroad operating within the state to furnish reasonably adequate train service to every station on its line. In so far as the regulation affects interstate trains, it is deemed a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state and as such is an exception to the exclusive power of Congress over interstate commerce, subject to the qualification that its exercise must not extend beyond the reasonable requirements of the occasion. See the notes to the following cases: People v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 7 Ann. Cas. 1, at page 7; State v. Northern Pacific R. Co. 13 Ann. Cas. 144, at page 148; and Seaboard Air-Line Ry. v. Blackwell, Ann. Cas. 1917A 967, at page 982.

It is accordingly held that for the purpose of securing to any station an adequate train service the stopping of trains at that station, or, if necessary the running of additional trains, may be required. Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S. 427, 17 S. Ct. 627, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 1064, affirming 57 Minn. 390, 59 N. W. 487, 24 L.R.A. 502; Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S. 285, 19 S. Ct. 465, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 702; Com. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 120 Ky. 91, 85 S. W. 712; Com. v. Eastern R. Co. 103 Mass. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 555; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Oregon R. Commission, 60 Ore. 400, 119 Pac. 727; Texas R. Commission v. Galveston, etc. R. Co. 51 Tex. Civ. App. 447, 112 S. W. 345. And see State v. New Haven, etc. R. Co. 43 Conn. 351, affirmed 104 U. S. 1, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 629; State v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 60 Fla. 465, 54 So. 394. See also the cases cited in the notes heretofore referred to. In Railroad Com'rs v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 71 S. C. 130, 50 S. E. 641, it was said: "The legislature under the police power may require all regular passenger trains, not engaged in interstate commerce, to stop at certain stations. Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S. 427 [17 S. Ct. 627, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 1064.] It, therefore, necessarily follows that it has the power to compel a less number and may specify the particular trains required to stop at a station. In the case last mentioned the court says, page 430: 'A railroad corporation created by a state is, for all purposes of local government, a domestic corporation, and its railroad within the state is a matter of domestic concern. Even when its road connects, as most railroads do, with railroads in other states, the state which created the corporation may make all needful regulations of a police character, for the government of the company, while operating its road in that jurisdiction. It may prescribe the location and the plan of construction of the road, the rate of speed at which trains shall run, and the places at which they shall stop, and may make any other reasonable regulations for their management, in order to secure the objects of the incorporation, and the safety, good order, convenience and comfort of the passengers and of the public. All such regulations are strictly within the police power of the state.' See also Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 193 U. S. 53 [24 S. Ct. 396, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 614], and North Carolina Corp. Commission v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. [137 N. C. 1] 49 S. E. 191."

The reasonableness of the requirement is primarily a legislative question and the presumption is in favor of its validity. Texas, etc. R. Co. v. Louisiana R. Commission, 127 La. 387, 53 So. 660; Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. State, 28 Okla. 476, 114 Pac. 721; State v. Public Service Commission, 81 Wash. 275, 142 Pac. 684. Thus in Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Wisconsin R. Commission, 152 Wis. 654, 140 N. W. 296, it was said: "That the legislature may prescribe reasonable regulations as to the stoppage of trains is admitted. Such admission, however, includes within it the further admission that within the field of its discretion the legislature is supreme, and its determination must control unless clearly unreasonable or unless it contravenes some specific or implied constitutional provision, state or federal. It is not for the court to square the act with its own judgment and declare it void if it fails to measure up to such standard. The court's duty is to sustain the statute unless it can be said that in its enactment the legislature exceeded its powers." So in State v. Gladson, 57 Minn. 385, 59 N. W. 487, 24 L.R.A. 502, affirmed 166 U. S. 427, 17 S. Ct. 627, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 1064, in sustaining the validity of an act requiring all trains to stop at county seats, the court said: "It is contended by appellant that this law is so unreasonable and oppressive as against the railroad company that it is unconstitutional and void. We are not of that opinion. While it seems to us that it is rather drastic legislation to compel this train, which is designed only for through traffic, and stops at no other stations en route, to stop at this one station, while there are so many other trains to do the local business, still we cannot substitute our judgment for that of the legislature. There are reasons in support of the law on which the legislature had a right to come to the conclusion at which they arrived. Besides, this law does not apply alone to this train, this county seat, and this railroad, but to all railroads, all county seats, and, with a few exceptions, to all trains; and there are not the same reasons for assailing such a general law merely because it works hardship or inconvenience in exceptional cases as if it worked such hardship or inconvenience in all cases to which it applied. It is a regulation of common carriers which the legislature has the power to impose, and it is certainly not so unjust and unreasonable that the courts should declare it void."

The fact that the required train service will not be profitable to the carrier is not conclusive against the reasonableness of the order. State v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 239 Mo. 196, 143 S. W. 785; Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Miller, 28 Okla. 109, 114 Pac. 1104. The true criterion is whether the public interest requires that the additional service shall be rendered, provided always that the loss to the railroad shall not be so great as to constitute a greater sacrifice on its part than the public would have the right to demand; or in other words so great as to reduce the earnings of the railroad in the state below a fair return on the capital invested. Texas, etc. R. Co. v. Louisiana R. Commission, 127 La. 387, 53 So. 660. As was said in State v. Great Northern R. Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 1201: "The pecuniary loss or profit to the carrier in executing the particular order is an important criterion in determining the reasonableness of the order, but it is not the only one. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, 206 U. S. 1, 26, 27, 27 S. Ct. 585, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 933, 11 Ann. Cas. 398; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262, 279, 30 S. Ct. 330, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 472. The question of reasonableness is to be determined by a consideration of the interests both of the carrier and of the public. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 458, 10 S. Ct. 462, 702, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 970; Wisconsin, etc. R. Co. v. Jacobson, 179 U. S. 287, 296, 21 S. Ct. 115, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 194." So it was said in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, 206 U. S. 1, 11 Ann. Cas. 398, 27 S. Ct. 585, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 933: "As the primal duty of a carrier is to furnish adequate facilities to the public, that duty may well be compelled, although by doing so as an incident some pecuniary loss from rendering such service may result. It follows, therefore, that the mere incurring of a loss from the performance of such a duty does not in and of itself necessarily give rise to the conclusion of unreasonableness, as would be the case where the whole scheme of rates was unreasonable under the doctrine of Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466 [18 S. Ct. 418, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 819], or under the concessions made in the two propositions we have stated. Of course, the fact that the furnishing of a necessary facility ordered may occasion an incidental pecuniary loss is an important criteria to be taken into view in determining the reasonableness of the order, but it is not the only one. As the duty to furnish necessary facilities is coterminous with the powers of the corporation, the obligation to discharge that duty must be considered in connection with the nature and productiveness of the corporate business as a whole, the character of the services required, and the public need for its performance." Similarly in Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Wisconsin R. Commission, 152 Wis. 654, 140 N. W. 296, the court said: "The evidence shows that to put on an extra local train each way daily would cost about $7,000 per month and that the estimated receipts would not equal the expense. It is not shown, however, that the whole passenger revenue of the road in this state is not ample to meet the additional expense with a fair margin of profit. But if that were not so, if the service required is a reasonable one it is no answer to say that it would have to be performed at a financial loss. . . . In determining what is reasonably adequate service the paramount factor is public need and convenience, modified no doubt by many other considerations, such as the size of the station, the extent of the demand for transportation, as well as the reasonable cost of giving additional service."

A statute requiring a certain number of trains to be stopped daily at every town having more than a specified number of inhabitants rests on a permissible basis of classification. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Wisconsin R. Commission, 152 Wis. 654, 140 N. W. 296, wherein it was said: "It will be observed that as a basis for a minimum passenger service the population of a station and the number of passenger trains passing it each way daily are made the main tests. That such tests are germane to the subject of the act can scarcely be doubted. The population of a station is usually not only a fair index of the amount of business the station itself will furnish, but also of that of the population tributary thereto, while the number of passenger trains run daily past a station measures the amount of passenger business done over the road and, in a degree, its ability to furnish additional facilities to the station without financial loss or without undue interference with through traffic. The furnishing of adequate mail facilities for the residents of the village and of the surrounding country was also in the legislative mind, as is evidenced by the provision that the station must have a post office in order to enjoy the service provided for in the act. So it must be deemed that a proper basis of classification is made by the statute."

A statute requiring a certain number of trains to stop at towns having more than 200 inhabitants does not impair the right of the railroad commission to order a stopping of trains at a smaller place. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Wisconsin R. Commission, 157 Wis. 287, 146 N. W. 1129.

Limitations on Power.

As is stated in the preceding subdivision of this note, it is essential to the validity of an order for additional train service at a station that the requirement shall be reasonable. In other words, the obligation of the carrier is to furnish a service which is reasonably adequate under all the circumstances and it may not be subjected to the expense of anything in addition to this. Delaware, etc. R. Co. v. Van Santwood, 216 Fed. 252; Alabama R. Commission v. Saline River R. Co. 119 Ark. 239, 177 S. W. 896; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Com. 154 Ky. 332, 157 S. W. 687; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Norfolk, 25 Okla. 325, 107 Pac. 172, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 159. And see the cases cited infra in the subdivision Illustrations—Regulation Held Invalid. "The term 'adequate or reasonable facilities' is not in its nature capable of exact definition. It is a relative expression and has to be considered as calling for such facilities as might fairly be demanded, regard being had, among other things, to the size of the place, the extent of the demand for transportation, the cost of furnishing the additional accommodations asked for, and to all other facts which would have a bearing upon the question of convenience and cost." Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Wharton, 207 U. S. 328, 28 S. Ct. 121, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 230. In that case it was said further: "Of course, it is not reasonable to suppose that the same facilities can be given to places of very small population that are supplied to their neighbors who live in much larger communities, and the defendants in error, it may be conceded, make no such demand. No one would assert that one daily train each way between New York and Philadelphia would furnish adequate facilities for the transportation of passengers. Twenty times that number of trains would be necessary, and yet one through train a day, each way, through so small a place as Latta to New York or Tampa would in all probability easily transport all the passengers desiring transportation between these places. Nevertheless, the fair needs of the locality for transportation to other local points must be considered and provided for."

The distinction between "through" or "fast" trains and local trains is one essential to proper railroad management and the stopping of a "fast" train at a station of minor importance which is adequately served by local trains should not be ordered. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. v. Illinois, 177 U. S. 514, 20 S. Ct.

722, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 868, reversing 175 Ill. 359, 51 N. E. 842; Mississippi R. Commission v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 203 U. S. 335, 27 S. Ct. 90, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 209; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Wharton, 207 U. S. 328, 28 S. Ct. 121, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 230, reversing 74 S. C. 80, 54 S. E. 224; Herndon v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 218 U. S. 135, 30 S. Ct. 633, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 970; Roach v. Atchison, etc. R. Co. 218 U. S. 159, 30 S. Ct. 639, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 978; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 26 Okla. 804, 110 Pac. 668, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1003. In Cleveland, etc. R. Co. v. Illinois, supra, it was said: "We are not obliged to shut our eyes to the fact that competition among railways for through passenger traffic has become very spirited, and we think they have a right to demand that they shall not be unnecessarily hampered in their efforts to obtain a share of such traffic. It is evident, however, that neither the greater safety of their tracks, the superior comfort of their coaches or sleeping berths or the excellence of their tables would insure them such share, if they were unable to compete with their rivals in the matter of time. The great efforts of modern engineering have been directed to combining safety with the greatest possible speed in transportation, both by land and water. The public demand this; the railway and steamship companies are anxious in their own interests to furnish it, and local legislation ought not to stand in the way of it." So in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Wharton, 207 U. S. 328, 28 S. Ct. 121, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 230, it was said with reference to certain through trains: "To stop these trains at Latta, and other stations like it, which could bring equally strong reasons for the stoppage of the trains at their stations, would wholly change the character of the trains, rendering them no better in regard to speed than the other trains, 39 and 40, and would result in the inability of what had been fast trains to make their schedule time, and a consequent loss of patronage, also the loss of compensation for carrying the mails, which would be withdrawn from them, and the end would be the withdrawal of the trains, because of their inability to pay expenses."

The fact that some inconvenience results to individuals is not conclusive as to the inadequacy of the train service. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. State, 85 Ark. 284, 107 S. W. 989, wherein it was said: "The principal reason urged as to the inadequacy of the facilities provided by the railroad company is that the only through train to St. Louis which stops at Arkadelphia reaches stations in this state north of Little Rock at an unreasonable hour in the night time for passengers to debark; and that a through northbound train should be provided which will land passengers from Arkadelphia at those stations at a more reasonable hour. It is also earnestly argued that, as Arkadelphia is the county seat of Clark county, and as circuit court, when in session, usually convenes at 8:30 o'clock A. M., this train by which litigants and witnesses living south of that place could reach there at 6:18 A. M., ought to be required to stop there for their convenience, instead of requiring them to wait for train No. 24, due to reach Arkadelphia at 9:26 A. M. Now, it will be admitted that there is, at best, some inconvenience which must attend the traveler. A perfect system of railroad transportation, whereby the traveler can begin his journey at an hour which precisely suits his own convenience, progress with due speed and arrive at his destination, wherever that may be, at a reasonable hour of the day, is scarcely to be expected, however much it is to be desired. That would be Utopian. A train schedule could not be arranged so as to begin and end every journey in the day time. What the state may demand of a railroad company for the benefit of the people is reasonable service—facilities which are as near perfect as may reasonably be furnished, considering all the circumstances."

Where the service over part of a division is admittedly adequate, an order requiring additional trains on the whole division is unreasonable. Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. State, 23 Okla. 524, 101 Pac. 258.

REGULATION HELD VALID.

A statute requiring every train to stop at a county seat has been sustained. Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S. 427, 17 S. Ct. 627, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 1064, affirming 57 Minn. 390, 59 N. W. 487, 24 L.R.A. 502. And see Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. State (Tex.) 169 S. W. 385. In the case first cited it was said: "In Minnesota, as in other states, the county seat of each county is the place appointed for holding the meetings of the county commissioners and the sessions of the district court, and for keeping the offices of the clerk of that court, the judge of probate, the county auditor, the county treasurer, the sheriff and the register of deeds. Minnesota Gen. Stat. 1878, c. 8, sections 102, 129, 148, 174, 195, 220, 227, 258. The legislature of the state may well treat it, as one important object of establishing a railroad within the state, that public officers, parties to actions, jurors, witnesses and citizens generally, should be enabled the more promptly to reach and leave the centers to which their duties or business may call them. To require every regular passenger train, running wholly within the limits of the state, to stop at all stations at county seats, directly in its course, for the few minutes, and at the trifling expense, needed to take on and discharge passengers with safety, is a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state." In Cleveland, etc. R. Co. v. Illinois, 177 U. S. 514, 20 S. Ct. 722, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 868, reversing 175 Ill. 359, 51 N. E. 842, a similar act was held to be invalid in so far as it required the stopping of through trains at a minor station having four local trains each way daily.

A requirement that three regular passenger trains each way, if so many are run, shall be stopped at every city or village of more than three thousand inhabitants is reasonable. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S. 285, 19 S. Ct. 465, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 702.

In State v. Public Service Commission, 81 Wash. 275, 142 Pac. 684, it was said: "The question presented is one of fact. The testimony shows that the stopping of westbound train No. 3 at Krupp, in lieu of westbound train No. 43, will be to the advantage of the inhabitants of that town and vicinity. There is a population of approximately 1,500 people within a radius of nine miles from Krupp. These people, for the most part, do their business at Krupp. There are three to four jury terms of court held at Ephrata each year. The testimony shows that train No. 3 will best serve the convenience of jurors, witnesses, and litigants who attend court from Krupp and vicinity. It will also enable the people to go west to Ephrata or east to Spokane, transact their ordinary business, and return the same day. The passenger revenue at Krupp for the year preceding the filing of the complaint was $4,311.65. The revenue derived from freight for the eleven months preceding the same date was $22,512.08. On the other side of the question, the appellant showed that a compliance with the order may require an extra man, and that the train will be delayed from six to nine minutes. While these elements are to be considered, they are not controlling. 'Because, as the primal duty of a carrier is to furnish adequate facilities to the public, that duty may well be compelled, although by doing so as an incident some pecuniary loss from rendering such service may result.' Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Commission, 206 U. S. 1 [11 Ann. Cas. 398, 27 S. Ct. 585, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 933]. This principle was reaffirmed in Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 262 [30 S. Ct. 330, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 472]."

In St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Troy, 25 Okla. 749, 108 Pac. 753, an order for additional train service was held to be reasonable, the evidence showing the following facts: "The town of Troy is a place of about 300 population, with one general store, two small stores. That Ragon is an inland town about four miles from Troy, and about the same size, and would do its railway business at Troy if facilities were improved. Some cotton and a great many ties are shipped from Troy, and considerable cattle would be shipped from there if the accommodations were adequate for that purpose. That two passenger trains stop there, one of the northbound trains, due between 7 and 8 o'clock A. M., and the southbound, due between 10 and 11 o'clock P. M. The trains that stop are local trains. The only through trains the company runs over this line are Nos. 9 and 10, between St. Louis, Mo., and Texas points, via Sherman, Denison, and Ft. Worth: the southbound being due at Troy at 11:05 A. M., and the northbound at 2:47 P. M."

In State v. Washington R. Commission, 60 Wash. 218, 110 Pac. 1075, it was said: "Anacortes is a town of 5,000 or 6,000 inhabitants, situated in Skagit county, at the western terminus of the Rockport branch of the railway company's lines, about 16 miles west of Burlington, where that branch crosses the main north and south coast line of the railway company. This main line connects the cities of Seattle, Everett, Bellingham, Vancouver, B. C. Mt. Vernon, the county seat of Skagit county, is also on this main line, about four miles south of Burlington. The total amount of business done by the railway company at Anacortes is about $20,000 per month for freight, and about $800 per month for passenger fares, the latter representing the same number of passengers. This is the only rail communication between Anacortes and Mt. Vernon. The evidence indicates that the travel by rail between Anacortes and the county seat would probably be considerably increased if the extra train service was furnished as ordered: a considerable part of that travel being at the present time by road vehicles on account of the inconvenient train service. At the time of the hearing the first train left Anacortes at 7:15 A. M., returning at 9:50 A. M. Another train left Anacortes at 5:45 P. M., returning at 8 P. M. A freight train, bringing mail and also passengers if they cared to ride thereon, arrives at Anacortes from Burlington generally about 5 P. M., though it is scheduled to arrive earlier. Through trains on the coast line arrive from both directions at Burlington about the noon hour, with which there is no close connection for Anacortes. The present train service has the effect of furnishing only a morning mail service to Anacortes so far as the arrival of mails is concerned; the afternoon and evening trains arriving too late for distribution until morning. Upon the showing of these facts, the commission announced that, unless a showing was made indicating that the running of a midday train from Anacortes to Burlington and return would result in loss to the railway company, such a service would be ordered to be furnished. No such showing was attempted prior to the making of the formal order. However, the railway company put on an additional train leaving Anacortes at 10:45 A. M., arriving at Burlington about an hour later, and upon its return from Rockport arrived at Burlington at 9 P. M. and at Anacortes at 10 P. M. This train, it will be noticed, helped the passenger service to some extent by arriving at Burlington a short time before the noon hour, but not in returning, and did not have any material effect on the mail service so far as the arrival of mails at Anacortes is concerned. We think these facts show that the train service ordered by the commission would be a materially better service than that which the railway company is furnishing, even with the added train put on since the hearing, and we have seen that there is no showing that such train service as so ordered by the commission would be unreasonably burdensome upon the railway company by being operated at a loss."

In a number of Oklahoma cases orders requiring trains to stop on signal at particular stations have been sustained. Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Witcher, 25 Okla. 586, 106 Pac. 852; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. State, 28 Okla. 610, 115 Pac. 770; Stepp v. Wichita Falls, etc. R. Co. 29 Okla. 71, 115 Pac. 1012; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Langer, 29 Okla. 691, 119 Pac. 126, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 478. A typical case of that kind was Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. State, 28 Okla. 476, 114 Pac. 721, wherein it was said: "Appellant's objections to this order, as they appear from the testimony of its vice-president, quoted supra, are: First, that the grade of its road at and near Belva is such that to stop these trains will cause one of them to lose a great deal more time than on the lighter grades. Second, if it is required to stop its trains at Belva, it ought to stop them at all the other small stations. While there is evidence that these trains are interstate trains and carry mail, there is no evidence that they are fast trains, or that the stopping of them at this station will interfere with their schedule or with their connection with other trains. Nor is there any evidence as to what the additional cost to the company of stopping these trains at the time required by the order will be. The evidence discloses that the passenger receipts for the months of July and August preceding the hearing before the commission were small; but whether these are the average monthly receipts of this station the evidence fails to disclose. That the stopping of these trains will entail some additional expense upon appellant is evident; but that such additional expense will operate as pecuniary loss to the appellant is not established. These trains are not required to stop every time they pass this station, but only when there are passengers upon such trains to leave the trains at that point, or when there are passengers desiring to enter these trains at this point. Nor does the suggestion necessarily follow that if these trains are required to stop at Belva they would have to be stopped at all other stations of similar size, for the reason that at no other station on this road do the day trains meet each other. The farther any station is from Belva on this road the more time intervenes between the passing of the day trains going in opposite directions, and the more time is afforded to patrons on the road to embark upon one of these trains and transact business at other points upon the road and return upon the other train; but the patrons at Belva, with the present schedule and facilities afforded them, are without opportunity to go to any point upon the company's line of railway and return in less than 24 hours.

. . . In the case at bar, one of the beneficial purposes that will be accomplished by stopping these trains on flag will be to enable the patrons of appellant at that point to go to their county seat and transact their business and return within half the time they otherwise could. While the facts disclosed by the record supporting the order of the commission, as stated by the commission in its order, might not be sufficient to require additional trains to be run to furnish to these patrons the facility which they seek, in the absence of any showing by appellant that this order will entail pecuniary loss upon it or hamper these trains in making their interstate connections, we are unable to say that the prima facie presumption of the reasonableness and justness of the order of the commission has been overcome."

REGULATION HELD INVALID.

In Texas, etc. R. Co. v. Louisiana R. Commission, 127 La. 387, 53 So. 660, the issue was as to the reasonableness of an order for the operation of night trains on a branch road to and from the town of Natchitoches. The extent of the traffic and the expense of operating the trains were stated by the court as follows: "Another exhibit shows the distance that was traveled by the 16,890 passengers carried by plaintiff from Natchitoches during the year ending July, 1909, and shows that 94 per cent of these passengers went to points less than 100 miles from Natchitoches; that is to say, were presumably day passengers, since the day trains are ordinarily used for a short distance. This would leave 890 for the night trains, a number approximating the 792 shown by the other exhibit. If we adopt the higher of these figures, we find that about 1,800 passengers traveled to and from Natchitoches more than 100 miles, or presumably on the night trains, during 1909. Doubling these figures, for greater safety of computation, we have 3,600 passengers using the night trains, or an average of about 10 a day—5 in, 5 out. The average fare from Natchitoches to Cypress is 25 cents. The total revenues, then, from the 3,600 passengers would be $900. The evidence shows that the expense of this additional service would be $11,349.95 a year; that, therefore, the plaintiff company would carry each passenger at a net loss of $2.90, and would furnish the service at a net yearly loss of $10,549.95." Holding the order to be unreasonable the court said: "A night service upon this branch would, no doubt, be a great convenience to the people of Natchitoches, and especially to the young lady students of the Normal school located in that town; but so would a night service upon every branch line in the state be a great convenience to the people of the towns along the line. We discover no special reason why there should be this night service upon this branch to accommodate so few people."

In Yazoo, etc. R. Co. v. Louisiana R. Commission, 130 La. 1012, 58 So. 862, an order requiring that on a branch line leading to a town of about 900 inhabitants trains should be run to connect with every train on the main line was held to be unreasonable. The court said: "Clinton is a town of 918 souls, according to the last census. It is on the decline, for its population, according to the census of 1900, was 960, and, according to that of 1890, was 974. Its present passenger facilities consist of a train which does service between Baton Rouge, Ethel, Wilson, and Clinton. It leaves Baton Rouge daily at 9 A. M., reaching Ethel at 10:40 A. M., merely stopping at Ethel, and returns at once to Ethel, where it remains until 1:05 P. M., when it goes again to Clinton, and at once returns to Ethel. After making a stop at Ethel, it proceeds to Wilson, further north on the main line; and at 3:15 P. M. starts on its way back to Baton Rouge. This train on its trip from Baton Rouge to Clinton in the morning, and on its trip from Clinton to Wilson in the afternoon and thence back to Baton Rouge, is a mixed freight and passenger train. On the other trips, between Clinton and Ethel, it is a regular passenger train. By this train, morning passengers make close connection on the main line with the Vicksburg Express northbound, and approximately close connection with the 1 P. M. New Orleans Express southbound. There are two other trains daily on the main line: The Memphis Express, passing Ethel at 5:18 A. M., southbound, and at 6:20 P. M., northbound. It is to afford the people of Clinton close connection with the latter two trains that the said order has been made. Clinton would have then five trains daily to Ethel.

We think that to require such service for so small a place is unreasonable. The service would be out of proportion."

. In Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Norfolk, 25 Okla. 325, 107 Pac. 172, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 159, an order for additional train service to a town of 300 inhabitants was held to be unreasonable, it appearing that the town had two railways making practically the same points with trains stopping as follows: Northbound, 1:20 P. M., local freight carrying passengers and freight daily except Sunday, between 12:10 P. M. and 1:10 P. M.; southbound, 2:25 P. M., local freight carrying passengers and freight daily except Sundays, 9:55 A. M.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Wharton, 207 U. S. 328, 28 S. Ct. 121, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 230, with respect to the reasonableness of stopping certain through trains at a small station, it was said: "In this case the company furnishes eleven different trains a day by which the people of Latta can leave that place, and among them are the daily through trains 39 and 40 for the South and North, respectively. That the inhabitants of a place demand greater facilities than they have is not at all conclusive as to the reasonableness of their demand for something more. Fault is found here with the character of some of the local trains, in that the appointments thereof are not up to a sufficiently high standard. It is true that included in these eleven trains were some which were a combination of freight and passenger, and others which only ran between Latta and Clio, and those are described as dirty and without proper closets and drinking tanks. These deficiencies are remediable by other means than the stoppage of the two trains in question. It is to be remembered that these two places, Latta and Clio, had together a population, by the last census, of about a thousand. Two ordinary modern trains of the usual passenger coaches would comfortably transport the total population of these places. The number of people who are inconvenienced by the nonstoppage of these trains is, of course, comparatively quite small. One witness, who was in the hotel and general merchandise business at Latta, said that he sent a man or two every week to meet the fast train at Dillon, because they could not take it at Latta. Other witnesses said that the demand for those particular trains, 32 and 35, was quite frequent, as many as four people a week, while others said that the inconvenience of the through trains, 39 and 40, was on account of their not being fast trains, and hence were not so pleasant as the others, 32 and 35, and did not get them into their destination as early as the latter trains did. The demand at Latta by people desiring to go to the termination of the road, either at New York or Tampa, would naturally be small. Some of the plaintiff's witnesses said that the demand for transportation at Latta was large, or quite large, and the inconvenience great, but a further examination of these witnesses showed that in specific details there was much lacking, and instances of inconvenience were really somewhat limited. But assuming that the number actually inconvenienced by the want of fast trains was 'quite large,' as said by some witnesses, it is perfectly evident the number would be small compared with the inconvenience of the much larger number of through passengers resulting from the stoppage of these trains at Latta and other similar stations in the state. To stop these trains at Latta, and other stations like it, which could bring equally strong reasons for the stoppage of the trains at their stations, would wholly change the character of the trains, rendering them no better in regard to speed than the other trains, 39 and 40, and would result in the inability of what had been fast trains to make their schedule time, and a consequent loss of patronage, also the loss of compensation for carrying the mails, which would be withdrawn from them, and the end would be the withdrawal of the trains, because of their inability to pay expenses."

In Alabama R. Commission v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 195 Ala. 527, 70 So. 645, an order requiring the operation of an additional train daily for the accommodation of four towns, all of less than 2,000 population and having a train service consisting of three trains daily each way, was held to be unreasonable.

In Delaware, etc. R. Co. v. Van Santwood, 216 Fed. 252, the court said: "The true inquiry is whether or not the convenience and necessities of the people at South Granby, Lamson, Little Utica, and Lysander demand the restoration, running, and operation of the two trains in question (those discontinued and ordered restored). South Granby and Lamson are on the line, and the combined population is, in round numbers, 850. Lysander and Little Utica have a population combined of 400, and to serve the necessities and convenience of these 1,250 people, residing in an agricultural community, should the complainant, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company, be compelled to operate four trains per day each way between Oswego and Syracuse at a large pecuniary loss to the company? Are not two trains each way on complainant's road sufficient for the convenience and necessities of the public? . . . If numerous nonpaying trains may be compelled in order to serve the convenience of a very few residing in small towns situated between two larger places on the line of the road, it may be done at all points on the line, and the profits, if any, of the paying trains, including freight, will be eaten up; and, if there is to be a curtailment of service, where shall it be, and on what principal based? What is reasonable and what is reasonably necessary is not to be determined by the occasional wants and wishes and convenience of a very few people living at points along the line. It seems to me that when steam trains enough are run between the city of Oswego and the city of Syracuse to accommodate and serve the necessities of the people of those cities and the intervening city of Fulton, and two steam trains per day each way are run which reasonably serve the convenience and supply the reasonable necessities of the four small intervening points, and these people also have the convenience of the trolley line as described, the complainant has performed its whole duty to the public, and that to compel the running of the two additional trains between these points at a net loss of over $3,000 per annum is unjust and unreasonable and in violation of the constitutional rights of the complainant."

In State v. Washington R. Commission, 62 Wash. 193, 113 Pac. 252, a requirement of a daily train service on a branch fourteen miles long was held to be unreasonable, the court saying: "During November and December, 1907, and January and February, 1908, the railway company maintained a daily train service on this line, and during that period the passenger travel on the line only produced an income of nine cents per mile per day in one direction, and eleven cents per mile per day in the opposite direction. That is, there was an average of between three and four passengers per day carried over the line in each direction at the usual fare of three cents per mile. There is no evidence in the record to warrant the conclusion that the passenger earnings would be greater than this at the present time and with a daily train service. The cost of operating a train over the line is not less than thirty cents per mile, not including maintenance expenses. The two trains per week now operated are entirely sufficient to render all necessary freight service to the people along the line. The entire receipts from freight and passengers, even as the train service is now operated, is not sufficient to prevent the line being operated at a financial loss to the railway company, and it is evident that that loss would be materially increased by the additional expense incident to a daily train service. The benefits to the public of a daily freight service over the present service would be insignificant. And while the additional passenger service would no doubt be of some convenience to the public, we do not think the necessities of the public for such service is of enough consequence to warrant the forcing of the railway company to furnish such additional service at a financial loss in addition to the loss now being incurred by it in operating the line as at present. This branch line and the small community it serves are both relics of the memorable real estate boom of the early nineties. Nearly all of the business inducements which prompted the building of this branch line have vanished, and we believe the evidence in this record shows that the railway company is bearing all of the burdens required of it in furnishing to the public the present train service."

In Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Com. 154 Ky. 332, 157 S. W. 687, it was said: "As Eddyville is a place of only about one thousand people and six trains stop there every day, three eastbound and three westbound, it cannot be said that the railroad company is failing to furnish reasonable facilities for the traveling public without also stopping two fast night trains at that point. Anyone wishing to take these trains can take them at Kuttawa which is only about a mile away, and under the rulings of the supreme court it must be held as a matter of law that the act requiring the two fast night trains to stop there is invalid."

FIREMEN'S INSURANCE COMPANY

v.

LAREY.

Arkansas Supreme Court—July 3, 1916.

125 Ark. 93; 188 S. W. 7.

Tenancy in Common — Nature of Title.

The title to tenants in common in land is separate, there being no unity in title, but only unity of possession.

Fire Insurance — Change in Title of Property — Sale of Interest by Joint Owner.

Where an insurance policy covering partnership property is voidable by change of title of insured, a sale of his interest by one partner to a third person affects the risk, because a new party is brought into contractual relations with the insurance company.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under such policy, covering property of tenants in common, a sale by a tenant in common of his interest to a stranger ends the contract of insurance as to him or his vendee.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under such policy, covering property of tenants in common, a sale by a tenant in common of his interest to a stranger does not affect the insurance as to the remaining tenant or tenants in common, since thereby no stranger is brought into contractual relation with the insurance company so far as concerns that part of the insurance which covers the interest of the tenant or tenants in common not selling.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Miller county:
HAYNIE, Judge.

Action by R. L. Larey, plaintiff, against Firemen's Insurance Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Webber & Webber for appellant.
J. M. Carter for appellee.

[95] HART, J.—R. L. Larey sued The Firemen's Insurance Company to recover upon a policy of fire insurance. The facts material to a determination of the issues raised by the appeal are as follows:

C. M. Blocker and R. L. Larey were tenants in common of certain lots in the town of Fouke, Miller County, Arkansas, each owning an undivided one-half interest therein. There were two store buildings located on the lots. On the 1st day of April, 1915, C. M. Blocker applied to the Firemen's Insurance Company for a policy on said buildings in the sum of $800 for the period of one year. The policy was issued to C. M. Blocker and R. L. Larey and among other conditions provided that the policy should be void "If any change, other than by the death of an insured, take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard) whether by legal process or judgment or by voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise, etc." Blocker had no authority from Larey to insure his interest in the property but as soon as Larey found that the insurance had been taken on the property, he ratified the act of Blocker and agreed to pay his part of the premium. The policy was issued on a credit but the agent who issued it had authority to issue policies on a credit and both Blocker and Larey were well known to him. Blocker sold his interest in the property to Mrs. F. L. Duke and on the 15th day of May, 1915, the agent cancelled the policy. The property was destroyed by fire on June 12, 1915. Larey did not know that Blocker had sold his interest in the property until after the fire occurred and had not authorized him to make a sale thereof.

The court directed the jury to return a verdict for Larey in the sum of $300 being one-half of the policy and from the judgment rendered the insurance company has appealed.

[96] It is contended by counsel for the defendant that the contract for insurance was an indivisible one and that the policy became void when Blocker sold his interest to Mrs. Duke. They claim that this act violated the provision of the policy quoted in the statement of facts against a sale of change of title of the subject of the insurance. In the first place they contend that this necessarily results from the principles laid down in McQueeney v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 52 Ark. 257, 12 S. W. 498, 20 Am. St. Rep. 179, 5 L.R.A. 744, and Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Public Parks Amusement Co. 63 Ark. 187, 37 S. W. 959. In the first mentioned case the policy was issued upon a residence and frame house which was used for rental property. A gross sum was named in the policy as the premium and the amount of the policy was apportioned as follows: $600 upon the residence and $400 upon the frame house held to let. The same person owned both houses. The court held that the contract was entire and that the effect of the apportionment of the amount of insurance on the different subjects insured was to limit the extent of the insurers' risk, upon each item, to the amount named. In the last case the policy stipulated for a single premium and covered the contents of a livery stable. The insurance was separately apportioned to three classes, the horses, the vehicles, and the harness, etc. It was held that the contract was entire, the contract and risk being indivisible, and that if the policy was rendered void as to part of the carriages by reason of the insured's misrepresentation of his title, the entire policy was avoided. We do not think the rule laid down in those cases is controlling here. In giving effect to language, regard must be had to its purposes. The generality of the language employed must be restricted to the reason and object of its use by the parties. In the cases referred to the same person owned all the property insured. The premium was gross and there was not only no apportionment between the different items of property insured but the title to the insured property was in the same person. The two houses in the McQueeney case were situated at a distance from each other and a separate valuation of the houses was placed in the policy to apportion [97] the loss in case one of the houses burned and the other did not during the life of the policy.

The title to tenants in common in lands is separate. There is no unity in title but only unity of possession. In the instant case it is conceded that the agent who wrote the policy had the authority to issue policies and to issue them on a credit. He lived in the same county with Blocker and Larey and knew them both personally. The policy was not issued to Blocker and Larey as partners but as tenants in common. Hence the agent must have known that they did not occupy the premises themselves but were renting them out. The contract was one in its nature and purpose susceptible of apportionment and when the intention of the parties are gathered from the language of the contract and the subject matter of the insurance is considered, we think there is nothing in the nature or the terms of the contract which makes it indivisible. There is considerable conflict of authority as to the question whether the change in the personnel of a partnership, or the assignment of one partner's interest, is within the meaning of fire insurance policies which provide that the policy shall be void in case of any sale or transfer of the property, or change of title or possession. A much greater number of decisions hold that the transfer by one partner of his interest in the property insured to another member of the firm, is not such a change in the title thereto as would violate conditions in a policy against transfer, change, or alienation of the property or interests therein. See case note to 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 422; Pierce v. Nashua F. Ins. Co. 50 N. H. 297, 9 Am. Rep. 235; Lockwood v. Middlesex Mut. Assur. Co. 47 Conn. 553; Hoffman v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 405, 88 Am. Dec. 337. The reason given is that such a condition is inserted in the policy for the benefit and protection of the company against the risks of having careless or improvident persons substituted in the place of the original parties with whom they contracted. An assignment by one partner to another is obviously not within the principle or motive on which the condition is founded. Such a change does not affect the risk because no new party is brought in contractual [98] relations with the insurers. The rule is different where a sale is made by one partner to a third person. In such cases a new person is brought into contractual relation with the insurance company. This is so because every partner owns the whole partnership property subject to the equal ownership of every other partner. When one partner sells his interest to a third person such purchaser does not become a tenant in common with the other partners in any specific goods but acquires only the interest his vendor had, which is his share of the residue after the affairs of the firm are settled and the debts paid, including debts due from the firm to a partner. 30 Cyc. 605. Again the same author says that the interest of a partner in the firm's assets is not that of a tenant in common, or of a joint tenant at common law. It is the share to which he is entitled under the partnership contract, after the firm's debts and the partners' equities are adjudged. 30 Cyc. 444. See also Parsons on Partnership, 4th ed. p. 137. Tenants in common are such as hold by several and distinct titles, but by unity of possession; because none knoweth his own severalty and therefore they all occupy promiscuously. Cooley's Blackstone, 4th ed. Vol. 1, Book 2, * p. 191. On the other hand as Lord Hardwicke said, each member of a partnership is seized per my et per tout of the common stock and effects.

It follows that when one partner sells his interest to a third person, a new party with whom the insurance company did not contract is introduced. Such a change affects the risk because a new party is brought into contractual relations with the insurance company. In the case of a sale by a tenant in common of his interest to a stranger, the contract of insurance as to him or his vendee is at an end. Under a contract of insurance containing a provision like the one in question as to change of title, the contract as to the remaining tenant in common however, is not affected by the sale. This is so because under the sale no stranger is brought into contractual relation with the company. There is no unity of title whatever between tenants in common and a contract made by an insurance company with them is necessarily subject to [99] apportionment and is therefore a divisible contract. We think this rule is in accordance with reason and justice. To illustrate: in the present case, Blocker sold his interest in the property insured to Mrs. Duke. Under the clause of the policy under consideration there was a change in his title to the property and the contract was ended as to him. Mrs. Duke could not be brought into contractual relationship with the company without its consent and under the clause in question there was not only no consent but the insurance was avoided as to her. All this, however, had nothing to do with the contract in regard to the interest of Larey. His interest was not in any way affected by the sale of Blocker's interest to Mrs. Duke. In case of a loss by fire, neither he nor Mrs. Duke could share with Larey in the insurance collected by him. There would be no temptation to Mrs. Duke to destroy the property, not only because she could not share in any recovery had by Larey but she also lost her undivided one-half interest in the property insured.

The judgment will be affirmed.

MCCULLOUGH, C. J. (dissenting).—The ownership of the insured property was separate, Blocker and appellee, Larey, being equal tenants in common, but the contract of insurance was joint and indivisible. The stipulation in the policy was that "if any change other than by the death of the insured takes place in the interest, title or possession of the subject of insurance, or if the policy be assigned before a loss, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, the entire policy shall be void." It is undisputed that Blocker sold his individual interest in the property to Mrs. Duke without obtaining the consent of the insurance company.

There is a sharp conflict in the authorities on the question of the divisibility of a policy of insurance which provides for the payment of a gross sum as premium but insures different items of property. This court has held that such a contract is indivisible and that a breach of a portion of the contract avoids the entire policy. McQueeney [100] v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 52 Ark. 257, 12 S. W. 498, 20 Am. St. Rep. 179, 5 L.R.A. 744; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Public Parks Amusement Co. 63 Ark. 187, 37 S. W. 959.

In the opinion in the McQueeney case, the conflict in the authorities on the subject was distinctly recognized, and after a full discussion of the question and a review of the authorities, the court deliberately took the position that the contract was indivisible, and many cases were cited in support of that rule. In concluding the discussion the learned judge who wrote the opinion said: "We can see no good reason why a contract which, if made between individuals, would be entire, should be divisible if made between an individual and an insurance company."

The same rule was announced in the latter case of Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Public Parks Amusement Co. supra, where the policy was on different items of personal property but reciting an entire consideration, and Judge Battle, speaking for the court, said: "The contract of insurance was entire and indivisible. Being void as to a part of the property insured, it is void as to all. It was all exposed to one risk, and the consideration for the policy was a specified sum. The fact that separate amounts of insurance were apportioned to separate items or classes of property did not make the policy divisible. The contract and risk being indivisible, the contract is entire, and any breach which renders it void as to a part of the property affects it in the same manner as to the remainder."

The authorities on this question are still irreconcilably in conflict, but as our court has deliberately taken a position on the question it ought not to be changed except by the law-makers. If the policies in the two cases just referred to were entire, it would seem for a stronger reason, that the policy involved in the present controversy is entire and indivisible. There was a single premium and the contract was to pay a gross sum to both of the beneficiaries jointly in the event of the destruction of the property. It makes really a stronger case of indivisibility of the contract than where the policy apportions a separate sum on each item of the property insured. There is not a single feature of this policy which separates it into parts, for it mentions the two beneficiaries jointly, provides [101] for a gross premium and for a gross sum to be paid in case of loss. There is nothing upon which the idea of divisibility can rest. The fact that the two beneficiaries owned separate interests does not, it seems to me, at all affect the entirety of the contract.

It will be observed also that the language of this contract, which is a standard form of policy, is unusually emphatic in providing that the entire contract should be void. Many of the authorities lay down the rule that that particular language renders every portion of the contract void even though it be treated as a divisible contract, and in those states where the contrary view is taken from that this court has decided upon the question of the divisibility of the contract, hold that where the stipulation is that the entire policy shall be void, it renders the contract indivisible so as to make it void in the case of a breach of the terms with respect to any part of the contract. 2 Cooley's Briefs, on the Law of Insurance, p. 1913; Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Schild, 69 Ohio St. 136, 68 N. E. 706, 100 Am. St. Rep. 663; Home Ins. Co. v. Connelly, 104 Tenn. 93, 56 S. W. 828; Germier v. Springfield F. etc. Ins. Co. 109 La. 341, 33 So. 361; McWilliams v. Cascade F. etc. Ins. Co. 7 Wash. 48, 34 Pac. 140; Martin v. Insurance Co. of North America, 57 N. J. L. 623, 31 Atl. 213.

It seems to me, however, that this case is entirely controlled by the two decisions of this court referred to, and that we are making a radical departure from the doctrine announced in those cases in holding that this contract was divisible and that one of the beneficiaries could recover for his separate interest.

Mr. Justice Wood concurs in the views here expressed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that where insured property is owned by two persons as tenants in common, a transfer by one of them to a third person avoids the insurance as to him under a provision in the policy for avoidance by a change of ownership but does not avoid it as to his co-owner. The holding is apparently unique, the court applying the principle applicable to transfers by co-owners inter sese and holding to be inapplicable the rule relating to the transfer to a third person of an undivided interest whereby a new party is introduced into the insurance contract and the risk assumed is materially altered. The cases relating to the effect of an alienation by or to a partner or joint owner as a change in title or interest within the meaning of a fire insurance policy are reviewed in the note to Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. v. Ohio Valley Dry Goods Co. Ann. Cas. 1916B 944.

THE KING

v.

ROBINSON.

England—Court of Appeal—March 15, 1915.

[1915] 2 K. B. 342.

False Pretences — Attempt — What Constitutes.

The acts of a person whose property is insured against loss by burglary in secreting the property and making complaint to the police that it had been stolen are merely preparation for the commission of the offense of obtaining money from the insurer by false pretences and do not constitute an attempt to commit the offense.

[See note at end of this case.]

[342] Appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal.

The appellant, who was a jeweller at Oldham, was convicted at the Manchester Assizes of having attempted to obtain money from certain underwriters at Lloyd's by false pretences.

On November 5, 1914, he insured his stock of jewellery at Lloyd's against burglary for twelve months for 1200l. By the terms of the policy it was provided that "The assured, in case of loss or damage, shall, as a condition precedent to his right to be indemnified in respect thereof, give to the underwriters such information and evidence as to the property lost or damaged, and the circumstances of the loss or damage, as the underwriters may reasonably require and as may be in the assured's power."

On the morning of December 11 a policeman who was passing the appellant's shop heard some one inside shout out "I am bound and gagged. Open the door." The policeman whistled for assistance, some other policeman came up, and they burst open the door. Inside they found the appellant with his legs and one hand tied with cords. He told them that on the previous night after locking the door of the shop he put his [343] jewellery in his safe and was going upstairs when he was knocked on the head and stunned. On his regaining consciousness he found himself in the condition in which they saw him. He looked into the safe and said: "They have cleared me out." The safe was open and empty. The police, who were not inclined to accept his statement, took him to the police station to give a more detailed account. They then went back to the shop and searched the premises, where they found the jewellery concealed in a recess at the back of the safe. They returned to the station and asked the appellant how he accounted for the jewellery being where they had found it. He replied "I am very sorry, but the times have been bad through the war. I am a long way behind last year's takings. Being inspired by the insurance I got from the last robbery at my shop I did it to get more money from them." He was then arrested and charged. At the trial Lawrence, J. directed the jury that if they thought the prisoner intended to obtain the 1200l. from the underwriters by falsely pretending that he had been the victim of a burglary, and that if he had not been arrested he would have gone on to make a claim against the underwriters, they might find him guilty of an attempt to obtain the money by false pretences. The jury convicted the prisoner, who appealed.

Gordon Hewart, K. C. and McCleary for appellant.

Bodkin and Jordan for prosecution.

Magson & Nicholson, Oldham, solicitors for appellant.

Director of Public Prosecutions, solicitor for prosecution.

[347] LORD READING, C.J.—This is an appeal against a conviction for an attempt to obtain money by false pretences from certain underwriters, the appeal being upon a question of law. There is little room for dispute about the facts. The prisoner was a jeweller carrying on business at Oldham. In November, 1914, he insured his stock of jewellery with underwriters at Lloyd's against burglary and theft, and a policy was issued to him covering those risks. On the morning of December 11 some policemen when passing the appellant's shop heard a shout inside from some one calling to them to open the door. They burst open the door and found the appellant bound with cords. He said that on the previous night he had put the jewellery in his safe, and was going upstairs when he was knocked down and lost consciousness. The safe was found by the police to be open and empty. The police were not satisfied with his story and took him to the police station for the purpose of his making a more definite statement; they then went back to the shop and searched the premises with the result that they found the jewellery hidden underneath the safe. When they told him of the discovery he made a confession and said [348] "Being inspired by the insurance I got from the last robbery at my shop I did it to get more money from them;" and when asked where he was insured he said "Lloyd's." On those facts it was not disputed that the appellant had arranged a fraudulent scheme with the object of its being used to obtain money on the policy from the underwriters, and the only question was whether, the police having intervened and prevented its execution, the offence of attempting to obtain the money had been committed. If he had made a claim of the money from the underwriters, or had communicated to them the facts of the pretended burglary upon which a claim was to be subsequently based, he clearly could have been convicted of an attempt to obtain the money. It seems to the Court upon consideration of the authorities that there is no real difficulty in formulating the principle of law which is applicable to cases of this kind. A safe guide is to be found in the statement of the law which is laid down by Parke, B. in Reg. v. Eagleton, Dears. 515, at p. 538. "The mere intention to commit a misdemeanour is not criminal. Some act is required, and we do not think that all acts towards committing a misdemeanour are indictable. Acts remotely leading towards the commission of the offence are not to be considered as attempts to commit it, but acts immediately connected with it are." The difficulty lies in the application of that principle to the facts of the particular case. In some cases it is a difficult matter to determine whether an act is immediately or remotely connected with the offence of which it is alleged to be an attempt. In other cases the question is easier of solution, as for instance in Reg. v. Button [1900] 2 Q. B. 597. There upon the evidence there was a false pretence made directly to the race authorities with the intent to make them part with the prize, and one which, but for the fact of the fraud being discovered, would necessarily have had that effect. In the present case the real difficulty lies in the fact that there is no evidence of any act done by the appellant in the nature of a false pretence which ever reached the minds of the underwriters, though they were the persons who were to be induced to part with the money. The evidence falls short of any communication of such a pretence to the underwriters or to any agent of theirs. The police were [349] not acting on behalf of the underwriters. In truth what the appellant did was preparation for the commission of a crime, not a step in the commission of it. It consisted in the preparation of evidence which might indirectly induce the underwriters to pay; for if the police had made a report that a burglary had taken place,—and that was presumably what the appellant intended,—it may very well be that the underwriters would have paid without further inquiry. But there must be some act beyond mere preparation if a person is to be charged with an attempt. Applying the rule laid down by Parke, B., we think that the appellant's act was only remotely connected with the commission of the full offence, and not immediately connected with it. If we were to hold otherwise we should be going further than any case has ever yet gone, and should be opening the door to convictions for acts which are not at present criminal offences. We think the conviction must be quashed, not on the technical ground that no information or evidence as to the property lost was given to the underwriters as required by the policy, but upon the broad ground that no communication of any kind of the false pretence was made to them.

Generally.

An attempt to commit a crime is an overt act which, but for the interference of some cause preventing the carrying out of the intent, would result in the commission of the crime. 8 R. C. L. tit. Criminal Law, p. 277. In order to constitute an attempt it is essential that the accused shall, with the intent to commit a crime, do some overt act which in the ordinary course of things would result in the commission thereof. The act must reach far enough toward the accomplishment of the desired result to amount to the commencement of its consummation. In other words, while it need not be the last proximate act to the consummation of the offense, it must be sufficiently near to it to stand either as the first or some subsequent step in a direct movement toward the commission of the offense. Mere preparation, i. e., the devising or arranging of the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offense, is not enough. There must be a direct movement toward the commission of the crime after the preparation is made. 8 R. C. L. tit. Criminal Law, p. 278.

The application of the foregoing principles to the crime of attempting to obtain money by false pretenses necessarily depends on the particular facts of each case, and the cases so applying them are accordingly set out specifically in the following subdivision of this note.

IN GENERAL.

In People v. Spolasco, 33 Misc. 22, 15 N. Y. Crim. 184, 67 N. Y. S. 1114, it appeared that the defendants, acting together, made certain representations to the complainant, and demanded the payment of a certain sum of money with which they alleged they had arranged to bribe a judge and the district attorney, and thereby secure the release of the complainant, who was a prisoner under indictment and awaiting trial. The indictment was demurred to on the ground that the facts as set forth did not constitute a crime. Overruling the demurrer the court said that an attempt was a separate and distinct crime and its essence was "an act done with intent to commit a crime."

In Rex v. Laitwood [1910] W. N. (Eng.) 122, the defendant was convicted of attempting to obtain money by false pretenses from two persons. He represented to them that he was interested in an advertising company and wished to engage a person to act as its representative who would receive very substantial remuneration. They would, however, have to invest a stated sum in shares of the company, and he suggested that they apply for the appointment. He produced to them a balance sheet purporting to show a considerable profit of the company for the preceding year. The court dismissed his appeal.

In Reg. v. Button [1900] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 597, 69 L. J. Q. B. 901, it appeared that at an athletic contest at which prizes were given of the value of ten guineas for certain foot races the prisoner pretended to be a man by the name of Sims. On the basis of their past performances the runners were given handicaps. Sims was only a moderate runner and as a result the supposed Sims was given by the handicapper a substantial start. Sims in fact was ill at the time of the race and the prisoner who was a fine performer won the races easily. The suspicion of the handicapper was aroused and he asked the prisoner whether he was really Sims to which he answered that he was, that the performances were his own and that he had never won a race. In summing up the case to the jury the recorder told them that if the prisoner did it for "a lark," without any criminal intent and without intending to get the prizes, they ought to find him not guilty; but that if he made the false representations wilfully, intentionally, and fraudulently, with intent to obtain the prizes, they ought to find him guilty of attempting to obtain them by false pretenses. The jury found a verdict of guilty. Holding that the conviction was good the court said: "If nothing more had been shown than that the defendant had entered for the races in a false name, the case would have been different. If he did not run or claim the prize it would be difficult to say that there was an actual attempt to obtain it. But here in effect he did claim the prize."

In Reg. v. Rigby, 7 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 507, it appeared that the prisoner was employed at a colliery. In order to ascertain the amount of wages to which each workman was entitled the "tally system" was used. Each workman was, on going to his work, supplied with a certain number of tallies, each marked with a number corresponding with that marked against his name in the employers' books. In each tub of coal mined by a workman he placed one of his tallies, and the tubs with the tallies in them were then sent by rail to the canal and the tubs emptied. The tallies were all put in one tub and sent back to the pit's mouth, where they were removed by the "tally-man" and hung on the "tally-board," over the number on that board corresponding with the number on the tally, and so showing the amount of work for which each man was entitled to be paid. These tallies were then counted by the bookkeeper and that number was booked to the credit of the workman. The evidence showed that the prisoner was seen to place three tallies in a tub, containing other tallies, which was just about to be sent back to the pit from the canal, by which means these three tallies would, in due course, have been placed on the tally-board in the usual manner. They were, however, never actually placed on the tally-board, as the witness who observed the act of the prisoner removed the tallies from the tub and gave immediate information to the employer. The court said: "These facts, . . . constitute the offense charged, the placing of the tally in the tub by the prisoner being an act done for the purpose of obtaining money which was not due to him, and with the intent that the person whose duty it was to do so should place the tally on the board whereby he would have obtained credit for work which he had not done." See to the same effect Reg. v. Holloway, 1 Den. C. C. (Eng.) 370, T. & M. 40, 3 N. Sess. Cas. 410, 2 C. & K. 942, 61 E. C. L. 942, 18 L. J. M. C. 60, 13 Jur. 86, 3 Cox. C. C. 241.

In People v. Arberry, 13 Cal. App. 749, 114 Pac. 411, it appeared that the defendant stated to the aunt of one Muscio in the presence of another that Muscio had a valvular disease of the heart from which he might drop dead at any moment, but that he could cure him for the sum of $200. The aunt then left the defendant's office under pretense of getting the money, but never returned. Muscio was thereafter examined by several physicians and they found that he had no valvular trouble of the heart. It was held that the defendant was guilty of the crime of attempting to obtain money by false pretenses although at the time the defendant could not have obtained any money from the aunt for the reason that she had none.

In Reg. v. Hensler, 11 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 570, 22 L. T. N. S. 691, 19 W. R. 108, it appeared that a prisoner wrote a begging letter to a prosecutor attempting to obtain money by false statements. Although the prosecutor knew the statements were false he sent the money. It was held that the defendant might be convicted of attempting to obtain money by false pretenses. The court said: "This is an attempt by the prisoner to obtain money by false pretenses which might have been so obtained. The money was not so obtained because the prosecutor remembered something which had been told him previously. In my opinion, as soon as ever the letter was put into the post the offense was committed." See to the same effect Arthur Dennison Light, 11 Crim. App. 111.

In Graham v. People, 181 Ill. 477, 55 N. E. 179, 47 L.R.A. 731, it was held that a person who persuaded another by false statements to withdraw his money from the bank and purchase a "gold brick" could not be prosecuted under the statute for attempting to obtain money by a confidence game, the money having been actually obtained, even though the sale was consummated in another county from which the prosecution was brought and where the statements inducing the fraud were made. The court said: "The jury may have believed that the plaintiff in error had the intention of obtaining Bowlin's money by means of the confidence game in Alexander county, where Cairo is located, and that he did an act towards obtaining money by means of the confidence game in Alexander county, but that his failure only was in Perry county. The proof shows that the crime was consummated in Alexander county. The crime, of which the plaintiff in error was guilty, if he was guilty at all, was the obtaining of Bowlin's money; and he obtained it in Alexander county, and not in Perry county. The state cannot split up one crime, and prosecute it in parts. . . . A consummated crime may involve an attempt—a successful attempt—to commit it, but such attempt is merely a part of the completed offense."

FRAUD ON MUNICIPALITY.

In Reg. v. Eagleton, Dears. (Eng.) 515, 3 C. L. R. 1145, 24 L. J. M. C. 158, 1 Jur. N. S. 940, 4 W. R. 17, 6 Cox C. C. 559, it appeared that a person had engaged with the guardians of a poor-law union to deliver loaves of bread of a certain weight to any poor person bringing a ticket from the relieving officer. The tickets were to be returned by him at each week end, with a statement of their number, for which he would be credited and paid at the time agreed on. He delivered to certain persons bringing tickets loaves of less than the weight contracted for and obtained credit therefor. It was held that he was guilty of an attempt to obtain money by false pretenses. The court said: "Acts remotely leading towards the commission of the offense are not to be considered as attempts to commit it, but acts immediately connected with it are; and if, in this case, after the credit with the relieving officer for the fraudulent overcharge, any further step on the part of the defendant had been necessary to obtain payment, as the making out a further account of producing the vouchers to the board, we should have thought that the obtaining credit in account with the relieving officer would not have been sufficiently proximate to the obtaining the money. But, on the statement in this case, no other act on the part of the defendant would have been required. It was the last act, depending on himself, towards the payment of the money, and therefore it ought to be considered as an attempt."

In State v. Peebles, 93 Minn. 311, 101 N. W. 306, the evidence showed that the defendant was the chairman of a board of town supervisors, and had been such for three years prior to the transaction in question. The board of commissioners of the county appropriated the sum of $1,000 to be expended in the repair of certain highways in the county, and the amount was placed in the hands of the defendant to expend in that behalf. The defendant superintended the work under contract with the county, and incurred an indebtedness of $1,080.75, which was $80.75 in excess of the amount appropriated, and which he was authorized to expend. He then sought to have the board of commissioners pay that excess, which they declined to do, whereupon he induced the clerk of the town into and through which the improved highway extended, to draw two town orders, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $80.75, to enable him to pay fully the indebtedness he had thus incurred. The orders were issued to two different persons who had been employed in and about the work of repairing the roads, but the defendant took and presented the same to the town treasurer, who indorsed thereon, "Not paid for the want of funds." He then negotiated them at a bank, receiving the money, and subsequently paid it to the payees named in the orders. The orders were afterwards paid by the town treasurer. No itemized statement of any account against the town for the amount of the alleged indebtedness was prior to this time presented to the board of supervisors for their action, and the board had in no manner authorized the town clerk or defendant to draw the orders on the town treasury. Affirming an order denying the defendant a new trial the court said: "It is urged by defendant that the evidence is insufficient to show that by his act he intended to defraud the town of Blaine, or that he presented a false or fraudulent claim for payment. We think the evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury on this subject. Defendant's intention in the premises must be determined from his acts. He knew that payment of the claim for which he caused the orders to be issued had never been authorized by the town board of supervisors, and he knew also that the town had not authorized him to incur the debt. That he intended to obtain the money from the town upon this claim, there is no doubt. That it was a false claim is equally clear, for it had never been allowed by the town board of supervisors, and was not incurred under a contract with the town. That his act in causing the orders to be issued, signed by himself as chairman of the board of supervisors, procuring the town clerk to attest the same in his official capacity, and presenting the same to the town treasurer for payment, constituted the presentation of a false and fraudulent claim for payment, within the meaning of the statute . . . is the only conclusion that the evidence will warrant. Whether the claim would have been allowed by the board of supervisors, had it been properly presented to that body, is wholly immaterial. It was not a proper charge against the town, for it had been incurred by defendant under a contract with the county. Defendant offered to prove on the trial that the board of supervisors, acting as an auditing body of the township of Blaine, at a regular meeting, audited and allowed this identical claim, and, on objection of the state, the testimony was excluded. We find no error in this ruling. The board of supervisors, acting as an auditing body, had no authority to audit or allow the claim. They may have approved the accounts of the treasurer and town clerk, including this item, but that fact would not relieve defendant from the consequences of his wrongful conduct."

In State v. Adams, 10 Idaho 591, 79 Pac. 398, it appeared that the defendant came before his brother-in-law, who was a justice of the peace, on the twelfth day of June, 1902, Ann. Cas. 1917B.—78.

with a box claimed to contain the ears of one hundred and fifty-eight coyotes, and the defendant's written claim against the county for the sum of $237 as bounty was prepared by the justice of the peace, and subscribed and sworn to by the defendant. The justice then gave to him the bill or claim and the box of ears and told him to send them to the clerk of the court of Fremont county. The defendant then left, taking the box and bill, and some person presented a box to the postmaster at Market Lake and requested him to register the same as coming from J. W. Ayres, Market Lake, to A. M. Carter, St. Anthony, Carter being clerk of the court of Fremont county. The bill and a box of ears were received by Carter as clerk of the court and ex officio auditor at St. Anthony, on the thirteenth day of June, 1902. He received the bill in a letter which showed that it was from Adams and in his favor, for bounty on one hundred and fifty-eight coyotes. As a matter of fact, the ears were manufactured and spurious. It also appeared that a man by the name of Short and the defendant were operating together in the coyote business; that Short manufactured coyote ears; and that the defendant took from Short a cigar-box full of spurious ears. The evidence further showed that the defendant requested a man by the name of Price to turn into the county some ears for him, but Price refused to do it and told the defendant that they were spurious ears, and the defendant thereupon assured him that there was no danger, that he had turned in several batches of them and had come out all right and had not been caught, and that he would stand the expense if Price was caught. The defendant had a conversation with the deputy sheriff on the day that he was arrested for the crime, and said that inasmuch as he had received no money for the scalps he had sent up, he wanted to know if the matter could not be fixed up by his relinquishing any claim for the money from the county, and that if it could be fixed up that way he would relinquish any claim and have the matter dropped. He asked what the penalty would be if he pleaded guilty to the charge. Holding that after a careful examination of the evidence they were fully satisfied that it supported fully the verdict against the defendant of presenting a false and fraudulent claim against the county, the court said: "In the case before us, the end in view, to wit, the presenting of the claim, was attained. The means adopted involved several steps, all of which were established by direct proof, except that it was not proven who presented the box of ears to the postmaster in order to have it registered and sent to the clerk of the board and mailed the letter to the clerk of the court. However, the admissions of the defendant to the deputy sheriff as above set forth shows beyond a reasonable doubt that he was instrumental in having said claim presented for allowance with intent to defraud the county. It is urged that the ears admitted in evidence were spurious; that the fraud was detected by the county commissioners, and that the bill was not allowed and was never paid, and for that reason the defendant is not guilty. It is not requisite under the provisions of section 6385 that the fraudulent bill be allowed or paid before a conviction can be had. It is there provided that every person 'who with intent to defraud, presents for allowance . . . any false or fraudulent claim, bill, account, voucher or writing, is guilty of a felony.' It is the presenting of a false or fraudulent claim with intent to defraud that constitutes the crime. The offense is consummated when that is done."

In People v. Howard, 135 Cal. 266, 67 Pac. 148, the defendant was convicted of the crime of attempting to obtain money under false pretenses. It appeared that in January, 1899, the board of supervisors of Tulare county passed an ordinance offering a bounty of three cents for any squirrel killed or destroyed within that county. The ordinance required the claims to be supported by affidavit of certain facts, and also provided how and when the claims should be paid. The affidavit was to be accompanied by the tails of the squirrels claimed to have been killed. It was conceded that the ordinance was invalid, by reason of some necessary formality in its passage being omitted. The information charged the defendant with having brought into Tulare county from without that county a large number of squirrel-tails, taken from squirrels elsewhere killed, and having falsely represented the animals to have been killed in Tulare county, and that the defendant attempted to effect his purpose by procuring one Clarkson, a resident of that county, to make the necessary affidavit, present the claims, collect the money, and divide with the defendant. It was alleged in the information, and appeared by the evidence, that from and after February 1, 1899, claims were allowed and paid by the board of supervisors under the supposition that the ordinance was valid, and so continued to be allowed and paid up to the time Clarkson presented the claim in question, and the fact that such claims were being allowed and paid was known to the defendant and to Clarkson. Clarkson's claim was allowed, and a warrant was ordered by the board and was drawn by the auditor, and Clarkson endeavored to obtain the warrant. The evidence tended to show that the defendant brought about twelve thousand squirrel-tails from Alameda county to Visalia, with the intention of getting the bounty offered by Tulare county; that the squirrels from which they were taken were not killed in Tulare county; and that the defendant, the better to conceal the crime and his own connection with it, procured Clarkson, who had been engaged in killing squirrels in Tulare county, to make up and present a claim for part of the animals, and to find some person or persons to present claims for the balance. The point chiefly relied on by the defendant was, that the crime was not made out because the ordinance was invalid. Holding that the judgment and order should be affirmed the court said: "It is urged that the officers are charged with knowledge of the law; that on its face the claim showed it to be illegal and its payment not warranted by law, and therefore no pretense or representation could be made to the board which could be the basis of a claim; that the false pretenses intended by the statute are such as assert the existence of some fact calculated to impose upon a man of ordinary caution, and which create the credit given the accused; that it being the duty of the board to reject all illegal claims, no crime can be predicated of pretenses which could by no possibility create a credit; that as the claims showed on their face that they were not entitled to allowance, it must be assumed the officers would do their duty and reject them, and hence there could be no crime, because no one could be injured or deceived. Section 72, 532, and 664 of the Penal Code are brought into the discussion. Section 72 declares: 'Every person who, with intent to defraud, presents for allowance . . . to any . . . county, board, or officer, authorized to allow or pay the same if genuine, any false . . . claim . . . is guilty of a felony.' The ordinance being void, and the board, therefore not being authorized to allow the claim, this section does not apply. Section 532 declares: 'Every person who knowingly, . . . by false . . . representations or pretenses, defrauds any other person of money or property, . . . and by this imposing upon any person obtains credit, and thereby fraudulently gets into possession of money or property, is punishable,' etc. Section 664 declares: 'Every person who attempts to commit a crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable,' etc. Defendant takes the position that neither of these last two sections reaches the case, for the reason that, whether or not he succeeded in collecting the claim, he could not be punished, because the board had no authority to allow it. He puts an illustration, thus: Suppose defendant had made a claim for killing cattle, and had presented their tails as evidence. Could it be said he was seeking to obtain money by false pretenses, when the board would at once perceive the absurdity of the claim and reject it? The illustration does not meet this case. The board had the power to offer and pay the bounty, by ordinance legally adopted, the purpose being to rid the county of a destructive pest. The ordinance was believed to be valid, and claims were then being paid under it. That the board failed to observe the formalities necessary to a valid exercise of the power, does not relieve defendant from the criminal intent in seeking to take advantage of the invalid ordinance. The same presumption of knowledge of the law which he seeks to place upon the board attaches also to him, and he must be presumed to have known that he was attempting to obtain money from the county to which the law gave him no right. But this was not the crime with which he was charged and of which he was found guilty. His crime was in falsely and fraudulently procuring Clarkson to represent that he had killed the squirrels in Tulare county, believing that the supervisors would allow his claim if he succeeded in deceiving them, knowing at the time that they would not do so if he told the truth as to where the squirrels were killed. Clarkson had collected claims under the ordinance for killing squirrels in Tulare county, and although the board exceeded its authority in allowing them, Clarkson was innocent of criminal intent since he made no false representations. When, however, he attempted, on his own and on defendant's behalf, to obtain money from the county by false and fraudulent pretenses, with intent to defraud the county, believing that his claim would be paid, he and defendant were both guilty under section 664, although they failed in their attempt, and they would have been guilty under section 532 if they had succeeded. In this latter case each of them would clearly come within the statute as a 'person who knowingly . . . by false . . . representations or pretenses, defrauds any other person of money or property, . . . and by thus imposing upon any person obtains credit, and thereby fraudulently gets into possession of money or property.' By attempting to violate section 532, defendant brought himself within section 664. The supervisors were deceived, as is evidenced by the fact that they allowed the claim and ordered a warrant drawn for it. That the ordinance was found to be illegal, in time to prevent the consummation of the crime intended, is immaterial, since there was, in fact, another crime committed. Defendant might be convicted of the lesser offense."

In State v. Lawrence, 178 Mo. 350, 77 S. W. 497, wherein it appeared that the directors of a school district had no power to issue a warrant for the purchase of books, it was held that to attempt to procure the warrant by false pretenses was not a crime.

FRAUD ON BANK.

In State v. Riddell, 33 Wash. 325, 74 Pac. 477, it appeared that the appellant attempted to obtain money from a bank by falsely pretending ownership of a certificate of deposit, intending to defraud one Gower to whom the certificate had been issued and by him indorsed. The court affirming the judgment said: "It is urged, . . . that it is not averred that appellant was in possession of the certificate of deposit, and that the false pretenses are not charged to have been made while it was in his possession, or when he was attempting to cash it. We think the allegation that the false pretenses were made in an effort to procure the payment of the $3,000 represented by the certificate sufficiently shows that they were made when he was attempting to cash it. The mere fact that it is not alleged in so many words that he was in actual possession of the certificate at the time, we think, is not material, since it is alleged that he falsely pretended that he was the owner and its bona fide purchaser for value, and that by means of such false pretense he sought to obtain the money. It being alleged that he claimed to be the bona fide purchaser and owner, the law implies that he at least controlled the certificate, which fact is inseparable from that of actual possession as far as it relates to the effort to procure the money represented by it."

In State v. Woodward, 156 Mo. 143, 56 S. W. 880, it appeared that the defendant Woodward with intent to defraud a banking corporation, representing that a signature attached to a promissory note was that of his stepmother, attempted to obtain from it a small amount of money. Overruling a demurrer of the defendant based on the ground that the indictment stated "no offense under the law", the court said: "The section of the statute under which the indictment is drawn (section 3826, R. S. 1889) reads as follows: 'Every person who, with intent to cheat and defraud, shall obtain or attempt to obtain from any other person or persons any money, property or valuable thing whatever, by means or use of any trick or deception, or false and fraudulent representation or statement or pretense . . . shall be deemed guilty of a felony.' The constituent elements of a crime under this statute are the intent to cheat and defraud, the attempt to obtain from another person or persons money or property by means or use of some trick or deception, or false and fraudulent representations or statements, or pretenses, and the failure in the perpetration of the offense; and, while the indictment is inartistically drawn, and contains much verbiage, it contains all the essential and necessary averments."

FRAUD ON INSURER.

In Rafferty v. State, 91 Tenn. 655, 16 S. W. 728, it appeared that a woman procured a policy of insurance against loss by fire covering her household furniture, wearing apparel, jewelry, books, etc., to the amount of $1,250, said to be contained in a certain frame building occupied by her as a family residence. Seventeen days after the issuance of the policy, and during its life, the building was totally destroyed by fire. Promptly thereafter she personally gave written notice to the agent of the insurance company, and filed itemized proofs of loss, verified by her affidavit as required by the rules of the company, wherein she claimed that she had lost by the fire substantially all the property covered by the policy, to the value of about $1,900; and thereupon she demanded of the company payment of $1,250, the full amount covered by the policy. In response to the notification of the company, she also appeared before an insurance examiner and deposed that she owned the property set out in her proof of loss, that it was contained in the building covered by the policy, and destroyed by the fire. Having complied with all the requirements of the policy, and taken all formal steps necessary to entitle her to the full sum of $1,250, if the loss and her claim of value were bona fide, and the company still refusing to settle or make payment, she filed her bill in the chancery court, three months and a half after the occurrence of the fire, to compel the insurance company to indemnify her according to its undertaking in the policy. Thereafter certain articles to the value of several hundred dollars which she had described and enumerated in her proofs of loss, etc., as destroyed by fire were found by persons investigating the case for the insurance company and evidence was also offered to show that she had had thirteen different fires in as many different cities within a period of three years, and under different names. The court affirmed a judgment of the court sentencing her to two years imprisonment in the penitentiary for attempting to obtain money under false pretenses.

In State v. Fraker, 148 Mo. 143, 49 S. W. 1017, an indictment for an attempt to defraud a life insurance company by simulating the drowning of the insured was held not to aver an overt act "which, but for the intervention of superior and exterior forces, would have resulted in the money being obtained."

In the reported case certain acts of the accused in furtherance of a design to make a false claim on a policy of burglary insurance are held to constitute mere preparation and not an attempt.

FRAUD ON PAWNBROKER.

In Reg. v. Francis, 12 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 612, it appeared that the prisoner went to the shop of a pawnbroker and asked for an advance of money on the pledge of a hoop ring which he represented to be a diamond ring. The pawnbroker examined the ring, and declared it was not a diamond ring. He refused to advance anything on it. The prisoner left the shop and proceeded immediately to the shop of another pawnbroker and repeated his request for an advance on the same property. He was then taken into custody and the ring was found to be practically worthless. The jury found the prisoner guilty of attempting to obtain money by false pretenses and affirming the conviction the court said: "It seems clear upon principle that, when the fact of the prisoner having done the thing charged is proved, and the only remaining question is whether, at the time he did it, he had guilty knowledge of the quality of his act, or acted under a mistake, evidence of the class received must be admissible. It tends to show that he had been pursuing a course of similar acts, and thereby it raises a presumption that he was not acting under a mistake. It is not conclusive; for a man may be many times under a similar mistake or may be many times the dupe of another. But it is less likely he should be so oftener than once, and every circumstance which shows that he was not under a mistake on any one of these occasions strengthens the presumption that he was not on the last."

In Reg. v. Roebuck, 7 Cox. C. C. (Eng.) 126, Dears. & B. 24, 25 L. J. M. C. 101, 2 Jur. N. S. 597, the evidence showed that the prisoner called at a pawnbroker's shop with a chain, on which he asked for an advance of ten shillings. The pawnbroker asked if the chain was silver, and the prisoner replied that it was. The pawnbroker then examined it and tested it with an acid. The chain resembled in appearance greasy silver, and withstood the test as if it were silver. The pawnbroker then lent the prisoner ten shillings on the chain, which he took as a pledge. He paid the money, relying on his own examination and test of the chain, and without placing any reliance on the statement of the prisoner. Evidence was admitted to prove that the prisoner, a few days afterwards, offered a chain, similar in appearance, to another pawnbroker, requesting him to advance ten shillings upon it. Objection was made to the admission of this evidence. Twenty-six similar chains were found on the person of the prisoner when he was apprehended. An assayer proved that these chains were not silver, and that the chain pledged was not silver, but that they were all made of a composition worth about a farthing an ounce, and that each chain was of much less value than ten shillings. The jury were told, that, as the money had not been obtained by the prisoner's statement, the completion of the offense charged in the indictment was not proved; but that, if they were satisfied of the fraudulent intent of the prisoner, and that his design was to obtain the money by means of his false statement, they might convict the prisoner of an attempt to commit the misdemeanor charged against him in the indictment. The jury accordingly found the prisoner not guilty of the misdemeanor charged in the indictment, but guilty of an attempt to commit the same. The conviction was confirmed.

In Reg. v. Ball, 1 C. & M. 249, 41 E. C. L. 140, it appeared that the prisoner went into a pawnbroker's shop and endeavored to obtain money on some thimbles which he claimed were silver. On testing them it was found that they were not as represented and the prisoner was taken into custody. The jury found the prisoner guilty of attempting to obtain money by false pretenses and the conviction was sustained.

COTTINGHAM

v.

MARYLAND MOTOR CAR INSURANCE COMPANY.

North Carolina Supreme Court—February 17, 1915.

168 N. Car. 259; 84 S. E. 274.

Fire Insurance — Avoidance by Incumbrance — Effect of Subsequent Satisfaction.

Under a policy of insurance on an automobile providing that it shall be void if the property should become incumbered by a chattel mortgage, or if any change other than by the death of insured should take place in the interest or title of the property, a chattel mortgage subsequently given merely suspends the insurance, and, where it is paid and canceled before a loss, the insurance revives.

[See note at end of this case.]

Insurance — Construction against Insurer — Standard Policy.

The terms of a policy of insurance are construed against the insurer and in favor of insured, even though a standard form of policy has been adopted under legislative enactment.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913E 287.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg county: SHAW, Judge.

Action by L. T. Cottingham, plaintiff, against Maryland Motor Car Insurance Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Stewart & McRae for appellant.

Cameron Morrison and J. M. McLain for appellees.

[259] CLARK, C. J.—On 11 June, 1913, the defendant insured the automobile of the plaintiff against loss by fire for the term of one year, and the plaintiff paid the premium of $25 therefor.

On 19 September, 1913, the plaintiff executed a deed of trust on a number of horses, wagons, and other property, including the automobile. The deed of trust was paid off and canceled of record, on 22 September, only three days after its execution. On 26 September, four days thereafter, the automobile was destroyed by fire. The defendant filed an answer, but when the case was called for trial demurred to the complaint on the ground that the policy contained this provision: "This policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon in writing by [260] an authorized agent of the company, shall be void if the interest of the assured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if the property hereby insured be or become encumbered by a chattel mortgage, or if any change, other than by death of the assured, take place in the interest or title of the property hereby insured, whether by legal process or judgment or by voluntary act of the assured or otherwise."

The court sustained the demurrer and the plaintiff appealed. The loss occurred as above stated, after the deed of trust was paid off and canceled.

2 Cooley Ins. 1780, citing many cases, says: "The general rule that a breach of the condition against encumbrance is ground for forfeiture must be modified where the encumbrance is merely temporary and is not in existence at the time of the loss. It may be regarded as settled by the weight of authority that the effect of the encumbrance is merely to suspend the risk, and on cancellation or discharge of the encumbrance the policy is revived."

Elliott on Insurance, sec. 205, collating the authorities, also says: "The weight of authority seems to support the view that a violation of a condition that works a forfeiture of the policy merely suspends the insurance during the violation, and if the violation is discontinued during the life of the policy and does not exist at the time of the loss, the policy revives and the company is liable, although it had never consented to the violation of the policy, and the violation was such that the company could, had it known of it at the time, have declared a forfeiture therefor." To same purport, Phillips on Insurance, sec. 975, and 1 May Insurance (3 ed.), sec. 101; 2 A. and E. 288, and note.

A case almost exactly in point is Strause v. Palatine Ins. Co. 128 N. C. 64, 38 S. E. 256, where the defendant set up a defense that the mill was operated at night, contrary to the provisions of the policy, and this Court said: "The fire occurred more than three months thereafter and was in no wise traceable, so far as the evidence shows, to the work at night, which had long ceased."

Revisal, 4806, provides: "All contracts of insurance on property, lives, or interests in this State shall be deemed to be made therein; and all contracts of insurance, the application for which is taken within the State, shall be deemed to have been made within this State and shall be subject to the laws thereof."

Revisal, 4808, is as follows: "All statements or descriptions in any application for a policy of insurance or in the policy itself shall be deemed and held representations and not warranties; nor shall any representation, unless material or fraudulent, prevent a recovery on the policy."

[261] The purpose of Revisal, 4808, was to prevent insurance companies from escaping the payment of honest losses upon technicalities and strict construction of contracts.

In construing these sections in McCarty v. Imperial Ins. Co. 126 N. C. 820, 36 S. E. 284, where at the time of issuance of policy there was a deed in trust to secure a debt of which the insurance company did not have notice and where the policy provided that it should be void if the interests of the insured be not truly stated, this Court quoted with approval from Albert v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 122 N. C. 92, 30 S. E. 327, 65 Am. St. Rep. 693, as follows: "This law applies to all policies of insurance, both of fire and life; and unless such misrepresentations materially contribute to the loss, or fraudulently evade the payment of the increased premiums, they do not vitiate the policy. Ordinarily, these are questions of fact for the jury and not for the court."

In the present case the deed of trust given by the plaintiff embraced horses, wagons, and other property besides the automobile. This mortgage was paid off before the loss and was not material to the risk or fraudulent. The title of the plaintiff at the time of the loss was the same as at the time of the delivery of the policy. The deed in trust in no wise contributed to the loss or in any way affected the risk. Weddington v. Piedmont F. Ins. Co. 141 N. C. 244, 8 Ann. Cas. 497, 54 S. E. 271; Watson v. North Carolina Home Ins. Co. 159 N. C. 638, 75 S. E. 1105, and Roper v. National F. Ins. Co. 161 N. C. 151, 76 S. E. 869, differ from this case vitally. In them the breach of the condition existed at the time of the loss. The law laid down in those cases had reference to the facts therein and has no bearing on this case.

In Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Ia. 379, 81 N. W. 676, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300, it is held that giving a mortgage under the circumstances of the present case is a temporary breach of the policy, and when the breach was removed the policy was revived. In that case the mortgage given on the property was paid off and the fire occurred afterwards, the Court said: "The theory upon which an existing mortgage is held to be a violation of a clause in the policy against an increase of risk is that it increases the risk. . . . As the time of the loss the personal property in question was in the possession and ownership of the plaintiff, free from the encumbrance of the mortgage and covered by his valid policy of insurance. Therefore he is entitled to recover for the loss thereof," citing Wilkins v. Tobacco Ins. Co. 30 Ohio St. 317, 27 Am. Rep. 455.

On the rehearing of Born v. Home Ins. Co. 120 Ia. 299, 94 N. W. 849, the Court reaffirmed its former ruling. The Born case is reported 80 Am. St. Rep. 300, with full annotations, and the editor reaches this conclusion: "The general rule to be deduced from the weight of authority is that the violation of a condition in a policy of insurance which works a forfeiture thereof merely suspends the insurance during the violation, and that if such violation is discontinued during the life of the policy and is nonexistent at [262] the time of the loss, the policy revives, the insurance is restored, and the insurer is liable, although he has never consented to a violation of the conditions in the policy and such violation has been such that the insurer could, had he known of it at the time, have declared a forfeiture therefor."

Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013, holds that a breach of condition suspends the policy during the existence of the breach, and the removal of the breach revives the policy. In that case the policy contains this provision: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void, if a building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied and so remain for ten days." The house did become vacant, but was reoccupied before the loss occurred.

It is thus declared by Cooley on Insurance, Elliott on Insurance, and the notes to the 80 Am. St. Rep. p. 305, that the "weight of authority" is as above stated, and an examination of the authorities sustains that view, though Vance on Insurance, 433, says that the weight of authority is otherwise.

Among many cases, besides the above, sustaining the proposition that the removal of the breach revives the policy when it is removed previous to the loss and has in no wise contributed to it, are Lounsbury v. Pre- tection Ins. Co. 8 Conn. 459, 21 Am. Dec. 686; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 9, 81 Am. Dec. 521; Joyce v. Maine Ins. Co. 45 Me. 168, 71 Am. Dec. 536; U. S. F. etc. Ins. Co. v. Kimberly, 34 Md. 234, 6 Am. Rep. 325; Garrison v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 56 N. J. L. 235, 28 Atl. 8; Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Coatesville Shoe Factory, 80 Pa. St. 407; Hinckley v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 140 Mass. 47, 1 N. E. 737, 54 Am. Rep. 445; McKibban v. Des Moines Ins. Co. 114 Ia. 41, 86 N. W. 38; Traders' Ins. Co. v. Catlin, 163 Ill. 256, 45 N. E. 255, 35 L.R.A. 595.

The contrary view in Vance on Insurance, supra, is largely based upon Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 14 S. Ct. 379, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 231. But that case has no application here. There the policy contained a provision that it should become void if without notice and permission "mechanics are employed in building, altering, or repairing the premises." It was found that such building and repairing increased the risk, and though the work was completed before the fire occurred and in no wise contributed to the fire, yet the alterations were very material and were in existence at the time of the fire. In that case there was a forbidden physical alteration made, which continued down to the fire. In the present case there was simply a mortgage, in no wise affecting the physical condition of the property, and which was canceled of record within three days and before the fire.

There are many other cases which support those which we have already cited that when such temporary encumbrance was removed before the fire it did not invalidate the risk, as there was no mortgage outstanding at the time of the fire. In Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013, above cited, the Court, summing up the authorities, says: "The common people [263] who insure should not be entrapped by a harsh construction of a technical word. The insurance is revived by occupancy, though suspended during the vacancy. . . . So much for the authorities in support of the position announced by this Court. We are also very clear that this position is more in consonance with justice and sound reasoning. . . . It would be a harsh and unjust rule to hold that a condition which in no wise contributes to the loss should work a forfeiture of insurance. The principle of the old legal maxim, 'Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex,' would seem to be applicable. . . . No maxim of construction of contracts is better established or has been more generally approved than that of Lord Coke, 'He who considers merely the letter of an instrument goes but skin deep into the meaning,' and too minute a stress should not be laid on the strict and precise signification of words, to the destruction of the intention of the parties and the spirit of the contract." To this quotation of the Court from Lord Coke the counsel for the plaintiff in this case adds this citation from St. Paul: "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." II. Cor. ch. 3, v. 6.

In Thompson v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 22 App. Div. 380, 49 N. Y. S. 184, where the policy provided that it should be entirely void if the property became mortgaged, and where the property was mortgaged, but the mortgage was paid off before the loss, the New York Court says: "The defendant contends that the policy was voided by the giving of the first mortgage. The court below found and we have held that the second mortgage extinguished the first. Even if the policy would have been void and inoperative during the life of the first mortgage, it revived on the death of that mortgage. This principle is well settled in the analogous case of a marine policy, which contains a limit of the waters within which the vessel is insured. If the vessel leaves the limited waters and is lost, the insurer is not liable, but the liability reattaches on the return of the vessel to limits. Hennessey v. Manhattan F. Ins. Co. 28 Hun 98. So here, although the policy was suspended during the existence of the first mortgage, it was revived when that mortgage ceased to exist, by the substitution of the second mortgage."

In Hinckley v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 140 Mass. 38, 1 N. E. 737, 54 Am. Rep. 445, where the defense was that the insured property was temporarily put to an illegal use, contrary to the terms of the policy, the court in construing the word "void," says: "But, irrespective of this consideration, it is not the necessary meaning of the word 'void,' as used in policies of insurance, that it shall under all circumstances imply an absolute and permanent avoidance of a policy which had once begun to run. But the meaning of the word is sufficiently satisfied by reading it as void or inoperative for the time being."

It will be noted that this is the standard form of policy established by statute, and Phillips on Insurance, sec. 975, says: "After the policy has begun to run so the premium has become due it assuredly is but equitable [264] that a temporary noncompliance should have effect only during its continuance. To carry it further is to inflict a penalty on the assured and decree a gratuity to the insurer, who is thus permitted to retain the whole premium when he has merited but part of it."

In Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Phoenix Assur. Co. 76 S. C. 76, 11 Ann. Cas. 780, 56 S. E. 654, 121 Am. St. Rep. 941, 10 L.R.A. (N. S.) 737, where the defense was that the hazard was increased contrary to the terms of the policy which made it void, the Court says: "The contract of insurance must, like other contracts, be enforced according to its terms. In construing such contracts, however, courts should endeavor to ascertain from the language used, in the light of the surrounding circumstances and the nature of the business, the safeguards which the parties intended to place around themselves. It may be reasonable to suppose an insurance company would desire to reserve the valuable right of canceling a policy, even on a temporary increase of hazard, if known to it at the time, because such change might result in loss; but it is not reasonable to impute to it a purpose or desire to curtail its own revenue by canceling a policy on account of the temporary increase of hazard which has come to an end without loss, and from which it could not possibly suffer detriment. Hence there may be ground for holding a temporary increase of hazard forbidden by the policy to avoid insurance without action or even knowledge on the part of the company, when the loss resulted from that cause. But there is no ground for such an inference when the increase of hazard came to an end without loss. The greater weight of authority supports this conclusion."

The last line in the above quotation reiterates what is said above by Cooley, Phillips, May, and Elliott in their works on insurance, and is a correct statement.

Silver v. London Assur. Corp. 61 Wash. 503, 112 Pac. 666, also sustains the proposition that the removal of the temporary breach of the condition revives the policy. Also Ins. Co. of North America v. Pitts, 88 Miss. 587, 9 Ann. Cas. 54, 41 So. 5, 117 Am. St. Rep. 756, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 627.

In Nebraska, where a policy contained a provision making it void if the property should be mortgaged, it was held that the payment of the mortgage revived the policy. State Ins. Co. v. Schreck, 27 Neb. 527, 43 N. W. 340, 20 Am. St. Rep. 696, 6 L.R.A. 524; Omaha F. Ins. Co. v. Dierks, 43 Neb. 473, 61 N. W. 740; Johansen v. Home F. Ins. Co. 54 Neb. 548, 74 N. W. 866.

McClure v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. 242 Pa. St. 59, 88 Atl. 921, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1221, holds the same general principles as the authorities above cited. In that case the defense was that certain prohibited articles were kept upon the premises. The policy provided that it should be void if they were. The Court held that if they were removed before the fire and in no wise contributed to the loss, the policy was revived.

Independent of the overwhelming weight of authority, there can be no reason to release the insurance company from liability for a loss [265] which accrued after the forbidden mortgage was canceled, the mortgage having in no wise any connection with the loss.

The terms of a policy of insurance are construed against the insurer and in favor of the insured, and this is true although a standard form of policy has been adopted under legislative enactment. Gazzam v. German Union F. Ins. Co. 155 N. C. 330, Ann. Cas. 1912C 362, 71 S. E. 434.

The stipulation that the policy shall be void if the property "be or become encumbered by chattel mortgage" was inserted for the benefit of the insurer upon the idea that if the owner of the property was permitted to insure and then mortgage the property that it would be an inducement to him to destroy the property by fire, and if the stipulation is given effect so that this purpose and intent of the parties can be carried out, there is no reason for extending it further. In other words, it was the intent of the parties to prevent an increase of the risk to the insurer, and this can be amply protected by holding that the policy is only void if the mortgage is in force at the time of the loss. Instead of increasing the risk, this interpretation of the contract decreases it, because while the mortgage is in existence there is no liability on the part of the insurance company, and if a loss then ensues there can be no recovery, and when the mortgage is canceled the insurer assumes no responsibility that it was not liable for when the policy was first issued.

Nor is this construction against public policy as offering an inducement to the insured to destroy his property, because if destroyed while the mortgage is in force the total loss falls on him. See also 9 Ann. Cas. 54, 11 Ann. Cas. 780, and cases cited.

Our cases on the subject, which are collected in Roper v. National F. Ins. Co. 161 N. C. 151, 76 S. E. 869, were decided correctly, because in them the stipulation was violated at the time of loss and it was properly decided that the policy was void.

Nor is this construction in conflict with the cases of Fishplate v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 140 N. C. 589, 53 S. E. 354; Bryant v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 147 N. C. 181, 60 S. E. 983; Alexander v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 150 N. C. 536, 64 S. E. 432; Gardner v. North State Mut. L. Ins. Co. 163 N. C. 367, Ann. Cas. 1915B 652, 79 S. E. 806, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 714, and Schas v. Equitable L. Ins. Co. 166 N. C. 55, 81 S. E. 1014, where a representation, actually false and material, was held to vitiate the policy, although the misrepresented fact may not have contributed to the loss, for the insurance company is entitled to know the facts about which inquiry is made, in order to decide whether it will enter into the contract or not, and those things are material for it to know, which would naturally affect its judgment or decision as to making the contract, or which, by its inquiries, it has made material, the company being the judge of what it should know in order to determine whether or not it will issue the policy. The demurrer should have been overruled.

Reversed.

NOTE.

Revival of Fire Insurance Policy after Satisfaction of Lien or Incumbrance Attaching to Property in Violation of Policy.

View that Policy Is Revived.

It may be stated as a general rule that though there may have been a change in the risk at some time during the life of a fire insurance policy by reason of an increased hazard which would be sufficient to avoid the policy, yet where the company has not declared the policy forfeited on that account, and the increase of hazard has ceased to exist and has in no way affected the loss ultimately occurring, the policy will be enforced as if there had been no such increase of risk. See the note to Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Phoenix Assur Co. 11 Ann. Cas. 780. And following the rule of construction that of two parties to a fire insurance policy, the insured is always to be favored in determining whether there has been a compliance with the terms of the policy, it is held by perhaps a majority of the cases that the vacancy of insured premises during the term for which the policy is issued merely operates to suspend the policy, and a subsequent occupancy of the premises revives the policy and puts it in full force again. See the notes to Insurance Co. of North America v. Pitts, 9 Ann. Cas. 54, and Dolliver v. Granite State F. Ins. Co. Ann. Cas. 1916C 765.

On the same principle the rule obtaining in some jurisdictions is that the satisfaction of a lien or incumbrance attaching to the insured property in violation of the policy before a loss occurs has the effect of reviving the policy. Weigen v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 104 Ia. 410, 73 N. W. 862; Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Ia. 379, 81 N. W. 676, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300; McKibban v. Des Moines Ins. Co. 114 Ia. 41, 86 N. W. 38; State Ins. Co. v. Schreck, 27 Neb. 527, 43 N. W. 340, 20 Am. St. Rep. 696, 6 L.R.A. 524; Omaha F. Ins. Co. v. Dierks, 43 Neb. 473, 61 N. W. 740; Johansen v. Home F. Ins. Co. 54 Neb. 548, 74 N. W. 866; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Johansen, 59 Neb. 349, 80 N. W. 1047. See also Meech v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 147 Mich. 343, 110 N. W. 1078. And see the reported case. Thus in Weigen v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. supra, it appeared that a mortgage of insured personal property was executed under an agreement whereby the mortgagee was to furnish money to take up a prior mortgage given by the mortgagor or in the event of his failure to do so he was to cancel the second mortgage. The mortgagee was unable to raise the necessary means and the second mortgage was canceled in pursuance of the agreement. It was held that the transaction did not invalidate a policy containing a clause avoiding it in case an incumbrance was placed on the property.

In McKibban v. Des Moines Ins. Co. 114 Ia. 41, 86 N. W. 38, it was held that property was not encumbered in excess of the amount allowed under an insurance policy where it appeared that although mortgages on the property had at one time exceeded the amount permitted by the policy, enough had been paid on one of them at the time of the loss of the property to reduce the amount of the incumbrance below the amount permitted.

So in State Ins. Co. v. Schreck, 27 Neb. 527, 43 N. W. 340, 20 Am. St. Rep. 696, 6 L.R.A. 524, it appeared that buildings and personal property were insured at one time, the policy limiting the amount of the loss recoverable for the destruction of each of the buildings and the various kinds of personal property. Some of the personal property was afterwards mortgaged in violation of the policy, but the mortgage was satisfied before any loss occurred. In holding that the policy was not avoided as to the personal property the court said: "An examination of the language . . . satisfies us that it was not the intention of the parties to the contract to require that the same personal property should remain upon the farm for the whole term of the policy, but that, as hereinbefore indicated, it was upon certain kinds of property upon the premises. . . . Had the property destroyed been sold, and the legal title transferred to the purchaser, defendant in error could recover nothing for his loss. Had it been mortgaged and the legal title so transferred, he could still recover nothing. But, under the plain sense of the policy, had the property been replaced by other of the same kind and species, there could be no doubt of plaintiff's liability in case of loss. Had the contract of insurance been upon specific personal property, it is possible that the defense presented would have been available. However, that question is not before us. But we are quite clear that the transfer of the legal title to the insured property, either by mortgage or sale, would avoid the policy so far only as that particular property was concerned, during the time of the existence of the title in the purchaser or mortgagee, and to that extent only could the sale or mortgaging of the property under the provisions of this policy be a successful defense."

In Johansen v. Home F. Ins. Co. 54 Neb. 548, 74 N. W. 866, it was held that a verbal release of a chattel mortgage was a sufficient satisfaction of the mortgage to revive an insurance policy covering the mortgaged property.

In Meech v. Citizens' Ins. Co. 147 Mich. 343, 110 N. W. 1078, it appeared that at the time of the issuance of the policy sued on there was a mortgage on the insured property to secure a note given by the grantor. The policy contained a clause avoiding it if the property "be or become encumbered" by a mortgage. The insurer did not have knowledge of the existence of the mortgage. Subsequently the insured gave another note to the mortgagee and the first note was canceled and marked paid, but no agreement was made concerning the mortgage. The appellate court said in reversing a judgment of the trial court against the insurer: "We do not hold that the agreement for the acceptance of the second security may not have been in terms which would exclude the idea of a continuance of the security of the bill of sale. If such was the fact, however, it was not found or made the basis of the judgment. The case is not so clear as to justify entering final judgment for defendant in this court. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered."

View that Policy Is Not Revived.

The rule obtains in some jurisdictions that where a lien or incumbrance has attached to property in violation of a fire insurance policy, the subsequent satisfaction or discharge of the lien does not revive the policy. McKernan v. North River Ins. Co. 206 Fed. 984; German-American Ins. Co. v. Humphrey, 62 Ark. 348, 35 S. W. 428, 54 Am. St. Rep. 297; Jones v. Michigan F. etc. Ins. Co. 132 La. 847, 61 So. 846; Gray v. Guardian Assur. Co. 82 Hun 380, 31 N. Y. S. 237; Insurance Co. of North America v. Wicker, 93 Tex. 390, 55 S. W. 740, affirming 54 S. W. 300. Compare Tompkins v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 22 App. Div. 380, 49 N. Y. S. 184. Thus in German-American Ins. Co. v. Humphrey, supra, it appeared that personal property was insured against fire by a policy which provided that if the property "be or become encumbered by a chattel mortgage" the policy should be void. The property was mortgaged after the issuance of the policy but the mortgage was discharged before the property was destroyed by fire. The court said in answering a contention that the policy was only suspended during the continuance of the mortgage, and was revived by the discharge of the mortgage before the loss occurred: "The proposition that the incumbrance, while it existed, only suspended the policy, contravenes the unambiguous terms of the contract, which the parties themselves have made. The language of the clause quoted supra, in its plain, ordinary, and popular sense, indicates a total extinction of the policy if the property be encumbered, and not a suspended animation thereof, subject to be revived upon payment of the mortgage debt. . . . The insurer has the right to contract against any possible risk of loss or embarrassment incident to encumbering the property insured. If it be said that, where the mortgage is paid off, there is no longer an incumbrance and increase of risk, still as to whether or not the mortgage had been paid off would be the question, and one that often could not be settled without expensive litigation. The insured mortgagor might enter into collusion with the mortgagee to defraud the insurance company after the loss occurred by claiming that the mortgage had been paid off and discharged, when in fact it had not. Unfortunately, all men are not honest. Without some such provision in the policy, the unscrupulous would have an inviting opportunity, after a loss, to divide the spoils, at the expense of the insurer. Doubtless some such considerations as these prompted the clause in the policy under consideration. The clause is reasonable and clear, and the parties had the right to thus contract."

In Jones v. Michigan F. etc. Ins. Co. 132 La. 847, 61 So. 846, it appeared that property was insured by a policy containing a proviso that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the . . . hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured; . . . or if, with the knowledge of the insured, foreclosure proceedings be commenced or notice of sale of any property covered by this policy by virtue of any mortgage or trust deed." The evidence showed that the property insured was seized under foreclosure proceedings, with the knowledge of the insured; but that the proceedings were discontinued by the seizing creditor on payment to him of the debt due by the insured, and that subsequent to the release of the seizure the fire occurred which destroyed the property described in the policy. It was held that the violation of the policy terminated the contract of the insurer and that it could not thereafter be made liable on the contract without having waived the condition merely because the seizure may not have increased the risk.

But in Tompkins v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 22 App. Div. 380, 49 N. Y. S. 184, it appeared that insurance was taken out on some live stock, the policy fixing a valuation on each class of animals. The insured executed a chattel mortgage on some of the animals in violation of the policy but another mortgage on other of the insured animals was afterwards given in place of the first mortgage. It was held that the second mortgage extinguished the first mortgage and revived the policy as to the animals covered by the first mortgage.

In Secrest v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 68 S. C. 378, 47 S. E. 680, it appeared that personal property was mortgaged in violation of a fire insurance policy covering the property. In a suit instituted on the same day as the destruction of the property by fire, but prior thereto, to set aside the mortgage as a fraudulent and voluntary conveyance, the mortgage was declared null and void. In holding that no action would lie on the policy the court said: "We conclude that at the time of the fire, the stock of goods of Hilton & Co. was covered by a mortgage valid between the mortgagor and mortgagee, and that the policy, by its terms, was annulled by this incumbency."

PATTERSON'S ESTATE.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court—January 2, 1915.

247 Pa. St. 529; 93 Atl. 608.

Wills — Taking by Representation — Gift of Remainder to "Children."

A will provided: "I give and devise . . . to my son [naming him] for . . . life, and at his death I devise the same to his child or children . . . and in default of such, then to my other children [naming three] in equal parts in fee." All of testator's children survived him. The life tenant died without children, being predeceased by his sister, one of the three children named. It is held that the two children of testator surviving the life tenant were each entitled to one-third of the fund, and that the remaining one-third should be divided among the children of their deceased sister.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Allegheny county: TRIMBLE, Judge.

Matter of estate of Joseph Patterson, deceased. From decree of distribution, Robert W. Patterson et al., appeal. AFFIRMED.

OPINION OF COURT BELOW.

[530] TRIMBLE, J.—Joseph Patterson died March 25th, 1868, testate, and by his will made the following devise, inter alia:

"Seventh. I give and devise . . . to my son, Joseph N. Patterson, for and during his natural life, and at his death, I devise the same to his child or children in equal parts in fee, and in default of such, then to my other children, Elizabeth H. Hazeltine, Thomas H. Patterson and Robert W. Patterson, in equal parts in fee."

By three other devises, similar in expression, he gave to his daughter, Elizabeth H. Hazeltine, and to his other two sons, Thomas H. Patterson and Robert W. Patterson, other portions of his estate.

The testator left to survive him the following:

First. (a) Hetty H. Patterson, his wife, who died April 9th, 1909;

(b) Elizabeth H. Hazeltine, daughter, who was born September . . . 1840, and died March 29th, 1891;

(c) Joseph N. Patterson, a son, who was born December 24th, 1843, and died April 5th, 1913, without issue;

(d) Thomas H. Patterson, a son, who was born March 1st, 1849, and is still living;

[531] (e) Robert W. Patterson, a son, who was born December 28th, 1850, and is still living.

Second. Elizabeth H. Hazeltine had three children and died intestate, leaving two children and her husband surviving as follows:

(a) Her husband, Charles F. Hazeltine, who is still living;

(b) Esther H. Hazeltine, born April — 1864, and who married Charles S. Carstairs, from whom she was subsequently divorced, and thereafter married Felix F. Tuckerman, and who died January 15th, 1907, leaving to survive her husband, Felix L. Tuckerman, who is still living, and the following children, viz.: Charles Hazeltine Carstairs, Carroll C. Carstairs, James Stewart Carstairs and Elizabeth Holmes Carstairs, who are living and of full age.

(c) Miss L. S. Hazeltine, born December 29th, 1867, and died February —, 1882;

(d) Caroline M. Hazeltine, born September —, 1873 (now Caroline H. Valentine), who intermarried with Abram S. Valentine, and is still living.

A petition was presented to this court under the Price Act for the sale of a portion of the land devised by the seventh paragraph of the testator's will to Joseph N. Patterson, for his life, and after all the interested parties were brought upon the record, the trustee, who was appointed to make the sale, consummated it. Joseph N. Patterson the devisee of the life estate having died on the 5th of April, 1913, the trustee filed its account, and one-half of the balance of said account is now before the court for its determination of the ownership thereof.

The question involved is whether a fee vested in Elizabeth H. Hazeltine, Thomas H. Patterson and Robert W. Patterson at the death of the testator under said paragraph their heirs was held to indicate an intention to substitute the heirs in place of their ancestors in case the latter died before the estate vested.

If an intent to make a gift of a remainder to a class is clearly indicated, as by the use of words of survivorship, the estate will go to those surviving at the time fixed for the distribution or vesting in possession of the property. In Burlet v. Burlet, 246 Ill. 563, 92 N. E. 965, the court construed a devise of a remainder to "my beloved children, share and share, or the survivor or survivors of them and their heirs." Holding that only those children who were living at the death of the life tenant took under the will the court said: "The decisions in regard to determining when, in cases such as this, the survivorship is referred to the time of the death of the testator and when to the death of the person to whom has been given an intervening interest are not in entire harmony. The rule now prevailing, and which we follow, is, that where a gift to survivors is preceded by a life or other prior interest it takes effect in favor of those who survive the period of distribution, and those only, unless a special contrary intent is found in the will. This is the rule now generally accepted." So in Brewick v. Anderson, 267 Ill. 169, 107 N. E. 878, it was said: "Where there is a devise to a class, as to the children of the testator, and the gift is postponed, pending the termination of a particular estate which intervenes between the death of the testator and the period of distribution of the estate devised to the class, those members of the class, and those only, take who are in existence at the arrival of the time for distribution, as at the death of a life tenant, unless there is particular language in the will showing a different intention."

The issue of a member of a class who predeceases the testator will not ordinarily take his share in a gift of a remainder. In re Cochrane (Del.) 85 Atl. 1070, wherein it was said: "Where a testator refers to a class he cannot be held to have intended to include in it dead persons. Gowling v. Thompson, L. R. 11 Eq. (Eng.) 366, note; Grover v. Musther, L. R. 43 Ch. D. (Eng.) 569 (1889). Gifts by substitution are permitted to children of legatees who were dead at the date of the will, but distinctly on the ground that such legatees took by name and not as a class. It is otherwise if the original gift is to a class which is not determinable until the death of the testator, such as a gift to such of his children as shall survive the testator."

In Kentucky it is provided by statute as follows: "When a devise is made to several as a class or as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, and one or more of the devisees shall die before the testator, and another or others shall survive the testator, the share or shares of such as so die shall go to his or their descendants, if any; if none, to the surviving devisees, unless a different disposition is made by the deviser." In Barnhill v. Sharon, 135 Ky. 70, 121 S. W. 983, that statute was applied, the court holding that under a gift of a remainder to "brothers and sister" the issue of a sister who predeceased the testator took the share of their mother.

DINNEEN

v.

AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

DINNEEN

v.

DELAWARE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Nebraska Supreme Court—April 3, 1915.

98 Neb. 97; 152 N. W. 307.

Fire Insurance — Local Regulations as Part of Policy.

When writing insurance on a building situated within the fire limits of a city, the insurance company is bound by the laws and ordinances of the city, and such laws and ordinances should be considered as a part of the policy.

[See note at end of this case.]

Total Loss — What Constitutes — Building Incapable of Repair.

When an insured building is injured by fire to such an extent as to destroy its use as a building and require it to be demolished or removed, the insured will be entitled to recover as for a total loss. Such construction of the valued policy law does not deprive the insurance company of its property without due process of law.

Valued Policy — Provision for Payment of Less than Face of Policy — Validity.

In such case any condition in the policy providing for the payment of a less sum than the amount of the insurance as written therein is void under the provisions of the valued policy law. Rev. St. 1913, § 3210.

New Trial — Time for Filing Motion.

On the trial the jury made special findings of fact without rendering a general verdict. The court discharged the jury, with consent of the parties, and took the case under advisement. The plaintiff excepted to the special findings, and immediately filed a motion to set them aside and for a new trial. After considering the matters of law for some days, the court rendered a judgment in substance as requested by the defendant. Plaintiff within three days filed a motion for a new trial. Held, that such motion was in time, and was a sufficient compliance with the rule.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Douglas county: DAY, Judge.

Actions by John J. Dinneen, administrator, plaintiff, against American Insurance Company and Delaware Insurance Company, defendants. Judgments for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

James B. Kelkenney and John E. Quinn for appellant.

Baldridge, Keller & Keller for appellees.

[98] BARNES, J.—John Kennelly brought two suits in the district court for Douglas county on separate fire insurance policies, but died before the cases were tried. The actions were revived in the name of John J. Dinneen, administrator, and were subsequently consolidated.

It appears that each of the two defendants insured Kennelly against loss by fire to the extent of $1,500 on a three-story frame building situated within the fire limits of the city of Omaha. The insured property was damaged by fire on March 19, 1908. The city of Omaha, pursuant to an ordinance, prevented the repair of the building, and the owner was required to demolish it. Out of what remained after the fire, insured realized $210. Allowing credit for that sum, he demanded from each of the defendants $1,395. Before the loss occurred the value of the building was $5,000. The fire damaged the insured property to the extent [99] of $1,200. Each of the policies contained the following provisions: "This company shall not be liable for loss caused . . . by order of any civil authority." "This company shall not be liable . . . for loss . . . beyond the actual value destroyed by fire, for loss occasioned by ordinance or law regulating construction or repair of buildings." In giving effect to these provisions of the policy, the district court rendered judgment against each of the defendants for $640.81, and from those judgments the plaintiff has appealed, claiming that, within the meaning of the contract of insurance and the valued policy act, the property was wholly destroyed, and that he was entitled to recover as for a total loss. Rev. St. 1913, sec. 3210.

Plaintiff contends that, where the property insured is realty, and is wholly destroyed without criminal fault on the part of the owner, the amount of the insurance written in the policy should be taken conclusively to be the true value of the property insured and the true amount and measure of damages. He argues that the statute eliminates from the insurance contract in controversy the conditions of the policies relating to loss occasioned by city ordinances regulating the construction or repair of buildings. It is also argued that existing laws and ordinances are parts of the insurance policies; that the building was damaged by fire beyond repair; and that as a result the insured property was totally destroyed. There is a stipulation in the record which recites, among other things, the following:

"That on the 19th day of March, 1908, while said contracts of insurance were in full force and effect, said building was burned and damaged by fire to such an extent as to require that it should be repaired before being fit for habitation; that said building was located within the fire limits of the city of Omaha; that Charles H. Withnell, building inspector of the city of Omaha, refused to grant plaintiff's application for a permit to repair said building, because, by reason of said fire, he claimed said building had depreciated in value to an extent greater than 50 per cent of its original value, said building being a frame [100] structure and within the fire limits of the city of Omaha; that the said building inspector recommended to the city council of the city of Omaha that said building be torn down, and on the 17th day of July, 1908, upon a hearing on said recommendation, said building was condemned and ordered torn down by said city council because, in its opinion, said building was in bad condition and depreciated in value to an extent greater than 50 per cent of value of similar buildings above foundation by reason of said fire; that plaintiff obeyed the order of the council, and notified defendants of this fact; that plaintiff notified defendants of the refusal of the building inspector to grant a permit to repair said building, and of the condemnation proceedings of the city council."

It was further stipulated, in substance, that the city ordinances pertaining to buildings within fire limits, as published in Thomas' Revised Ordinances 1905, were in effect at the time of the issuance of the policies herein, at the time of the said fire, at the time of the building inspector's refusal to grant said permit to repair and the condemnation proceedings of the city council. It is a well-established rule that a policy insuring against loss or damages by fire covers loss occasioned by a law prohibiting the repair of a building partially destroyed by fire. Hewins v. London Assur. Corp. 184 Mass. 177, 68 N. E. 62; Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 425; Larkin v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 80 Minn. 527, 83 N. W. 409, 81 Am. St. Rep. 286; Monteleone v. Royal Ins. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1563, 18 So. 472, 56 L.R.A. 784;

Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. v. Garlington, 66 Tex. 103, 18 S. W. 337, 59 Am. Rep. 613; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Nunn, 99 Miss. 493, 55 So. 44.

In Larkin v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. supra, it was said: "The parties are presumed to know of the ordinances. They directly and materially affect their rights in case of a loss under the policy, and should govern and control in the adjustment and settlement of such loss. 4 Joyce Insurance, sec. 3170."

In Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. v. Garlington, supra, it was held: "That the parties having contracted in view [101] of the ordinance, the fire must be deemed the proximate cause of the loss, and the loss total."

In Palatine Ins. Co. v. Nunn, 55 So. 44, 99 Miss. 493, it was said: "A building insured against fire is a 'total loss' where, though only partly burned, it is rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was constructed, and there is an ordinance or law prohibiting reconstruction."

In the note to Monteleone v. Royal Ins. Co. supra, as reported in 56 L.R.A. 784, 793, it is said: "Whenever, by reason of the existence of local ordinances or regulations, it is rendered impossible to repair a partially destroyed building, the insured is liable as for a total loss."

Such is the rule in this state. German Ins. Co. v. Eddy, 36 Neb. 461, 54 N. W. 856, 19 L.R.A. 707; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Bean, 42 Neb. 537, 60 N. W. 907, 47 Am. St. Rep. 711; Insurance Co. of North America v. Bachler, 44 Neb. 549, 62 N. W. 911. In the two cases last cited it was said: "Where real property is wholly destroyed by fire, any provision of a policy of insurance covering such property which in any manner attempts to limit the amount of the loss to less than the sum written in the policy is in conflict with the statutory rule, invalid, and will not be enforced."

The principal question in dispute in this case is whether an insurance company may embody provisions in the policy which provide that it shall not be liable for loss occurring by reason of any ordinance regulating the construction or repair of buildings. This precise point was considered and determined in New Orleans Real Estate Mortg. etc. Co. v. Teutonia Ins. Co. 128 La. 45, 54 So. 466, and in Palatine Ins. Co. v. Nunn, supra, and it was held that such provisions were invalid under a valued policy law. Considering the effect of our former decisions as to what constitutes a total loss, and also giving the valued policy law the weight and effect it seems to us that the legislature intended it to have, we must hold that the conditions of the policy limiting the amount of loss are invalid, and that the building was a total loss to the insured. The Massachusetts case (Hewins

v. London Assur. Corp. supra), relied upon is not based upon a valued policy law, and is not applicable.

[102] It appears that a jury was impaneled to try the case, and at the conclusion of the testimony the plaintiff requested the court to direct a verdict in his favor for the amounts prayed for in his petitions. The court refused the request, and thereupon the jury were required to answer the following interrogatories: (1) To what extent was the property in dispute injured or damaged by reason of the fire itself on March 19, 1908? The jury answered: $1,200. (2) What was the value of the building insured immediately prior to the fire of March 19, 1908? The jury answered: $5,000. Thereupon they were discharged without having rendered a general verdict. The parties then agreed that the legal questions should be reserved for the decision of the court. The plaintiff at once filed a motion to set aside the findings of the jury and for a new trial, and the court took the case under advisement. On May 27, 1912, the court rendered the judgments of which the plaintiff complains. On the 29th day of May a motion for a new trial was filed and overruled, and the plaintiff thereupon perfected his appeal. As we view the record, the court erred in refusing plaintiff's request for a directed verdict as prayed for in his petitions, and defendants' contention that plaintiff failed to file his motion for a new trial within the time provided by statute cannot be sustained.

Finally, it is contended by the defendants that they were not brought before the building inspector or the city council at the time the orders were made refusing the plaintiff the right to repair the building and requiring the same to be demolished. Therefore to require them to pay the amount of the insurance named in the policies is, in effect, taking their property without due process of law. The stipulation shows that defendants had knowledge of the proceedings, but it is true that no summons or other written notice was ever served upon them requiring them to appear and defend against said finding and order. The ordinance contains no provisions for the service of such a notice. At most, the findings and order were mere ministerial or administrative acts, and were within the reasonable [103] discretion of the city authorities. If the injury to the building by the fire was so slight, and the repairs necessary so trifling that the action of the authorities in condemning the property was beyond all reason, they might have been restrained by a court of equity. Therefore this contention is not well founded.

It follows from what has been said that the conditions contained in the policies limiting the recovery to an amount less than is provided by the valued policy law are void. The trial court should have rendered judgment for the amounts claimed in plaintiff's petitions.

The judgment of the district court is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed.

LETTON, J., (concurring).—We have held in this state repeatedly that it is not essential that a structure be totally destroyed in order to make the company liable for a total loss; it is enough that it be destroyed as a building. Other courts, upon good reason, have held that, when it was destroyed as a building by reason of the restrictions of building ordinances, it was a total loss. Our valued policy act provides: "The amount of the insurance written in such policy shall be taken conclusively to be the true value of the property insured and the true amount of loss and measure of damages." Rev. St. 1913, sec. 3210. The insurance company had knowledge of this act when it made the contract, and might have adjusted, and perhaps did adjust, its premium rate to meet the liability. It seems to me that the provision written in the policy to the effect that the amount of insurance shall not be taken to be the true amount of loss violates this statute.

FAWCETT, J., (dissenting).—I have no quarrel with the rule announced in the first paragraph of the syllabus of the majority opinion, that, "when writing insurance on a building situated within the fire limits of a city, the insurance company is bound by the laws and ordinances of the city, and such laws and ordinances [104] should be considered as a part of the policy," but I think the rule should work both ways, and hold that the owner of a building situated within such fire limits should also be bound by the ordinances of the city, and that such ordinances should be considered as a part of the policy he accepts from the insurance company. He knows, as well as the company, that, when a frame building situate within the fire limits is damaged 50 per cent of its value, it cannot be repaired, but will be ordered torn down and removed. But the insurance company and the assured, therefore, in entering into a contract of insurance, have the ordinance before them, and the simple question in this case is: May they enter into a contract, binding upon both, that the assured will assume the risk of having his building torn down after it has suffered a partial loss by fire, and that the insurance company will assume the risk of loss actually caused by the fire, but will not assume the risk of loss or damage to the building over and above that caused thereby, which may be occasioned by the action of the city authorities in ordering the building destroyed? Each of the contracting parties understands fully the part which fire may play in the destruction of such a building, and the part which the ordinance of the city may play in causing such destruction. The company assumes the risk of the former, and the assured of the latter. Is such a contract prohibited by the valued policy act? I think not. In such cases I think the rule is, and should be, that insurance against damage by fire protects the insured against loss resulting from the enforcement of an ordinance prohibiting the repair of his building after its partial destruction by fire, in the absence, and only in the absence, of an agreement to the contrary. Hewins v. London Assur. Corp. 184 Mass. 177, 182, 68 N. E. 62. The provision in controversy relates to the causes of loss and the character, as well as the extent, of the insurer's risk or liability. On these matters parties may make their own agreements, unless they are hampered by valid legislation. A statute restricting the right of contract, as the valued policy law, should not be extended by implication or construction [105] beyond its import and purposes as disclosed by the language of the lawmakers. The purpose of the valued policy act is to prevent insurance at an overvaluation, and to deter insurers from taking reckless risks, by prohibiting them, after a total loss, from claiming that, at the time of issuing the policy, the value of the insured property was not equal to the amount of the insurance. Here the value of the property when the policy was issued and when the fire started is not questioned. The question here is the character of the risk assumed by the company. The statute by its own terms applies to insurance on property wholly destroyed. Where there is only a partial loss by fire, and the damaged building is for that reason demolished under police ordinances, enacted to protect the public against future fires, the character of the risk to be assumed by an insurance company is a lawful subject of contract. If a property owner desires insurance, limited to fire alone, intending to carry his own risk in so far as a city may prevent him from repairing a building partially destroyed by fire, how can he procure such indemnity if he cannot make a lawful contract including those terms? They are not inconsistent with the valued policy act, and there is nothing in the policy indicating a purpose to violate the law or to mislead or defraud the insured. It is a plain, straightforward, honest contract, voluntarily entered into between the parties, and the district court was right in enforcing it as the parties had made it.

Rose, J., joins in dissent.

NOTE.

Effect of Local Ordinance or Regulation on Liability under Fire Insurance Policy.

The parties to a fire insurance contract must make their contract with reference to the local laws affecting the property insured. Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 426; Philadelphia F. Assoc. v. Rosenthal, 108 Pa. St. 474, 1 Atl. 303. Speaking of city ordinances regulating buildings in fire districts, the court in Larkin v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 80 Minn. 527, 83 N. W. 409, 81 Am. St. Rep. 286, said: "They are in the interests of the public welfare and within the police power, and we adopt the view that they become an integral part of all contracts of insurance upon property within the fire limits to which they apply."

Hence, an ordinance forbidding the use of wood in building within a certain district imposes on the insurer, electing to rebuild, the liability for the cost of the necessary material. Philadelphia F. Assoc. v. Rosenthal, 108 Pa. St. 474, 1 Atl. 303, wherein the court said: "The defendants' election imposed no particular obligation to build with wood, if for any reason wood could not be employed; the contract therefore involved no impossibility, it did involve a greater expense, perhaps, than was anticipated, but the plaintiff was in no way responsible for that; and the existence of a police regulation, prohibiting the use of wood, of which they may have had no knowledge, cannot any more relieve them from the obligation of their contract than would the rise of prices of materials in the market. They agreed to put the premises in repair, and they were bound to comply with their contract, using such materials as were suitable for the purpose and were allowed by law. The contract of insurance, and the election under it, were both made after the adoption of the city ordinance. The parties of course contracted with reference to the law, as it existed at the time, and consented to be bound by it; whether the city authorities would permit the building to be repaired in wood was, therefore, a risk which the insurers assumed, at the issuing of the policy, and which they reassumed at the making of the election."

And, as is held in the reported case, an ordinance which prohibits the reconstruction of a partially destroyed building throws on the insurer the liability for the total loss. Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 11 Mich. 426; Larkin v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 80 Minn. 527, 83 N. W. 409, 81 Am. St. Rep. 286; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Nunn, 99 Miss. 493, 55 So. 44; Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. v. Garlington, 66 Tex. 103, 18 S. W. 337, 59 Am. Rep. 613.

See also Monteleone v. Royal Ins. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1563, 18 So. 472, 56 L.R.A. 784. In Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. supra, the court said: "This charter and these ordinances were in existence at the time of the last renewal of the policy. They were local laws affecting the property, and the risk which the defendant assumed, and of which the latter is presumed to have had knowledge, and to have estimated in renewing the policy. Whether, therefore, in case of damage or partial loss, the common council would permit a repair of the building, was a risk which the company took upon itself, because the loss and injury to the plaintiff might depend in amount upon such action of the council, while such loss and injury would be absolutely and actually the consequence of the fire; and because, by the terms of the policy, the company reserved the right to repair or not at option, thus taking the risk of the power to repair, and of all loss which should accrue if repairing should be impossible from any cause. To hold that for an injury to the property, which results, without the fault of the insured, in a total loss to him, so far as value and use are concerned, the insured can only receive compensation to the extent of the appraised damage to the materials of which the building was constructed, and which were destroyed, would establish a narrow, illiberal and illogical rule. The value of the building consisted in its adaptation to use, as well as in the materials of which it consisted; and if it could not be restored to use after the fire, the loss was total, less the value of the materials rescued. In the very pertinent language of the plaintiff's counsel, 'The contract was not simply an agreement to pay for so much material as might be damaged by fire—to pay such amount as the material might actually be worth. Fixed by the conditions of the policy as the most hazardous of all structures, and with a premium adjusted accordingly, the insurer took the risk upon a "three-story wood warehouse," actually in use as such. The risk was not taken upon a mere collection of beams, boards, and other materials, thrown together without purpose or special adaptation. It was upon a building for trade, situated within a particular locality, within the jurisdiction of municipal authorities vested with legislative powers for special purposes, and subject to the exercise of those powers;' and the parties must be regarded as contracting with a full knowledge of all the facts and the law, and the risk to which the property was thereby subjected."

Under a valued policy law, it has been held that a clause in the contract of insurance exempting the insurer from liability for loss occasioned by an ordinance or law regulating the repair of the building is invalid. New Orleans Real Estate, Mortg. etc. Co. v. Teutonia Ins. Co. 128 La. 45, 54 So. 466; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Nunn, 99 Miss. 493, 5 So. 44. And see the reported case. But without reference to a valued policy law, a clause releasing the insurer from liability from loss "occasioned by ordinance or law regulating construction," etc., was given effect in Hewins v. London Assur. Corp. 184 Mass. 177, 68 N. E. 62, wherein it appeared that the loss of the insured was enlarged on account of the building laws of Boston (Stat. 1892, c. 419; Stat. 1894, c. 443).

In Pennsylvania Co. for Ins. on Lives, etc. v. Philadelphia Contributionship, 201 Pa. St. 497, 51 Atl. 351, 57 L.R.A. 510, the question involved was the effect of a statute passed after the issuance of the policy. The court, extending its remarks to include municipal regulation, said: "A contract of insurance may need to be interpreted with regard to changed conditions for the purpose of arriving at a proper standard for estimating the extent of the liability of an insuring company at the time of loss. It is our judgment that the case in hand must fall under such a general classification. It has long been well recognized that building regulations and restrictions were matters properly within the scope of legislative and municipal authorities. This must have been known to the contracting parties at the time when the policy involved in this suit was issued. The defendant company did not, by the terms of the policy, become liable only for the loss which might accrue to the owner of the policy in case of fire to the extent of what it would cost to rebuild the premises injured according to the actual dimensions of the walls of the building as described in the survey. It did insure a building which corresponded to the description therein contained, but the insurance was against loss to the owner by reason of the destruction or injury of that building by fire, and if, in consequence of a state of the law existing at the time of the fire, the loss was increased above what it would have been by reason of regulations which required the rebuilding to be done in some other way, according to some different plan, for the protection of the community, it seems to us that there is nothing in good reason, or in law, why the insuring company would not be held liable for the actual loss thus incurred, up to the extent of the amount designated in the policy, provided the proportional amount of the loss falling upon the company reached that sum. Applying such a principle would not involve the insuring company in any loss greater in extent than that which it undertook to assume when the policy was made, and the method of arriving at the extent of the loss which we have adopted, appears to us a just, reasonable and lawful one. The decision in Brown v. Royal Ins. Co. 1

E. & E. 853 [102 E. C. L. 853] while not ruling the exact question involved in this case, yet may be regarded as in general harmony with the view already expressed, so far as the differing facts of the two cases would allow." But see McCready v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 61 App. Div. 583, 70 N. Y. S. 778.

TITUS

v.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals—
January 27, 1915.

87 N. J. Law 157; 92 Atl. 944.

Fences — Division Fence — Prescriptive Duty to Maintain.

There was evidence to show that the defendant company, and its lessor before it, had maintained a certain fence along the whole line of its right of way past plaintiff's close from the very beginning, although it latterly protested that it was not liable to do so. These protests were inefficacious to discharge the company's liability, and the case was rightly submitted to the jury upon the question of defendant's liability through lack of maintaining a sufficient fence, there being no question of right or obligation on the part of plaintiff or defendant in reference to the fence in question under the provisions of the fence act.

Same.

When for a period of over 20 years the owner of one of two adjoining tracts has continuously, without interruption and as of duty, repaired and maintained the whole of a division fence between them, a presumption arises that he or those under whom he derived title were, as owners of a servient tenement, bound to perpetually make and maintain the fence, the existence of a former and lost agreement to do so may be inferred.

[See note at end of this case.]

Negligence — Fleeing Contributory Negligence — Necessity.

Defendant's answer not containing any statement of fact showing contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and not pleading such a defense according to its legal effect, and such an issue not arising out of the complaint, the defense of contributory negligence was not put in issue; and, not being available on the trial, cannot be raised on appeal.

[See 15 Ann. Cas. 433; Ann. Cas. 1913B 845.]

Same.

Quaere: Where contributory negligence appears from the plaintiff's case upon the trial, being theretofore unknown to the defendant, should not the rule of court, requiring contributory negligence to be pleaded, be relaxed, so that the defendant may have the advantage of that defense without having put it in issue?

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from Supreme Court.

Action by Frank R. Titus, plaintiff, against Pennsylvania Railroad Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AF-FIRMED.

Theodore Strong for appellant.

H. Burdett Herr for respondent.

[158] WALKER, Ch.—This was an action in the Hunterdon Circuit Court for damages for the killing of two cows of the plaintiff by a locomotive engine of the defendant. The cows strayed upon the defendant's right of way by going through a defective fence between the plaintiff's close and the defendant's property, and the right to recover turned principally upon the question as to whose duty it was to maintain the fence—the plaintiff's or defendant's. This question was submitted to the jury as one of fact and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The right of way in question became the property of the defendant's lessor by condemnation of land of the plaintiff's [159] predecessor in title about sixty years ago, with no obligation imposed upon the defendant to build or maintain the fence through which the cows broke out of the plaintiff's close onto the defendant's right of way.

There was evidence to show that the defendant company, and its lessor before it, had maintained this fence along the whole line of its right of way past plaintiff's close from the very beginning, although it latterly protested that it was not liable to do so. These protests were inefficacious to discharge the company's liability, and the case was rightly submitted to the jury upon the question of defendant's liability through lack of maintaining a sufficient fence, there being no question of right or obligation on the part of plaintiff or defendant in reference to the fence in question under the provisions of the Fence act.

Motions to nonsuit and direct a verdict, based on the contention that there was no duty shown to exist on the part of the railroad company to maintain the fence, among other reasons, were properly denied. Among the reasons was that of contributory negligence, which will be treated of hereafter. The others entirely lacked substance.

On behalf of the defendant objection was made to that part of the trial judge's charge which dealt with the common law as to the prescriptive obligation of the defendant to repair the fence and to the leaving it to the jury to decide whether, continuously and without interruption for over twenty years, the defendant maintained the fence, in which event the judge declared that the company would be liable. Upon this question the judge charged:

"That it is the law in this state that when for a period of over twenty years the owner of one of two adjoining tracts has continuously, without interruption and as of duty, repaired and maintained the whole of the division fence, a presumption would arise that he or those under whom he derived the title were, as owners of a servient tenement, bound to perpetually make and maintain the fence. The existence of a former and lost agreement to do so may be inferred; and that, gentlemen, is the crucial question in [160] this case for you to decide; whether, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant was not obliged to maintain this fence under any statute or under its charter, it did, as a matter of fact, for a period of over twenty years, continuously, without interruption, and as a duty repair and maintain the whole of the fence along plaintiff's property. If you find from the evidence that it did, then the law would infer an agreement on the part of the company to perpetually make and maintain the fence, and if it failed to do so and by reason of such failure the plaintiff's cattle passed through the breaches in the fence upon the company's right of way and were killed or injured thereon by defendant's engine, then the defendant is liable in damages for the injury or destruction of such cattle."

The Supreme Court in Castner v. Riegel, 54 N. J. L. 498, 24 Atl. 484, said (at p. 500):

"That an obligation to maintain partition fences might arise by prescription which could be enforced by the writ curia claudenda at common law, does not admit of doubt. This right was said by Gale & Whately to be a spurious kind of easement. Gale & W. Easem. 201, 202. The easement seems to be founded upon the duty which at common law required the owner of a close, at his peril, to keep his cattle thereon, and to prevent them from trespassing on an adjoining close, and when the owner of the latter erected a fence for his protection and maintained it for the prescriptive period, he was deemed to have discharged his neighbor from his original duty and to have become bound to protect his own close by some grant or agreement, the evidence of which was lost by lapse of time. But in whatever way the right arose there can be no question that it did arise by prescription at common law."

And (at p. 503):

"When for a period of over twenty years the owner of one of two adjoining tracts had continuously, without interruption and as of duty, repaired and maintained the whole of the division fence, in my judgment a presumption would arise that he or those under whom he derived title were, as [161] owners of a servient tenement, bound to perpetually make and maintain the fence. The existence of a former and lost agreement to do so may be inferred, and no other inference would be consistent with the circumstances."

It will be seen at a glance that the doctrine of Castner v. Riegel is dispositive of the concrete fact that the defendant company in the case at bar was liable by prescription to have imposed upon it the duty of maintaining the fence between its right of way and plaintiff's close, if, in fact, it had maintained the fence along the whole of the dividing line between their respective premises for the statutory period of twenty years or more, and, as already remarked, there was evidence justifying the finding of the jury that the railroad company had in fact so maintained the fence.

The defendant requested the court to charge that if the plaintiff were aware that the fence was not in a secure condition and nevertheless pastured his cattle in the field bounded by it, he was guilty of contributory negligence and could not recover. This the court declined to do, and defendant now urges this refusal as one of the grounds of appeal. The question thus raised is not, however, necessary to be considered, because it was not pleaded as a defence.

The Practice act (1912) in section 3 provides that the pleadings in all actions shall be according to rules of court. Rule 40 in Schedule A annexed to the act provides that the answer must specifically state any defence which is consistent with the truth of the material allegations of the complaint, and any defence which, if not stated, would raise issues not arising out of the complaint, for instance, contributory negligence. Rule 21 provides that acts may be stated according to their legal effect, but in so doing the pleading should fairly apprise the adverse party of the state of facts which it is intended to prove. These same rules are now rules 35 and 58, Supreme Court, 1913.

Now, in the answer filed by the defendant company there is no statement of fact showing contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, nor any pleading of such a defence according to its legal effect, nor does such an issue arise [162] out of the complaint in this case. Therefore, by the terms of the Practice act and rules of court under which this suit was instituted and tried, the defence of contributory negligence was not put in issue and could not be availed of by the defendant on the trial, and, upon familiar principles, it cannot be raised here.

It may well be observed in this connection that by rule 5 annexed to the Practice act, now rule 218 of the Supreme Court, it is provided that the rules may be relaxed or dispensed with by the court in any case where it shall be manifest that strict adherence to them will work surprise or injustice; and the query naturally arises whether, where contributory negligence appears from the plaintiff's case upon the trial, being theretofore unknown to the defendant, the rule of pleading ought not to be relaxed, so that the defendant may have the advantage of that defence without having put it in issue, as that was impossible. This question, however, is not pressing for solution, because the facts constituting contributory negligence, if there were such negligence in this case, were known to the defendant before the trial.

The other matters assigned for error and urged upon our attention we deem to be without merit. The judgment, therefore, will be affirmed, with costs.

For reversal: None.

NOTE.

Prescriptive Obligation to Maintain Division Fence.

Generally.

Statutes in most jurisdictions now provide for the construction of partition or division fences by equal contribution of the owners of adjacent land and for the adjustment by a public officer of conflicting rights growing out of that construction. See 11 R. C. L. tit. Fences p. 883. A statute of that kind does not affect a prescriptive obligation of one of the owners to maintain such a fence. Barber v. Whiteley, 11 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 822, 13 L. T. N. S. 319, 13 W. R. 774, 34 L. J. Q. B. 212; Binney v. Hull Common, etc. Lands, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 503; Castner Riegel, 54 N. J. L. 498, 24 Atl. 484. Thus in Binney v. Hull Common, etc. Lands, supra, it was said: "If he who is bound prescriptively to maintain a fence, builds it and brings his action under the statute, he will fail, because the statute was not made to relieve him from an obligation created perhaps with his title to the land, and proved by prescription." In Glidden v. Towle, 31 N. H. 169, the court said that prescriptive duty to maintain a fence must have originated before the enactment of the statute in order to prevent the fence viewers from having jurisdiction. See also Chase v. Jeffs, 58 N. H. 43. But in Gibson v. Heyward, 67 N. H. 265, 30 Atl. 407, the court indicated that this was changed by the Act of 1862 so that an obligation might exist by prescription, unimpaired by the statute.

Accordingly the common-law rule that the obligation to erect or repair a division fence may be created by prescription seems to be generally in force. Nowel v. Smith, Cro. Eliz. (Eng.) 709; Star v. Rookesby, 1 Salk. (Eng.) 335; Boyle v. Tamlyn, 6 B. & C. 329, 13 E. C. L. 191; Barber v. Whiteley, 11 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 822, 13 L. T. N. S. 319, 13 W. R. 774, 34 L. J. Q. B. 212; Lawrence v. Jenkins, L. R. 8 Q. B. (Eng.) 274; Knox v. Tucker, 48 Me. 373, 77 Am. Dec. 233; Harlow v. Stinson, 60 Me. 347; Binney v. Hull Common, etc. Lands, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 503; Rust v. Low, 6 Mass. 90; Brinson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 335, affirming 118 Mass. 156; Castner v. Riegel, 54 N. J. L. 498, 24 Atl. 484; Adams v. Van Alstyne, 25 N. Y. 232. And see the reported case. See also Heath v. Ricker, 2 Greenl. (Me.) 72; Little v. Lathrop, 5 Greenl. (Me.) 360; Thayer v. Arnold, 45 Mass. 589; Kennedy v. Owen, 136 Mass. 199; Canefox v. Crenshaw, 24 Mo. 199, 69 Am. Dec. 427.

Thus in Kennedy v. Owen, 136 Mass. 199, the court said that it was the law of the commonwealth "that an obligation of an owner of land to fence against land adjoining might be established by prescription, and, if so established, would be a charge upon his land; and the corresponding right of the owner of the adjoining land to have the fence maintained was recognized as in the nature of an easement."

In Lawrence v. Jenkins, L. R. 8 Q. B. (Eng.) 274, it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant occupied adjoining lands separated by a fence. Two cows of the plaintiff got through a gap in the fence and fed on the leaves of a yew tree from the effects of which they died. It was held that the defendant was liable in damages for the loss of the cows notwithstanding he had no knowledge of the injury done to the fence for the reason that by prescription the defendant was bound at his own risk to have a sufficient fence always existing. The court said: "By prescription, a landowner may be bound to maintain a fence upon his land for the benefit of the occupier of the adjoining close. This obligation is described by Gale in his work on Easements as in the nature of a spurious easement affecting the land of the party who is bound to maintain the fence."

So in Rust v. Low, 6 Mass. 90, it was said: "Prescription to fence is allowed at common law, as resulting from an original grant or agreement, the evidence of which is lost by lapse of time; and it is reasonable that the agreement produced should be as effectual as a presumption that it once existed, but is lost, arising from ancient usage. The country has now been settled long enough to allow of the time necessary to prove a prescription, and ancient assignments by fence-viewers made under the late provincial laws, and also ancient agreement made by the parties, may have once existed, and be now lost by the lapse of time."

In Binney v. Hull Common, etc. Lands, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 503, it was held that a prescriptive obligation of an owner of land to maintain a division fence was not destroyed by the owner's becoming a tenant in common of the adjoining land. The court said: "The rights to the two parcels of land are distinct, and the proprietors are distinct. If there would be a difficulty, the defendants being mere tenants in common with the plaintiff, that difficulty is cured by the incorporation of the defendants. They are now distinct parties. And even if they now were merely tenants in common, the difficulty would be on the plaintiff's side, from an incapacity to sue himself with others. The authorities cited go to show, that where there is a union of titles and possession, an easement does not exist; but that principle is inapplicable to the present case. Here the land and the titles are distinct, and the defendants may well prescribe for an easement in the plaintiff's land, or against his right to a contribution in building and repairing fences." See also Gibson v. Heyward, 67 N. H. 265, 30 Atl. 407. But in Boyle v. Tamlyn, 6 B. & C. 329, 13 E. C. L. 191, the court said that where a person became the owner of an entirety, afterwards parting with one of the two closes, a prescriptive obligation to maintain a division fence would not be revived unless expressly so done in a deed or conveyance.

In Carpenter v. Cook, 71 Vt. 110, 41 Atl. 1038, it appeared that a fence which the plaintiff had at times maintained between his doorway and a pent road was wholly on his own land. The defendant claimed that she was entitled by prescription to have the plaintiff maintain and keep up the fence and gate. The court holding that the defendant had no prescriptive right in regard to the fence and gate said: "Conceding that if the plaintiff had so kept and maintained this fence and gate for fifteen years continuously, the defendant would be entitled to the right by prescription to have it kept up and maintained thereafter, a question upon which we express no opinion, it does not appear that it was kept up and maintained except 'at occasional intervals,' 'occasionally,' and the referee finds the gate was open 'much of the time during the year,' and the report does not show that the fence was kept up for fifteen years prior to the fall of 1871."

As to Portion of Fence.

A prescriptive obligation on the part of the owners of adjoining land to maintain each a certain portion of a division fence may exist. Heath v. Ricker, 2 Greenl. (Me.) 72; Knox v. Tucker, 48 Me. 373, 77 Am. Dec. 233; Harlow v. Stinson, 60 Me. 347. See also Sturtevant v. Merrill, 33 Me. 62. Compare Castner v. Riegel, 54 N. J. L. 498, 24 Atl. 484; Adams v. Van Alstyne, 25 N. Y. 232. Thus in Knox v. Tucker, supra, it appeared that about thirty years before the action was brought one Forbes owned the plaintiff's lot, and one Roberts owned the adjoining lot, and at that time, while they were occupying and improving their lots, Forbes built a certain portion of the fence, and Roberts a certain other portion of it, and that the fence had ever since been recognized as the division fence. It was never a joint fence on any part of the line. It was, from the time it was first erected, a fence built by the respective owners, each building a distinct portion. The part of the fence built by Forbes was rebuilt by the occupant of his lot some years after. The court holding that they could safely presume some original grant or agreement between the parties by which a legal division of the fence was established said: "This occupation continued undisturbed and unquestioned for, at least, twenty-five years. When the plaintiff rebuilt his part in 1853, he made no claim on the owner of the adjacent lot to build it as a joint fence, although he built it for a line fence. He took no steps to call on fence-viewers. The tendency of modern decisions and statutes has been to diminish the length of time required to establish or limit rights by prescription or by statutes of limitation." But in Castner v. Riegel, 54 N. J. L. 498, 24 Atl. 484, the court said that the prescriptive right to have a division fence maintained ran only where it appeared that the person to be charged with the duty had maintained the entire fence and not a portion of it for the prescriptive period. See also Adams v. Van Alstyne, 25 N. Y. 232. In Gibson v. Heyward, 67 N. H. 265, 30 Atl. 407, it was held that under a statute the division of a partition fence between the owners of adjoining closes might be determined by usage and acquiescence. See also Chase v. Jeffs, 58 N. H. 43. In Webber v. Closson, 35 Me. 26, wherein it appeared that the owners of adjoining lands maintained a division fence jointly, it was held that neither of them was bound to maintain any separate and distinct portion of it as the result of a prescriptive obligation.
